We have said Mr. Squander was a prisoner in his own house; and this is true. Sometimes, however, he took heart of grace and ventured out, always accompanied, however, by a pretty strong body-guard, well armed—principally consisting of his two sons, myself, and three or four stout and resolute tenants. Poor man, this was a great relief to him, especially when attending the neighbouring races, or the Bally scamper hounds. Not an occasion occurred of the kind, it is true, on which there was not from one to half-a dozen bailiffs after him. If, however, to feast their eyes upon him might be considered a gratification, they undoubtedly enjoyed it; but there their satisfaction rested. To attempt serving him with a writ—much less the fearful hazard of an arrest—was what none of them, aware as they were of the hatred which animated the people against all law proceedings, would any more think of doing than he would deliberately put his head into a heated furnace. Nay, their very disguises, in point of ingenuity and effect, were such as could be equalled on any stage in Europe, and it was only by the peculiarity of their movements that they were known. Sometimes, a simple-looking farmer, dressed in comfortable frieze, and apparently well to do in the world, would keep dodging about the Squire, as he was often called, and narrowing the circle, or diminishing the distance between himself and his object by such imperceptible degrees, that the secret was at once discovered. On such occasions some one of us put his finger in his mouth, and, giving a loud, ear-piercing, fierce whistle, called out at the top of his voice "Wan hawk!" after which a dozen pistols were out, the caps or flints looked to, and, in an instant, the three individuals apprehended the farmer, who kept gradually withdrawing—his pace accelerating as he went along—until at length he fairly fled at the top of his speed, and it was seldom indeed he got off without what is called a shirtful of sore bones, and that by strangers of whom he knew nothing, and who had only got a mere hint of his purpose.

On such occasions as these I was found to be very useful. My father having been a bailiff, attached to the Dublin courts, before he was engaged to act in that capacity for Mr. Squander, had related so many anecdotes connected with the difficulty of arresting the southern and western gentry—the latter especially—that there was scarcely a metamorphosis or manœuvre connected with the craft which had not been familiar to me. Two or three of those which occurred to Mr. Squander I will now mention.

One day in the year 1831, I think, the land-steward was out near a young shrubbery, when he detected a country man, dressed in tattered frieze, and without a shoe or stocking, trimming a young oak sapling into a cudgel. The moment the man saw him he hastily threw the sapling aside, and took to his heels. The steward, however, who was a young, active fellow, pursued him at an extremely rapid pace, and by the force of strong running overtook and made a prisoner of him.

"Come, my good fellow," said he, "come along to where you were cutting the sapling—I will teach you to come into another man's property and destroy his young timber."

"Ah, thin, shir, fwhat the sake o' your fwadher and mudher's sowls, an' have compunct i or me this wanst—do, good gintleman—do, a yinnaustle—I'm but a poor boy, shir, that was making preparations fwhor the faction fwoight at Ballyboutteen Fair on next Winsday [Wednesday]—do, good gintleman, an' may ever hair on your head become a mould candle to light you into glory! Amin, a chierna!"

"What's your name?"

"I'm wan Barney Muckleswag, shir—a son o' my fwadher's, sir—ould Jimmy, the tacher [thatcher], and of Molly Nahannahin, my mudher, sir, God rest both their sowls! Will you let me go; an', shir, 'tis a harmless boy I am; an' if I could only crack Barney Cullinan's skull so, so as to give him his gruel widout puttin' it down his throat, my conscience 'ud be asy, an' I'd sleep continted, glory be to God!"

"Worse and worse, you scoundrel. So, in order to take away another man's life, you come into Mr. Squander's oak shrubbery and cut down his timber. Come, my fine fellow, where did you throw that same sapling I saw you cut? You and it must both appear before Mr. Squander, who, you know well, is a magistrate. Jog on, I tell you, till we get the sapling."

"Ah, thin, gud gintleman—for sure 'tis in your fwhace the gudness is—have compression and resolution an a poor harmless boy this blessed day that's in it. I'm a yinnaustle [gentleman]; do, asourneen [my dear]; and may God couldinn your sowl to ivarlastin' happiness and reprobation, as he will I hope. Do, shir; an' let the poor boy aff, shir. I was never in but only fwour times, shir. 'Twas parjury was agunst me, shir. They shwore that I put a kindyel [candle] to Major Hennessy's bastack, shir, an' me as innocent as St. Judas himself, shir: but they fwailed, an' I came out fair an' clane, glory be to God. An' what's moreover, shir, I'm fhwastin' widout a bit or sup since Tursday last. Oh, sweet Jasus! if I had only a moutful!"

Here he became desperately pathetic, and wept bitterly at the calamity into which he had fallen.

"Ha!" exclaimed the steward, "I see what a customer I've got; but no matter, trot along, my worthy—not a word now—I'm flint—adamant—so spare your breath."

He then led him along until they had reached the spot where the sapling lay—a frightful weapon—which the steward immediately took up, after which they directed their steps to the Castle.

"My good fellow," said the steward, as they went along, "I suppose you are right well aware that for some time past our young oak timber has been cut down and stolen, for purposes similar to yours; and as we have been on the look-out for the culprits, and as we have found you in the act, you may take my word for it that you'll soon make your fifth visit to the stone jug. You have been in four times you say; and don't you know, now, that four and one make five, all the world over?"

Grief, deep, vehement, and loud, prevented the detected thief from making any reply, and in the course of about a quarter of an hour they arrived at the Castle, the prisoner crying at the top of his lungs as he ascended the hall steps in the firm grip of his captor.

A knock of confidence and business, accompanied by a hasty ring at the bell, gave indication that the master was wanted to attend to something earnest and pressing in his magisterial capacity. I was up in Master Tom's room at the time, where, indeed, I spent a good many hours every day, and some of the pleasantest to which my memory can now look back. Mr. Squander, as usual, was in the front parlour, and hearing the steward's voice, knew that there could be no danger; he accordingly threw up the window, and, looking out, asked what was the matter.

"A scoundrel, sir, that I caught cutting down one of the young oaks in Cracton's nursery."

"Ha!" exclaimed Mr. Squander, "have you pounced upon one of the villains at last? I'm very glad of it; bring him round here to the window."

Now the parlour windows of the castle were not more than four feet from the ground; but it is necessary to state, that, for the purpose of protecting both person and property, they had been powerfully secured by strong removable bars of iron, which were laid aside every day, or at least when no particular apprehension of writ or arrest existed.

"You have caught the scoundrel in the act?" asked his master, throwing up the window.

"I have caught him in the act, sir," he replied, "and here is the sapling."

In the meantime the unfortunate vagabond was howling with the most outrageous grief; indeed so loud was it, and so apparently heart-rending, that Tom and I were startled at its violence, and raised the windows that we might understand the nature of what was going forward. On looking down we saw the fellow on his two knees, with his hands up, in an attitude of the most abject supplication towards Mr. Squander, whilst the steward was pointing to the fatal sapling as a testimony against the thief. The window from which I looked, commanded a full view of the lodge and entrance gate, outside which I saw a servant in livery, mounted and leading a saddled horse by the bridle. On listening for a moment I understood the whole thing at once. The young oak shrubbery had been cut down in hundreds, to such an extent, in fact, that rewards had been offered for the apprehension of the delinquents, but hitherto without effect.

"We must commit him," said Mr. Squander. "Lodge informations, Moore; I am glad we have caught one of them."

"Certainly, sir," replied the steward; "there is the proof against him, and a hell of a weapon it is," he added, throwing it on the ground.

"Ah, you scoundrel!" said the magistrate, "I wonder you are not ashamed to look me in the face."

"Ah, thin, your haner, it's I that ought to blush if I'd be ashamed to look you in the fwace, for in troth it's it that's the jintlemanly, good face, an' its your haner's fwoure bones* that has the open an' generous hand, the hand, shir, that was ever an' awlways good for givin', but the divil, by all accounts, for gettin'; and in regard, your worthy haner, that it's open now," he added, starting to his feet, and clapping a writ into it, "just take this, shir, "it's a true copy, and here's the ouriginal; and now you're served."

He had no sooner uttered these words, than he whipped up the sapling, and with one blow of it tumbled the unsuspecting steward upon the steps, exclaiming, as he did it, "that sapling, my good fellow, was never grown in your nursery; I brought it with me." After which he bounded away like a buck, dropped from the wall near the lodge, which was banked up inside nearly to the top; mounted one of the horses, and ere many minutes was completely beyond reach of pursuit.

This man was one of three brothers who acted as bailiffs only in cases of difficulty, but we need hardly say that in Ireland these cases of difficulty were so numerous, that it was no easy matter to succeed in securing the services of these brothers. They never undertook a capture under fifty pounds, but this was the minimum. Cases have frequently occurred where the reward amounted sometimes to one, and not unfrequently to five hundred pounds. In the case in question no earthly being could avoid being taken in. The character of the low-minded, wavering, but vindictive scoundrel, was so ably sustained, that suspicion would have been beyond the range of human caution.

One would imagine that manœuvres of this kind would sharpen a man against the very possibility of being outwitted. There are no bounds, however, to natural ingenuity; and as a case that exhibited as grave and ludicrous a piece of invention as ever was played off on any man, occurred some months after that already recorded, we shall relate it here.

At that period it was usual—for what reason it is difficult to account, unless to obstruct the course of public justice—it was usual, we say, to remove the police from one district to another, just when they had been long enough in any one locality to make themselves acquainted with its state and condition, with the peaceable and ill-disposed, and, in fact, with all the bad and suspicious characters in it. This very sapient piece of policy has, we are glad to know, been since relinquished, but, at all events, it was the practice at the period of which we are now writing. So many attempts had been already made to serve Mr. Squander with writs, as well as to arrest him, that the strictest orders were given to allow no man near the house unless he were well known, with the exception only of the police, whose uniform was a sufficient passport for their admittance to the lodge, and consequently to the Castle. A few days previous to the incident we are about to relate, a dreadful murder had been committed in the neighbouring county, and, as a natural consequence, the police were everywhere on the alert. One evening, therefore, pretty late, in fact nearly dusk, a policeman, accompanied by a person who was evidently a prisoner, made his appearance and knocked at the hall-door. The magistrate on hearing the knock immediately gave the word "Ware hawk!" and accordingly old Nogher Nult, the butler, opened the window and asked what was the matter.

"I want Mr. Squander," replied the policeman, "to back a warrant. It is about Mr. M'Gregor, the Scotch steward's murder, and I have a prisoner on suspicion."

"Wait there," replied Nogher, "and I will tell the master."

Mr. Squander having heard the circumstances thus briefly, sent Nogher back to desire the policeman to stand on the Lall steps with the prisoner fast in custody, for he declared to God there was no knowing but that the policeman himself might have been taken in, and the supposed murderer nothing but a cursed bailiff in disguise. The policeman replied, that being only a stranger in the neighbourhood, he had not been aware that Mr. Squander was in any apprehension of arrest; but pledged himself that he would not allow the prisoner to approach him or to go near the window at all.

The magistrate accordingly came to the window on the strength of this assurance, and as usual threw it up.

The policeman on seeing him, put his hand to his cap, saying, by way of respectful inquiry, "Mr. Squander, sir?"

"Yes, I am Mr. Squander. What's the matter?"

"I have arrested a man, sir, who, according to the Hue and Cry, corresponds to the description of M'Gregor's murderer, and I wish your worship to back the warrant. I have reason to think he is connected with that, or something suspicious, at all events."

"You are one of the new police, are you?"

"Yes, your worship. I suppose you are aware that we only arrived at Ballyscamper Station the day before yesterday; and as you were the nearest magistrate, sir, I came to you, as was my duty."

"Very right, policeman; very right. But as to that scoundrel, your prisoner, you don't know what he may be—stop a moment. Here, Nogher, go and hold that fellow that the policeman has prisoner, until I back the warrant."

The unfortunate prisoner appeared to be thunderstruck. "Why," said he, addressing Nogher, who had seized him, "divil the like of this ever was heard. Amn't i one of his honour's tenants; and this blaguard policeman not me only a little below the lodge."

"Why, man o' Moses!" exclaimed Nogher, "is this Mat Brennan?"

"Divil a other; but what that fellow manes by taking me into custody I cannot undherstand. Be the livin' mortual, I have a great notion to give him his head in his fist. Devil resave the foot he'd have brought me here, only that I was comin', at all events, to pay my rent."

The policeman, in the meantime, went to the window, and, after a few words upon the topic of the murder, with which he seemed to have been well acquainted, handed up the warrant to Mr. Squander.

* By William Carleton, Author of "Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry," 'The Black Prophet,' &c. Office of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON LIBRARY, 227, Strand, London.

An Irish peripatetic for an individual.

"That's the writ," sir, said he, "a true copy: and here's the original. You're duly served." And having uttered these words, he bounded away at the top of his speed, reached the wall as before, mounted his horse—for it was the same individual who had cut the sapling—and in a few minutes was out of sight.

The third and last "service" which we shall relate was also executed through the unconscious instrumentality of a policeman. The town of Belly-Squander was not more than a quarter of a mile distant from the Castle. It was what is called a half-town; or, as the humorous Dr. Twigg, a shrewd, clever, good-looking little fellow, full of kindness and humanity, who wore an outside coat, somewhat like our present Chesterfield, with his hands easily stuck in the pockets of it—as he, we say, once called it, a profile—for, in point of fact, there was only a string of houses on one side, and a wall, behind which stood the empty and unoccupied palace of a rich bishop, on the other; so that the half-town might be said to resemble a half-face, or profile, as aforesaid. Be this as it may, there came to market on the day in question, which was Saturday, a strolling vagabond, who had a card-table, on which lay a pack of old greasy cards, which he shuffled about with great dexterity, challenging the country folks, as they came around him, to take a hand and try their luck, for any sum from sixpence a game to a pound. Human nature—the desire of wealth—the tendency to win it by short cuts, is as strong among the humble and vulgar, as it is among the high and educated.

A shrewd, warm-looking countryman put down a shilling, and having cut for deal, he won it. The game commenced, and it appeared for some time that the latter had fortune at his finger's ends. He won almost every game, and from a shilling it rose to five shillings a game, when the owner of the table stopped, and said he would play no more. The countryman insisted he should go on; the bystanders supported him, and with great reluctance the gambler resumed the play. His opponent, already confident in his own run of good luck, increased the stakes, but, in the course of a little time, Fortune, as she frequently does, shifted to the other side. The countryman now became desperate, double the stakes, lost his coolness, and, as a natural consequence, lost his luck. In short, he was cleaned out; but so ungovernable became his temper under this change of fortune, that on finding all his money gone somewhat about fifteen pounds—he raised his fist and knocked the gambler down. Now, it so happened that there were a couple of policemen looking on all the while; but before they had time to interfere, the countryman struck his opponent three or four blows, by which the poor devil was desperately cut; so severely, indeed, that the blood was flowing from his mouth and nose. In most of the cases of this kind, the country people always stand by each other; at least, in this case they did. The unfortunate gambler's table was torn into fragments, his cards flung into the street; and were it not that the policemen interfered, he would himself have been still more severely punished. On seeing the "authorities" present, he immediately charged his brutal assailant, and requested to be brought before a magistrate. The policemen, having been present, and witnessed the assault and violence, could not refuse to take the charge, and in consequence both were brought before Mr. Squander, who lived nearest to the spot. This occurred about two o'clock in the day. Mr. Squander, on the occasion in question, knew the policeman, which in a great degree eased his mind, and gave him a good deal of confidence. Having come to the window, which he raised, "Harricks," said he, addressing the sergeant, "what is this? You know my situation, and must have heard how I have been done by affairs of this nature. Keep these two men off till I hear the whole circumstance. What is it?"

Harricks, who, with his companion, had witnessed all that we have narrated, now gave him a full detail of what had happened, which, by the way, was so natural, that the very devil of suspicion could not have felt alarm.

"Here, Harricks," said he, "it is all right; the matter was a chance affair, the result of ill-luck on behalf of the countryman. I understand his feelings well, and curse him if I much blame him. We cannot violate the law, however; but, at all events, bring them down to Widow Bere, and let us hear what they have to say for themselves." This being complied with, and the parties placed before him, he asked—

"What is this? A gambling transaction, eh? Who is the plaintiff?"

"I am, sir," replied a shrewd-looking, keen fellow, with a thin face, like that of a Norman lurcher, or Irish dog of Ireland.

"And what's your charge against him?"

"Look at my face, sir. Look at my mouth and nose, and you need scarcely ask that. He first won from me, sir, till he left me only five shillings; a then wanted to stop, but he insisted that a should play on. Well, a did so; and a won—and when he found he had no more money, sell be from my saul, but he struck and abused me, as you see."

"What have you to say to this, my good fellow?" asked the magistrate.

The countryman gave his whole body an immense shrug, and, scratching the top of his head with his two fingers, replied—

"It was foul play of the villain, your honour. Can you deny, you blaggard o' the univarse, that you reneagued Con Roe (the ace of hearts) to my Five fingers?"

"A do deny it—it's your own case you're tellin'."

"Oh, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John protect us! Did any one ever hear the like o' this? Didn't I get the last trick when we were down for the twenty-five shillins, and the Earl o' Cork? Didn't I, you achsmin' vagabone?"

"What do you mean by the Earl of Cork?" asked Mr. Squander.

"Why, sir, I had two thricks and the lead for the third. Well and good. I led the Earl o'Cork, and he had nothing but the ten o' clubs."

"But what do you mean by the Earl of Cork?"

"The ace of diamonds, your honour. It's the worst ace and the worst card in the pack, and is called the Earl o' Cork because he's the poorest nobleman in Ireland."

"That's all a cursed lie," replied the gambler; "an' besides, your honour, a was licked bekaise a'm an Orangeman—a true blue, your honour—that's Justice Pope and Property, brass money, and wooden shoe. As for this blaggard, he knows nothing about the Earl o' Cork; but if you'd wish to see him, sir, here he is as large as life," handing a printed paper to Mr. Squander—"there's the Earl o' Cork, sir, a true copy, and this is the original. Come, Ned, the horses are ready."

It is unnecessary to say that these were two of the celebrated Donnel ties—for such, in fact, was their name—and that the horses were ready outside the lodge, to carry them beyond the reach of pursuit, which they did.

"Now these (says Mr. Carleton) are not cases of fiction, wrought up into fulsome and impossible extravagance, in order to create a laugh. On the contrary, they are facts which have actually occurred."

The death of old Mr. Squander, and of the aristocratic Mrs. Squander, and the career of extravagance of the eldest son, in which he was zealously assisted by his brother, are incidents all powerfully told. But how the young men hoped, at one time, to retrieve their desperate fortunes on the turf, and at another by the exercise of political influence, and by the possession of a seat in Parliament, all of which involved them successively in still greater pecuniary embarrassment than that from which they so madly struggled to be relieved, will be found at full length in the volumes themselves. Any attempt to convey a notion of those incidents by a mere summary of the events would fail to impress the reader with the merits of Mr. Carleton's treatment of the subject. The following, however, which describes what is, even now that the country is half depopulated, a common occurrence, will speak for itself:—

The morning of the day on which we went to commence the work of extermination was bitter and cold. All the regular and legal steps had been in due and proper course taken, and nothing remained but the expulsion of the unhappy people. But before I proceed further, I must make this business a little better understood. Ever since the election, Harry had exhibited, by his conduct, a dark and vindictive feeling against certain tenants upon the Five Townlands who had sufficient independence to vote against him. Though vindictive, however, he was not without caution, and on this occasion he was aided and instructed by "Greasy Pockets." In his case there were two principles combined, both of which were calculated from their nature to operate against the unfortunate tenantry. The first was that of the public class, to which he belonged—because, although only acting for his brother, I consider him in the capacity of a landlord—by which I mean the determination, at all risks, to clear and consolidate the property. This he held in common with almost all other landowners; but it did not involve any personal feeling of ill-will against the tenant beyond that which necessarily resulted from the act itself, and drove the unfortunate men to ruin. Many such men have cleared their property—frequently with regret, I admit—but in every case from a principle which they conceived to be only an act of justice to themselves, and a step essentially necessary to save their property from destruction. In addition to this, as I have said, Harry entertained a principle of personal enmity against a number of the voters alluded to, which was pretty well known to originate from their unmanageable recusancy at the election. Here, then, were two motives in existence; one upon what was considered by the landlord as the undoubted exercise of his public right; and the other upon a matter of private and vindictive feeling.

"Greasy Pockets" had written to persons in England and Scotland, to look out for intelligent agriculturists with sufficient capital for the management of large farms; and at this period several conditional offers from such individuals had been made. All, however, of the lands in question had neither been seen nor examined by the strangers; and now we shall proceed with the business of that melancholy day.

The morning, as we said, was cold and bitter, and ere we had been long out it began to rain. In this remorseless campaign against the poor, those who conducted it experienced no principle of combination and public resistance as was the case in what was called the Tithe Rebellion. This patient submission to the law of the land infused a character into such proceedings that was calculated to smite almost any heart except those which were engaged in them, and reminded one of the calm and unresisting heroism with which the primitive Christians endured the persecutions of martyrdom. It is true there were exceptions, in which nature and the original impulse of self-preservation attempted to assert their rights as well as they could; but in no country on the face of the earth was there ever witnessed such a pitiable mass of unresisting misery subjected to a tyranny which no humane man would inflict upon the dog of his enemy.

At length we reached the first village in which our political engine of death was to commence its operations. I had never yet witnessed anything of the kind, and felt as if the act we were about to commit was actually one of secrecy and underhandedness. I knew there was no necessity for my presence, but Harry, who was so perfectly aware of the state of the country, with his usual caution insisted that "Greasy Pockets" and myself should accompany him, in order that the onus of the act, by being divided, as it were, between three of us, should be the less likely to fall heavily on himself. This was like him; but with all his cunning he miscalculated the sense and shrewdness of the people, as will be seen before we conclude.

In the first house we came to there was none sick, or, as far as we could see, ailing of any complaint. The family consisted of a man aged about sixty, whose countenance must have been naturally placid, if not mirthful, in earlier and better days. At present, however, the expression of deep care and dread of what was to take place, together with a knowledge of the consequences to him and his family, spoke that calm sternness of mentality, of the inmost desolation which had come upon him and them, that I actually looked at Harry to make myself certain whether after all he had been in earnest in this proceeding, and that it was only his intention to give these persons a good wholesome fright, and let it end there. How with a human heart in his bosom he could turn that old man out to rot, who lived, himself and his ancestors, so long upon the family property, was a matter to which I could scarcely lend my assent. His wife was much about his own age, and most of the family which resided with them were females. There were three of the latter and two boys, one who looked younger, one about the age of twelve, and the other eight. The girls were fresh, modest-looking creatures, and their mother, though now, like her husband, worn and pale, had yet about her a decent and comely look. I saw at once, from the appearance of the whole family, that the proceedings of this day were considered by them as hopelessly and irretrievably ruinous to them all. They then got up, as I had seen by their arms and hands, by their parched and colourless lips, and the tears which no effort could suppress, and as I could hear by their deep sighs and the hopeless tones of their low and hollow voices, which could only with difficulty be lifted into anything of a sustained conversation. Even this, however, I could hear, but the looks which these poor unnerved each other, so full of despair, so indescribably woe-begone, so full of the tumultuous expression of misery, so conscious of the want of friend or protector—terror, too, and that awful and impenetrable darkness of the future which lay before them, through all of which glanced the beautiful light of domestic tenderness and affection never to be witnessed in any other country—this, I say, I could not bear. When I saw how this calamity was deepened and aggravated by such a communion between these loving hearts and tearful eyes, I felt a sense of injustice that almost turned my sympathy into madness, and prompted me to drag the aggressive villain out of the house and trample him under my feet.

The reader will doubtless anticipate the incident, which in the natural evolution of the story will arise from the scene, the details of which we have quoted. It is told in Mr. Carleton's best manner:—

We have said that Harry Squander, by some manœuvre peculiar to the turf, got three hundred pounds. His brother suggested to him the propriety and decency of purchasing some ornament, and returning that which Dr. M'Claret had so kindly lent them. Harry, however, only laughed at the suggestion; for being quite a politician in matters of property, if not a projector, he was, to say the truth, perpetually devising some scheme or other that he thought calculated to extricate small portions of the family property. Many of these schemes were not very creditable either to his head or his heart, their stupidity having having been exceeded only by their villainy. Seeing, however, that the process of eviction was rapidly extending, he felt that he could manage to get his brother Dick "to clear," as it is termed. To tell the truth, poor Dick, like his father, wished to lead an easy careless life, and to enjoy himself as far as was in his power. At present, however, he was very much broken down, and refused to lend himself to Harry's heartless project of extermination.

"Besides, Harry," said he, "how can we consolidate, when you know that we have no control over our own property. I question, if it were sold to-morrow, whether it would meet the heavy load of incumbrances that are on it."

"No matter," replied Harry; "do you leave the affair to me, and I will contrive to make something out of it. You don't look into your own affairs, Dick. You do nothing but swill whiskey punch."

"Look into my own affairs, Harry! Upon my soul I would rather look into hell; as to the whiskey punch, if it were not for it I should go mad. Look at the condition to which we are reduced—paupers upon a property of twelve thousand per annum! Our miserable circumstances and distress are notorious; and I do assure you, Harry, that whatever you may think, it is anything but a consolation to me to reflect, that the landholders of the country are in general gone nearly as far to the devil as we are."

"This is one way," replied Harry, "who has squatted upon our property. I put him out before, and, let it cost me what it will, now that I have some cash, I will banish him. The scoundrel grumbled, and I think means me mischief. I shall put him out of the country, if I can; but, at all events, he shall not remain upon our property."

"My property, Harry; but who is the man?"

"Father to that unfortunate girl that died, as I told you."

"Harry," replied his brother, "I beg of you to pause before you proceed farther in this business. I think, if you look back upon your own conduct to that man and his daughter, that you ought to make him and his compensation, rather than pursue him with the vengeance of a devil, which I sometimes am inclined to think you must be. If, as you say, that man meditates mischief against you, I tell you that if the devil were at your elbow, anxious to drive you to your own destruction, you could not take a better course than to prosecute him as you have done. Be advised by me; if the man has run up a shed upon a common, why, in God's name, let him and his live there as well as they can. Under present circumstances, now that famine and disease are desolating the land, it would be cruel and inhuman to turn him and his family out upon the world. Besides, Harry, to tell you the truth, I will not permit it. The man and his family must remain in their little place, because I understand that at present they are in circumstances of the greatest distress."

Harry made no reply, but went out of the room indulging in a contemptuous and meditative whistle—I forget the tune; but at all events for a day or two he was silent upon the subject. In the meantime he secretly persisted in his purpose; and so anxious was he to effect it, that he spoke to several of the tenantry whom he wished to take a part in levelling the unfortunate man's cabin. It has been said that there is no person so vindictive as he who inflicts the injury, and on this occasion it would seem that the apophthegm was correct. A day was privately appointed by Harry, on which the poor man's cabin was to be levelled to the earth; and as he had no legal authority to eject him, it remained for the man and his family merely to consider whether they were to be crushed to death by the falling roof and walls, or to give up possession and procure a shelter for themselves wherever they could.

In the meantime Harry, who, as we have said, had long ago fallen back into his original habits of intemperance, resolved to give a dinner at the Castle Squander Hotel, to a number of his acquaintances and colleagues of the turf. This was upon the day previous to that appointed for the demolition of the poor man's cabin. Having turned our readers of so much, we must go back a couple of days, that is, to the market-day of Castle Squander, and request them to follow us into a small public-house in the north end of the street, where two men were sitting with half a pint of whiskey before them. One of them spoke as follows:—

"I might have overlooked the disgrace he brought upon our name—yours as well as mine, for she was your niece, Matthew, your sister's daughter, and the child that I loved beyond any human creature on this earth. I say I might have forgiven even that, although it was hard to do so; but when he came to our house and place and insulted us out—even his own child that was dying—I swore an oath to myself that I would have his blood for all. Well, time went on, and I began to think it was wrong to keep such an oath to a man who had punished himself as he did by the murder of his child, and I let him pass. But what is to be said, I, to God. So I would, too, but what is the case? he is coming on Wednesday to pull down the poor bahey (hut) that I built as a shelter for us, and he swears that he will banish me and mine out o' the country. Now, the heart o' man can't stand this, Matthew; so, as you are her uncle—or was her uncle—you must do this for me."

"I'll do it; but he always goes armed."

"That won't signify; the blunderbush is true and safe. He's givin' a dinner on Tuesday in the Castle Squander Arms; you can watch behind the hedge at the entrance gate, where you know the road that leads to it is narrow, and there take him. I will go home now and get sick; I will have five or six of the neighbours about me until the mornin' after the affair is over, and as he can't suspect you, I will be able to prove that I was ill in my bed when the thing was done. Put the blunderbuss where I showed you, and all the peelers and polis out of hell will never be able to find it. When the job's complate you can cross the country, without touchin' at the road, until you get home—what signifies thirteen miles?—and after that let them do their best. I will have pleuty of witnesses to prove that I didn't do it."

It was so arranged, the men finished their liquor, and in a few minutes left the house.

Neither Dick nor I went to the dinner. The brothers were estranged in consequence of a variety of matters arising from Harry's conduct. It is true that he got in five and twenty gallons of whiskey, and a corresponding portion of lump sugar, but he refused to pay the bills either of the butcher or the baker, who, if they had been settled with, would, for the sake of the former rank and respectability of the family, have once more given them credit; and this ungenerous and selfish refusal on his part reduced us to great straits.

The dinner, however, came off, but not before Harry was obliged to place gold in the hands of the hotel-keeper a sum supposed necessary to cover the expenses. He had tricked that worthy man more than once before, and on this occasion the latter flatly refused to provide a dinner unless paid in advance. Something was due to Dick's word, although not much, but nothing at all to Harry's.

Never did Dick nor I felt surprised at his not returning on that night. He had remained frequently out before, and there was nothing calculated to alarm either of us upon the present occasion. They took it for granted they had made a debauch of it, and that such of them as were incapable of going home had a bed in the hotel—Harry among the rest. Early the next morning, however, we were both alarmed by a loud and tremendous knocking at the hall door. Dick met me on the lobby in the act of going to seek him.

"What the devil is this?" said he. "Some new dodge of the bailiffs. Don't be in a hurry, Randy—take your time—the thing is a pass. Go down to the parlour, open the window and look out; I will not appear. Yes, it's a new dodge—the alarm principle—it was by that that Dick Blake was trapped. Be cautious."

The violent knocking still continued, and we now heard loud voices upon the steps of the hall-door. I felt alarmed, and so I could perceive did Dick, who got quite pale.

"What can it be?" said he. "These loud voices are the voices of terror and alarm. Good God! Harry did not come home last night! I begin now to have dreadful apprehensions. Open the window, for God's sake, and see what it means."

Neither scarcely say that our apprehensions were mutual; I felt a presentiment as if something were wrong—as if some calamity had occurred—and I could not help associating it with Harry. At all events I went down to the parlour, opened the window, and looked out.

"What is the matter?" I asked, "and why do you keep knocking at the door with such violence, disturbing the family?"

"Death's the matter," replied the old gate-porter; "Mr. Harry's murdered."

Dick, who had come down after me to the parlour, heard the words distinctly; and now putting his head out of the window learned the whole circumstances, so far as the poor people knew them. Harry's body was found within about fifty yards of his own gate, in a narrow part of the road that led to it, pierced by eight or nine bullets and slugs, more than one of which had penetrated his heart, so that his death must have been instantaneous.

His brother seemed struck as if with paralysis, and sat down incapable of uttering a word.

"This is dreadful," said I; "what can I say to you?"

"Nothing," he replied, "nothing; the ruin and desolation of the family are now complete. Where is his body? Great God! he that was in the prime of life and health only yesterday evening."

When a murder takes place in Ireland, the common people do not feel themselves justified in removing the body until an inquest is held on it; however, on this occasion, I desired them to bring his remains home, whilst I and Dick accompanied them. We found him lying across the road, with his arms extended, and his legs drawn a little, as it by a death-spasm. We marked the spot where he lay, and in a few minutes his corpse was placed upon a table, with a pillow under his head, until the coroner should be sent for, and an inquest held.

Not the slightest trace, however, was discovered of the murderer at the inquest. All was dark, mysterious, and impenetrable. It came to light, however, subsequently. The man whom Harry had evicted, and whose daughter he had seduced, died of fever in about a month afterwards, but he died in a state of stupor, and was incapable of making any confession. The actual murderer did not survive him more than six weeks, but on his death-bed he disclosed the circumstances of the murder, for which he seemed extremely penitent. He died in the poor-house, and nothing could exceed the extraordinary remorse and agony which distracted him until he breathed his last.

Thus fell Harry Squander, by the hand of a man whom he had never knowingly injured and whom he had never seen. Such, however, is the usage in Ireland.

We have quoted sufficient to show, not only the main incidents of the story, but the powerful manner of the author in describing them; and must refer the reader who wishes to know more of the subject of Ireland than he can glean from a thousand newspapers and Parliamentary Blue Books, to these two small volumes. It is not the most agreeable of novels; but to many readers, the "stern stuff" of which it is composed will recommend it for higher uses than those of amusement.

THE NEWEST FABLE OF HANS C. ANDERSEN;

"THERE IS A DIFFERENCE."

TRANSLATED FROM THE DANISH BY THE REV. E. FLOOD-WOODMAN.

IT was in the month of May: the wind blew quite cold, but spring was come; the bushes and trees, the gardens and fields alike proclaimed that. There was a profusion of flowers everywhere, even on the hedges, and thus the spring plainly spoke for itself; but especially from a small apple-tree, which had but a single branch, so fresh, so blooming, and covered with the finest rose-red blossoms, just at the point of opening. It knew very well how beautiful it was; that was evident in every leaf; and hence it was not at all surprised when a lordly carriage stopped by the roadside, and when the young Countess said, "This branch is the most beautiful which has ever been seen. It is spring itself in its fairest manifestation!"

So the branch was broken off, and she carried it in her soft hand and screened it with her silk parasol as she drove to the castle, where there were high halls and stately chambers; clean white curtains fluttered before the open windows, and beautiful flowers stood in lustrous transparent vases; in one of which, it looked as if it were cut out of fresh-fallen snow, the Apple-blossom Branch was placed, among young and sweet flowers. It was quite a treat to see it.

And then was the Branch so proud but that was just like human nature!

Soon there came people of different sorts through the chamber, and those who could do so ventured to express their admiration. One saw nothing at all in it, and another saw too much; until the Apple-branch perceived that there were differences between men as among plants. "Some are for show and others for use, and there are even some who would not be missed," thought the Branch, who was now placed at the open window, where he could look into the garden, and also into the fields. There were plants and flowers enough for him to contemplate and to reflect upon; there were the rich and the poor—some were, indeed, very poor. "Poor banished plants!" said the Apple-branch; "there does, indeed, exist a difference! How unhappy you must feel, if, indeed, your class can at all feel, as I and my companions can—there is, indeed, a difference made, but that is quite right, since all cannot be equal." And the Apple-branch looked with a significant pity, particularly on a class of flowers which grew in great plenty in the fields and hedges. "No one buds you together for nosegays—you are too common; any one can find you, shooting up between the paving-stones, like the noxious weeds; and, besides, you have such an ugly name—Dandelion." "Poor despised things," said the Apple-branch, "you cannot help it that you are what you are, that you are so common, and have such a reputation. For it is with plants as with men: differences must exist."

"A difference," said the Sunbeam, as he kissed the Apple-branch, but also kissed the yellow dandelions elsewhere; for the bird while at the same moment the Sunbeams brothers kissed them—the poor as well as the rich.

The Apple-branch had never perceived so fine a humble love of the dear Lord for everything which lives and moves. He had never hence reflected how much vanity and goodness may be concealed, but yet is not forgotten. But this was just like human nature too.

The Sunbeam, the ray of heavenly light, knew better. "Thou canst not see far: thou canst not see aright! Which is the banished plant thou pitiest so?" "The Dandelion," said the Blossom-branch; "no one gathers them for nosegays; people trample them down: there are too many of them; and when they cast their seed, it flies about here and there like short cut wool, and hangs on people's clothes. It is only a weed, but that it cannot help. I am only thankful that I am not such a thing."

Just at this moment there came into the field a whole troop of children; the least of them was so very, very little, that it had to be carried in the arms of another: and as it was placed on the grass among the yellow flowers it laughed for joy, stretched its little limbs out, and rolled about, plucking the yellow blooms and kissing them in sweet innocence. The bigger children broke the flowers from the green stem and bent their stems, end to end, together, until they formed a complete chain, which they hung over their necks and shoulders and round the body. There was, indeed, a splendid show of green rings and chains. But the biggest children carried cautiously the plants which had flowered by the stem, which bore the feathery seed-crown—those light airy wool-blossoms which so resemble a little work of art, composed of finest feathers, flakes, and down, and then held them to their mouths, and with a breath blew them away. "Whoever could do it completely would have new clothes before the year was out," so the Grandmother said.

The despised flower was a true prophet on that occasion.

"Dost thou see," said the Sunbeam, "its beauty and its charm?"

"Yes, for children," said the Apple-branch

Then there came out into the field an old woman, and began to grub with her blunt knife, without a handle, at the roots of the dandelions, and to pick them up; some of the roots she could make tea from, and others she could sell to the chemist for medicine.

"Beauty is yet more esteemed," said the Apple-branch. "Only the elect may enter the kingdom of the Beautiful. There is a difference between plants as there is among men."

Then the Sunbeam spoke of the infinite love of God for all his creatures, and of the equal distribution of all in time and eternity

"Yes, that may be your opinion," said the Apple-branch.

At this moment the young Countess came into the room, who had placed the Apple-branch so nicely in the crystal vase, where the sunbeams shone, carrying a flower, or whatever it was, concealed under three or four large leaves, and wrapped round with paper, so that no breath of wind could injure it. The Apple-branch even had never been treated so carefully! Whatever could it be?

Very tenderly were the large leaves removed; and lo! the fine downy seed-crown of the despised Dandelion appeared. After all it was this which the Countess so cautiously had picked and so gently carried, lest a single feather-pillar should be blown away, which composed its cloud-figure. Fortunately it had remained in good condition and quite perfect, so that the Countess could not help admiring its lovely form and airy figure, its peculiar composition and its beauty, which the wind could so soon destroy. "Only look," said she, "how wonderfully God has made it! I will paint it together with the Apple-blossom, which every one admires so much; but yet this poor flower has received quite as much from the loving God, although in another style. There is a great difference between them, but both are children of the kingdom of beauty."

And the Sunbeam kissed the poor flower, and at the same instant kissed the Appleblossom-branch, whose leaves in consequence were seen to blush.

"L'ALLEGRO AND IL PENSEROSO." PAINTED FOR HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT, BY J. C. HORSLEY.

"L'ALLEGRO AND IL PENSEROSO."—BY J. HORSLEY.

HORSLEY'S picture of "L'Allegro and Il Penseroso" was one of last year's exhibition at the Royal Academy; but it possesses merit sufficient to ensure more than an ephemeral renown. It was painted for his Royal Highness Prince Albert. The passage seized by the artist is the well-known lines:—

Hence vain deluding joys,
Come, pensive nun, devout and pure,
Sober, steadfast, and demure;
All in a robe of darkest grain,
Flowing with majestic train,
And sable stole of cyprus lawn
Over thy decent shoulders drawn.
Come, but keep thy wonted state,
With even step and musing gait.
* * *
Forget thyself to marble, till
With a sad, leaden, downward cast,
Thou fix them on thath, y tafacear
And join with thee Calm, Peace, and Quiet.
Spare Fast, that oft with gods doth diet,
And hears the Muses in a ring,
Aye round about Jove's altar sing.—Il Penseroso.

MAY IN IRELAND.

THE Maypole never appears to have been in general use in Ireland, and is evidently of English introduction. In Connaught it is unknown; and even those places where it obtained most repute in other parts of the country were generally English settlements, as in Westmeath, where it was constantly to be found, as described by Sir H. Piers in "Vallancy's Collectanea."

The only authorised pole now standing which we know of is at Hollywood, near Belfast, where it is used to bear the orange-and-blue flags and streamers on the 12th of July, equally with the flower-decked hoops and green garlands of the 1st of May. When we last saw it, it was decorated with miniature ships, emblematic of the calling of the villagers. There formerly existed one at Mountmellick, which was applied to a similar purpose; but that which stood upon the mall at Downpatrick some thirty years ago was one of the most celebrated in Ireland. Among the rites and ceremonies which attached to this latter was one somewhat similar to the privilege assumed, if not granted, under the Christmas mistletoe in England. Whenever a lady appeared in the vicinity of the Maypole, or went to visit the revels upon Downpatrick mall on May-day, she was liable to be saked by any of the tradesmen present to take a turn round the pole, and, at the end of the dance, if her partner was so inclined, they concluded with a kiss. The omission of the latter part of the ceremony was often purchased with a bribe. A milk-offering used in former times to be made at the foot of the Maypole

The two Dublin Maypoles were erected outside the city. One of these stood in the centre of Harold's-cross Green, and existed within the memory of some of the present generation. After its decay, an old withered poplar supplied its place for many years: and so recently as the year 1836, the publicans of the village erected a Maypole, decorated it, and gave a number of prizes, in order to collect an assemblage of the people, by restoring the ancient festivities. The chief Maypole of Dublin, however, was erected at the pretty suburban village of Finglas, to the north of the city near the [illegible] gardens, [illegible] combines the most [illegible] sylvan scenery with the charm of the [illegible] cottages [illegible] the names of Swift, Addison, Parnell, Delany, and [illegible] days of our dissipated [illegible] Wesley. [illegible] was erected annually in the last few years—a very tall smooth spar, [illegible] mast of a vessel, and upon every Easter Monday it was painted white and encircled with a red and blue spiral stripe like a barber's pole. In latter years, at least, it was not decorated with floral hoops and garlands like the usual English Maypole, but was well soaped from top to bottom in order to render it the more difficult to climb; and to its top were attached, in succession, the different prizes, consisting generally of a pair of leather breeches, a hat, or an old fob-pocket watch.

The May boys and morris dancers went their rounds, particularly in Connaught and Munster, even so late as within the last twenty years. They consisted of a dozen or two of the cleanest and most likely" boys in the vicinity, who took off their coats, and decorated themselves with garlands, ribbons, and silk handkerchiefs of the brightest colours, generally furnished them by their sweethearts, who vied with each other in dressing their lovers to the greatest advantage. One of the most effectuate of the number was dressed in female attire as Queen of the May (in the country parts we never heard of a girl being elected the part), a king or captain was appointed, as also a [illegible] man, who repeated the rhymes; a treasurer carried the money-box; and a fool or devil (like that of the wren-boys and mummers at Christmas), a sort of "Lord of Misrule," cleared the way, frightened the children, despattered the crowd, uttered the broad rustic jokes current among the people at that time, and capered for the general amusement. This person wore a sort of loose garment, covered with many-coloured shreds and patches of cloth and rags tacked to it; a large, brimless hat, with the front of it formed into a hideous mask, came down over his head; a row of projecting pieces of stick, made to resemble teeth, surrounded the mouth; a piece of goatskin formed the beard, and the eyeholes were surrounded by circles of red cloth. To the back of it was fastened a dried hare's skin. In his hand he carried a long wattle, to which an inflated bladder was attached, and a very formidable weapon it was, particularly against the women and children.—*Irish Popular Superstitions. By W. CORA. A MAY LEGEND OF SOMERSETSHIRE.

A young and spiritual girl, whose whole nature has become tinctured with the exquisite beauties surrounding her in a country retreat, lives with her father, whose life, one May-moon night, passes away in so sleep-like a manner, that his child, deeming he slumbers, wanders forth into the woods, and, straying into a mystic dell, is there transformed by certain flower-elves and fairies into a spirit of the night. Such, in brief, is the substance of a Poem written by Mr. Sydney Whiting, somewhat German in its character, and full of elegant fancy and tender poetic

The accompanying [illegible]ng represents the heroine of the legend, which we have copied from a pastel-drawing in the possession of the author. As a specimen of the poem we can only find room for the following extract:

Within this dell a different atmosphere
Is breathed by Spirits of the moonlit air.
Now they are seen, and then anon they fade,
And all seems motionless within the glade;
And then again the rays the outline take
Of mortal form, which suddenly will break
In dancing light again; and all around
Swells harmony, till gradually the sound
Subsides to merely moving of the trees,
And plaintive whisperings of the scented breez
The tiny forms of fairy beings play,
And hang in clusters on the May-moon's ray;
Or float upon some perfume passing by.
With folded pinions resting lazily.
Anon within the crimson cavern of a bud
Some elfish band will sink in listless mood;
And closing up the leafy curtains of the flower
Ren[illegible]en.bosom'd for an idle hour.
* * * * *
And see! amidst the brightness falls a shade,
Some mortal's wander'd to the fairy glade;
And yet must purer be than mortals are,
Or like that sudden quenching of the star
That's lost from Heaven in the abyss of air,
Would ev'ry elf and spirit disappear.
But, though 'tis Cora's shadow dims the spot,
Yet the immortal forms are frighted not;
With sweet bewilderment the air she feels
Press round her form, and o'er her senses steals
Oblivion of the past: but, as it fades,
In lieu a mystic lore her mind pervades;
What erst appear'd but common to her view,
Now wears a different shape, a stranger hue.
She sees the flow'rets' dews are elfin springs
Bubbling from leafy cups: their elfin wings
Lav'd in the sparkling drops, and then the gems
Cling to their forms like fairy diadems.
She feels that light becomes incorporate,

"CORA."—DRAWN BY ANDRE.

And mingles with her form, while odours wait
To claim their share in the creating sprite;
And as she grows attenuate and light,
On Cora's form no more the air can press,
But folds a spirit in its sweet caresses.

Then is the scene all animate again;
No form that loves the night now dare remain
Ensconced in cradling flowers—no spirit rest,
While all are with a kindred spirit bless'd.
Nor do they wish—the music of each wing
Makes glad the air, the joyful fluttering
Bids ev'ry odour choicest incense pour;
The gladsome flow'rets give their richest store,
The dew-drops glisten more intensely bright,
For Cora is a Spirit of the Night!

E'en to this day the cottage may be seen,
But almost hidden from the passer's view,
For Time has robed it in a garb of green
Now climbs the ivy, where the roses grew:
And peasants speak of how the old man died,
And how that night his only child was lost;
And that in grief they sought her near and wide;
But vain the search, and vain the tears it cost:
They tell the tale with reverential fear,
That, though the cot remains unoccupied,
Soft sounds at even-time still hover near,
And, though the stranger will the tale deride,
Yet some avow they recognise the sound
The same sweet melancholy sound they say,
That once had call'd the village band around,
To deck the maidens with the buds of May.
Strange stories have they all, and each one tells
The tale with fresh tradition of his own;
But all agree, each May the weaver bells
Send forth a musical yet plaintive tone,
More softly than if peal'd by village hands,
More sweetly than their notes o'er spoke before;
And then the home-returning peasant stands,
With wond'ring pleasure till the sounds be o'er.
But, whate'er the truth, the place is dear
To all who know the legend of the spot;
And e'en the poorest rustic will forbear
To break the charm, to occupy the cot;
He will not even touch a tree or flower
And lets in wildness climb the creeping bands,
And thus the cottage, to this very hour,
A loved memorial of tradition stands.

"FREE COMPANIONS"—BY J. W. GLASS.

"Free Companions," by J. W. Glass, in the National Institution of the Fine Arts, is a clever and effective picture, representing a troop of soldiers of fortune on a march at eventide. The landscape is wild and romantic in aspect, as suits their wild life; the group is thrown skilfully across the picture from the back to the foreground. The various faces are full of varied character and admirable spirit, realising the burthen of the old song—

Across the moor, across the lea,
We follow him, whoe'er he be,
Whose sword's aye ready, hand as free—
A fig for fame, we fight for fee
Sing hey! for our jollie companie!

REVIEW OF BOOKS.

LITERATURE and ROMANCE of NORTHERN EUROPE; constituting a complete History of the Literature of Sweden, Denmark, Norway, and Iceland, &c. By WILLIAM and MARY HOWITT. 2 vols. London: Colburn and Co. 1852.

That England, though "a wise child," does not know its own father, is clearly shown by the plainest references to historical evidence. There is no country in the whole world, not excepting France, in which people are so easily led away by sonorous phrases as our own. Our very adventurousness proves this; and that class of persons who may be peculiarly said to live and thrive, not by "knowing themselves," according to the counsel of the Greek sage, but by knowing others, have, instinctively, at all times, availed themselves of this national weakness, to facilitate the chances of enterprise, or to gild the hopes of speculation. Gargins of Leontium would have been charmed with the well-turned and magnificent designations of the schemes, mineral or not, which are daily announced as deserving the attention and support of the monied part of our community. But it is chiefly where the terms thus cast loose amongst us have the appearance and form of embodying some well-considered generality, that they obtain the widest currency and the most durable adhesion.

The egotism which (strangely mingled with fine bursts of benevolence and charity) is one of the prevailing characteristics of the age has this effect—that most people, except where each is occupied with his own peculiar pursuits, refuse and shun the labour of thinking for themselves. Hardly one man in thirty but talks his particular newspaper; and the press has been truly, though somewhat bitterly, styled the great thinking machine of the country. No man, or hardly any man, works out true ideas for his own mind, save in what concerns his material interests as an individual. A ready-made thought, like a ready-made hat, has a wide demand. The division of labour and the economy of time are principles wise in themselves, but carried by the mass of us into folly and idiotcy; since we insist upon having manufacturers of general notions for us, and, though not venturing so to call them, yet virtually using them as a profession apart. To use the fruits of the labours of this profession is a convenience; but to admit that it was, as it is, a real profession, would be a stultification of all who were not freemen of its noble citizenship.

Thus, then, in brief, it happens that when once a compendious corollary-seeming phrase is launched, it stills the Babylonish tumult of small guesses and crude chat, and becomes, as the French would say, if not un fait accompli, at least un operçu reconnu. Among these phrases is the term "Anglo-Saxon race." "We are not an Anglo-Saxon race," says Mr. Howitt; and we thoroughly agree with him in this view. We are not a "German island" (Deutsche Insel). The English are Scandinavian to the back-bone. But are they not a good deal Norman? The Normans were, also, to the back bone Scandinavian. But were not the smouch Saxon English conquered by the Danes? And what, even to this day, gives the Danes that extraordinary advantage which the whole world has recently witnessed and admired over the inhabitants of Schleswig-Holstein, though backed by the armed support of one of the two great powers, and by the enthusiasm of sympathising Germany? But have not the Romans and the Britons left traces in our blood? The Romans, as every one knows, can have had but small influence upon an island so long emancipated from their occupation—an occupation which was ever too haughty to become a fusion with the native race. The native race, indeed, has been judicially indestructible among us, and wears locks on St. David's Day. But the Saxons conquered them; and the Saxons were first conquered by the Scandinavian Danes, and then by the Scandinavian Normans, the successors of the great Rolf-yauger.

"It is not, perhaps," as Mr. Howitt remarks, "so much an overwhelming number of the Northmen, as the new spirit they brought with them, that mixed them with and changed the social elements of the countries they settled in. A spark will set fire to a city if it find stuff to kindle. This stuff was in human nature."

Mr. Howitt elsewhere most justly says: "If ever the child was father to the man, the Scandinavians were the fathers of the English. Indeed, the family likeness is so striking not to be evidence of itself. The lineaments of the parents live in the character of the progeny; the same spirit of commercial enterprise and maritime adventure—invincible on the sea, and the same on the land; the same instinctive curiosity, and inexhaustible expansion of colonization; the same mighty imagination—the Scalds living again in our poets; the same martial prowess; the same unconquerable and somewhat stern love of freedom; the same popular institutions, and instinct for harmonious community of action. The things are not even yet German; but these things have never ceased, even now, to be Scandinavian."

It is not a wild expectation that the poetry and romance of northern Europe should meet with a popular acceptance among the English. Out of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark they will never be noticed, if with us they are neglected. But they are not. Even the modern, the contemporary productions of the Danish and Swedish mind, have arrested attention in this country. We know how to appreciate and enjoy both Thorwaldsen and the artist; that which Teyner and Oehlenschlager, and Evald and Buggesen, and Andersen and Frederika Bremer—some ancient, some modern—have been able to achieve with the pen in both poetry and prose.

We have not space or time to give our readers any full idea of this strange book of Mr. and Mrs. Howitt. It is no bad digest of the entire literature of Scandinavia, from the pagan days, when it was wholly oral, to our own times. Along with this, it is a history of the Scandick race; and, further, it is a clear comprehensive account of the religious and political revolutions of idea which have occurred in those mighty parent countries; countries which, as they have been prolific in Eddas, have been themselves the Eddas of many great races. When we have said this, we have said but little.

The work is one from which no quotation can be made of a nature to do it justice.

In many of his incidental views and opinions, we totally dissent from the author. But he has given us too interesting a work to allow us to use any very qualified language in begging our readers to make its acquaintance.

A SCHOOL ATLAS of GENERAL and DESCRIPTIVE GEOGRAPHY. By ALEX. KEITH JOHNSTON, F.R.S.E., &c. Blackwood and Co.

Hitherto the atlases of general geography have either been imperfect in their political divisions of countries, or have been so overcrowded with names as to be unfit for the purposes of practical education. To remedy these defects is the object of the present Atlas; the information is brought to the latest period. We have here distinctness of outline, and unmistakeably clear arrangement, land and water being produced from different plates—the latter printed in bright blue, and traceable in the smallest stream through the black reading of the mountains. Again, scales have been adopted for the relative sizes of the countries; corresponding latitudes and meridians of capitals are inserted in the upper borders; and there are other advantages in the pronuction of this Atlas which entitle it to preference for alike simplifying the work of teacher and learner. Where so much depends upon the education of the eye, it is important to render all distinctions as striking as possible, which appears to have been most efficiently done in the volume before us.

THE JOURNAL of AGRICULTURE, and the TRANSACTIONS of the HIGHLAND and AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY of SCOTLAND. William Blackwood and Sons: London and Edinburgh.

This well-recognised journal continues to keep pace with the advancing spirit of agriculture. An article "On Climate," of some length, by Mr. Rowlandson, C.E., F.G.S., is a valuable synopsis of the causes which exercise the most important influences on farming operations. The philosophical reasons herein given to account for many of the commonly recognised and observed facts are exemplified in an extremely popular manner, and such as it is difficult to misunderstand. In fact, the treatise is so apposite to be written with the special intention of making a difficult subject of facile comprehension by the unlearned. We are glad to see by the concluding paragraph that we are to be favoured with a continuation.

In paper on "The Feeding Properties of Turnips grown with different Manures," by Mr. W. Goodlett, will be read with great interest; as also one by Mr. Walter Dean, "On the Comparative Advantages of Fattening Cattle in Stalls, Boxes, or Sheds," by Mr. Walter Reid.

SYNOPSIS of the VEGETABLE PRODUCTS of SCOTLAND in the MUSEUM of the ROYAL BOTANIC GARDEN at KEW. By Peter Lawson and Sons: Edinburgh.

This valuable work as an agricultural reference may be considered as an extension of the Great Exhibition. Such of our readers as took a particular interest in the display there made of our British European vegetable productions, will remember the splendid collection of the vegetable productions of Scotland, exhibited by the publishers of the work under notice. It occupied the greatest space of any single exhibitor; and the plate glass alone cost £630: the total cost to Messrs. Lawson and Son, for the fittings, &c., being more than £1000, which, with their valuable contents, have been presented to the nation, and are now deposited at Kew.

The present work has been written as a guide and reference to this collection, and as a handbook for the study of British agricultural productions is extremely valuable, and possesses great interest. Its general character may be described by the following quotations from the preface:—"The Synopsis comprises all economic plants indigenous to, and cultivated or cultivable in Scotland, with the exception of those used in medicine, which are contained in a separate volume." It is added, that "Supplements will be issued from time to time in order to keep pace with the introduction of new plants, and to record the results of experiments now in progress."

FINE ARTS.

SIR Edwin Landseer's beautiful picture of "Windsor Castle in the Present Time," the engraving from which, by Atkinson, attracts so many admirers in the shop-windows, has been on view for a few days, by permission of her Majesty, at Messrs. Graves and Co.'s, in Pall-Mall. Portrait pictures are at all times difficult subjects to deal with, and they are especially so where Royal personages are introduced in their domestic character. In the present instance, Sir Edwin Landseer has succe-fully triumphed over the difficulties inseparable from his task, and produced an admirable work; one which, as a picture, is worthy to be placed beside his celebrated "Bolton Abbey in the olden Time," whilst, as containing portraits of our beloved Monarch and her consort, and their eldest child, it must prove a treasure of interest to all loyal Englishmen. The scene represented is an ante-room in Windsor Castle, where Prince Albert, on his return from the sports of the field, is seated, in an easy attitude, upon a sofa, while her Majesty, who has just entered the apartment, views with a smile of admiration the spoils of the forest which are scattered about the floor. On the opposite side is the Princess Royal, quite a child (the picture has been painted some years), with her bonnet falling back from her head, holding up with both hands a magnificent pheasant gay plumage has quite captivated her fancy. The artist, whose mastery of pencil is unsurpassed in this line, absolutely revels in the soft and gaudy details of birds of various breadth and transparency of colouring producing marvellous reality of effect. The general colouring of the other parts of the picture is delicate and harmonious.

The statue of the late Sir Robert Peel, by Mr. M. Noble, intended for erection in the borough of Salford, has been so successfully cast in bronze by Messrs. Moore, Fressance, and Moore, of Gray's Inn-lane, the figure is well treated, and dignified in attitude; the dress is modern, with a cloak thrown negligently over it, leaving the right arm partially exposed. The likeness is a good one, and the expression very true to that displayed by the great statesman when in the act of addressing the Commons of England upon a question of national importance. Another statue of this familiar figure of the same, from a model also by Mr. Noble, and is intended for Tamworth

A very excellent cast of Power's "Greek Slave" has been executed by Brucciani for Messrs. Copeland and Co., with the intention of being reproduced in small size in their famous parian porcelain. We inspected it some days ago, and can speak favourably of the accuracy of the copy, and the admirable quality of the material in which it has been produced.

A Column of Old May.

"To do observance to a morn of May."—SHAKESPEARE.

F a grave Londoner of the present day were asked how the Poet's Month is signalized in his metropolitan calendar, he would point to the long list of "May Meetings" which are held in Exeter-Hall and elsewhere at this season. There is an undercurrent of "practical comfort and joy" in this mode of commemoration, which far be it from our wish to disturb; it is characteristic of an age of enlightened philanthropy and extended benevolence, and therefore hedged in with a divinity to which we duly bow. It has, however, little in common with the "sprightly May" of our ancestors, who held this gratulation of Spring, this rejoicing at the revival of vegetation, in court and city, as well as in flowery fields:—

For thee, sweet month, the groves green liv'ries wear,
If not the first, the fairest of the year
For thee the Graces lead the dancing hours,
And Nature's ready pencil paints the flow'rs.
DAVDEN.

But this celebration was not merely a rustic sport; such was rather the Gathering of the May, wherewith to deck the towns and villages, which Herrick has so quaintly sung:

Come, my Corinna, come; and coming, mark
How each field turns a street, each street a park,
Made green and trimm'd with trees. See how Devotion gives each house a bough,
Or branch; each porch, each door, ere this,
An ark, a tabernacle is,
Made up of whitethorn, neatly interwove;
As if here were those cooler shades of love.

In "jolly old London," on May-day, the doors were decorated with flowering branches, and every hat was decked with hawthorn, brought in triumph from the neighbouring fields. Stow thus describes the universality of the custom:—"In the month of May, the citizens of London of all estates, lightly in every parish, or sometimes two or three parishes joining together, had their several Mayings, and did fetch in Maypoles, with divers warlike shows, with good archers, morris-dancers, and other devices, for pastime all day long; and toward the evening they had stage-plays and bonfires in the street. These great Mayings and Maygames, made by the governors and masters of this city, with the triumphant setting up of the great shaft (a principal Maypole in Cornhill, before the parish church of St. Andrew), therefore called Undershaft, by means of an insurrection of youths against aliens on May-day, 1517, the 9th of Henry VIII., have not been so freely used as afore." We scarcely need add how this Maypole was hung on iron hooks over the doors and under the "pentices" of Shaft (now Undershaft) Alley, until 3d King Edward VI., when on St. Stephen, a curate, preaching at Paul's-cross, said that this shaft was made an idol, by naming the church of St. Andrew with the addition of "under-the-shaft." Stow heard this sermon, and describes how the parishioners in the afternoon lifted the shaft from the hooks whereon it had rested thirty-two years, sawed it in pieces, "every man taking for his share so much as had lain over his door and stall, the length of his house, and they of the alley divided among them so much as had lain over their alley-gate; and by this pious vengeance was the idol 'mangled and burned.'"

Westward, in Basing-lane, was another famous Maypole, in Gerard's Hall, which has just been disturbed by the hand of improvement. This pole was pressed into the fabulous story of "The Gyant." It was a large fir pole, which reached to the roof of the hall, and was said to be "the lasting staff of Gerrard a giant." There was also a ladder of the same length as the pole, and said to have been used to ascend it. Stow treats the story of the giant as "a cluster of lies," and reasonably suggests that "the pole in the hall might be used in old time (as then the custom was in every parish) to be set up in the summer as Maypole, before the principal house in the parish or street, and to stand in the hall before the screen decked with holme and ivy all the feast of Christmas; the ladder serving for the decking of the May-pole and the roof of the hall."

A more celebrated "column of May" was, however, the Maypole which stood on the site of the present church of St. Mary le-Strand:—

Where the tall May-pole once o'ercrock'd the Strand,
But now, so Anne and piety ordain,
A church collects the saints of Drury-lane.—POPE.

Here, in 1634, one Captain Bailey established the first stand of hackney-coaches. There is an unauthenticated report current, that the Strand Maypole was set up in the place of an ancient stone cross, by John Clarges the farrier, who lived in the Savoy, and was father of Nan Clarges, the quondam mistress, and afterwards the wife, of General Monck, and first Duchess of Albemarle. Stow tells us that it was raised by the farrier to commemorate his daughter's good fortune; but it is not certain whether Clarges' Maypole stood in the Strand or Drury-lane. It was, however, erected long before this period (1634); but it could not long survive the Puritan ordinance of 1644, even allowing it to have stood till then.

The Restoration of Charles II. proved the signal for the restoration of the Maypole; and on the very first May-day afterwards, a new and very lofty one was raised in the Strand, with great rejoicing and ceremony, of which a very curious account is given in a rare tract, "The City's Loyalty Displayed," 4to., 1661.

Aubrey describes this Maypole as "the most prodigious one for height that perhaps was ever seen: they were faine (I remember) to have the assistance of the seaman's art to elevate it: that which remains (being broken with a high wind, I think about 1672) is but two parts of three of the whole height from the ground, besides what is in the earth. The juvenile and rustique folkes at that time had so much of their fullnesse of desire in this kind, that I thinke there have been very few set up since."

Pepys, as gay a gallant as ever danced in the ring of pleasure, has left us some traces of May-day customs. He writes in his Diary one day:—"My wife away; down with Jane and W. Hewer to Woolwich, in order to a little air, and to lie there to-night, and so to gather May-dew tomorrow morning, which Mrs. Turner has taught her is the only thing in the world to wash her face with." He emphatically adds, "I am contented with it."

To return to the Strand Maypole. In the year 1677 a fatal duel was fought under the pole. Early one morning Mr. Robert Percival, second son of the Right Honourable Sir Robert Percival, was found dead under the Maypole, with a deep wound under his left breast; his sword, drawn and bloody, lying beside him. He was the most notorious duellist of his time, and had fought as many duels as he numbered years—nineteen. His antagonist was never discovered, although great rewards were offered for his apprehension; the only clue was a hat, with a bunch of ribbons in it, suspected to belong to the celebrated Beau Fielding, but it was never traced home to him.

For a livelier scene from the maypole, we turn to Pepys' sprightly Diary:—

"1st May, 1667. To Westminster, in the way meeting many milkmaids, with their garlands upon their pails, dancing, with a fiddler before them; and saw pretty Nelly standing at her lodging-door, in Drury-lane, in her smock sleeves and bodice, looking upon one; she seemed a mighty pretty creature."

Of this really curious scene we borrow a picture from Mr Cunningham's "Story of Nell Gwyn, and the sayings of Charles II.," corrected and enlarged from the story as originally contributed by him to the Gentleman's Magazine, in 1851. Nelly's history is mixed up with so many popular fictions, which have been unwittingly perpetuated in print, that it may be as well to repeat Mr. Cunningham's explanation that his little book "must be read as a serious truth; not as a fiction—as a biography, not as a romance. It hath no other foundation than truth, and will be heard of hereafter only as it adheres to history." The traditions of Nell Gwyn would fill a much larger volume. However, the truths are more strange and interesting than the fiction; and Mr. Cunningham has not failed to surround his frail heroine with the still life as well as the living portraiture of the period, though we never lose sight of charming Nelly, who, as the author tells us, "was living at this time in the fashionable part of Drury-lane the Strand or Covent-garden end; for Drury-lane in the days of Charles II was inhabited by a very different class of people from those who now occupy it; or, indeed, who have lived in it since the time Gay guarded us from Drury's mazy courts and dark abodes"—since Pope described it only too truly as peopled by drabs of the lowest character, and by authors 'lulled by soft zephyrs' through the broken pane of a garret window. The upper end, towards St. Giles's Pound and Montague House, had its squalid quarters, like Lewknor's-lane and the Coal-yard, in which, as we have concluded, our Nelly was born; but at the Strand end lived the Earl of Anglesey, long Lord Privy Seal; and the Earls of Clare and Craven, whose names are still perpetuated in Clare Market and Craven-yard. Drury-Lane, when Nelly was living there, was a kind of Park-lane of the present day, made up of noblemen's mansions, small houses, inns, and stable-yards. Nor need the similitude be thus restricted; for the Piazza of Covent-garden was then to Drury-lane what Grosvenor-square is at present to Park-lane. Squalid quarters, indeed, have always been near neighbours to lordly localities. When Nelly lodged in Drury-lane, Covent-garden had its Lewknor-lane, and Lincoln's-inn-fields their Whetstone-park.

"Nelly's lodgings were near the lodgings of Lacy the actor, at the top of Maypole-alley—and over against the gate of Craven House. The look-out afforded a peep into a part of Wych-street, and, while standing at the doorway, you could see the far-famed Maypole in the Strand, at the bottom of the alley to which it had lent its name.

Where Drury-lane descends into the Strand,

"This Maypole, long a conspicuous ornament to the West-end of London, rose to a great height above the surrounding houses, and was surmounted by a crown and vane, with the Royal arms richly gilded. It had been set up again immediately after the Restoration. Great ceremonies attended its erection—twelve picked seamen superintending the tackle, and ancient people clapping their hands and exclaiming, 'Golden days begin to appear!' Nelly must have remembered the erection of the Maypole at the bottom of the lane in which she was born; but there is little save some gable-ends and old timber-fronts near her 'lodgings-door' to assist in carrying the mind back to the days of the Maypole and the merry Monarch whose recall it was designed to commemorate.

"Among the many little domestic incidents perpetuated by Pepys, there are few to which I would sooner have been a witness than the picture he has left us of Nelly standing at her door watching the milkmaids on May-day. This was in 1667, while her recent triumphs on the stage were still fresh at Court, and the obscurity of her birth was a common topic of talk and banter among the less fortunate inhabitants of the lane she lived in. The scene so lightly sketched by Pepys might furnish no unfitting subject for the pencil of Leslie or Maclise a subject, indeed, which would shine in their hands. That absence of all false pride, that innate love of unaffected nature, and that fondness for the simple sports of the people which the incident exhibits, are characteristics of Nelly from the first moment to the last, following her naturally, and sitting alike easily and gracefully upon her, whether at her humble lodgings in Drury-lane, at her handsome house in Pall-Mall, or even under the gorgeous cornices of Whitehall."

Strype tells us that the Strand Maypole having grown old and decayed, was, in 1717, obtained of the parish by Sir Isaac Newton, who then lived in St. Martin's-street, Leicester-square. The pole was accordingly taken down, conveyed away through the City in a timber-carriage, April 1718, to Wanstead, in Essex, and by leave of Sir Richard Child, Bart., was reared in his park for raising a telescope, the largest in the world, which is elsewhere stated to have belonged to Newton's friend, Mr. Pound, rector of Wanstead, to whom it had been presented by M. Rugon, a French member of the Royal Society; but Strype states the telescope to have been given by Hugon to the Royal Society, of which Newton was then president.

Our little May garden is nearly at an end; but there is a trace of the "sprightly month" in a very grave place—the Lord Chancellor's Court, where a bouquet of flowers is said to represent the judge's bough or wand, thus derived from the column of May. We learn from an old pamphlet, that our ancestors held an anniversary assembly on May-day, and that the column of May, whence our Maypole was the great standard of justice, in the Ey-commons, or fields. Here it was that the people, if they saw cause, deposed or punished unpopular rulers.

The chimney-sweepers, with their dreary gambols and tinselled equator, have almost monopolised the metropolitan May-day of our times. The reader may recollect that at the north-west angle of Portman-square is a spot associated with a May-day festival. The mansion was built for the celebrated Mrs. Elizabeth Montagu, who resided here many years, and whose eccentric benevolence led her to regale the chimney-sweeps of London annually, on the 1st of May, on the lawn in front of the house, with good and wholesome fare, "so that they might enjoy one happy day in the year." We have heard it stated that the festival was given in commemoration of the truant Edward Wortley Montagu having been kidnapped by chimney-sweeps in his abandoned boyhood.

Some years since, it was cleverly remarked (in the Examiner) of the grim finery of chimney-sweepers—"What a personification of the times, gilded dirt, slavery, and melancholy, for another penny! Something like celebrations of May-day still loiter in more remote parts of the country, as Cornwall, Devonshire, and Westmoreland; and it is observable that most of the cleverest men of the time come from such quarters, or have otherwise chanced upon some kind of insulation from its more sophisticated commonplaces." Reader, have you the happiness to be of this class?

"DENISE"—FROM LAMARTINE'S "STONE-CUTTER OF ST. POINT" PAINTED BY O. R. CAMPBELL.

"DENISE."—BY O. R. CAMPBELL.

O. R. CAMPBELL has a clever little study of "Denise," from Lamartine's "Stone-cutter of St. Point," which pleases us by its simplicity and genuine character. The passage particularly referred to in Lamartine's charming romance is the following:

But I loved her most of all when we went amongst the broom on the mountains to cut logs for winter, and my brother placed one of them on her back, long as the trunk of a cherry-tree, with all its leaves and flowers at the end, to be cut up on reaching home.

WORDS OF THE SONGS.

THE SWALLOW AND THE ROBIN.

[AIR—"The Carman's Whistle."]

I.

SPRING-TIME music fills the valleys,
Blossoms deck the apple-tree,
Violets peep in forest alleys,—
Gentle Swallow! list to me.
Dipping, curving,
Floating, swerving,
Seek my true love through the bowers:
When thou'st found her, gently tell her,
Love was born 'mid summer flowers.

II.

Wild and bleak the north wind blusters,
Crisp the snow lies on the lea,
Pendent ice-drops fall in clusters,—
Friendly Robin! list to me.
Doubting, flying,
Trusting, prying,
Near her lattice pass thine hours:
Tell her, at her window tapping,
Love shall last through winter showers.

WILD FLOWERS.

[AIR—"Gathering Pensées."]

I.

FAIR flowerets of the field,
That gem the modest grass,
And peep in woodland bowers:
Fair buds, that ever yield
A pleasure as we pass,
And smile like happy hours,—
Sweet memories ye recall
Of past delights we knew,
Ere toil and grief begun;
Joy haunts ye, one and all,
Ye nurselings of the dew,
And darlings of the sun.

II.

Rose-lipp'd, the daisies tell
Of infantine delight,
When we were pure as they;
Shy violets in the dell
Restore the visions bright
Of youth's unfolding May;
And sweet, with sweeter name,
The blue "forget-me-not"
Recalls the joy supreme
When life was loving flame,
And hope was passion-fraught,
And sorrow but a dream.

III.

Fair blossoms, ever bloom!
Heaven has its stars above
To light its awful face;
Earth has your sweet perfume,
Your smiles as kind as love,
Your never-failing grace.
Oh, blessings great, though small,
That stir each feeling true,
We love you every one:
Joy dwells amid you all,
Ye nurselings of the dew,
Ye darlings of the sun!

NOTES ON THE MELODIES BY SIR H. R. BISHOP.

THE SWALLOW AND THE ROBIN.

"THE CARMAN'S WHISTLE."—This old tune, arranged with variations by William Bird, is from Queen Elizabeth's Virginal-Book; and is also contained in a manuscript collection of Bird's compositions for the virginal, called Lady Nevill's Music Book,—a thick folio, the music of which is neatly written by John Baldwine, "a singing-man at Windsor." Baldwine has informed us that his labours in transcribing this volume were "finished and ended the leventh of Sptember, in the yeare 1591." The carman in the time of Elizabeth may have "whistled as he went for want of thought," but we have no reason to agree in the supposition which has been set forth, that his class in particular possessed extraordinary musical abilities. Shakspeare, indeed, in his play of Henry the Fourth, Part II., makes Falstaff say of Justice Shallow, that "he came ever in the rear-ward of the fashion, and sung those tunes to the over-scutched huswives that he heard the carmen whistle, and swore they were his fancies or his good-nights;" and Taylor the Water Poet says, "If the carman's horse be melancholy or dull with hard and heavy labour, then will he, like a kinde piper, whistle him a fit of mirth, to any tune above Eela (E la) to below Gammoth" (Gamut ut). Among these tunes, the one that is entitled "The Carman's Whistle" may have been an especial favourite with the whistling carmen of the WORDS OF THE SONGS.

WINE AND GLORY.

[Air—"Young Virgins love Pleasure."]

I.

A fly on the brink of a tankard was sipping
The rich mantling wave of the ripe Rhenish wine;
"Oh, what are you doing? you rush to your ruin!
Be wise, foolish fly, and to reason incline!"
Thus argued another, careering in gladness
Around the bright flame of a taper and,
"All drinking's a folly, and brings melancholy;
Take warning and shun it, lest fly that you are!

II.

"Behold how a passion more noble should move you—
'Tis Glory alone has a charm in my eyes;
Whatever betide me, its radiance shall guide me;
Good bye, silly toper! and learn to be wise."
Thus saying, he sported his wings for a minute,
Then flew to the light that so tempted his gaze;
But burning his pinions in Glory's dominions,
He fell in the candle, and died in the blaze.

III.

"Alas!" said the fly that was perch'd on the tankard,
"Can aught for the want of self-knowledge atone?
We rail against others, see faults in our brothers,
And blame every folly and vice but our own."
But whether this fly was converted from toping,
Or led a new life, is not easy to say;
But if flies are like drinkers 'mong two-legged thinkers,
'Tis likely he sips the red wine to this day.

THE SILVERY BIRCH.

[Air—"The Women all tell me I'm false to my Lass."]

I.

Alone on the slope of the mountain it grew,
And bathed its light tresses in glittering dew;
The bird on its boughs linger'd loving and long,
And the stream at its feet ever murmur'd in song;
It toy'd with the winds, it was happy and free:
Oh! the Silvery Birch was a flourishing Tree.

II.

The lord of the mountain beheld it, and sigh'd
That so lovely a thing in the desert should hide.
"Come down from the wilderness, child of the storm!
And I'll shield from its anger thy delicate form:
I've a garden of pleasure more fitted for thee,
And there thou shalt flourish, my beautiful Tree."

III.

He loosen'd its roots, and convey'd it away,
To dwell in the bowers with the roses of May;
But it pined for the breezes that roam'd on the hill,
For the fern of the rock, for the voice of the rill;
And drooping forlorn 'mid the pride of the lea,
It died in its grandeur, the beautiful Tree.

COULD WE RECALL DEPARTED JOYS.

[Air—"Drink to me only with thine Eyes."]

I.

Could we recall departed joys,
At price of parted pain,
Oh, who that prizes happy hours
Would live his life again!
Such burning tears as once we shed
No pleasure can repay;
Pass to oblivion, joy and grief!
We're thankful for to-day.

II.

Calm be the current of our lives,
As rivers deep and clear;
Mild be the light upon our path,
To guide us and to cheer,
For streams of joy that burst and foam
May leave their channels dry,
And deadliest lightnings ever flash
The brightest in the sky, sixteenth century. There is a song (of a somewhat later period) to the tune of "The Carman's Whistle, or Lord Willoughby's March," the words of which begin, "As I abroad was walking." These words, however, are so ill suited to the present tune, that we can hardly conceive they were intended for it.

WILD FLOWERS.

"Gathering Pearcods."—The quaint simplicity of this charming air would be a sufficient testimony of its having been produced by some one of our English composers in the sixteenth century, and probably in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; but we do not find any mention of it until a later period. Towards the close of the seventeenth century it was printed in several editions of that very curious and now scarce work entitled The Dancing-Master.

WINE AND GLORY.

"Young Virgins love Pleasure."—A song in the fifth volume of Watts's Musical Miscellany, and therein stated to be from The Beggar's Wedding, a ballad opera that was produced in 1729. The tune, with a few alterations, was used in several other musical pieces of the same period, and is also printed in the first volume of the above Miscellany, as adapted to some words of a humorous character, beginning "The spring's a-coming," written by the eccentric Tony Aston for his Bath Medley,—a species of entertainment consisting of recitation and song, with which he is said to have visited most of the cities and towns in England.

COULD WE RECALL DEPARTED JOYS.

"Drink to me only with thine Eyes."—A remarkably beautiful air. We have no traces whatever of its origin, but its prevailing style at once proclaims the pure English source from whence it has sprung. At the same time, that very style renders it doubtful whether this melody was the production of any contemporary of Ben Jonson, the author of the words to which, as is supposed, it was first applied, and in association with which it has hitherto been generally known. [The Author, in writing a new song to the air "Drink to me only with thine eyes," hitherto known in connexion with the beautiful verses of Ben Jonson, may be pardoned for stating that his reason for taking such a step—exposing him, as it may do, to the charge of presumption,—is simply to introduce the exquisite melody to a circle of listeners who have hitherto only known it as an instrumental piece. Ben Jonson's song, admirable as it has always been considered, is not one that ladies like to sing; and is otherwise objectionable, especially to that large class who do not approve of the introduction of the gods of pagan antiquity into the songs of a modern and a Christian people. It may be remembered by those who perused the introduction to this series of Songs and Melodies, that one of the objects avowed by the Author was to avoid all mention of Jove, Cupid, Venus, Bacchus, and other heathen deities, in compositions that claimed not only to be serious and heartfelt, but to be in accordance with the sentiments and feelings of the present age.]

THE SILVERY BIRCH.

"The Women all tell me I'm false to my Lass."—This melody is in a scarce collection of songs entitled Clio and Euterpe, or British Harmony, published in the year 1758, in The Convivial Songster, 1782, and also in Ritson's Collection of English Songs. The words to which it was probably at first adapted being of a bacchanalian description, it was, of course, then sung in a brisk and lively manner. Many melodies, however, that were originally intended for somewhat similar purposes, have gained a new and greatly improved character when allied to poetry of a different and superior kind. Of this, the present song affords a prominent example.

PARTIES AND PARTY GOVERNMENT IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THE old landmarks of party have been removed. The House of Commons remembers, and sections right and left of the Speaker's chair assume, the names of the half or totally defunct organisation that formerly bore the brunt of political and senatorial battles; but the ancient parties themselves appear to be dead or dying, their bodies are decayed, and the soul that yet clings to them flickers like an expiring flame. There is not a genuine Tory left in the halls of St. Stephen's, unless it be Colonel Sibthorp; it may be doubted whether there be a pure Whig remaining, except Lord John Russell; and certainly we have no statesman who has any serious and indefeasible claim to the title of "Whiggissimus," once jocularly bestowed upon Dean Swift, unless it be our illustrious and unfortunate ex-Premier. As for Protectionists, we may seek, and perhaps find, many in the House who yet glory in the name; but if we do, it will not be among the chiefs of the Protectionist Ministry. Common sense and arithmetic have remodelled the factions, if they have not reformed them; the old traditions have grown dim, the old watchwords have become obsolete, and the House of Commons has sobered down into a place of hard substantial business, like a merchant's counting-office, or the private parlour of a bank. Finance has become more than ever the touchstone of political capacity; and face to face with that practical monster, the shadowy ghosts of Whig and Tory dwindle and fade away. Men who aspire to guide the affairs of this great country are compelled to range themselves either for or against Free Trade—to declare whether they are for the wealth or for the decay of nations, and to say whether they believe in or deny arithmetic and mathematics.

The great doctrine of Free Trade has thus made many converts in unexpected quarters. Since the memorable period when Sir Robert Peel broke up his party and saved his country by yielding to the force of an irresistible conviction, the progress of the question has been as rapid as it has been remarkable. In our day we witness conversions which, though not more important, are more significant than that of Sir Robert Peel. When Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli abandon the cause of Protection, as they have virtually done, although they have not had the boldness to say so, the party revolutions of 1846 are surpassed, and have ceased to be the most remarkable in our annals.

Mr. Disraeli's able, temperate, and convicting speech on the introduction of his long-expected Budget, is so gratifying a testimony to the truth, justice, and success of the Free-trade policy of the late Sir Robert Peel, that Free-traders cannot do otherwise than rejoice. There is always joy over the sinner that repents and amends. Mr. Disraeli not only spoke for himself, but for his colleagues; and not only for his colleagues, but for the compact section of the House who lately fancied themselves Protectionists and, taking that speech or oration as it stands, in its clear statements and candid avowals, and in its concealed recantations of past errors, we are irresistibly led to approve of the actual policy of the Minister who made it, and as irresistibly compelled to judge of his past conduct by the new light thrown upon it by his present professions

Much as the sensible bulk of the people will applaud Mr. Disraeli, and through him Lord Derby, for doing that which now appears to them to be safe and right and in accordance with the public interest, no one who values the honour of those foremost men who lead or sway the senate—no one who thinks high principle essential in private, and, if such a thing could be possible, doubly essential in political life—can avoid asking whether the cause of public morality has not suffered, and is not likely still further to suffer, by the personal conduct of the present Administration? The late Ministers fell; and their sworn, unyielding, and, as it then seemed, consistent opponents stepped into the places which they left vacant. No sooner were they installed in office, than they found that their predecessors were right in their general policy, through all its principal details. The Russell Ministry proposed to reform the Court of Chancery—so does Lord Derby. The Russell Ministry thought a militia bill a measure of paramount necessity—so does Lord Derby. The late Ministers proposed a Constitution for New Zealand; and they also proposed to punish the violators of the Constitution at home. The peccant borough of Sudbury having been deprived of the franchise, Lord John Russell proposed that the still more grossly delinquent borough of St. Alban's should bear it company in disgrace and in punishment, and that the franchise they had forfeited should be extended to new and rising towns; Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli are endeavouring, by the aid of Parliament, to carry out these intentions, both as regards the home boroughs and the remote colony. A similar course has been pursued with the Budget. The public does not, of course, know the exact form of Budget that would have been introduced by Sir Charles Wood, if that Minister had remained in power; but it knows that he would have persevered in the Free-trade policy of Sir Robert Peel—that he would have neither re-imposed a tax upon breadnor upon calicoes; that he would not have restored the Excise duty on glass, or abolished the Property and Income-tax; and that he would, in some way or other, and with more or less modification and relief to particular interests, have persevered in a course of financial policy under which the country has prospered in a most extraordinary manner. What Sir Charles Wood would not have done Mr. Disraeli has, for the very same causes, and in consequence of the very same arguments, refused to do; and what Sir Charles Wood would have attempted, Mr. Disraeli, on the same grounds of right, expediency, and sound statesmanship, has succeeded in doing.

As these particular measures are in themselves good and necessary, the country approves of their being carried; but it asks, and may well ask, why the change of Ministry? And why, of all the statesmen in the world, those very statesmen who participate, if not factiously, opposed these measures, should so quietly and as a matter of course be allowed to carry them into effect? Are principles dependant upon certain places upon certain benches in the New Palace at Westminster, or in certain arm-chairs before certain desks in Downing-street? Is there to be no morality in public men? No doubt when a right thing has to be done, it is well that it be done quickly; but there are certain persons whom good taste, no less than high honour, should prevent from doing it. Sir Robert Peel, who made the most enormous sacrifices ever made by a public man in a cause which he considered that of justice, damaged to some extent the sense of public morality; but what damage will not Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli do to it by their present proceedings? Sir Robert Peel, as soon as he was convinced, had the manliness to say so in plain terms. If he acquired office and supported under a mistake as to his future intentions, he took care not to retain office or court friends and supporters under any false pretences. What he meant to do he openly avowed. He did not play fast and loose with his principles and convictions; and he did not manifest a sordid love of place, and carry out the policies of his adversaries in defiance of the public sentiment.

No doubt it is an advantage that the Government of Lord John Russell fell. It fell from its own weakness of men; from its gross nepotism and exclusiveness, and from the rash and repeated indiscretions of its chief. Over its decline and fall there are none to mourn but the innumerous cousins of the Russells, the Elliotts, and the Greys; but were there no other men who should have tried their hands at forming an Administration? The country may be justified in looking to measures, not to men; but the axiom must not be strained too far. We must have honourable men to carry out honourable measures. There is a certain kind of reserve which is equivalent to a falsehood; and until the time, which we hope for their own sakes is not far distant, when Lord Derby, Mr. Disraeli, and their colleagues shall boldly, openly, and in the face of day renounce Protection by their words, as well as by their deeds, they are acting in a manner to impair the public confidence in the faith and honour of public men. They are lowering the standard of political morality, and committing evil in the vain hope that good may ensue.

MARRIAGE OF EARL GROSVENOR AND LADY CONSTANCE LEVESON GOWER.

THE relationship already so happily existing between the families of Sutherland and Grosvenor was still further cemented by the alliance on Wednesday, the 28th ult., of the eldest son of the Marquis of Westminster with the youngest daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland.

The Chapel Royal, attached to St. James's Palace, in which by the gracious permission of her Majesty, the marriage rite was to be performed, was a great point of attraction; the applications for admission were extremely numerous, but the privilege was restricted to those only connected with the family party.

It may be questioned whether Stafford House was ever seen to greater advantage as on this morning. In the grand hall the pantbs of the columns were tastefully decorated with moss, starred with primroses. Marochetti's exquisite bust of Lady Constance Gower was surrounded by a delicate garland of the white flowers of the stephanotus.

The reception-room was the banqueting-hall. In the centre, from a settee, sprang a cigantic group of lilies. Opening from this room was a balcony, with a charming conservatory for promenade.

The picture-gallery was to-day, for the first time, devoted to the purposes of festive enjoyment. Along the whole gallery, to the extent of more than a hundred feet, a table was spread out for the guests. In the centre, two circular seats of flowers arranged on either side, where the Duke and Duchess might each form the centre of distinguished guests.

The venerable Countess of Carlisle, attended by her son, the Earl of Carlisle, and other immediate relatives of the family, having arrived, the bride soon descended the grand staircase, resting on the arm of her noble father, the Duke of Sutherland by her side

Her Ladyship wore a white satin dress, covered with guipure flounces. The head-dress was of wreath roses entwined with the orange flower and myrtle, surmounted with a splendid veil of guipure, falling to the feet. The bodice and sleeves were of the same lace, supported in front by a magnificent carbuncle surrounded with brilliants, a present from her Majesty the Queen. A necklace of pearls, diamonds, and emeralds completed her Ladyship's toilet.

The company began to arrive at the Chapel at half-past twelve o'clock. Among the earliest were the Earl of Carlisle and Lady Mary Howard, the Duchess of Argyll, the Marchioness of Stafford, Lady Blantyre, and the Marchioness of Kildare. The Duchess of Argyll wore a dress of gray silk, an elegant point lace shawl, and a paille de fantaisie bonnet; the Marchioness of Stafford was attired in a dress of blue moire antique, with flowers of guipure, a white silk mantle elegantly trimmed with fringe, and a bonnet of blonde trimmed with pearls and blue flowers; the Marchioness of Kildare wore a dress of embroidered muslin, a Brussels lace shawl, and a bonnet of tulle spread with jessamine; Lady Blantyre's costume consisted of a dress of white moire antique, trimmed with blue velvet and silver, a shawl of Brussels lace, and a bonnet of the same lace, with blue flowers, feathers, and silver. Her Ladyship was accompanied by her youthful daughter, who was gracefully attired in a white costume, with an elegant hat trimmed with silver.

The three Misses Lascelles, cousins of the bride, now entered the chapel. One of these ladies, the Hon. Mary Lascelles, had been selected as a bridesmaid. The others were the Ladies Octavia, Agnes, Jane, and Theodora Grosvenor, sisters of the bridegroom; Lady Adelwa Fitzalan Howard, daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, Lady Louisa Cavendish, daughter of the Earl of Burlington; and Lady Blanche Egerton, daughter of the Earl and Countess of Ellesmere, all cousins of the bride. The costumes worn by these young ladies were of white glace silk, with mantles to correspond. The bonnets—particularly novel—were white lace, embroidered with green and white grass

The bouquets worn by the bride and her attendant train consisted of a charming admixture of the queen of the orchids (Phalænopsis amabilis), orange flowers, lilies of the valley, and the stephanotus

The next arrivals were the Marchioness of Westminster, the Duchess of Norfolk, and Lady Foley, all of whom were costumes remarkable for their grace and elegance

The noble bridegroom now made his appearance, attended by Viscount Anson as his "best friend." He cordially shook hands with almost every person in the chapel

At one o'clock the carriage containing the bride drove into the court-yard. Her Ladyship was received by the Duchess at the entrance of the chapel, and, resting on the arm of her father, entered the sacred edifice. She looked exquisitely beautiful, and as she walked up the chapel, received the hearty congratulations of her friends and relatives.

The Duchess of Sutherland wore a white gros de Naples dress, with flounces of guipure; a white silk mantle, having a handsome trimming of guipure touching the skirt; and a bonnet of guipure, trimmed with marabout feathers.

The Bishop of London, with the Rev. Dr. Wesley in attendance, having taken his place at the altar, the bridal party formed. At this moment a buzz of attention was directed towards the Royal closet, and the next instant, to the great surprise of nine-tenths of the assembled party, and to the huge gratification of all, the Queen, with the Duchess of Kent and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, entered from the ante-room of the Palace, which the illustrious party had reached by the garden entrance.

The ceremony was performed by the Bishop of London in a very impressive manner. Her Majesty appeared to be much interested in the scene, joining fervently in the service

At the close of the homily the bridal party retired to the vestry, where the usual record was signed by the bridegroom, and attested by the Duchess of Sutherland, the Marquis and Marchioness of Westminster, and the Duchess of Norfolk.

The Queen and the Prince, with the Duchess of Kent, retired as soon as the ceremony was concluded

The bride and bridegroom left the chapel in the noble Earl's chariot, and returned to Stafford House, where a magnificent déjeûner was given by the Duchess of Sutherland in celebration of the happy event. Their exit from the chapel and arrival at Stafford House were greeted by the crowd with cheers.

The Duke of Northumberland was prevented by illness absent, and the Duke of Devonshire was prevented by indisposition from attending.

The déjeûner was served at two o'clock. In the centre of the table was placed a magnificent gateau de noce, of very beautiful design: the cake being supported by figures of the nine Muses, and forming the base of a trophy temple, from which sprang a tripod filled with rare exotics. Among the exquisite works of foreign art which adorned the table was a design in sugar, by Soyer, which was presented to the young bride, in token of his very grateful respect for her Ladyship's family, by Mr. Minton.

Flowers and fruits, of such rarity and in such abundance as the conservatories and forcing-houses of Trentham and Chiswick alone could furnish, graced the table. The strawberries and cherries being abundant.

At the table the Duke of Sutherland had the Marchioness of Westminster on his right hand, and the Duchess of Norfolk upon his left. The Duchess of Sutherland was supported by the Marquis of Westminster and the Marquis of Lansdowne.

The following were among those present, in addition to the noble parents of the wedded pair:—

The Duchess of Northumberland, the Duke and Duchess of Argyll, the Duke and Duchess of Beaufort, the Marquis and Marchioness of Stafford, the Marquis and Marchioness of Kildare, the Earl and Countess of Wilton and the Ladies Egerton and Kathleen Grey Egerton, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Marquis of Granby, the Earl and Countess of Carlisle and Lady Mary Howard, the Earl and Countess of Ellesmere and the Ladies Blanche and Alice Egerton, the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, the Earl and Countess of Mountcashell, the Earl of Burlington, the Earl and Countess of Desart, the Earl and Countess Cawdor, the Earl and Countess Granville, the Earl and Countess Clarendon and Lady Susan Hyde Villiers, the Countess Fitzwilliam and Mr Harcourt, M.P., the Countess Grey and Lady Alice Lambton, Viscount and Viscountess Bradley Somerset and Lord Edward Somerset, Viscount Anson, Lord and Lady Leigh, Lord and Lady Stanley of Alderley, Lord Feversham, Lord Charles Somerset, Lord Grey de Wilton, Lord Dufferin, Lady Louisa Lord and Lady Foley, Lord Harry Gordon Lennox, M.P., Lord and Lady Edward Pitzalan Howard, Lord and Lady Robert Grosvenor and Miss Grosvenor, Lord John Manners, M.P., the Honourable Spencer and Mrs Horatio Ponsonby, Baron Parke and Lady Parke and Miss Parke, Hon. C. C. Cavendish, M.P., and Lady Catherine Cavendish, Hon. Francis Charteris, M.P., and Lady Anne Charteris, Hon. Frederick Leveson, the Misses Lascelles, Captain the Hon. E. Howard, M.P., and Mrs Howard, Hon. Bobby Lawley, M.P., and Lady Elizabeth Lawley, Sir W. Heathcote, M.P., and Mrs Regis, Hon. Charles Howard, M.P., Hon. Leopold Agar Ellis, Hon. James Agar Ellis, Hon. Algernon Egerton, Hon. Arthur Egerton, Hon. Edward Cust, M.P., and Mrs Cust, Sir Charles Barry, Mr Ferrey, Rev. D. Wesley, Mr Scott Russell, and Mr Minton, &c.

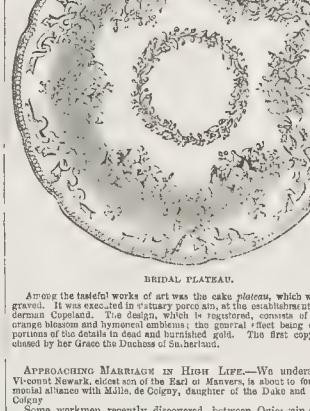
During the déjeûner, the Earl of Carlisle, having been called upon, rose, and in a graceful address, proposed "the health of Lord and Lady Constance Grosvenor."

The noble Earl's remarks elicited loud approbation, and the toast was responded to with three times three hearty cheers.

The bridal cake was now immediately handed round to the guests, who soon after rose and retired to the drawing-rooms. At this period an opportunity was afforded to witness the very costly and magnificent presents made to the bride. Amongst these were her Majesty's gift of a diamond stomacher; a splendid tiara of diamonds, contributed by the Marquis of Westminster: a necklace, having a fine opal and ruby and diamond pendant, from the Duke of Sutherland; a beautiful bouquet, covered over with gold, from Lord Ebrington; and a jewelled bracelet, necklace of rubies and emeralds from the Duchess of Argyll. The Duchess of Sutherland's present was an ebony dressing-case, with gold mountings, and elabora e turquoise ornaments—a recherché work.

At half-past three o'clock the company arranged themselves on the grand staircase to witness the departure of the bride and bridegroom. As her Ladyship descended, she affectionately embraced each of her relatives, nor passed without some kind greeting even to the humblest of the domestics.

The noble bridegroom having handed his fair bride into a travelling carriage which was in attendance, leaped in himself, and the happy pair drove off amidst the cheers of the crowd, for Clifden, the Duke of Sutherland's seat in Buckinghamshire.



BRIDAL PLATEAU.

AMONG the tasteful works of art was the cake plateau, which we have engraved. It was executed in statuary porce lain, at the establishment of Mr. Alderman Copeland. The design, which is tasteful, consists of wreaths of orange blossom and hymeneal emblems; the general effect being enriched by portions of the details in dead and burnished gold. The first copy was purchased by her Grace the Duchess of Sutherland.

APPROACHING MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—We understand that Viscount Newark, eldest son of the Earl of Manvers, is about to form a matrimonial alliance with Mlle. de Coigny, daughter of the Duke and Duchess de Coigny

Some workmen recently discovered, between Quievrain and Bavai, (Belgium), several Gaudish tombs, containing, however, beades a little dust, only some glass beads, apparently belonging to a necklace. It is supposed that these tombs were occupied by women. Near Valenciennes a medal has been discovered, with the date of 1405, and struck, it is presumed, to commemorate the great famine of that year. A second medal, found near the same spot, bears the date of 1345, when Humbert Dauphin (Count d'Albon), being without children, ceded his states to the son of Philippe of Valois, on condition of his assuming the name of Dauphin and his arms. Since then the eldest son of the Kings of France has always borne the title of Dauphin.

The gross amount of all sums received and credited (including interest), by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, on account of savings-banks and friendly societies, from the 8th August, 1817, to the 30th November, 1851, was £64,080,566 19s 1d. The amount paid by the Commissioners during that period was £31,240,590 18s 8d. The gross amount of interest paid and credited to savings-banks and friendly societies by the Commissioners was £33,491,621 16s 3d.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The approaching military fête monstre of Monday next, the 10th inst., engrossed almost the entire interest and attention of the public in Paris during the week. Strangers from the provinces, from England, and the adjoining Continental countries, were crowding to the capital in large numbers, to be present at the grand spectacle. The number of applications for tickets of admission exceeds 150,000.

On Wednesday the anniversary of the Emperor Napoleon's death (the 5th of May) was celebrated with great pomp at the Church of the Invalides, in the presence of the "Prince President," who arrived at eleven o'clock, accompanied by the Minister of War, and escorted by a troop of Cuirassiers. All the members of the Bonaparte family, and the Legislative and the other constituted bodies of the State, were also present in their official costume. A large crowd, collected outside the church, saluted the President with cheers, as he drove slowly, going and returning, through a narrow passage kept by the troops in the centre of the throng. At the conclusion of the service some eighty or ninety old soldiers of the Imperial armies, dressed in the uniform of the various regiments of the time of the Empire, walked in procession from the Invalides to the Place Vendôme, and deposited crowns of immortelles at the foot of the pillar surmounted by the statue of Napoleon. One of the garlands, which was suspended by a lancer of the Imperial Guard to the beak of the bronze eagle at the entrance of the monument, bore this inscription:—"5th of May, 1852." An offering presented to Napoleon the Great by the Philanthropic Society, composed of the remains of his army, established in Paris." The old soldiers then walked round the pillar; and having formed within the railing, they were addressed by a Lieutenant-Colonel of the line. In the evening they met together at a banquet.

A considerable decline which has taken place in the Four-and-a-Half per Cents excites a good deal of attention as to its cause; but the stringency of the press law deters the conductors of the daily journals, or the foreign correspondents resident in Paris, from communicating the alleged fact that the speculation of falsehood should be discharged to their account, and they be sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment. An impression, notwithstanding, prevails that the decline is attributable to a demand having been made by the Emperor of Russia for the reimbursement of the 50,000,000 Five per Cents (lately reduced to Four-and-a-Half) of which he is the holder.

On Saturday night the ball at the Tuileries took place, which had been twice deferred, on account of the deaths of Prince Paul of Wurtemburg and the Grand Duke of Baden. The President wore the uniform of a general of the army. For the first time he was preceded by an usher, who cried out to the people to make way for the Prince.

The usual weekly military review was held by the President on Sunday, in the Place du Carrousel. The troops reviewed form the third division of the army of Paris.

The question relative to the confiscation of the Orleans property, which has been taken by the Government on of the jurisdiction of the ordinary court of law, the Civil Tribunal of the Seine, and been referred to the Section du Contentieux of the committee on disputed matters of the Council of State, has been made the subject of a decree addressed by the Prefect of the Seine to the President of the Civil Tribunal

His document puts the case of the Government in its most presentable form, and represents the pecuniary aspect of harsh and arbitrary injustice which the whole affair bears. The chief points relied on are as follow:—

Considering that the decree of January 22 was issued by the Prince-President of the Republic in the plenitude of his power; that, according to the terms of Art. 58 of the Constitution, it has the complete character and to have the effect of a law;

Considering that this decree has pronounced in a definite manner the restitution to the domain of the State of the property comprised in the condition of the 7th August, 1830, made by the late King Louis Philippe to his children; that the domains of Bentily and Monceaux are by name comprised in that donation; and that, by a second decree of March 27, the Administration of the domains was authorised to proceed into the sale of it in the forms prescribed by the sale of domain property;

Considering that the act of taking possession in the name of the State of the domains in question is only the necessary consequence of the execution of the above decrees; that all the measures taken or to be taken by the Administration to give effect to it are but acts of simple administration, and exclusively within the attributions of the administrative authority;

Considering that the tribunals cannot claim to take cognisance of the acts of the Government and of the Administration;

Considering that the joint property which might exist with regard to a part of these domains can be no obstacle to the sale of the whole by the Administration of the domains, without prejudice to the rights of a third party, conformably to the laws of the 15th and 16th Floréal;

Considering therefore, that the demand formed by the heirs of the deceased King Louis Philippe, both to the above-mentioned decrees, and tending to impede the action of the Administration, the tribunal, in declaring itself competent, is in contravention to the laws which prohibit the judicial authorities from taking cognisance of the acts of the Government and of the Administration, and has violated the principle of the separation of powers;

From those motives we decree:—

"The conflict of attribution is raised in the case pending before the First Chamber of the Civil Tribunal of Première Instance of the Seine, between the heirs of the deceased King Louis Philippe and the Director-General of Registration and Domains, in consequence of the judgment of 23d April."

Some two or three weeks are expected to elapse before the decision is finally pronounced.

UNITED STATES.

There is no political news of interest in the advices received this week from New York, and dated the 21st ult.

Kossuth was at Jersey city on the 19th, where he was received very favourably. He addressed large assemblies both at Trenton and Jersey city, and had proceeded to Newark.

Reports were rife in all quarters of floods in the rivers consequent on the breaking up of the frost. A good deal of damage has been caused by the rising of the waters in the Monongahela and Alleghany rivers, particularly in the neighbourhood of Allegheny city and at Pittsburg. The water reached within two feet and a half of the great freshet of 1832, when property to the extent of a million of dollars was destroyed; on the present occasion it is estimated at 400,000 dollars.

Commodore Stevens has published a reply to Mr. Mare's challenge to try Yankee speed in sail ng. The answer is to this effect:—

I regret it is not in my power to accept the proposal of Mr Mare, as I have at present no intension of visiting England again the ensuing season. You have the Americus in your waters; and when Mr. Mare builds a yacht of superior speed, we shall be most happy to give him a trial for the sum he mentions, whenever he will do us the favour of returning the visit I had the honour of paying the Royal Yacht Squadron at Cowes.

INDIA.

In our late edition last week, we gave a telegraphic despatch from Trieste, communicating intelligence from Bombay, dated April 3. The usual full accounts have since arrived, and from them we learn that the Calcutta portion of the Burmese expeditionary force left the Hooghly on the 25th March, the Madras troops embarked on board the Bombay squadron on the 27th and 29th, and both divisions were expected to rendezvous at Moulmein about the 4th or 5th of April. It was intended that the force should start 10 or 15 days earlier, and the delay that has taken place is much to be regretted, as the near approach of the monsoon, and the necessity of striking a blow before the setting in of that season, renders the loss of every day a matter of very serious moment.

"The promptness and vigour (says the Bombay Times) of the Councils of the Governor-General are said to have been chilled and damped by the Executive. It had been resolved—why, it is not stated—to place General Godwin in charge of the expedition. He was the oldest Queen's officer available, and had shared in the Burmese war in 1824—reasons sufficient, one would have supposed, why some other should have been appointed. He is said to have debated and hesitated, being averse to the sea then blow originally desired to be struck, in favour of a delay till October, and it was by land and river accordingly that is due form."

In addition to this state of matters, the 38th Bengal Native Infantry, whose conditions of service do not require them to go beyond sea, had refused to embark for Burmah, and the 5th Native Madras Infantry had been similarly situated in their case.

The extreme north-west frontier continued to be disturbed by foray of the hillmen. On the 11th of March a force of about 2600 men, consisting of the 1st troop 1st brigade Horse Artillery, under Captain Baldwin; four quarters and 600 men of her Majesty's 32d Regiment; a wing of the 29th Regiment Native Infantry; the whole of the 66th Regiment Native Infantry (Goorkas), under the command of Lieut.-Colonel Troup; the 55th Irregular Cavalry (Fisher's), and a company of Sappers and Miners, left Peshawur under Sir Colin Campbell for the Kusafzie country. On the 20th they were attacked by the enemy; the fighting lasted three hours, when the hillmen were beaten off. The loss is said to be considerable on both sides—100 killed and wounded. India itself was generally tranquil.

The Nizam's dominions were in a most hopeless state: the alienation from the ordinary purposes of the State of the sums required for paying off in part the debt due to the company had, as was anticipated, increased every species of disorder which arose from the nonpayment of the Nizam's troops, whose outrages, in consequence, had rendered life and property in Hyderabad so insecure, that a large number of the more wealthy inhabitants of the city had taken refuge within the limits of the residency. The Minister had avowed his inability to pay the contingent.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Accounts from the Cape, reaching to March 17, which is ten days later than the intelligence published last week, states that Sir Harry Smith left King William's Town on the 4th of March, with the intention of attacking the enemy's fastnesses. His forces were divided into three divisions, and consisted of the 73d, 60th Rifles, and the 43rd and 12th Lancers, Artillery levies, &c. He had heard of his removal, but it had not altered his plans. Lady Smith was making every preparation to leave on the arrival of the new Governor.

The Legislative Council had voted £500 towards the relief of the sufferers from the loss of the Birkenhead.

From the seat of war we learn that during the first week of March, a patrol, having successfully attacked some Kaffir kraals in the Waterkloof, were themselves attacked on their return (by combined Kaffirs and Hottentots), when the following casualties took place. Colonel Yarborough, of the 91st, slightly wounded; Ensign Hibbert, 91st, wounded; Captain Bramley, Cape Corps, wounded; and twenty-six soldiers of the 91st and 74th Regiments killed and wounded.

ELECTION INTELLIGENCE.

EAST SUFFOLK.—Her Majesty's Solicitor-General, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, was returned as representative for East Suffolk on Saturday, without opposition. Mr. Houghton (Free-trader) was put in nomination, but he declined to go to the poll.

AYLESBURY.—At a public meeting of the electors of Aylesbury, Mr. Layard expressed his political sentiments; and having promised to support Free Trade as extension of the suffrage, and the ballot, his candidature was unanimously accepted by the meeting. Mr. Layard deprecated any intention to divide the Liberal party by coming forward, or to endanger Mr. Bethell's chances of re-election.

CARLISLE. There are three candidates in the field; viz. Sir James Graham and Mr. Joseph Ferguson on Liberal and Free-trade principles, and Mr. W. N. Hodgson, a member of Lord Derby's Government. At a large open-air meeting, held on Monday, a resolution of confidence in Sir James Graham and Mr. Ferguson was agreed to.

DOVER.—It is said that A. J. Hope, Esq., of Bridgbury-park, Kent, will be a candidate for the representation of the borough of Dungarvon at the next election.

DURHAM CITY.—The rival candidates for the representation of this ancient city are Mr. Grainger, Q.C., the present member, Lord Adolphus Vane, son of the Marquis of Londonderry, and Mr. Atherton, a barrister on the northern circuit. There has been an active canvass during the past week by all these gentlemen.

WEST GLOUCESTER.—It is stated that Mr. Kingscote, son of the veteran Colonel Kingscote, and nephew of the Duke of Beaufort, will be brought forward as a candidate for West Gloucestershire, in the Liberal interest.

GREENWICH.—Mr. Alderman Salomons addressed a large meeting of the electors on Monday evening, at the house-hold of the poor. The Jewish member having briefly explained the import of the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, declared that he would abide by what they decided. He said that he would not at present make any appeal to the House of Commons, for in the decision of the Court of Exchequer, although he had the option of doing so. It would only occasion greater delay and waste of property. They would shortly have a new Parliament; and, if it should be their pleasure to return him again as their member, he would take his seat and act a legal part in their first proceeding; he would vote upon the appointment of the Speaker, for no oath would be required of him before he did, and thus he would show the soundness of his admirable position of the law. The question of the oaths would then have to come before the House; and if they should then refuse to pass an act to admit him to the privileges of the Legislature, he would summon a meeting of the electors and return them that trust which, perhaps, he could not usefully preserve. At the conclusion of the hon. gentleman's address, a vote of confidence in him was proposed and seconded, amidst much confusion.

HARWICH.—Mr. Issac Butt, Q.C., has left town for Harwich. The election is fixed for this day (Saturday). It is said that Mr. Butt will be returned without opposition. The resignation of the Solicitor-General has led to the abandonment of the petition to the House of Commons against his return.

KING'S COUNTY.—Mr. Lotus Bland is at present pursuing an active canvass amongst the electors of the King's County, and has met with a very favourable reception. The other candidates for the county are talked of on the part of Mr. Ambrose Cox, of Clare, and one of Judge Hall's sons. The Hon. Colonel Westenra has declared his intention of not again seeking the representation of the county. Captain Lennard's claims, however, are considered by many better by other, from his very liberal character as a landlord, and general position in the county.

MALMESBURY.—In consequence of the intended resignation of the Hon. James Howard, two candidates are in the field for this borough. Mr. Luce, manager of the Wilts and Dorset Branch Bank in this town, has come forward on Free-trade principles, having received a requisition from a body of the electors, and being supported by the Radical party. Mr. Audley Lovel, of Coe Park, near this place, has come forward on the Conservative interest, as a supporter of Lord Derby's Government, except in any point that may tend to re-impose a duty on articles of imported food. Both parties are sanguine as to the result of the election.

MANCHESTER.—It is now decided that the present members for Manchester, Mr. John Bright and the Right Hon. Thos. Milner Gibson, will not at the impending general election be allowed again to return to Parliament without a contest. The candidates will be Mr. Bright and Mr. Cobden, whose claims members are understood to be Lord Moreton, son of the Earl of Ducie, and Mr. George Loch, son of the member for Wick.

NEWCASTLE.—Mr. Samuel Laing, jun., of London, and younger son of Papdale (a native of Kirkwal), chairman of the Brighton Railway Company, has been persuaded to start for the Northern Burghs, in opposition to Mr. Loch. The principles of the two gentlemen are identical.

PENRYN.—The friends of Mr. Lowndes Parker have expressed their determination to propose that gentleman at the hustings on the day of election, and to carry him to the poll.

RIPON.—Mr. Laycles has again intimated his intention of again coming forward for this borough; but his address contains no declaration of his political sentiments.

ROCHESTER.—It is understood that two gentlemen are prepared to come forward as candidates for the Conservative interest. One is a relative of a Cabinet Minister, the other an East India proprietor, who has served the Hon. Company with distinction in several capacities. Neither of these gentlemen has hitherto sat in Parliament.

SLIGO COUNTY.—Mr. Sheriff Swift comes forward under the special patronage of Archbishop Slade.

SUNDERLAND.—Mr Hudson visited Sunderland again on Monday, to complete his canvass of electors. Mr. Seymour has left; but there is also losing pursuit. Mr. Fenwick is at Sunderland, and is using every energy he can to strengthen his position; but there are no changes in the relative position of the three candidates worth noticing.

SUTHERLAND.—It is said that Sir D. Dundas, who has long and ably represented this county, is about to retire, and that the Marquis of Stafford will offer himself to the electors on Liberal principles. This rumour gains ground.

TOWER HAMLETS.—On Tuesday evening Mons. A. Thompson, Lyttelton, two out of the five candidates for the representation of the Tower Hamlets at the forthcoming general election, attended a crowded meeting of the electors at the Mansion-house, for the purpose of stating their views and principles to the gentlemen, at considerable length, addressed the meeting, which was very noisy and by no means unanimous, and finally a resolution approving them as candidates was put and carried.

WILTS (SOUTH).—It is expected that Mr. Sidney Herbert and Mr. Long will be returned for the southern division of Wilts without a contest.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—It is stated that the committee gentlemen who were desirous of retaining the building in its original position, have failed in their object, have made such arrangements for the purchase of a piece of land in the immediate neighbourhood, that it will not be removed 300 yards from its present site; and that, if it is now a nuisance to the inhabitants of Prince's-place, it is likely to be equally so in its new location, the ground alluded to being in the immediate rear of Prince's-place, between the Knight's bridge and Brompton road, from which there will be no inconvenient approaches to the Palace, that from Knightsbridge being by Rutland gate. It is proposed to convert the building into a winter-garden and museum of science and art, the attractions of which will be enhanced by the addition of fountains and other élite.

BUILDERS' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—On Wednesday last a deputation of the above society met a number of the most influential builders of Brighton, at dinner, at the Solp Hotel, in that town, for the purpose of forming a branch institution. Mr. Joshua Higgs, on taking the chair, said that their object in meeting the builders of Brighton was to induce them to form a local institution in their town, and to co-operate with the parent society, whose object was to help those who had been reduced to penury and distress by circumstances over which they had no control. He concluded by suggesting that a committee be formed for that purpose. Mr. George Burd, in a neat speech also advocated the claims of the institution on the public for support. Mr. G. Cheeseman, jun., of Brighton, said that the builders of that town felt honoured by the invitation; and he, for one, gave the society his earnest and hearty support. The Lessins of Mr. Joseph Aird, the principal mover in the matter; Mr. Thomas Cozens, the founder of the institution; and other toasts, having been given, the officers of the branch were appointed, and the meeting separated.

An address is about to be presented to the Rev. W. J. E. Bennett, the rector of Frome, by his congregation, which has already received more than 1000 signatures.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

GENERAL ARTHUR DE CONDORCET O'CONNOR.

This celebrated leading partisan of the Irish Rebellion in 1798, a man of daring yet chivalrously consistent spirit, was the fifth and youngest son of Roger Connor, Esq., of Connorville, in the county of Cork, by his wife Anne, daughter of Robert Longfield, Esq., and sister of Viscount Longueville. The next brother of Arthur, Roger Connor, was prosecuted, and his father's property of Connorville, was also a well-known character in Ireland: he was, as well as his brother, implicated in the rebellion of 1798, and he tried and acquitted in 1817 on a charge of robbing a mail-coach. he died in 1835. One of the sons of Roger is the present Roger O'Connor, M.P. for Nottingham. The family of Conner was of high standing and respectability in the county of Cork. The two brothers, Arthur, the subject of this notice, were educated by their father's own principles, and Roger, adopted the surname of O'Connor, in consequence of a family tradition that it had been merely discontinued by an ancestor, to escape the persecution of the English Government.

Arthur O'Connor was born in 1765. From his earliest manhood he took an active part in Irish politics. He was, at the outset of his career, M.P. for Philipstown, and he soon put himself in the front of those Protestants who were then the most opposed to the proceedings of the Government in Ireland. The line of conduct was so contrary to that which Arthur O'Connor's uncle, Lord Longueville, that that nobleman offered him the reversion of his estates, with a chance of succeeding to his title, if he would abandon his democratic principles. O'Connor steadfastly refused to do so; and it cannot be denied, that during the long course of his subsequent existence, he never, for an instant, swerved from the sentiments he then professed, even though he frequently incurred loss of liberty and risk of life. O'Connor was a chief of the United Irishmen, and a member of their treasonable Directory, and, indeed, of every organised association on the ultra-Liberal side which was then entirely disaffected to the State. He, moreover, was looked upon as a man who sought to procure aid from a foreign power at war with the British Crown, to carry out their views of freeing Ireland from English rule. O'Connor entered into open communication with the French Directory—a dangerous and discreditable proceeding—and in 1795 he accompanied the unfortunate Lord Edward Fitzgerald to Switzerland, where, high unto the frontier of France, they had an interview with the great republican General Pichegru, who afterwards made an unsuccessful descent on Ireland. Mr. O'Connor becoming responsibly connected with a newspaper called the Press, which was very violent against the Government, was imprisoned in Dublin. On obtaining his liberty, he came to London, went to France, and then returned. The result of this was that he had to stand his trial for high treason, together with four others, before a special commission at Maidstone, presided over by Mr. Justice Buller, on the 21st and 22nd May, 1798. The principal charge against the accused was that of inciting the King's enemies to make an invasion of the realm. The evidence was of a somewhat double-ill kind. Some of the first men in England—among them the Duke of Norfolk, Sheridan, and Erskine—spoke to the character of O'Connor. All the prisoners except one, the Rev James O'Coigley, a Roman Catholic priest, were declared not guilty. At the moment of acquittal, there was a message to the effect that from the strength of the actual case made out against him. He that as it may, O'Connor was brought a prisoner to Ireland, and finally was offered the option to a compromise entered into, at Hamburgh, at the suggestion of Lord Castlereagh, between the Government and those Irish rebels who remained untried, by which the latter were to remain, without naming; exiles, all their civil rights restored, and to have permission to leave Ireland on giving security not to return without leave. Some delays occurred in the carrying out of this arrangement, pending which O'Connor and his fellow prisoners were detained in custody at Fort George, Scotland. Fort St. George is in Inverness-shire, under the care of the late benevolent General Stuart, then Governor of the place. At last, on the 30th June, 1802, they were liberated, and allowed to sail for Hamburgh. Arthur O'Connor adopted France for his future country; he rose to high rank and distinction in her service, and became a General in the French army. In private life he was everywhere esteemed and respected. He married Mdlle. de Condorcet, the widow of the celebrated Condorcet who died on the 23rd ult., at his château at Bignon, in the department of Loiret, in the Orléanais.

Mr. Justice Buller, the only son of the General, preceded him to the tomb about two years ago.

General O'Connor was a man of literary ability. In conjunction with his fellow-prisoners Emmett and Macnevin, and in the presence of the ministers with the Irish Government which saved their lives, O'Connor wrote a "Memoir of the Origin and Progress of the United Irishmen." This was rather too violent to suit the taste of the latter. It was burnt by the Government, instead of accepting the production, suppressed it. It was afterwards published by its author; and, despite of its extreme opinions, has proved an acceptable addition to the literature of the period of its epoch. General O'Connor has since brought out an edition of his father-in-law Condorcet's works, and also some pamphlets on the political position of Great Britain and Ireland. It is to be regretted that the turbulent spirit of the times and of the men themselves abroad have deprived their country of the valuable talents which the three exiles, Macnevin, Emmett, and O'Connor, proved themselves, and travelling over a great portion of the provinces and the States, he returned home. He was speedily engaged in connexion with the Morning Chronicle; and so highly were his and Sir Francis Burdett's services valued, that a journal to the United States. for the purpose of examining the diplomatic bearings of the treaties as to the Maine boundary, and observing the feelings of the American public on the question. His letters on these subjects were filled with valuable information, and with clear and logical reasoning. Not long after his return, Mr. Mackay published his "Western World," a work of comprehensive grasp and great philosophical development. The book was acknowledged to be the most complete ever written upon the Transatlantic Republic. Its success was immediate, and the volumes became a standard authority. As one of the special correspondents of the Morning Chronicle, Mr. Mackay was engaged in investigating the condition of the English rural population, and rendered important services to the question of Labour and the Poor, while his versatile pen was frequently and successfully turned to other topics of general literary and political interest. Latterly Mr. Mackay determined to devote himself to political life. He joined the Reform party, and delivered many able speeches at public meetings in the metropolis upon the franchise question. He had the purpose and expectation of ultimately entering Parliament; but he first retired from home politics, and accepted from the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester a mission to India, to investigate the possibility of extending the growth of the cotton plant in our eastern possessions. Somewhat more than six months ago he departed with the hopes and spirits. He died on his passage home, on the 18th ult. Mr. Mackay was a highly promising author, a rising politician, and a most amiable man.

MR. JOHN DALRYMPLE, F.R.S.

THIS eminent surgeon died at his residence in Grosvenor-street, on Sunday, the 2d inst., in the 49th year of his age. He was the eldest son of the late William Dalrymple, a duelist, retired surgeon at Norwich. After studying for some time under his father, and at the University of Edinburgh, Mr. Dalrymple passed his examination before the College of Surgeons in the year 1827, and settled as a practitioner in the city of London, a locality to encourage for the West-end in 1829. In 1832 he was elected one of the assistant-surgeons to the Royal London Ophthalmic Hospital, and, by his great skill and assiduity in the ophthalmic department of surgery, effectually laboured to sustain the high character of the institution. In 1843 he was appointed full surgeon to the hospital; and although, from the state of his health, he was under the necessity of resigning his situation, the governors evinced their sense of his services by requesting him to give his occasional assistance in consultations. In 1847 he was elected consulting surgeon to the North London Infirmary, in 1850 a Fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1851 a Councilor of the College of Surgeons. He was one of the founders of the Royal College of Chemistry, and zealously promoted its interests to the best of his ability. In 1834 Mr. Dalrymple published his much-prized essay on the anatomy of the human eye, and had just completed his valuable work on the pathology of that organ when his career was closed. His writings will bear lasting evidence to his skill and reputation. In private life, Mr. Dalrymple's many agreeable and amiable qualities caused him to be much loved and esteemed.

W. H. ASHPITEL, ESQ.

WILLIAM HUBAT ASHPITEL, ESQ., an architect, and a magistrate for Middlesex, died at his residence, in Clapton square, on the 22d ult., in the 76th year of his age. This gentleman was educated as an architect under the celebrated Alexander (known by his extensive works, particularly the prisons at Dartmoor and Millbank), and as an engraver under the no less known John Rennie. Mr. Ashpitel himself acquired a large practice in his profession: he had retired from it a very considerable time ago. He married Elizabeth, daughter of James Peto, Esq., and leaves by her three sons and four daughters. The sons are, Arthur Ashpitel, F.S.A., F.R.A.S., &c., the well-known architect and antiquary; Captain Felix Ashpitel, of her Majesty's 8th Foot; the Rev. Francis Ashpitel, B.A., of Brasenose College, Oxford, and Senior Mathematical Scholar of the University. The eldest daughter is the wife of the Rev. W. Denton, M.A., incumbent of St. Bartholomew's, Moor lane.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—The following appointments and preferments have recently been made:—Prebend: The Rev. Charles Mackenzie, M.A., rector of St. Benet, Gracechurch-street, and Head Master of Queen Elizabeth's Grammar School, Southwark, to a prebendal stall in St. Paul's Cathedral. Rectories: The Rev Alfred Roger Taylor, B.A., to St. Stephen, Cornwall; the Rev. W. Wilmot, M.A., to St. Michael Carhayes, Cornwall. The Bishopric of Christchurch, New Zealand, has been conferred upon the Rev. John Philip Gell, M.A., curate of St. Mary's Church, Bryanstone square, and formerly warden of Christ College, Tasmania. The new diocese of Christchurch will comprise the districts some time assigned to the new diocese of Lyttelton, and to that the Rev. Thomas Jackson was nominated the first Bishop. Mr. Jack on, however, was not consecrated. The Rev. Augustus W. D. Fellowes, M.A., minor canon of York Cathedral, has been instituted by the Bishop of Worcester to the Rectory of Nether Wallop, near Stockbridge, Hampshire, rendered vacant by the retirement of the Rev. B. Tate, M.A., on the nomination of the vicars choral of York Cathedral. The Rev. John E. Hill, A.B., rector of Cranoe, Leicestershire, to be a surrogate for the Archdeacon of Leicester.

TESTIMONIALS.—The following clergymen have received testimonials of esteem and regard:—The Rev. W. Lee Howarth, late curate of Pudsey, on his leaving, from the Sunday-school teachers, and other members of his congregation; the Rev. Lewis Paige, late chaplain of the gaol, Newcastle-upon-Tyne; the Rev. Alexander Read, of Hyde, Cheshire, from the congregation, the Rev. Edward Mayer, late curate of Manchester, from the Rev. [illegible] case of female [illegible] St. Barnabas' [illegible] Hoxton, [illegible] South Shields, was, on Monday evening last, presented with a [illegible] communion service, bearing the following inscription: [illegible] the parishioners of St. Stephen's district, South Stands [illegible] Sam Bolsgrove, ten years curate of Goodstone, from the churchwardens and other members of the congregation, on his leaving; the Rev. A. A. [illegible] late curate of Wellington, from the congregation, on his leaving; J. H. Gray, late curate of Rothley, Leicestershire, on his leaving; [illegible] Reynolds, late curate of St. John Baptist, Bristol, from the congregation, and particularly from the poorer portion of it, on his promotion.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—At a meeting for the conference of degrees by the University, held on Wednesday, at the rooms of the Royal Society, Somerset House (the Earl of Burlington, the Chancellor, president), it appeared from the report read by the registrar that in the past year 214 candidates had been admitted to matriculation, several of whom had distinguished themselves in science and classics. The list of honours for the year was very numerous.

ST. MATTHEW'S CHURCH, BEDFORD NEW TOWN.—The first stone of this sacred edifice, which is situate in Oakley-square, St. Pancras, and will add to the number of the seven district churches since which this parish is divided, was laid on Thursday morning, by Lord John Russell, in the presence of a vast concourse of spectators. Before the ceremony, Divine service was performed in the temporary chapel, in High-street, Camden Town, by the Rev. Mr. Dale.

OBJECTIONABLE CHURCH DECORATIONS.—A protest, signed on behalf of a great proportion of the subscribers to the fund for building St. Luke's church, St. Leonard's, was presented to the Bishop of Winchester during his visit in Jersey. The object of the parties was to protest against the introduction of painted windows, containing representations of the Virgin Mary and our Saviour, St. Luke, &c., and having various names inscribed in the compartments at the bottom of the windows, on the ground that it is contrary to the "act for abolishing and putting away divers books and images," and inconsistent with the teaching of the Church of England, on the subject. It was stated that he could see nothing in the design of these windows to which legitimate objection could be taken. The protesting parties had erroneously supposed that one of them contained a representation of the Virgin Mary and Our Saviour: it was, in fact, a memorial of the Annunciation, and the subject was treated in a manner which was usual, and he thought unobjectionable.

The Lord Chancellor has made the following appointments:—The Rev. Josiah Lockhart Rose to the vicarage of Avebury with Winterbourne, Monkton, Wilts; the Rev. Charles Trollope, to the rectory of St. Cuthbert's, Bedford.

The Lord Bishop of Durham has subscribed £100 towards the funds for erecting a new church at Elphin Banks.

BRITISH ANTI-STATE-CHURCH ASSOCIATION.—The annual general meeting of the British Anti-State-Church Association was held on Wednesday night, in Finsbury Chapel; Lawrence Heyworth, Esq., M.P., in the chair. The body of the chapel was crowded with the friends of the principles of the association, and there was a large number of ministers from the country. The report, which was read, stated that they had, during the year, sent deputations to nearly one hundred towns, from Aberdeen in the north to the other extremity of the kingdom. The literary scheme for inculcating the society's principles by means of general literature had been successfully launched, several thousand volumes of the "Library for the Times" having been circulated. To agitation for the repeal of the Maynooth Endowment Act had also the committee to call their support to the noble movement against State patronage of error. The following resolution amongst others was adopted:—"That the recent gratuitous declaration of the Earl of Derby, that it would be a principal object of his government to uphold and extend the influence of the Established Church, was regarded by the meeting as an encouragement to increased activity on the part of the members of the association, as betraying a consciousness that public opinion was fast ripening to a successful assault on so anomalous an institution."

The foundation-stone of a school for the children of Westmoreland parents was laid on Wednesday in Norwood-lane, near the Tulse hill gate, by the Hon Colonel Lowther, M.P., in the absence of the Earl of Lonsdale.

Shortly after one o'clock on Sunday afternoon the north-western portion of the metropolis was visited with a heavy storm of wind and rain, which lasted nearly a quarter of an hour. Between the showers the sun shone in large bright patches, and, but for the rain, would seem to be drying the ground a watery appearance. It was followed by a very cold sleet, which lasted till nearly two o'clock. At five o'clock another storm passed over the metropolis, interspersed with rain and sleet.

Mr. Stafford and Capt. Duncombe have prepared and brought in a bill for the better preservation and regulation of the ports and harbours of the United Kingdom.

RIFLE SOIREE.—The Scottish Society and Hanover-park Rifle Club gave a grand soiree in their club-house, Hanover-park, Peckham, on Monday evening last, which was very numerously attended, and presented a very pleasing appearance—the scene, with their ball-room decorations, forming a beautiful contrast with the dark rifle costume of the members of the club, and a number of gentlemen in rich Highland dresses being present. Dancing continued until two o'clock on the following morning. The members of the Rifle Club meet every Wednesday and Saturday, for manual and platoon exercise; but they have not decided on the description of arm they will adopt, as they are waiting for the decision of the Government, that they may have them of the same kind.

FESTIVITIES AT CHESTER.

THE houses of Wynnstay and Grosvenor have long been politically opposed. On Wednesday week they were rivals in rejoicing; for, in addition to the wedding festivities at Stafford House (illustrated on the first page), on the same day, at St. James's Church, took place the marriage of Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, Bart., M.P., with his beautiful cousin, Miss Maria Emily Williams Wynn, daughter of the Right Hon. Sir Henry Williams Wynn, G.C.B. This interesting events excited the liveliest interest and sympathy at Chester, on account of the near connexion which has long and happily existed between that ancient city and the families of Eaton and Wynnstay. Accordingly, the day was celebrated at Chester with great demonstrations of the inhabitants. The bells of the different churches rang merrily, flags were hoisted at the Exchange, upon the church towers, and the public establishments and the shipping at Crane and St. Salmey were gaily dressed. The house fronts were decorated with laurel and other evergreens, interwined with knots of ribbon and other symbolical devices. At Eaton Hall, the clergy, county, and principal tenantry of the Marquis of Westminster were hospitably entertained. In Chester there was a public dinner at the Royal Hotel, in honour of the nuptials of Lord Grosvenor, and at the Feathers Hotel, in compliment to the noble Lord, and also to Sir Watkin Wynn. There were commemorations at the schools and other public institutions of the city. In the evening the house-fronts were illuminated with brilliant and characteristic devices; crowns and stars based in every direction, sending upon the quaint old gables of past ages the splendid illumination of our own. We have engraved the festive scene upon the opposite page.

FETE AT CHESTER, IN CELEBRATION OF THE MARRIAGE OF EARL GROSVENOR AND LADY CONSTANCE LEVESON GOWER.—(SEE PAGE 362.)

MAY DAY IN THE NEW FOREST.

THE little village of Burley, in the New Forest, Hampshire, was the scene of a very interesting festivity on Saturday last, the 1st of May; and whilst we reflected on the pretty scene which there surrounded us, we rejoiced that our pages might still further extend this pleasure by Illustration, and be perhaps the means of stimulating some of the richer inhabitants of such localities, in future years, to adopt a somewhat similar celebration of May-day; and show how trifling expense, trouble, and good management may insure much happiness to a class who enjoy but little of the sweets of this life.

Burley is delightfully situated in one of the loveliest parts of the New Forest, the prettiest spot in which was selected for the day's pleasure and amusement to the children belonging to the church and chapel schools. And here we would express our gratification at finding the promoters of the fête permitted no sectarian views of their own to induce their favouring one class of children above another.

This lovely spot is known to the foresters as Shabbon-bottom. It is a long-extended lawn, the smooth grass of which appeared more luxuriant in contrast with the heath and furze, the bright and golden blossom of which added not a little to the enchantment of the scene; bounded by gently rising eminences, and shaded here and there by beeches varied by the darker hue of holly, which were growing in pretty knolls about the hills. A Maypole was erected in the centre of the lawn, tastefully decorated with green and garlands; and at a little distance was a tent, wherein cake, buns, oranges, gingerbread, &c. were most liberally distributed.

At three o'clock, the children, numbering 140, came upon the lawn, preceded by an excellent brass band, and accompanied by W. Clement D. Esdaile, Esq., of Burley Park; and Mrs. Laurence Hill, of Burley Lawn; the originators of the fête.

The May Queen, chosen by lot from the three best girls of each school, walked under a muslin canopy tastefully decorated, and surmounted by a floral crown, supported by her four maids of honour.

Many visitors from Ringwood, the neighbouring town, and Burley, with the parents of the children, conduced to make a large assemblage. A dance round the Maypole was commenced, whilst its outspreading ornaments of natural form and growth, in the shape of boughs and branches of evergreen, interspersed with the stag-horn, characteristic of the Forest, were hung around with sundry little presents to be afterwards distributed, that no child might go empty-handed from the gay scene.

The amusement was diversified by the approach of a "Jack-in-the-Green," who danced to the lively strain of two cornopeans.

After a plentiful supply of cake and tea, the children were addressed by the Rev. C. H. Maturin, vicar of Ringwood, and the Rev. Benjamin Maturin, the curate. They took the opportunity of imparting very excellent advice—in terms so simple, that the youngest child might understand; and in matter so important, that the oldest present might with profit take it to himself. Thanks were proposed to Mr. Esdaile, who, though a resident at Burley Park of but six months, has already, by his active benevolence, endeared to himself all the inhabitants in the village. Rustic games followed, and not only kept the children, but their older participators, till the lengthened shades of evening warned them to depart. Before separating, however, the various presents were distributed; and we saw nicely-dressed dolls, bookmarks, housewifes, bags, with other gifts, carried away by happy girls; from which we suspected what we afterwards learned, that the fair hands of many ladies of the place had not been inactive in this labour of love. Ninepins, balls, bags of marbles, tops, &c. were distributed amongst the boys. To the Queen of the May a nicely-bound Bible was presented by Mrs. Esdaile; in handing which the husband of that lady made a very suitable address, reminding one and all of the children assembled, that, however happy the day may have been to them, such happiness, at the most, was but for a season; that true joy was to be found in the path of righteousness, and the book he then presented would direct the way to treasures that faded not, to the peace which the world cannot give, and to happiness which will endure for ever.

The band, which had played with great spirit during the games, concluded the entertainment with the National Anthem. The weather was most propitious, the sun shining brightly. The children's holiday was made a general one; and the clean, neat, and tidy appearance of the dwellers of the New Forest, contrasted strongly with the pale and careworn countenances, &c of the indwellers of the crowded town to which we were about to return.

MAY-DAY, 1852, AND MAYPOLE IN THE VILLAGE OF BURLEY, NEW FOREST, HANTS.

"ASSAM GIRL."—BY H. WARREN.—EXHIBITION OF THE NEW SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

THE WATER-COLOUR EXHIBITIONS.

WATER-COLOUR painting is an art peculiarly popular in this country, and with good reason; our landscape scenery, viewed under the influence of so various aërial effects, presenting so many inducements to amateurs to try their hand, not content with admiring the works of the professional artist. Under these circumstances, the two tiny Galleries of the twain Societies in Pall-Mall always possess more practical interest in the eyes of the majority of their visitors than do the large and more pretentious rooms of the Academy itself; and the best "bits" by the most accomplished hands are earnestly sought after and purchased, both as models for imitation and for the decoration of the domestic studio.

In the Old Society Copley Fielding deservedly stands at the head of the classical landscape painters. Of his several works exhibited we are particularly pleased with the "Snowdon" and the "Bamborough Castle" (sic), with stormy effects at sea; the "View of Lancaster" (sic), warm and tranquil in effect; the "Old Pier at Brighton" (sic); "Windsor Castle, from the Forest" (sic); and the "View between Pont Aberglaslyn and Tan-y-bwlch, Merionethshire, looking down the Traeth Mawr" (sic), though the last certainly struck us as being of too deep a blue. J. Callow's "Mont Orgueil Castle, Jersey" (sic) is a most picturesque architectural landscape. His "Illustrations to Yarmouth Harbour, Norfolk" (sic), under the influence of a brisk gale, are extremely vivid and spirited. William Callow is equally successful in his "Distant View of Rye, on the Wye" (sic). H. Duncan, in his "Cockle-gatherers" (sic) on the sea-coast in South Wales and other sea-pieces, and George Hogarth, shows happy treatment in very many examples, notably so the Kilchurn Castle, Argyleshire (sic), the tone of which is decidedly aërial. Carl Haag has some warm pieces of the classic style. Hunt's fruit and flower pieces we have already mentioned with honour. His "Village Pet" (sic) is a creature to look and wonder at as a worthy mate for his famous ugly boy. J. Jenkins has several studies of homely peasant-girls and fancy subjects, amongst which the "Reluctant Bride" and the "Ruth" (sic), both very pretty, are conspicuous. We engrave the latter which is to be admired for its simple unaffected treatment, as well as for the colouring, which is delicate and effective.

In the New Society's room, amongst many productions of high merit, the great picture by L. Haghe (sic), "The Audience Chamber of the Maréchaux du Palais de Bruges," is entitled to distinguished rank, both as a work of art and an archæological curiosity; and the general character of the apartment, which Mr. Haghe has presented in the richest colouring, tells of the tasteful and sumptuous grandeur of the middle ages.

We now refer to our readers the extremely clever and characteristic study by H. Warren of "A Naga Girl of the Serpa Hoo Tribe of Assam," which we have engraved. The peculiar features of the great Mongolian tribes are well defined; the drapery is loosely wrapped round the body after the fashion of the country, and the ornaments of our subject, that of bearing water from the spring in tubes of bamboo cane, tell of the requirements and the primitive habits of her race. The colour of the original is rich and truthful.

BURTON PALE ALE, or BITTER BEER.—The Burton Brewers have requested me to publish a second declaration, which they have made before my official magistrate, and which they have left in my hands, with instructions to make known to all whom it may concern, that in no way whatever, either in the making of their celebrated Burton Ale, or in the brewing of their Bitter Beer, do they use any deleterious ingredient whatever; but that in our respective breweries no other articles ever was made, used, or employed, excepting malt of the very first quality, hops of the finest growth, water, and that in our respective breweries no other articles ever was used

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE MAY MEETINGS.

The annual meetings in the month of May, at which the numerous religious and charitable societies that form the noblest characteristic of the institutions of the metropolis render an account of their stewardship during the past year, have begun to take place. A summary notice of the proceedings of the more important of these meetings is given below:—

BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.—The forty-eighth anniversary meeting of this society, the object of which is exclusively to circulate the Bible, was held on Wednesday at Exeter hall; the Earl of Shaftesbury presiding. Amongst those present were—the Earl of Harrowby, the Bishop of Winchester, the Bishop of Cashel, the Bishop of Calcutta, Sir Robert Inglis, [illegible], the Earl of Chichester; the Right Rev Dr. Carr, Bart. M.P., [illegible], the Earl of Carnarvon, Sir J. A. Fowys, Lord [illegible], Lord [illegible], Sir Samuel Gurney, the Chevalier Bunsen, [illegible], Mr. Brown reading the 19th Psalm. The noble chairman read a letter which had been received from the Archbishop of Canterbury, expressing his great regret at the value of this society. The noble Lord proceeded to express his [illegible] of the [illegible] to God for the position and prospects of the society, [illegible] of the proceedings of the former present in its operation. In the course of the proceedings apologies from the Bishop of Chester, the Earl of Carlisle, the Marquess of Blandford, Sir G. Grey, the Rev. Dr. Cumming, and others, for inability to attend, were announced. From the elaborate reports, foreign and domestic, of the proceedings of the society, from the elaborate reports, foreign and domestic, of the proceedings of the society, we glean the following interesting statistical facts:—The entire receipts of the year ending March 31, 1852, amounted to £106,449 0s 10d., being an increase of £5118 18s. 2d. on those of last year. The receipts applicable to the general purposes of the society have amounted to £56,683 8s. 1d., including £34,100 18s. 6d. from contributions from auxiliaries. The amount received for Bibles and Testaments is £31,768 12s. 9d. The issues of the society for the year are as follows:—From the depôt at home, 800,180; from depôts abroad, 349,461: total, 1,154,642, being an increase of 17,025 over those of last year. The total issues of the society now amount to 25,402,309 copies. The expenditure during the past year has amounted to £ 53,809 9s. 10d. The society is under engagements to the extent of £32 341 2s. 7d. The meeting was addressed by the Bishop of Winchester, the Bishop of Cape Town, the Earl of Roden, Lord Calthorpe, and Chester, the Chevalier Bunsen, the Earl of Roden, Lord Calthorpe, and several other speakers, and resolutions in support of the objects of the society were unanimously agreed to.

NAVAL AND MILITARY BIBLE SOCIETY.—The 32nd anniversary meeting of this society was held on Monday, at Willis's Rooms, St. James's-street; the Marquess of Cholmondeley in the chair. Major F. S. Sotheby, C.B. (the hon. military secretary), read the report, from which it appeared that in the past year 87 of her Majesty's ships had been furnished with 1278 Bibles and Testaments, including the five vessels going out, under Sir Edward Belcher, in search of Sir John Franklin and his associates. These books are always thankfully received. To the Royal Marines, of the different divisions, 910 copies have been issued for the barrack-rooms, and 120 for the divisional schools; 243 copies have been furnished to military hospitals, barrack-rooms, and schools of different garrisons; 918 copies have been issued to coast-guard stations, and to sailors' and soldiers' homes. The total number of Bibles and Testaments issued during the past year is 20,288; making a general total of 558,445 copies distributed since the formation of the society. The total receipts of all such copies distributed since the formation of the society. The total receipts of all such copies distributed since the formation of the society. The total receipts of all such

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

It is to be remarked of the Royal Academy Exhibitions of late years, that they have shown less and less of the works of the Royal Academy as a school, and been dependent more and more for their attractiveness to the contributions from out of doors. Lawrence, Wilkie, Constable, Shee, Turner, Etty, have departed from the field since we remember it; and those who survive them, or who have taken their places, do not seem to be impressed with the same notion of joint responsibility for the appearance of the walls on opening days as they did. On the present occasion we have leading R.A.'s—one the President, Sir C. Eastlake, and Sir E. Landseer—altogether absent; and of those who exhibit, the works are generally not of very marked importance either in number or intrinsic interest. Looking through the index, we find the names of Dyce, Leslie, Mulready, Maclise, Marshall, with one production each, and several others with two and three. On the other hand, the multitude of independent artists have come in fuller force than ever, and, whilst the Academy seems to have abandoned its province as a school, there are those who threaten to introduce a school of their own, which, if it succeed, will displace many laurels, and despoil of fame and authority many who are now in high place. We allude, of course, to the small knot of "Pre-Raffaelites," as they are termed by many who do not fully understand what is implied in the term; and who, whilst they this year marshal in greater numbers than ever, have also managed to dismiss some of the wilder points of eccentricity which had them open to ridicule on former occasions. As it is, they have certainly much to get rid of, and much naturalness to embody with their painstaking art. But for all this, let us not be too lavish with our jibes against Pre-Raffaelitism, nor, indeed, presume to say that there is anything so excellent in the "school" of the present day, that it may not be improved by a diligent search after other models and principles. Though it is undoubtedly true that art arrived at its culminating point of excellence in the day of Raffael's prime, it is also a melancholy fact that its decadence in the three centuries which have elapsed since, has been much greater in degree than its rapid advance in the century preceding that great master; and that at the present time we wholly lack power and principles of action in essentials of art, which Raffael's predecessors were possessed of, though it remained for him to combine them all, and to add to them his own ineffable grace of treatment. In oneness of purpose, simplicity of design, and breadth and intensity of colouring, the "Pre-Raffaelites" Massacio, Fra Filippo Lippi, Signovelli, Andrea Mantegna, and others, accomplished all that honest art could do, and have left models which we might be well proud to imitate. Raffael added a grace which raised the artist above his subject, and created a new taste for art, which very soon required to be gratified with new and still newer devices, in struggling after which art itself degenerated. In one respect alone the school anterior to Raffael was remarkable for its simplicity, and that was in the lighting of a picture. But one light was then known or thought of—the broad natural light of day falling on the planes of the picture, as upon an actual group. The discovery of the principles of chiaroscuro, and the introduction of arbitrary lights, and their disposal through various planes of the picture, whilst it gave increased resources to the artist, also laid him open to increased temptations for stolen triumphs, in the procuration of which the natural powers of art have been frittered away. We make these observations in no spirit of partizanship, nor in any ignorance of the many points of weakness and downright absurdity which are remarkable in the Pre-Raffaelite school of the present day. We would merely disabuse artists of the no-school-at-all of the notion that they can suppress that school by means of ridicule; or that when the strong points of that school are matured in association with feelings now wanting, unschooled efforts, in which there is too often neither purpose in design nor principle in colouring, can stand in competition for a single moment.

The crowds which assemble daily round Mr. Millais' two pictures, the "Huguenot" (478) and the "Ophelia" (556), come many of them to scoff, but stop not a few of them to scrutinise and to admire; and certainly when they quit them, and look around, they find all the other pictures in the neighbourhood "killed" in comparison—not by trick or glare of chiaroscuro, but by the intensity of genuine colouring of these modern antiques. The subject of the "Huguenot" is a simple but touching episode in the history of the St. Bartholomew's Massacre—a Huguenot refusing to wear the Roman Catholic badge, by which he may escape the slaughter. The expression of the face of the female as she tries to tie the white scarf round his arm—a look of mild entreaty and earnest soul-wrapped affection—is a masterpiece of study and execution; that of the male figure, who gently, but firmly resists, as he takes a last look into the eyes which speak of truthfulness on earth to him, for the last time, is effective, though inferior to the other. The scene is beneath an ivy-clad wall, the details of which, as well as those of some flowers, the leaves of which have been dashed to the ground in the struggle, are elaborated with a painstaking and realness which are amongst the little triumphs of the new school. The "Ophelia," sprawling on her back in the water, though equally wonderful as a specimen of depth of colouring and minute study, is objectionable simply on the score of the absurdity of the situation. Everybody knows that if a person falls into the water backwards, the head has a tendency to sink first; that it would sink the faster if the heels were buoyed up by the clothes, or otherwise. Shakspeare says that Ophelia's "clothes spread wide," meaning around her, which would have the effect of supporting the head and shoulders for a time; but Mr. Millais has not supported the head, whilst the hands are also out of the water. The absence of the slightest ripple on the water into which the hapless heroine has just intruded her presence, and the calm chirruping of the robin-redbreast on the tree from which she has fallen, are amongst the conceits of this school which common sense cannot approve of.

Promising to pay our respects to others of this school on a future occasion, we turn now to the works of some of the old favourites of the day. Maclise has one picture representing "Alfred the Saxon King (disguised as a minstrel) in the tent of Guthrum the Dane;" in which we are sorry to see, that, with all his wonderful powers of composition, and all his masterly drawing, he still adheres to a style of colouring equally at variance with all the doctrines of all the schools that have preceded or followed Raffael. On all occasions he has been apt to scatter his lights over his canvass, without any regard to the mass upon which the eye may rest; but here he has actually studied to break his picture up into fragments by the introduction of the cream white cloth forming the tent, which makes a sort of circumbendibus from the sides, half way up, and across the middle. The groups are various and scattered: within the tent are Guthrum and his chiefs carousing and dallying with the belles of the Danish Court; in the front on one side is a group of savage soldiery gambling with dice; on the other, another lot plying the bottle, and in the centre a notable specimen of helpless intoxication; whilst in the midst of all is Alfred, the sad and indignant observer of the savage orgie. The faces are in Mr. Maclise's usual style—smacking somewhat of exaggeration, and one or two notably suggestive of Gog and Magog having been adopted as models. The various implements of armour, furniture, &c. are painted with undeniable exactness; and the botanical minutiæ of the may and honeysuckle clustering around the tent, and of the daisies and dandelions in front, show how genius misdirected may devote itself unduly to trifles in the midst of scenes of momentous interest.

Cope's picture "The Marquis of Saluce marries Griselda" (171), is a work of very considerable merit. The gentle heroine blushes with true rustic bashfulness, as she still clings to her aged father's hand, and looks inquiringly in his face, as the dazzling proposal is made to her by her noble suitor, surrounded by a glittering court. The courtiers, male and female, look on with an air of mixed enmity, envy, and impertinence at their Lord's elect; and even the two small pages laugh waggishly in the spectators' faces as they kneel tendering rich caskets to the rustic fair. Unfortunately, the least happy figure is that of the Marquis, who is of ungainly presence, and awkwardly placed with one foot on the step, and his hand thrown back as with an effort of dignity and assurance which might have been dispensed with, even by him, in a scene of courtship.

Unquestionably the best historical picture in the Exhibition is E. M. Ward's "Charlotte Corday going to Execution," of which we have the pleasure to give an Engraving. The devoted heroine (for such history must always esteem the slayer of the monster Marat) is just emerging from the Conciergerie, on her way to execution, her arms bound behind her, her hair cropped, and clothed in the scarlet garment appropriated to murderers. The expression of her countenance is one of extreme sadness, but of undaunted firmness, as though she were deeply impressed with the horrors of the awful duty which had been imperiously forced upon her, and from the consequences of which she disdains to shrink. Robespierre, Danton, and Camille Desmoulins have placed themselves on her passage, in order to gaze upon her, and study in her features the expression of that "fanaticism" which would deal death to tyrants. Robespierre looks a singular compound of the petit maître and the tiger, furious as his pet mastiff. The other personages exhibit every gradation of feeling which one might imagine to be aroused by such an incident. The savage fury of the dame de la halle, who can least pity a victim of her own sex; the ingrained, habitual roughness of the gendarmes; and the brutish unconcern of the gaoler, who delivers up his victim, scarcely conscious of her identity, are softened only by a little touch of sympathy on the part of the curé, who sends a parting benediction after her. The whole of the colouring of this fine production is managed with judgment and executed with wonderful success; the whole holding out high promise for the future career of this young and rising artist.

To pass to a more lively subject, Frith gives us a capital scene of "Pope making love to Lady Mary Wortley Montague" (336), founded upon an anecdote related in Lord Wharncliffe's life of that famous "blue." The little ill-formed poet has screwed his courage up to the sticking-place, and declares his passion—a declaration which, spite of all efforts to be angry and look grave, provoked an immediate fit of laughter. The victim of this double imprudence clenches his fists and bites his nails in silent anger. He was her enemy for ever after. This smart anecdote is here realised with great vivaciousness, and, happily, without even a semblance of exaggeration. In the Great Room the same artist has a little domestic group (74) of a child on his mother's knee, repeating one of Watts' hymns before going to rest, which is pleasingly conceived and executed. He has also two portraits of ladies, which we have not yet had time to look at.

H. O'Neill has "A Scene from 'Hamlet'" (320), betraying a judicious and tasteful conception of the passage in the scene with the King, Queen, Ophelia, and Laertes, where Ophelia distributing her newly culled flowers, says—"There is a daisy: I would give you some violets, but they withered all when my father died." There is a pale and deep-seated devouring grief in the expression, which admirably embodies, to our notion, the poet's creation; and the other characters sympathise with dignity in a bereavement which is beyond human skill to heal or to console.

In his scenes of real life Webster grows in strength, and increases in resources. His "School Playground" (69) is a juvenile world, wherein peg-top, marbles, and football are the business of existence. The diversified characters of the boys as they join in these important operations are comically real; that of the youth, with dangerous scowl, whose turn it is to aim at his neighbour's top, denotes an amount of firmness which we must hope may be directed in good channels. The scene is blended with the wider world without, by the introduction on the one side of a papa and a mamma just arrived to see their son, who welcomes them in the usual good-boy fashion; and, on the other, of the familiar apple-woman, whose goods are being eagerly devoured.

Another scene, in somewhat the same line, is presented by F. Faed, "Patron and Patroness' Visit to the Village School" (474). The pedagogue is eagerly superintending the examination of a class of pupils by the old squire and his dame, whose little black feathery standing behind them is made the unconscious butt of the other urchins, now partially released from restraint, one of whom, in the generous exuberance of the moment, aims his clenched fist at his woolly poll; whilst another traces his ugly profile on the wall.

A. Cooper's scenes of strife are always vivid in design and colour; amongst the best in this year's display are the "Rout at Marston Moor" (45), dashed off with wonderful spirit; and the "Attack on a Caravan by Arabs" (1309), which is from an Engraving.

If our academicians are behindhand in works of the higher historic class, they undoubtedly come out in great force in the landscape department; Creswick, Roberts, and Stanfield, each in his particular line, having works of remarkable excellence, upon which they might severally stake a long-earned reputation. Amongst the non-academic names in this line, we observe that of Niemann attached to highly creditable and promising efforts.

At the Sculpture Room we have only taken a hasty glance—the atmosphere being as yet too cold and too dark to render anything like a ramble in that dungeon deep a matter of choice. We were struck, however, with a very animated production in marble, by Bailey, being a portrait statue in the character of an Infant Bacchus—a production so hearty, so sound, so altogether satisfactory in treatment, that it deserves to be seen in a better light. We are sure, therefore, that our readers—by whom the merits of the jolly little fellow may have been overlooked in the dismal hole in which he is now confined, as if in expiation of all his past or future sins—will thank us for presenting them with an Engraving of this marble embodiment. It is not going too far to say of this work that a mere capital production of its class was not to be found in the assembled contributions of art of all nations in the famed Exhibition of 1851.

EXHIBITION OF AMATEUR ARTISTS.

THE successful result of the first experiment of an Exhibition of Paintings and Drawings by Amateur Artists last year, has encouraged the promoters to produce a second similar collection for inspection. We paid a visit to this little gallery the other day, and were much gratified with the evidences of talent, taste, and feeling amongst our amateurs, forming a part of society at large, which the walls presented. Of course, criticism in cases like the present is not looked for; but if we were disposed to be critical, we could point out very many specimens here which might warn the artists to look to their laurels; true efforts produced by genuine means—a point which, with the professional, is not always held as a paramount consideration.

The landscapes by Mrs. Bridgman Simpson are really of a superior order of merit; Naples; Tivoli and the Villa of Mecænas; and Gibraltar from the sea, under the diversified atmospheric effects produced by a threatening breeze, surprised us by their skilful and happy handling. Miss Blake also is very successful in a somewhat similar line. Miss Swinbourne has some very pretty studies of trees; and the Hon. Eliot Yorke has excellent sketches of a similar character. Miss Kennion presents us with a capital view of the Grande Place at Antwerp, with Cathedral, Hôtel de Ville, &c.; and Colonel Liddell, a well-chosen view in Richmond Park. The portrait sketches by Miss Houlton are of a very high order of merit; the individuality of character and naturalness of expression being evident in each of the specimens. Lady Leighton also is very successful in the same class of art; her portrait group of Lady Eleanor Butler and Miss Ponsonby, "the ladies of Llangollen," is extremely interesting, being the only likenesses taken of them in their lifetime. Altogether, this Exhibition is one of considerable interest, and to the whole body of amateurs must present peculiar attractions.

CRYSTAL PALACE AT THE ROYAL CYCLORAMA.

We were present, on Thursday, at a private view of the representations of the Crystal Palace at the Colosseum, which were presented in the Cyclorama department, and copies of which are likely to prove attractive. The details of seven tableaux: the first representing the exterior of the Crystal Palace, as seen from the north side of the Serpentine; the second, the interior, consisting of the nave, from the north-east corner of the gallery at the eastern end, looking west; the third, the western main avenue of the nave; the fourth, the south transept; the fifth, the nave looking east, from the north-west corner; the sixth, also the nave, looking east, from the north-west corner, and the seventh, the north transept, from the south-east corner. All those views are painted with admirable effect, and make a splendid impression on the mind. They will remain as worthy memorials of the gorgeous edifice now doomed to destruction, when the original shall have passed away like "an unsubstantial pageant faded."

The race is appointed for the 14th instant, from Erith round the Nore Light and back. The Ruby steamer has been chartered by the Club, and will leave London-bridge Wharf at half-past nine in the morning. The band of the Royal Blues will be in attendance.

Commodore Sir Charles Hotham, K.C.B., lately appointed special minister to La Plata, left London on Tuesday, for Plymouth, accompanied by Captain Hewett and Mr. W. Gore Onslow, attached to the legation, to embark on board her Majesty's steam-vessel Vixen for their destination.

The President of the French Republic has been pleased to award to John Lord Hay and Mr. William Chaster of the Amazon and Tweed packets, Harwich, gold medals; and to John Fullagar and Francis Monk, mates of the above vessels, silver medals, for their exertions in rescuing and saving the lives of the crew of the French brig Etoile de la Mer, recently wrecked on the Long Sand, on our coast. The crews of the above vessels were previously awarded, by the command of the Prince President, 350 francs, for risking their lives on this laudable occasion.

It would appear that the story of Meagher's escape from Van Diemen's Land is, at least, very problematical, as letters received from Smith O'Brien, of a date subsequent to that of the alleged escape, make no mention of the circumstance.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

ROYAL ASSENT.

The Royal assent was given this afternoon, by commission, to the following bills:—The Exchequer Bills Bill, the St. Albans Disfranchisement Bill, the Lunacy Contagious Disorders Prevention Bill, the Mansfield Gas Bill, the Liverpool Museum Bill, the Wolverhampton Gas Bill, the Yaxley Drainage Bill, the Sewage Manure Company Bill, the East London Water Company Bill, and the Scarborough Market Bill.

The Royal Commissioners were the Earl of Lonsdale, the Marquis of Salisbury, and the Duke of Montrose.

Lord ROSSE moved for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the operation of acts relating to the drainage of land in Ireland as administered by the Board of Works.

After a few observations from the Earl of DERBY, the motion was agreed to.

The Copyright Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed.

In reply to a question from Ear. Granville, the Earl of DERBY said the Government had no present intention of removing the Transatlantic packet station from Liverpool to any of the southern or western ports of Ireland.

The Copyright Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

NEW MEMBERS.

Mr. Carter took the oaths and his seat for Faversham, in the room of Mr. Trelawny; and the Solicitor-General for East Suffolk, having resigned his seat for Harwich.

NEW WRIT.

A new writ was ordered to be issued for the borough of Harwich, in the room of Sir F. Kelly, who has elected to sit for East Suffolk.

QUESTION.

In answer to a question from Sir A. E. Cockburn, Sir J PAKINGTON said there was no intention on the part of the Government to remove the West India mails from Southampton to Plymouth.

In answer to Mr. DUNNE,

Mr. BARROW said there was no intention on the part of the Government of proposing to Parliament to increase the strength of our regular troops serving in Great Britain and Ireland.

SMITHFIELD MARKET.

Sir B. HALL wished to ask the right hon. gentleman the Home Secretary whether any steps had been taken by the corporation of London for the removal of Smithfield-market, and whether any site had yet been fixed upon?

Mr WALPOLE said that the Home Secretary had nothing to do with the matter, except to signify his assent to the best site that might be proposed to him, until 18 months after the passing of the act, when, if the corporation had not taken the necessary measures, it would be his province to carry the act into execution. He had been officially informed, however, that the corporation had had 24 sites submitted to them, which had been under their anxious consideration; and that they hoped shortly to submit an eligible site to the sanction of the Government.

NEW ZEALAND.

Sir J. PAKINGTON moved for leave to bring in a Bill to grant a Representative Constitution to the colony of New Zealand, and in doing so gave a brief view of the rise and progress of the colony, in order to show that its importance justified the course he proposed to pursue with respect to it. In the year 1838 the European population of the islands amounted to 17,000, while in 1851 it amounted to 27,000. The value of the goods exported from the colony in 1846 was only £44,215, while in 1850 it amounted to £143,414. The revenue, also, which in 1840 was only £48 989, had swelled in 1850 to £57 749. The right hon. gentleman then proceeded to state the nature of the Constitution which the bill proposed to confer upon the colony, the chief provisions of which were the establishment of provincial Councils for the management of local matters, and the establishment of a central Legislature for the purpose of dealing with larger and more general questions. He proposed that the colony should be parcelled out into provinces, at the head of each of which there should be a Superintendent appointed by the Governor, with a salary of £500 per annum. Each province should have a Legislative Council, consisting of not less than nine members, all to be elected for four years, by natives as well as Europeans. The franchise entitling the party to vote would be a freehold of the value of £50, or the occupancy of a house of the value of £10 in a town, or of £5 value in the country, such occupancy to have been for not less than six months. In order to prevent the delay arising from transmitting bills to this country for the Royal assent, the Governor in chief would have the power to give final assent to any measure, with the power, also, to wait for advice from home will respect to any measure which he might think of sufficient importance to justify the delay. The Central Legislature would consist of the governor and a council of not less than 10 nor more than 15 members, to be nominated by the Crown, and a Legislative Chamber consisting of not fewer than 24 and not more than 40 members, all to be elective under the same franchise as applied to the Provincial Councils. The duration of this parliament he proposed to be five years, which was one year more than the duration of provincial councils. The right hon. gentleman said he brought this measure forward as one of urgency, and he did so quite in accordance with the pledge which had been given by the Government that it would early in the session of that character. He then resumed his seat amidst very general cheering.

After a short conversation leave was given to bring in the bill.

THE MILITIA BILL.

On the motion for going into committee on the Militia Bill,

Mr. COBDEN moved, as an amendment, for a number of returns connected with the naval force of the country, and that the consideration of the bill in committee should be postponed until the returns should be laid before the house. The gentleman supported his motion by referring to many of the arguments used on the second reading of the bill, and said he would resist the measure by every legitimate means in his power while passing through the House.

Mr. ANDERSON seconded the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD opposed the amendment, the only object of which appeared to be delay, which was not a little singular on the part of the hon. member, who had allowed the navy estimates to pass without question, in order that the session might be brought to an immediate close. He felt bound to refuse the returns moved for, because the information asked for in them was never been given by former Governments, under the conviction that such information would, if published, be detrimental to the public interest.

Mr. COBDEN agreed with Mr. Stafford that the Admiralty could not give the information required without detriment to the public service.

Mr. CARTER supported the amendment.

Captain BOLDERO said the whole of the information asked for by the hon. member for the West Riding was to be found in the Navy List, and his motion, therefore, could have no other object than that of delay.

Mr. BARROW supported the amendment, contending that there was nothing to be ashamed in the affairs of invasion; and that, as regarded the ruler and people of France, there was not a shadow of hostility apparent in their actions towards this country.

Mr WHITESIDE replied to the arguments of Mr. Bright, contending that it was consistent with every respect for the Government of France, as an existent Government, to take care that, under all the circumstances surrounding that Government, this country should be prepared for any event which might occur.

Mr. HUME asked Mr. Cobden not to divide the House on his amendment, which he for one must vote against on a division.

Mr MACKENZIE offered the same request on behalf of the debate.

Mr. MITCHELL seconded the motion for adjournment.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER thought the question had been amply discussed, and hoped the division might be taken on Mr. Cobden's amendment

Mr. MITCHELL said he would persevere in the motion for adjournment.

The House then divided on the question of adjournment, and the numbers were—For the adjournment, 38; against it, 291: majority against, 233

Another motion for adjournment was moved, which led to some discussion, but eventually it was arranged that the debate should be adjourned until the next day (Tuesday).

The Registration of Births, Deaths, and Marriages Bill was read a second time.

The Secretary of Bankrupts Office Abolition Bill was considered in committee.

Adjourned at one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

On the motion of the Archbishop of CANTERBURY, the Colonial Bishops Bill, the object of which is to amend the law relating to episcopal jurisdiction in Bombay and Madras in some slight particulars, was read a second time.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS.

Lord LYNDHURST called the attention of their Lordships for a few moments to certain disabilities imposed by the statute 6 George 1, cap. 13. Their Lordships were aware, that by that act any person who takes his seat in Parliament, and gives a vote on any question without having previously taken the oaths required by that act, which are subsequently altered in one particular clause, was rendered liable not only to very severe penalties—first of all to a penalty of £500, and next to a similar penalty of the same amount on every subsequent offence of the same kind—but also to several disqualifications, which were of a most serious description. He had no intention of suggesting at present any alteration of the pecuniary penalties inflicted by that statute. Those penalties were of a cumulative character, and the question of every separate offence. He considered them to be a sufficient security against the repetition of such offences against the act, without having recourse to the severe disqualifications which he proposed to repeal, particularly as there were as numerous a person offending against that act was disqualified from maintaining an action at common law or a suit in equity. Whatever violence he might suffer either in his person or in his property, he was left entirely without remedy. Any property belonging to him in the possession of another might be withheld from him, and any property in his own possession might be taken from him with impunity. No court of law, no influence of Government, nothing but the intervention of Parliament, could give redress. In the next place, a person in this position could not act as guardian to an infant, however important it might be in a moral or physical point of view that the infant should experience his care, attention, and protection. In the third place, a party offending against the act of Parliament could not receive a legacy from any deceased friend or from any other person. He could not receive a deed of gift of any property whatever. Further, he could not be either the executor or administrator of any person whatever. He was also rendered incapable of holding any office or of giving a vote at any election. In point of fact, the disqualifications were so severe that he hoped they would induce their Lordships to adopt the suggestion he was about to make. Indeed, they had been recently described by one of the judges in the Court of Exchequer as being of such fearful severity as to place the party offending almost in the position of an outlaw. It was after due consideration of these disqualifications and of their severity that he had come to the determination of advising their Lordships to repeal them. (Hear.) His attention had been directed to them by a recent decision in the Court of Exchequer; and he proposed not only that these disqualifications be repealed, but that the individual who was recently declared by that Court to have incurred them should be included by name in the bill for their repeal. He begged to state that he had had no communication with that individual, nor, indeed, with any other person on this subject, until he came down to the House that evening. (Hear, hear.) The noble and learned Lord then laid the bill on the table, and moved that it be read a first time.—Adjourned.

Lord CAMPBELL approved of the bill, and expressed a hope that his noble friend would go one step further, and support the admission of Jews to Parliament.

The Earl of DERBY said he would not oppose the bill. Mr. Salomons had applied to him for an act of indemnity, and he only deferred the introduction of such a measure until the question in dispute had been disposed of by the legal tribunals

After a few observations from the Marquis of LANSDOWNE and the Earl of WICKLOW, the bill was read a first time.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

THE BURMESE WAR.

Sir E. COLEBROOKE asked whether the President of the Board of Control was willing to lay upon the table papers showing the origin of the war with the Government of Ava?

Mr. HERRIES replied, that it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to communicate to Parliament, as soon as it might be proper to do so, all the papers which tended to show the nature of the proceedings which has led to probable hostilities between the Indian Government and the Burmese authorities. He might state that, before the Governor-General prepared to dispatch a force to Rangoon, in order to obtain by coercion that redress which the subjects of the British Government had sustained, the King of Ava, intimating the conditions on which he might avoid the impending danger; and if it should happen that the King was wisely disposed to submit to these conditions, which were merely what the Indian Government had a just right to demand, there would be no war. He thought the hon. Baronet would admit that, until the result was known, her Majesty's Government could not be expected to lay the papers before Parliament.

Sir E. COLEBROOKE inquired whether he was to understand that the production of the papers would not be delayed until the conclusion of any military operations which might take place?

Mr. HERRIES said the papers would be laid on the table as soon as the result of the pending negotiations was ascertained.

BOROUGHS OF SUDBURY AND ST. ALBAN'S.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER gave notice, that on Monday, the 10th inst., he would ask for leave to bring in a bill to assign the seats forfeited by the disfranchisement of the boroughs of Sudbury and St. Alban's.

THE MILITIA.

The adjourned debate on the Militia Bill was resumed by

Colonel SIBTHORP, who opposed the original motion, contending that our maritime superiority had not been affected by the progress of science, and that we might still rely upon our navy as a sufficient security against foreign invasion.

Sir H. VERNEY supported the bill, contending that the country should be prepared to receive an enemy on land as well as at sea.

Mr. GRANTLEY BERKELEY also supported the bill.

Sir De Lacy EVANS contended that the forces at the disposal of the French Government for offensive purposes was not so great as was generally supposed, and insisted that his former statement as to the defensive force of this country was quite correct, although its accuracy had been questioned.

Mr. BERESFORD said that in the estimates made by hon. members of our defensive forces it was always assumed that the forces in Ireland were available for the defence of Great Britain, which was a great fallacy, for they could not with any safety be withdrawn from that country.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that continental countries were rapidly reducing their military establishments, under the pressure of financial embarrassments; it was, therefore, quite unnecessary for this country to be subjected to them.

Sir F. BARING opposed the amendment of Mr. Cobden, being of opinion that it would be most unwise to disclose the information sought for to the enemies of this country, should there be any such at existent.

After some observations from Captain DUNCOMBE,

Mr HUME, in supporting the amendment of Mr Cobden, denied that there was anything like hostility in the conduct of the French people. In fact, the panic existed nowhere except in the late and in the present Cabinet. It was said that the object of the amendment was delay, and he must say that he would be desirous of any delay that would prevent the passing of the two Cabinets to pass away.

Mr. CHARTERIS said that on military matters he would bow to the opinions of military men, and there were would support the bill.

Mr. ANSTEY said, if an increase of force was necessary, he thought the best mode of increasing it would be of an addition to the standing army. Under the ballot for the militia, the man worth £100,000 per annum would only pay the same sum for his substitute as the man only worth £1 per week. Although the amount of property each had to be protected was so very dissimilar. On the other hand, if they added to the regular army, the man with £100,000 a year would pay £5 for the same benefit as the man never man would pay 5s. He therefore denounced, as most unjust to the labouring classes, the attempt to add to the defences of the country by the means proposed by the bill.

Mr. DUNCAN placed the strongest reliance upon the opinions of the Duke of Wellington as to the necessity of adding to our defences, and he therefore would vote against the amendment of Mr. Cobden

Mr. CLAY declared his belief that this country was further removed from danger at the present time than at any other former period of its history. If, however, additional defences were necessary, he thought the very worst mode of adding to them would be by means of a militia.

Lord PALMERSTON was of opinion that an invasion was an event quite possible, to use no stronger language; and it was their duty, therefore, to guard against it. If his advice should be followed, and the country should place itself on its guard, and if it should steadily turn out that he was wrong, there would, at all events, be no harm done While, on the other hand, if the advice of those who would rely on such a false security were followed, and an invasion should take place, the country might be ruined. When this country had a misunderstanding with Louis Philippe, likely to lead to a rupture, and when the former good feeling was restored, that Monarch expressed his satisfaction that policy had been maintained, but he likewise stated as a fact, that, had war broken out, there were those of his generals who would have undertaken to have possession of London in a week. The noble Lord ridiculed the principle of non-expenditure contended for by the opponents of the Militia Bill

The bill was opposed by Mr. Wakley and Colonel Thompson, and supported by Mr. H. Drummond and Lord J. Manners.

Lord J. RUSSELL said he would not vote for the amendment, for he thought that the second reading was carried by so large a majority that they ought to go into committee to discuss the details of the measure as soon as possible. He must say, however, that he thought the bill would not give to the country the security which it had a right to expect The House then divided:—For Mr. Cobden's amendment, 76; against it, 285: total majority against it, 209.

On the question for going into committee, Mr. HUME, condemning Lord J. Russell's advice, announced that he should divide the House.

After some noisy discussion, arising out of questions put by Mr. Milner Gibson, Mr. Bright, and Mr. Cobden, chiefly with the view of eliciting the fact that militia recruits would be subject to the Mutiny Act and the "rash," the House again divided, and the numbers were—For the original motion, 249; against it, 88: majority for Government, 134.

The House then went into committee.

Mr BRIGHT urged the postponement of the consideration of the bill to the furthest possible period.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that Mr. Bright had made a most preposterous proposition, to which, of course, he should not accede. The proposition had avowedly been made in order to enable Mr. Bright to get up an agitation. So far from fixing a distant day, he should name Thursday for proceeding with the bill.

A protracted and personal discussion followed, in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, and several other members took part; Mr. Cobden and his friends struggling for delay, and the Government resisting it.

Mr. COBDEN repelled the imputation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and warned the hon. gentleman opposite that he must not repeat that tone to hon. members on that (the Opposition) side of the House. A charge of agitation came badly from hon. members opposite, who had enacted the part of agitators on every platform and theatre in the metropolis, and throughout the country. They had once before been opposed to them on a national question, and they could not charge him (Mr. C.) or his friends with want of forbearance on that occasion; but if they again attempted to agitate, they must be for the purpose of reinstating on the Treasury bench men who, immediately on their entering upon office, abandoned the principles which they professed in opposition.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said the hon. member for Manchester wished for delay in order to appeal to the country, and he wanted to know what that meant, if not to agitate the country. He did not charge the hon. gentleman with wishing to agitate; he drew it not as a inference, but as the natural conclusion from his own words. With reference to what had fallen from the hon member for the West Riding, he begged to inform him that he (the Chancellor or the Exchequer) was there to put into operation the political opinions which he had professed on the other side of the House. (Cheers).

After some further discussion, the House resumed.

The CHAIRMAN reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Thursday.

Mr. HUME then moved that Monday next, instead of Thursday, be the day fixed for proceeding with the committee.

The House divided—For the motion, 31; against it, 103: majority, 72

The House again divided on the motion that the House do resolve itself into committee on Thursday.

For the motion, 105; against it, 29: majority, 76.

Adjourned at 20 minutes past two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon to six o'clock.

TENANT RIGHT (IRELAND).

The adjourned debate on this subject was resumed by Mr. Cowell, who strongly opposed the measure, as being a compulsory interference between landlord and tenant.

Mr. Moseley contended that the laws with respect to the letting of land in Ireland worked so badly that they must unquestionably be altered. But with all this he was opposed to the principle of a measure which, if carried, would be tantamount to the total disorganisation of society in Ireland.

Mr. G. Moore, a tenant-right supporter, contended that it was only a matter of justice that the tenant should receive compensation for any improvements he might have effected, and which would add to the value of the property, when the time arrived for him to quit it.

Mr. Sharman Crawford also supported the bill, contending that it was only a just and reasonable measure, and that it would be regarded by all other species of improvements. He hoped that upon the principle that the bill before the House, depended, it would be carried that upon the principle that the bill before the House, depended, it would be carried that upon the principle that the bill before the House, depended, it would be carried FIRING A PRAIRIE, AT CAPE GREGORIO.

CAPTURE OF MAGELLAN PIRATES, BY H.M.S "VIRAGO."

WE have been favoured with the following interesting Narrative, with Sketches, by a Correspondent:—

We left England in H.M S S Virago, Commander W. H. Stuart, on September 11th, 1851; and, after touching at various places, we entered the Straits of Magellan on the morning of the 4th of December. On the 3d, about noon, as we were steaming along for Port Famine (a Chilian penal settlement, where we expected to find fresh meat, wood, and water), the weather became so thick and rainy that we could scarcely proceed; when to our astonishment, through an opening in the mist, we saw a cluster of houses, with two vessels lying at anchor. We ran in and anchored, and the Captain, First Lieutenant, Master, Purser, and Chief Engineer, immediately went on shore. They were received most courteously in one of the wooden houses, inside a sort of fort or stockade, by a person who styled himself Major Cambiaso, commandant of the troops, and second in command to the Governor, who he stated was too sick to receive them, and begged that our surgeon might come on shore, and prescribe for him. About three o'clock the Captain and officers came off. The paddle-box boats were immediately hoisted out, and sent with a large party of men to bring the wood off, the greater number of the junior officers landing at the same time for a stroll. The party came off again, loud in their praises of the Governor, and more especially of Major Cambiaso, who, in the midst of filth and squalor, appeared in a ball-room dress, with laced coat and trousers, and a large pair of epaulettes, dashing about on horseback, with several men with lances. An Englishman who had acted as interpreter was named St. Jago Dunn: though on the first day he was allowed to walk down with us, on the second day he appeared to be a prisoner, and we wondered much how an Englishman should have come to be a prisoner under the Chilian Government, especially as he made no complaint. When our Assistant-Surgeon went on shore to see the Governor, he was courteously received: but on the following morning he was not admitted to the Governor's room. When they informed us that we might have coal at Port Famine, they warned our Captain against some escaped prisoners, who might apply to come on board: adding, that on no account should we give them protection, as they had shot a sentry when they escaped, and that they were to be shot as soon as they were taken. Again, the two vessels there had Chilian colours, though one was called the Ellen Cornish, of Liverpool; and the other the Florida: their hoisting these colours was accounted for by telling us that they were in the employ of the Chilian Government, and had been bringing down troops and provisions from Valparaiso. There was also another vessel, Tres Amigos, they told us, lying in Fortescue Bay, a little further up the Straits, which had brought prisoners down and was now on her way back: they gave us a letter from the Governor to her to tell her to come back again to Punta d'Arenas.

Next morning we got under weigh, and steamed about sixty miles to Port Famine, where we found the coal, and a good many houses deserted, except by a few men whom they had sent round to give us the coal, and to look after the escaped prisoners. (I should here mention that Port Famine had been the original seat of the settlement, but that they had removed five or six years back to Punta d'Arenas, as being a more convenient site). We remained some days at Port Famine, coaling, and after leaving it fell in with the before-mentioned barque Tres Amigos, to which ship we delivered a letter and some provisions. We stopped at several places in our way through the Straits, and were windbound for some time at Plaza Parda; we then proceeded through the magnificent scenery of Smith's and Sarmiento Channels, emerging into the South Pacific Ocean by Cape Tres Montes, and arrived at Valparaiso on the morning of the 24th of December, in time to spend our Christmas day snugly in harbour.

At Valparaiso we found the Admiral, with several ships of the English, French, and American squadrons. On Sunday, Jan. 11th, to our great surprise, the Lama arrived, only forty-six days from England—the shortest passage, I believe, ever accomplished. She, too, had called at Punta d'Arenas, and found it deserted except by two men, whom they brought with them: they stated that there had been a revolution amongst the prisoners, who had shot the Governor, taken a barque and brigantine, shot the captain and the owner of the latter and the owner of the former, and now were about to put to sea in those vessels, with the intention, as it was generally supposed, of joining the rebel General Cruz, who they erroneously supposed to be still making head against the Chilian Government and President Monte. Still more strange, the date on which they affirmed the Governor had been shot was just the day before we had arrived there in the Virago. At first we could not credit such a story; but, on comparing notes with the people at Valparaiso, we found that the person who had been shown to our assistant-surgeon as the Governor did not in any way answer the description of the real Governor, Munoz, who was one of the best officers in their navy, and had been brought up in our own service. They also discovered that the letters we had brought up had forged signatures attached to them; and, on describing the dress of the pretended Major, who, it appears, was the head man in this murderous scheme, it was found that he was wearing Munoz' epaulettes, but was only one of the junior lieutenants, and who had before borne a bad character. The men who had been regre-ented to us as runaway prisoners must have been some of the men who had originally fled with Munoz, at the first outbreak, and so it proved; for about the same time they arrived at San Carlos Chiloe, in the barque Tres Amigos (which, it appeared, had gone part of the way back, according to the instructions in the letter which we had taken to them), but happily fell in with these fugitives on the shore, in time to save her also from falling into the hands of these pirates.

DON BRUNO BRIONES, CAPTAIN OF THE PIRATICAL SCHOONER, "ELIZA CORNISH."

On the day after the arrival of this news, there came a request from the Chilian Government to Admiral Moresby to send a steamer down to the Straits of Magellan, as they had none disposable; and, on the Tuesday morning, we (the Virago) were to have gone out to the Admiral to carry this request, had he not suddenly appeared off the port on Monday night. Next morning we went out and towed the Portland in; after which we coaled, and on the 15th started for the Straits of Magellan.

We entered the Gulf of Penas on the morning of Sunday, 25th January, and proceeded through Messini, Sarmiento, and Smith's channels, arriving at the Straits on the 27th. We commenced our search for the pirates by going to Mercy Harbour, where we anchored for the evening. Next morning we got under weigh, and proceeded eastward; and, about ten o'clock, when approaching Plaza Parda, all hands were astonished and delighted at the cry of "A sail right ahead." She was soon made out to be the Eliza Cornish schooner we had seen lying at Punta d'Arenas on our former visit. We soon beat to quarters, and prepared to lower and send away our two cutters armed. When we first sighted the schooner, we observed a great many persons on deck; but, as we came nearer, there were only a few; and we observed two men struggling for which ensign they should hoist. When we came near, we fired one of the broadside guns at her, taking care not to hit her. She immediately hove to; we stopped and lowered our cutters, which immediately pulled alongside, and the men jumped on board. The English crew jumped into the boat, laying hold of the officers' and men's hands, saying, "Thank God, sir, you've come to our rescue; we've been in prison, and in danger of our lives long enough." Those who were below then came up one by one, apparently too much taken aback to offer any resistance. The two cutters conveyed the men and their things on board the Virago, where they were strictly searched and made prisoners. On board the Virago, where they were strictly searched and made prisoners. On board the schooner were Captain Salas and Lieutenant Dees, officers of the Chilian army, who had refused to join the others, and had, consequently, been imprisoned with the Englishmen. These two officers, together with the English mate, pointed out the ringleaders, who were immediately put in irons. When all the men were brought on board from the schooner, she was lashed alongside. The Virago then proceeded into Plaza Parda Bay, where she anchored to finish the necessary arrangements.

The schooner, with a prize crew of a lieutenant, a master's assistant, and five men, was left at anchor at Plaza Parda; having, also, part of her own crew and all the women on board.

Next day the Virago proceeded in further pursuit of the pirates, having learnt from the Eliza Cornish that the barque Florida had had her name changed to Inesperada, and had accompanied the schooner as far as Wood's Bay, here they both anchored, and Cambiaso persuaded about sixty to land on pretence of preparing for a revel, having done this, he got under weigh in the night, and giving the schooner the slip, ran away to the eastward, with the intention, it was supposed, of going either to Europe or to join Gen. Rosas at Buenos Ayres.

This had happened fifteen days before we fell in with the schooner; so that our hopes of catching her were small, as in fifteen days she could hardly have failed to get clear of the Straits. I may here mention that on board the Florida were some of the principal men—the two Generals, as they styled themselves, Cambiaso and Garcia, both of whom had been lieutenants in the Chilian service; also, they had on board the Englishman, St. Jago Dunn.

On the 30th we arrived once more at Punta d'Arenas, where we met with the party we expected, except sixteen men, who had started the day before on horseback, with the intention of falling in with the Indians, and so making their way back to Chili through Patagonia. These men here willingly came on board, the more so that they did not know that they were to be prisoners. Next morning we started to the eastern end of the Straits, to make sure that the Florida was not still there, and to touch at Cape Gregorio, where it was supposed the fourteen men (two had returned the day before to Punta d'Arenas) must pass in their route to find the Indians. We anchored that evening at the Cape, and landed some armed men, to kindle large fires to attract and bring off, if possible, the before-mentioned men, but in this they failed. In the afternoon we again proceeded to Punta d'Arenas, to examine the remains of provisions, &c there, and to post a notice of what had occurred, in case of any ships calling there. While here I made the accompanying Sketches of the Stockade; for we all landed to see the place where so many atrocities had been committed, and to have each individual spot pointed out to us.

We now proceeded to Port Famine. After picking up the schooner at Plaza Parda, we proceeded with her through Smith's, Sarmiento's, and Messina's Channels; and, after giving her a good offing, left her to pursue her voyage to Valparaiso. We had now about 160 prisoners on board, and were desirous of reaching Valparaiso as soon as possible; whilst a sharp watch was kept, with so many desperate fellows on board; and a certain portion of both officers and men, besides the regular sentries, carried loaded pistols in their belts.

On the morning of Sunday, the 15th, we reached St. Carlos Chiloe, and to our surprise found that the Florida had arrived the evening before, and been given up to the Chilian Government. It appeared that, after getting clear of the Straits, finding that many of the people were disaffected, Dunn, with some others, got up a counter-revolution; and, putting Cambiaso and the other ringleaders in irons, succeeded, with the Captain and crew, in bringing her round Cape Horn, and giving her up to the Chilian authorities at St. Carlos, though at the imminent peril of their own lives being sacrificed almost every night. We took Cambiaso and the other ringleaders on board the Virago, and then proceeded with a strict search of both the vessel and the prisoners, who were then bestowed in two Chilian men of war which were lying at St. Carlos; the women remaining on board the barque. An officer and some men were then sent on board her from the Virago to assist in taking her to Valparaiso, for which port all left together on Wednesday, 18th February.

Punta d'Arenas, the scene of the fearful tragedy, is a small penal settlement, belonging to the Chilian Government. The Governor, Munios, was a Captain in the Chilian navy, brought up in the English service. A small force of soldiers, under Captain Salas, and a few settlers, originally convicts, with women and children, altogether 500 or 600 persons, were the population of the colony. Cambiaso had been placed under arrest for insubordination; but he was still allowed access to the barracks, and gained over a sergeant and some of the soldiers, who excited the people to revolt.

At twelve o'clock on the night of the 21st November, Cambiaso's accomplice, the sergeant, being on guard, they seized the arms, and in the middle of the stockade proclaimed General Cruz, and freedom. Cambiaso then let loose all the prisoners, and compelled every one to join him on pain of instant death, though the greater part joined him of their own accord. His next object to confinement Captain Salas, Lieutenant Diez, Mr. Dunn, and some others; but contented himself with compelling the Governor to remain within his own house. But he soon escaped, with two women, from the window. Cambiaso then commenced his cruelties by shooting a man and woman who had given some food to Manlos, and finishing the lives of these wretched victims by beating in all the fine the poor creatures' bodies with a spectacle, and finally burnt. At this juncture, in the evening of Nov. 26, the American barque Florida arrived, with more political prisoners, and a guard, under the command of Capt. Avillar, to whom was then entrusted the charge of the Governor, the Governor for the captain and his men to land; on doing which they were seized and imprisoned. The prisoners and most of the captain's troops, however, joined the rebels, and next morning, having got most of the people on shore, they took possession of the barque. It was on this night that Manlos, with several others, escaped in a boat, with only one oar and no sail, to Tierra del Fuego, suffering all the time the pangs of hunger; on landing he was wounded by some of the Indians, and was again obliged to return to the mainland.

In a few days arrived the English schooner Elsea Cornish, freighted with about 16,000 dollars, and ballasted with silver ore. An invitation was sent off to the owner (Mr. Dean) and the captain to come on shore; they accepted, and were immediately made prisoners. Two boats full of armed men were then sent off to the vessel, when Mr. Smith, the mate, and the crew were made prisoners, and the rebels took possession of all the money. Meanwhile Cambiaso was organising his own men, appointing himself and Garcia general-; an ensign named Cavalia, major; and all the worst characters he could find as captains and lieutenants; to all of whom salaries were paid, partly in advance, with the money taken from the schooner. The two vessels were next fitted out for a long voyage, with the intention, it was pretended, of joining General Cruz. Cambiaso next, on pretence of the captain of the schooner having drawn a knife, had him executed, with the two owners of the vessels. At midnight they were brought out, made to sit upon a bench under a tree, and there shot, in the presence of the men and women collected to view the horrible spectacle; the man who fired standing in the foreground of the Sketch (taken from the inside of the stockade.) As soon as they were shot, their inhuman murderers prepared a cresset upon the branches of the tree, and, pouring on it spirits of wine, they hoisted them up, to be gazed upon by the mob, who filled the air with cries of exultation and clapping of hands. The bodies were then dragged outside the stockade, and burnt to ashes in boxes of logs, three on the top of the same fire. They finish'd by killing a calf amongst the ashes of the dead, and holding a revel on the spot.

Soon after this fearful spectacle the Governor returned from Tierra del Fuego, and landed in Freshwater Bay: his companions advised him to conceal himself, but, in spite of their entreaties, he repaired to the priest's house; but, being discovered, he and the priest were dragged to execution, shot, and burnt.

It was on the afternoon of the next day, December 4, that the Virago arrived; they having, as we have since learned, fired a gun to bring us in: they hastily invented a story to deceive us, and set General Garcia to personate the sick Governor. Meanwhile, they had a large number of men, with loaded muskets concealed, ready to shoot our captain and officers up in the first alarm; and during the time that I mentioned our officers were so strongly pressed to remain till Cambiaso's return, he was plotting their death. Four times that day we held a council of war with the rebel officers as to whether they should take the vessel, and they had a large number of irons in readiness for their purpose, three times at different periods of the day it was carried against Cambiaso's wish to take the vessel by three votes only, and once by four votes. This decision was not, however, from any dislike to the proceeding; but only in consequence of the reports of her crew and formidable armament carried on shore by the man who came off to fetch the surgeon, though his real object was to spy the vessel. The boat was well carried out, and nothing would have transpired had it not been for the Lama passing through and picking up two or three men. This was a wonderful escape; for if the rascals, then removed to Fort Famine, had known anything of her, she would have fallen an easy prey to them. After this we made every haste with their preparations for unbarking, and put to death three harmless Indians who had been living at Punta d'Arenas for some time amongst them. At length, having unbarked all they could, Cambiaso left with the schooner, accompanied the schooner in the Florida as far as Wood's Bay, where he gave them the slip, leaving his own crew behind, but carrying off as much money as he could. Thus is fully developed, from papers that fell into our possession, that he has turned pirate, so far as to have taken any vessels in his way. He had established signals with the schooner, and had prepared a piratical flag, "Death's head and cross-bones," We also found a paper containing a code of laws for the government of his party, in which the smallest attempt at insubordination were to be visited by various punishments, as being shot and hung; shot, hung, and burnt; hung, quartered, and burnt to ashes, &c.

P S.—Tuesday, 24th, Valparaiso.—We are this yesterday afternoon, the Virago having both the schooner and the barque, and are now snugly anchored here. Preparations for the trial of the pirates are proceeding.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE BOMBAY COMMAND-IN-CHIEF.—On Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when Lieut.-Genera. Lord Frederick Fitzclarence, G.C.H., was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Company's forces on the Bombay establishment.

Major-General James Campbell is appointed to command the troops in New South Wales, in succession to Sir Edward Buckley Wynyard, who vacates the command on his promotion to the rank of Lieutenant-General. Mr. William Commissiong is appointed a member of the Council at Sierra Leone.

Captain Hawkey, of the Royal Marines, who shot Lieutenant Seaton in a duel at Portsmouth, some few years since, is now under arrest, also Captain, of the same corps. It appears that on Saturday last Captain Hawkey were walking near Charlton, a few days ago, when they met Lieut. Swaine, and in consequence of some observations Lieut. Swaine made to the lady, Captain Hawkey struck him a severe blow across the face with a stick. A scuffle ensued, when Captain and Adjutant Campbell, of the Royal Artillery, came up, and, after separating the combatants, placed them both under arrest, and a report of the affair has been forwarded to the Admiralty, who have ordered a court of inquiry to take place immediately.

THE LOSS OF THE "BIRKENHEAD."—One of the officers of the Cape Screw Steam Navigation Company's ship Propontis makes the following statement in reference to the conversation heard in his ship, which may go far to account for the accident to the Birkenhead steamer, as the extraordinary circumstances referred to happened upon the same day the latter unfortunate steamer was lost:—"Some days before making the Cape land, and the Propontis, in February, 1852, we found there was nearly six points difference between our standard and binnacle compasses, the standard having nearly three points west variation, and the binnacle nearly three points easterly variation. On approaching the land, the night of the 25th February, we found the binnacle compass so out sadly, and oscillating so much, at times taking nearly a round turn, that we could not steer by it, but continued to steer by the standard, when remained steady." In the list of sub-criptions for the relief of the widows, orphans, &c., of all those who perished in the Birkenhead, we find—"A present-ation from Captain Stephenson for a girl to the Orp.an School at Chelsenham."

THE DOCKYARD BATTALION AND THE NATIONAL DEFENCES.—It is understood that orders have been given that the whole Royal dockyard battalion at Devonport shall, during the approaching summer, be exercised and mustered in the military attitudes, motions, and manœuvres which have hitherto formed the subject of their drills, but in embarking and landing from boats when under arms, and in going aboard with a view to encountering and forcibly repelling, in the case of the active companies, to embark and disembark the field-pieces, and to take them from the shore at Crenpyl, where they will land, to Maser Heights, a distance of some what more than a mile, all up hill. Maker Heights is to be the drill-ground for both artillery and cavalry.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.—A letter received from Stromness (North of Scotland), dated April 26, states that the Arctic Expedition, under Captain Sir E. Belcher, consisting of the Assistance, Captain Sir E. Belcher; Resolute, Captain Kellet; the North Star, Commander Pullen; the Intrepid, Commander M'Clintock; the Pioneer, Lieutenant Sherard Osborn; and the Sanspareil steamer, Commander Gardener, and Desperate steamer; Lieut. F. H. Stevens, arrived there on the 23d, all well, after a fine run of four days from the Nore, a short time bowing, and the longest time running under canvas. The Expedition left Stromness on the 24th, steering direct for Cape Farewell.

VESSELS CONTAINING GUNPOWDER.—A regulation, dated Office of Ordnance, April 30, 1852, directs, in pursuance of the 14th and 15th Victoria, cap. 67, by which no more than 100 barrels of gunpowder are to be carried in gunpowder magazines and stores near Liverpool, that the following regulations are to be observed under the penalty of a misdemeanour; viz.:—"1. That in vessels for the stowage of gunpowder in bulk, no wood lining or wing shall be left between the powder store and the ship's side, in case of collision from other vessels passing up or down. 2. That a crown of planking shall be attached of four inches thick, extending from the lower part of the beams, for the whole extent of the powder rooms; and that the entrance scuttle shall be fitted with a pent-house covering on the deck, for the further security of the magazine scuttle-way. 3. That no cabin with fire-place can be observed. And the Master-General of the Ordnance is pleased to allow that the quantity of gunpowder to be kept in the new floating magazines, at Liverpool, may be increased from 10,000 to 15,000 barrels, of 100 lb. each.—W. COTTON."

Captain Gunning Sutton was thrown from his horse between two omnibuses coming in opposite directions, on Saturday afternoon, while he was in the act of crossing from Albert-gate into William-street, Lowndes-square, in company with his daughter. He was taken up insensible, and conveyed to the residence of his brother-in-law, Captain Howard Vyse, in Chesham-street, where he was immediately attended by two medical gentlemen, who discovered that he had received a deep wound in the lower part of the abdomen, from which considerable hæmorrhage took place. The gallant officer was soon restored to consciousness, but in consequence of the serious nature of the injury, he gradually sank under it, and expired on Tuesday.

MUSIC.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The two symphonies at the fourth concert were Mendelssohn's No. 2, and Beethoven's magnificent work in B flat, No. 4. The former was composed expressly for this society, but we participate in the general opinion that it is not equal to Mendelssohn's other great orchestral conceptions. The first movement is particularly animated and frank, and foreshadows themes afterwards heard in the "Walpurgis Night;" the andante, which was re-demanded, is a solemn dirge, suggested, probably, by Beethovenish reminiscences; the minuet and trio are especially Haydnish and Mozartian; and the finale, a common tarantella, would have covered a multitude of composer sins ridiculs if he had dared to have worked such a trivial subject into a symphonic form. Nothing could be finer than the execution under Costa's bâton, as also of the overtures. Macfarren's "Don Quixote" is a clever work, and Romberg's in D, Op. 6, a fine composition, vigorous as it is, made no sensation, being too palpably Weberian in ideas and workmanship, and lacking also distinctive themes, to attend and give to the story of the opera. Addison's as was the performance of Spohr's double quartet in D, by Messrs. Sainton, Cooper, Dando, Hill, R. Blagrove, Lucas, and Piatti, it was out of place in a Philharmonic programme, and was a sorry substitute for a concerto with some great painist or violinist. Mr. John Thomas's harp performance in E flat was clever, and exceedingly well played by himself. The vocal gamings were confined to Miss Louisa Pyne's artistic singing of a scena by Weber, depicting Porzia's fears as to the intentions of Brutus prior to the assassination of Julius Cæsar, and of the finely executed trio from Auber's "Crown Diamonds;" and to Herr Formes' splendid rendering of the air of "Sarastro," from Mozart's "Il Flauto Magico," and the air from Weber's "Euryanthe." The orchestra was the whole on the first night of the series: but perhaps the directors will take their revenge at the fifth, which will be given on the 17th inst.

THE MUSICAL UNION.

The first performances at the "Union" of Madame Pleyel and Herr Joachim, attracted on Tuesday, at Willis's Rooms, one of the largest and most fashionable assemblages that we collected on those walls. Joachim, who was first known in the country as a boy violinist, returns to us, after a residence at Weimar, with Liszt, who is achieving much for art progress as music director in that city, a thorough-ly trained artist, combining with the complete physical mastery of his instrument, intellectual and poetic reading of the works he undertakes to interpret: thus, in the posthumous quartet of Schubert, the song writer of fame, he vanished instances of the most complex nature, within the last andante he sang two lovely melody with all the soul and passion of a southern singer. Equal-y great was his playing in Beethoven's Quartett in A, No. 5, with Moralt, second violin; Dury, tenor; and Lucas, violoncello. Madame Pleyel took the pianoforte part in Mendelssohn's trio in D minor, Op. 49, with Joachim and Piatti as coadjutors; and the unrivaled pianiste likewise performed Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's air, "Le Jeune Pâtre," and Liszt's fantasia on the themes o' the skating scene from Meyerbeer's "Prophète." Her match ess execution drew down acclamations rarely heard from the aristocratic subscribers. There was no gentle tapping of the hoives of Mr. E la's "Forest of Arden," but the jeweled hands were impressed with the butery oblivious of languid restraint, the voices at length resounded with absolute clearing. It must have been a grand triumph for the artiste to have witnessed amongst her most exacting admirers the most distinguished pianists of the age. It would call for infinitely more space than can be afforded in our illustrated columns to explain the combined qualities in Madame Pleyel's pianoforte interpretations, rendering them so fascinating and exciting; and the formula of conventional criticism fails far short of the reality.

BEETHOVEN QUARTETT SOCIETY.

The new arrangement of performing the posthumous quartetts of the immortal Beethoven, at the beginning of the programme, instead of at the end, as heretu ore, works well. The mind is less fatigued, and better prepared to follow and comprehend the intricacies of these wondrous works, comprising the third period of his great career. Thus, at the third meeting, on Wednesday night, at the Queen Anne-street Rooms, the scheme was opened with No. 15, in C sharp minor, Op. 131, composed in the year 1826: and it was Joachim, the enthusiastic worshipper of Beethoven's genius, who interpreted, with kindred feeling, the enormous difficulties, having Mr. Cooper as second violin, Herr Goffr.o as tenor or viola, and Lucas as violoncello (Piatti was absent with his regiment), in F, Op. 18 (1792), and No. 10, in E flat, Op. 74 (1813). MM. Silas and Rousselot also executed Mendelssohn's sonata in B flat, for the pianoforte and violoncello; his former, as a pianist, is too rarely heard in public.

MR. AGUILAR'S CONCERT.

Mr. Aguilar is an English pianist and composer, whose performances of Beethoven's pianoforte works we had recent occasion to eulogise. His evening concert at Wedne-day was fashionable—Mr. Willy leader, and Herr Anschuez conductor—was remarkable, inasmuch as an overture, entitled "Aspheus," and the pianoforte pieces in "Allegro Maestoso," with band, and a fantasia, were composed by him, and were calculated to inspire respect for his attainments. He was assisted by Sivori and Bottesini, Madame Cora Novello, Mademoiselle Jetty Treffz, Herr Reichart, and Herr Formes—thus securing an attractive programme.

FERDINAND HILLER'S CONCERT.

Ferdinand Hiller is one of the most eminent musicians of Germany. He was born in Frankfort, and studied composition under Rink and Hummel, and afterwards was accompanyist in the institution in Paris for sacred music, directed by Choron. In 1830 some of Hiller's orchestral works and chamber compost ons were tried at a concert in Paris, and raised his fame. As a pianist he gained party in Batiste's proceedings; but, not satisfied with his Parisian fame, Hiller returned to Germany, and at Frankfort first, and afterwards at Cologne, as chapel-master, was much distinguished, both as a composer and conductor. It was the direction of the Gürzenich Concerts at Cologne that Hiller gave up, and his natural taste were quite opposed to operatic music of that class. His overtures to Shakspeare's "Tempest" and "Goethe's "Faust," his symphonies, concertos, quartetts, and pianoforte pieces, are well known to college and conservatorio musicians in this country. He wrote additional accompaniments for Handel's "Deborah," executed at the musical festival at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1834. On Thursday he had a matinée at the Queen Anne-street Rooms, to display some of his chamber compositions, but it is to be hoped that he may be enabled to give a concert, with full orchestra, to enable amateurs to hear to his greatest works. He performed his "Danse des Fantomes," and other pieces; and, with Mdlle. Clauss, a duet for two pianos, on a theme by Weber, a duo with Joachim, and a sonata with Piatti. Vocal pieces by himself were also sung by Madame L. Novello, Miss Dolby, Herr Reichart, and Herr Staudigl, principally from his oratorio, "The Destruction of Jerusalem." Every hearer of Hiller's inspirations must be convinced that he is no ordinary composer; but whether he can be classed with the great circle claiming to possess creative genius, will require a larger arena to determine.

MUSICAL EVENTS.

At the fourth meeting of the Melodists' Club, at the Freemasons' Tavern—Major Hough in the chair—there was an excellent selection of English glees and songs, performed by Messrs. Durrant, Land, Cooper, Gray, King (the hon. secretary), Turle, J. L. Hatton, E. Taylor, Lawler, Kimberry, &c. Mohique played on the violin, and Herr Reichart and Herr Staudigl afforded their valuable aid in the vocal programme.——Mrs. John Macfarren, the clever composer of a mailede mascarade on the tist at the Queen Anne-street Rooms, assisted by Mdme. F. Lablache, the Misses Dolby, Williams, Rainford, Mr. F. Boodle, and Herr Reichart.——The first of the eighty concert at the C.O. Crystal Palace is a fixture, Mrs. A. Newton, the Misses H. Braham, E.—ocob, Lascelles, Warman, Woolf, Messrs. Swift and Josephmas were engaged.——Mr. F. Westerman, the flautist, and an excellent concerto at the Queen's Concert-room, Sloane-street, aided by Madame Lemaire, Mrs. Mary Rose, Mrs. F. Westerman, Herr Haas, Herr Bruchmann, Herr Rummel, Mr. Goldmack, Mr. John Day, Herr Lutgen, and Mr. J. Ward.——The "Rose Queen" held a rehearsal on Monday evening at the Queen Anne-street Rooms, at which Mdme. E. Gerzi, Mdle. T. Magner, Mdle. Anna Hermann, Miss Henning, Mdme. Goffrie, Herr Sonnenberg, Herr Goldmack, Herr Goffrie, Herr Gerzi, and a full band and chorus appeared in the programme.——Professor Taylor delivered, on Thursday and Friday, the usual Gresham Music lectures; the concluding one will be given this evening (Saturday).——Next Monday will be the fourth concert of the Amateur Musical Society, and Herr Jansa's third quartet.——On Tuesday Mozart's Requiem will be performed.——On Wednesday will be the performance of Beethoven's No. 9 Choral Symphony, under Berlioz's direction, at the fourth concert of the New Philharmonic Society; in the morning, at the second meeting of the Harmonic Association, at which Mdle. Clauss, the pianist, will perform.——Miss Anne Van Esch Taylor's concert is on the 12th inst.——On Friday will be the sixth meeting of the Musical Institute; the concert of the Misses Birch; and the performance of "Eljah," at the Sacred Harmonic Society, under Costa's direction.——Herr Gustave Nic ze, the well-known singer from Vienna, distinguished also by his clever compositions, has arrived in town for the season.——At the second morning concert last Monday, at Willis's Rooms, of the English Glee and Madrigal Union, madrigals by Benet and Stafford Smith, and glees and catch by Webbe, Callcott, W. Knyvett, Hawes, Horsley, and Harrison, were sung by Mrs. Endersohn, Miss M. Williams, Messrs. Lockey, Francis, Hobbs, Land, and Phillips, with consummate skill. The third concert will take place next Monday.——The first song at Oxford on Tuesday and Wednesday; on Thursday, at Plymouth, and yesterday at Devonport.——At the fifth of the London Wednesday Concerts, on the 5th instant, Sivori and Prosper Sainton were the instrumental stars; and Herr Reichart, Herr Staudigl, and Mr. Braham, the vocal stars; the other vocalists were the Misses Alcyone, Messent, Jacobs, R. Lucas's band, Stansbury, Bennett, M-ers. Wilkinson, and Lucas, conductor.——At Mr. Lucas's last Musical Evening, on Wednesday, a clever quartett, by Var. Bree, was executed: the artistes engaged were Herr Pauer, the pianist, and Sainton, Blagrove, Hill, and Lucas for the quintett.——Mr. W. Rea, the talented pianist, gave the first of two pianoforte soirées last night, at the Queen Anne-street Rooms.——M. Oross, the Hungarian pianist, presented a pianoforte recital to his friends and admirers yesterday morning, at the Mortimer-street Rooms: he performed Liszt's intricate "Don Juan" fantasia, some of Mendelssohn's poetic "Songs without Words," and Schubert's "Ave Maria" and "Wanderer." Not the least interesting portion of the programme were the pieces composed by Oross, comprising a dreamy nocturne, some Eastern reveries, and a study. He is an accomplished pianist, not disfigured by any difficulties, and possessing taste, feeling, and sentiment.——The Cecilian Society has undertaken the pe-formance of Mozart's "Requiem," and Haydn's 6o mith mass, under the direction of Mr. Shoubridge, with Mr. Boardman as organist.——The Musical World, publishes a letter of Berlioz to Mr. Edward Leder, the composer, ... that the non efficiency of the performance of the [illegible] ... by [illegible] ... ascribed to [illegible] ... LAW AND POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

ARCHES COURT.—THE REV. MR. GLADSTONE.

This was a proceeding against the Rev. Mr. Gladstone, for publicly reading prayers, administering the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and performing other ecclesiastical duties in a certain chapel in Long-acre, in the parish of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, without the license of the Bishop of London, and contrary to his monition and prohibition. Mr. Gladstone, in answer to the articles exhibited on the part of the promoter, delivered in an allegation, in which he pleaded that Long-acre Chapel was a special case to the parish of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, and that ever since 1788 divine service had been performed there by a clerk in holy orders, with the consent of the vicar and the Bishop. It went on to say, that, in May, 1851, Mr. Gladstone, for a considerable time, became the lessee of the chapel, subject to the payment of £147 annually to the Mercers' Company. Now, the articles said that this was a proprietary chapel, and the allegation did not take issue on that fact, but simply set out the history of the chapel. The second plea in the allegation stated that in August, 1846, Mr. Gladstone became perpetual curate of St. Mark, Lansdown, within the diocese of Bath and Wells, and continued to be curate of that parish till 1851. It stated that he had received the highest testimonials from the Bishop of Norwich and other clergymen, and that the Bishop of London, on a due examination of those testimonials, had duly licensed him to officiate as minister of Long-acre Chapel. The third branch of the allegation was that he had borne an irreproachable character, and he went on to say that he had not been monished to show cause why the license granted by the Bishop should not be revoked. This was intended to raise the question whether the license granted by the Bishop could be revoked without assigning any reason for the revocation. The fourth plea in the allegation was, that the proceeded prohibition of the Bishop of London was not such "a godly admonition" of his superior as Mr. Gladstone was bound by his ordination vows to obey, but was in effect a severe judicial sentence of perpetual suspension, which could only be pronounced by an ecclesiastical court for an ecclesiastical offence. It was also denied that the prohibition was duly served.

The arguments were heard before Sir John Dodson on Monday.

Dr. Bayford, as counsel for the promoter, called the attention of the Court to the exact charge against Mr. Gladstone, because the articles made no other charge against him than that of publicly reading prayers, and administering and celebrating as a minister of the Church of England, in an unconsecrated chapel, and in defiance of the prohibition of the ordinary. The question he submitted was one of law, and had been decided 160 years ago, in a case between one of the Bishop's claim to revoke his license. The learned doctor quoted several authorities in support of his argument.

Mr. Gladstone, who appeared in person, contended that this was a mere arbitrary revocation, and said that his authority to preach the Gospel came from a far higher source than the Bishop. Yet it seemed he was to desist without any reason being given, by the mere stroke of the Bishop's pen. The very question was referred to the judicial bosom of ordination, and said it certainly might be a legal arrangement; but without just cause shown, he apprehended it was but a secondary consideration; and that not only was the law far from clear on the subject, but there were many reasons and arguments which might be advanced to show it could not overrule all authority.

Dr. Bayford replied on the case cited.

The Court, in giving judgment (against Mr. Gladstone), observed that in the char e made there was nothing affecting his moral character in any degree what- ever. The only question the Court had to consider was the point of law in the f ensuance—whether the Bishop had not a right to act as he had done, without ass ng any reason or making any charge against the defendant of improper con uct. It did not be low, however, from the Bishop's act, that he could have no other good reason than a case of offence on the part of the defendant. It might be very proper at one time that the chapel in question should be used as a chapel of ease, but at other times it might be found inconvenient and improper. It was now the law, as laid down in the case of Middleton v. Croft, that the mere proprietary chapel belonging to the Drapers' Company, who might at any time they choose convert it to another use. Mr. Gladstone was bound to obey the lawful command of his ordinary, and the question still to be decided was, if a prohibition was a lawful command or not. The present sentence, however, would not operate to prevent Mr Gladstone from performing occasional duties for ever. It would only remain in force until the Bishop should see fit to withdraw the Bishop; and no clergyman could officiate without such license. The Court held the cases cited in support of the prohibition to bear out completely the revocation of a license, and that it was bound to follow the principle which it held decide that the facts averred in this allegation did not constitute a sufficient defence; that if they were all duly proved by evidence, they would not be sufficient to take away the power of the Bishop, and it must therefore reject the articles

Mr. Gladstone said he protested against the decision; and it appeared to him, that, had he been really guilty of a crime, his position would have been infinitely better. He should appeal to the Queen in Council.

Dr. Bayford said the proceedings were under the Church Discipline Act, which expressly provided that there should be no appea, from any interlocutory decree without the consent of the judge himself; and therefore he trusted the Court would withhold its permission, as the only effect of an appeal would be to protract the suit for nothing

Mr. Gladstone directed the attention of the Court to the 15th clause of the same act, which stated that an appeal to the Queen in council from the judgment of a bishop or of that court was allowable, if any of the parties to a suit should think himself aggrieved.

The Court said the case was not yet heard; those articles had been merely rejected.

Mr. Gladstone would defend the case to the last extremity.

The proctor having prayed publication of the evidence, publication was decreed.

The case will stand on admission of the exceptive allegations, if any, at the next court day.

BEGGING-LETTER IMPOSTORS.

At the Middlesex Sessions in Clerkenwell, on Tuesday, before Mr. Serjeant Adams and a bench of magistrates, Mr. Bodkin took occasion to put in a very clear light the infamous mode of trading upon the charitable feelings of the public which is practised by these impostors

Thomas Henry Stone, aged 40, a notorious begging letter writer, was indicted for fraudulently obtaining, by false pretences, from Richard Forster, a Post-office order for the payment of £3 10s. 6d., his property, with intent to cheat and defraud him of the same. Other counts in the indictment charged him with conspiring with Frances Stanley, and other persons unknown, to defraud the prosecutor.

From Mr. Bodkin the barrister's statement, it appeared that Mr. Forster's attention had been ca led to an advertisement in the Times newspaper, purporting to be from a distressed woman, on the 26th of March, which was as follows:

"TO THE CHARITABLE AND AFFLUENT.—At the eleven'h hour a young and most unfortunate lady is driven by great distress to re.ort from those charitable and humane persons we have always proven benevolent acts, some little pecuniary assistance, which will be duly and gratefully acknowledged. The condition is almost hopeless, being, alas! friendless, and reduced to the last extremity. The smallest aid would be most thankfully received. Address, for further explanation, given Invret Miss T C M, Post-office, Great Randolph-street, Camden New Town

He wrote, in consequence, and received the following reply:—

Friday, April 2

Sir—I again offer my gratitude for your charitable kindness I am quite unable to speak the promptings of my heart for your great go dness to me, an entire stranger, but you may be sure all I am very sincere and grateful You will, I am sure, be happy to hear I have at last found a few trifling diamonds upon me, and also obtained sufficient of my wearing apparel to make a decent appearance, but it has swallowed up the whole of your generous bounty, for I assure you the day have removed to the Hempstead-road where a far more comfortable lodging has been offered by me, and where, Sir, if you honour me with a call I shall be most happy, and will, if pleasure, relate my circumstances in connexion with my past history, and I do hope you may consider me worthy of your future notice But it is my earnest wish to accept myself of the offer of Lucas's situation, and I will gratefully accept by a letter addressed to me at Mrs Lucas's, Lennox-street, Hempstead-road, Camden New Town, and will be most punctual in the discharge of my duties, and I trust you will not withdraw your generous favour from me, but I will endeavour to merit your kindness in every way in my power. I am, Sir, your most grateful and humble servant, FRANCES STANLEY

Kindest Forster, do not forget

Please direct me, "T. C. M.," Post-office, 37, Cranmer-street, Grey's-inn-road.

In fact the printer at the "new way to Fortune" was the writer. He got his living in this way: He wrote letters of this description, went to the post office to receive the answers, and went away whistling with delight at having obtained the plunder of those he had swindled. On searching certain lodgings in Kleinfeld Forster, who stated he was an architect, reading at 9, New Ormond-street, and narrated the circumstances already mentioned. The first letter he received, in answer to one he wrote on seeing the advertisement, stated that the writer was the illegitimate daughter of a merchant, who died suddenly in a railway carriage, about two years ago. During her father's life she had been comfortably provided for, but since she has been in extreme distress. It was signed "Frances Clarke." In sent a Post-office order for £3 19s. 6d., after some further letters, in one of which the writer said that she had obtained a situation, but in consequence was obliged to put on other apparel, and requested some further assistance. The letters destroyed were unquestionably in the same hand writing as those produced.

The handwriting of the prisoner, and the case against him, as given above, was supported by ample testimony; and it was clearly shown that the prisoner had for a length of time pursued, with great pecuniary advantage to himself, the infamous practice of a begging-letter impostor.

The jury returned a verdict of "Guilty" on the first count (obtaining money by false pretences, but without conspiracy).

Mr. Bodkin then gave the court the following account of the prisoner's previous history.—For many years he had been carrying on the trade of fabricating letters for the purpose of obtaining money; a bushels of them might have been produced, which were in the possession of the Mendicity Society. He had living with him a woman who went by the name of Stanley. She was much younger than himself and was respectably connected, but had been induced by him to live with him as his wife, and in this degrading position she was the principal aid in the fraud he had committed on the Duke of Wellington. She then represented herself at different times as the daughter of several officers who had served under him, and were ill ed dying under his command, and in this way had obtained from his Grace as much as £450, who never suspected whom he was all this time assisting. The prisoner had been summary convicted two or three times for similar offences, and fourteen years ago was transported for forgery. Since his return he had obtained large sums in this manner, it forming the whole source from which he derived his living.

The prisoner was sentenced to transportation for seven years.

THE "GEMEINE" EAU DE COLOGNE.—On Tuesday, in the Court of Vice-Chancery, before Mr. J Parker, an application was made in the case of Farina v. Rosse for an injunction to restrain the defendant from using the trademarks of the plaintiff, as a manufacturer of Eau de Cologne. The bill stated that an ancestor of the plaintiff in the year 1709 invented and discovered a mode of printing, or giving a specimen to a wash, which was called and sold by him under the name of Eau de Cologne; that the exclusive right and title to the said secret art had descended to the present plaintiff, Johann Maria Farina, who prepared the said perfumed wa er at his manufactory, at the ishirty Platz, in the city of Cologne; that in the year 1826, he invented a certain form of signature and address, namely "Johann Maria Farina, gegenüber dem Jülich's Platz," and also a certain seal or stamp, and certain labels which he had caused to be printed or engraved on sticking, which were pasted on the bottles sold by him; that in July, 1846, he first discovered that the defendant, Luis Rosse, of 264, Regent-street, was selling counterfeit perfumed water, under the name of Eau de Cologne with labels similar to those used by the plaintiff; and that, on an application made to him, he agreed to discontinue such sale; but that, on the 15th of April, 1852, he had discovered that he was still selling such counterfeit Eau de Cologne, with labels similar to those of the plaintiff. The Vice-Chancellor issued an injunction restraining the defendant from selling Eau de Cologne in bottles, with la cls or wrappers s milar to those used by the plaintiff.

A few days ago a French lady, who described herself as having been engaged by Mr. Bunn as prémiere danseuse, and who produced a contract purporting to confirm her statement, applied to the Court of Queen's Bench for a writ of fieri facias for £50 and costs, in order to proceed to enforce the terms of the contract. It was stipulated in the contract that she should be paid 1000 francs for travelling expenses, and £4 000 francs for her services for the season. She had come from Paris for the season, but had been put into no engagem nt, nor had she been able to get her expenses, or any intimation of what was intended. As she could not enter into another contract, she was desirous of returning to Paris. Mr. Hardwick said the matter was one which a solicitor could best deal with.

Mr. F. B. Lewis, advertising agent, of No. 86, Moorgate-street, has been committed by Alderman Carden, at the Mansion House police-office, to take his trial on a charge of having obtained money from Mr. F. Ellerby, of Warbrook un er false pretences. It appeared in evidence, that the prosecutor is solicitor to the Melbourne Gold and General Mining Association, and that he gave the defendant, on the 12th inst., the sum in question for the purpose of inserting the advertisement of the company in the Times newspaper. On the 13th and 15th defendant called upon him and said that he had paid £5 for the insertion of the advertisement in the Times on which Mr. Ellerby gave him £3 more. The advertisement, however, never appeared, nor had any money been received at the Times office for its insertion.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The immense abundance of money seeking investment in most quarters, the comparatively flourishing state of the trade and commerce of the country, and the general advances made by the joint-stock banking interest to their customers, have not had any material influence upon the value of Consols this week. It is true that they have tended to diffuse more confidence as regards the future; yet it is evident that capitalists are not disposed to invest in other than the best securities, which, at present prices, offer a very moderate return for their money. The fact that the exchange at New York is slightly against this country, and that small shipments of bullion were made from Liverpool by the steamer of last week, have also operated against several large transactions; hence, the quotations of the Three per Cents have been the turn lower. That some period must of necessity elapse ere we shall receive anything like heavy payments for the produce of this country for the present season, is evident from the tenor of the advices just at hand; nevertheless, we can scarcely anticipate any material falling off in the stock in the Bank of England, as we shall be in the receipt of a large amount from the joint-stock banks, which, at present

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

SUPPLEMENT.

VOL. XX.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, MAY 8, 1852. [GRATIS.

OXFORD, WORCESTER, AND WOLVERHAMPTON RAILWAY.—OPENING FROM EVESHAM TO STOURBRIDGE.

THIS event, which has excited the greatest interest in the districts concerned, took place on Saturday last.

About nine o'clock in the morning a special train, with 21 carriages, started from Stourbridge amidst the ringing of bells, firing-of cannon, and cheers of an immense concourse of spectators who had congregated at the station. At Kidderminster, and again at Worcester and Pershore, there were the same manifestations of rejoicings—bell-ringing, cannon-firing, and the cheering of the people, while at every town and hamlet triumphal arches of flowers and evergreens were erected over the line. At Worcester there was a large accession of visitors, and the train started from that city soon after ten o'clock, making a short stay at Pershore, and arriving at Evesham (37 miles) before twelve o'clock.

This was the point at which the greatest preparations had been made. The Mayor, Mr. Henry Workman, had invited the directors and their friends to a sumptuous dejeûner at the Town-hall; and on the excursion train arriving at the Evesham station, the party were met by the corporation authorities, and escorted from thence to the Town-hall by the high sheriff and borough members, as well as a numerous portion of the gentry and magistracy of the county. An elegant cold collation was here served—the Mayor of Evesham in the chair. Most of the influential persons of the district were present. The usual introductory toasts having been given, were followed by that of the "Directors of the Company," which was responded to by Captain Rushout, M.P. The "Health of the Contractors" was then given, to which

Mr. Peto, M.P., replied in an excellent and spirited speech, in which he pointed out the great resources of the thickly populated district through which the line passes, and expressed an opinion that it would prove one of the best-paying lines in the kingdom. He also referred to the proposed extension from Oxford to Brentford, the bill for which was now before Parliament, and which line, he said, would to a certainty be made. That in fact "it should and must be made." (Cheers.) He hoped that their next celebration of this kind would be at Oxford next autumn, when he trusted to have the honour of entertaining all who were then present. (Loud cheers.)

The toast of the "Members for the borough of Evesham was acknowledged by Lord Marcus Hill. The party rose at two o'clock.

Meanwhile the interests of property having been duly represented, those of labour were not forgotten. After the departure of the magnates from Evesham, the working-men of the town and neighbourhood, to the number of 600 or 700, were entertained with a substantial repast, for which long ranges of tables were laid in the High-street. The brilliant sky overhead, the thousands of happy, smiling faces, and the holiday appearance of everything and everybody, made this the pleasantest scene we have long witnessed. The navigators employed on the line were feasted at the same time in the timber storehouse at the railway station. At four o'clock, the tables in the High-street having been cleared, they were again filled by the female part of the community, who were regaled plentifully with "the cup which cheers but not inebriates," and its usual concomitants. Indeed, the hospitality of the good people of Evesham appeared to be extended to all, without exception, to those to avail themselves of it. It was May-day, too: a grotesque party of dancers preceded the band of music through the town; whilst cakes were unsparingly distributed from the windows of the High-street to the crowd below. Rich and poor seemed mutually pleased with themselves and with each other; and from many a weather-beaten partaker in the day's rejoicing we heard the remark, "There were never such doings before in Evesham!"

Our Artists have pictured the very interesting demonstrations at Evesham: the gaily-dressed Arch of evergreens and flowers; the Station, similarly decorated; and the al fresco entertainment in the High-street, Evesham.

The party of Directors and their friends, who left Evesham at two o'clock, returned to Worcester, where cake and wine were offered to the party by the Mayor and Corporation. The train reached Stourbridge, and shortly after returned to Kidderminster, where they were received by the Mayor and corporation, and escorted from the station to the Lion Hotel, to partake of a sumptuous dinner prepared for their entertainment by the corporate body of the town.

After dinner, Mr. Delalls, one of the directors, in proposing "Prosperity to the borough of Kidderminster," took occasion to point out to the meeting the importance of the construction of the above line, and strongly urged upon those present the necessity of their giving the promoters of this undertaking their strenuous support. The hon. gentleman's remarks were received with most enthusiastic cheers

The Right Hon. Lord Ward, in acknowledging his health, fully corroborated the cogency of Mr. Delalls' observations, remarking that the district through which the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton line passed was pre-eminently entitled to a railway, having an independent access of its own to London; that their traffic would well support its construction; and that without this measure it was impossible to hope the great mineral and other resources of the western counties could ever be adequately developed.

The day was observed as a close holiday along the whole line, and a vast concourse of spectators attended at Evesham, Worcester, Kidderminster, and Stourbridge; at the former place it was computed that not less than 10,000 persons were present

The line having been surveyed by the Government authorities, was opened for traffic to the public on Monday.

The whole line is at present laid down on the narrow gauge, but there is ample room left for laying down an additional rail for the broad gauge hereafter.

In the whole round of Railway sights, there is not one more curious than the passing glance you sometimes catch into the interiors of the carriages of a night train as it draws up, say at two or three in the morning, at a station. Watch, by the dull glimmer of the faintly burning lights, the huddled up, cuddled up attitudes; the lounging, stretching, relaxed, and sleepy postures of the half-conscious passengers, leaning on each others shoulders, with drooping heads and drooping arms, and chins sunk in comforters and shawls; the ladies with limp bonnets totally and irredeemably crushed, and made night-caps of—mere wisps of straw, or ruined, stove in, and hopeless masses of silk and gauze; the gentlemen, adorned with all sorts of fantastic head-dresses, fuzzy caps, and Glengarry bonnets, or veritable bonnets de nuit, but all silent, all heaped in corners or blocked upright between the shoulders of their companions, with only now and then a half articulate snore or a dismal grunt as the utterer seeks temporary comfort in a change of position, to break the rumble of the journey or the silence of the temporary stoppage.

A night's railway run is a dismal thing to the man or woman who cannot sleep out of a four-poster. In vain they try to read. The lamp is too dim, and the printed lines seem to run into each other; the eye smarts and waters, the temples ache, and the book is given up. Then, perhaps, they turn to the window for amusement, and try to make out the dull lines of the black horizon, or the scattered lights of cottages or farmhouses, or the clustered lights of towns. But country places are dark early in the night, and the dismal glimmering which here and there streams athwart the night comes probably from a sick room or some such scene of sorrowful watching. Closer sparks of light, however, are not wanting. Every now and then flying red-hot cinders shoot past the window, producing a glare almost like lightning; and the grey torrent of the blowing steam streams like a phantom in the dark. The stations are all but deserted: A sleepy policeman goes about rubbing his eyes and half dreaming still. A muffled-up passenger, who has been stamping up and down the damp platform for the last half-hour, is inserted into a carriage, to the sore discomfort of a group of sleepers; and a burly fellow, quite wide awake—he has just had a trudge of ten miles across country—flings into the post-office carriage the local mails of the little villages about. Meantime the dozers for the most part enjoy that pleasant state which lies between sleeping and waking. They have a dim indefinite consciousness of where they are, and are sensible of the train stopping and then going ahead again. Only the interval between the stations seems wonderfully short—a fact, however, which gives them no degree of concern. Sometimes, indeed, at a stopping place the whole carriage is aroused. A stout gentleman given to snoring hears loudly and wakens up as the train slows and the whistle is heard. Moving about with some briskness, he opens the window and looks out, then consults his watch, and begins to fidget and get nervous. In a moment we are at the platform, and the glimmer of the guard's lantern shoots past the window.

"Guard! guard!" shouts the stout gentleman, "how far are you from Bullock-smithy?"

"Twenty miles, sir."

"Bless me, you're very late to-night."

"Raythber before than arter time, sir. It's now 2.5, and we passed Bullock-smithy at 1.20."

Occasionally we have a passenger of quite a different kidney—a fidgetty passenger, the character generally performed by a lady. She is bound, perhaps, to Little Peddington, and between her starting point and her destination are at least sixteen stations, at every one of which she inquires whether it be not Little Peddlington, and is not easily persuaded of the negative, citing cases in which she had arrived at that famous city at the very hour of the then mayory, but quite forgetful that upon those occasions she had started five or six hours before her present time of departure. I once witnessed a lady in a state of trepidation lest she should be carried past London by mistake—"These railway people were so careless;" but this, I think, is rather an exceptional instance.

At the stations where you stop at night, you frequently shunt trains; that is, if you are travelling by a quick passenger convoi. Sometimes you are run upon the sidings to let you pass them. There is always something especially magnificent in the locomotives of these trains—generally huge strong monsters—as you pass them in the darkness. With a constant shrill yell, up flies their white sheet-like breath; three great red gleaming lights in front—as it were two fiery eyes and a fiery mouth—making up a huge demoniac face; beneath, the strong red glow of the furnace lighting up the cinder-strewed line, while great lumps of burning coke fall sparkling from the monster's stomach. There never was a better representation of a fiery dragon. St. George, if he had met such an iron animal, would at once have couched his lance, and spurred his steed, and called on all the saints to aid him in a worse adventure than that of the monster of Cappadocia. But our present fiery dragon is a very placid beast of burden, and in the case before us he is conveying behind him a vast herd of cattle—you may hear their lowing in the pauses of the steam blast—up to the devouring maw of the metropolis, there to be converted into all manner of savoury dishes, from haunches and sirloins to chops and kidneys.

Dreary as is in general a night journey, an early morning arrival is drearier still. Perhaps a dismal cold and foggy twilight is stealing over you, and paling the ineffectual lamp as you rattle across a silent suburb; the wet streets empty, and where here and there a policeman leans against a lamp; or, if it be in London, a group of tatterdemalion wanderers, mingled with early mechanics, cluster round a breakfast shed. The personage who takes the tickets looks half asleep. The cold morning air nips you as he lets down the window; but it wakens you up, and you begin to collect your wraps and scattered goods and chattels around you. There is a discomfort in moving which seems invincible. You wish you were fifty miles from your journey's end, so as to let the day be properly aired and warmed before you step out into it. But there is no help; you clamber into a jingling fusty-smelling night cab, and in a few moments are ringing lustily at the portals of an hotel, looking strange and unfamiliar in its shut-up grimness. At all such establishments, almost without exception, you hear of an unsappy porter who is said to be up all night, but you seldom see him. After a due modicum of knocking and ringing, the door is slowly opened, and an unshaven, slip-shod wretch of a waiter rubs his eyes, and admits you into the darkened passage. You step for a moment into the coffee-room, while he flings back the window-shutters. Pah! the stale smell of the last night's cigars, the dim odour haunting the room, like the ghost of alcohol, of the unnumbered "goes" and "bottoms," and "cobs without," which were jollily called for ever night, and the wretched remnants of which lie in tiny drops of clammy, spiritly syrup, at the bottom of dim tumblers, with half-a-dozen intoxicated flies in each—the peculiar flavour of a coffee-room, not by any means disagreeable when you enter it at night, hungry for supper and disposed to be tolerably jolly thereafter, is fearful in the morning. It is the odour of the charnel-house of conviviality—the catacombs of departed toasts, sentiments, and songs. Only think of those glasses sparkling on that board—or that empty bottle being the sun of that table. You turn from the place as by instinct, and flee. What is to be done? Will you go to bed? The hour is exactly that absurd one when it is too early to turn out and too late to turn in. If you do settle upon a bed-room, the effect is horrible. Twenty to one you don't sleep; the light of day bores you. You get tremendously weak-eyed, and find yourself staring at the pattern of the curtains, intolerably tired, with all your bones aching, but not the slightest inclination to close your eyes. If, on the other hand, you decide to keep up and walk about till breakfast time, how long the slowly-going hours appear till then. You wander about the empty streets, and gaze disconsolately upon the white drawn window-blinds. The first housemaid you observe cleansing the door-step is an event; the first shop-boy you perceive listlessly and shufflingly removing the shutters is a catastrophe. Then sauntering slowly back to your hotel, you become aware, to your great gratification, that the brisk coffee-room fire has taken all fumes of last night up the chimney, and that the pleasant little appetising white cloths are spread for breakfast. You may congratulate yourself on having at last got comfortably over your night upon the rails

Very often, however, the process is much less agreeable than I have sketched it. Were you ever obliged to dodge forty miles or so, for example, behind a goods train, for want of a station with a siding to shunt it? The operation occurs very often, and is most woefully uncomfortable. The train keeps on at uncertain speeds—now making good way, anon suddenly pulling up, with all the breaks screwed on, and effectually putting an end to your slumbers The passengers get nervous, or snappish, or both; and the ears of the directors must tingle on their pillows in consideration of the variety of epithets applied, and unpleasant wishes as to their future destiny lavished upon them. Every now and then we come to a full stop, and the glimmer of the guard's lantern is seen. Down goes my window.

"What's the meaning of this, guard? We're an hour and a half behind time, and sticking in this cutting."

"Can't help it, sir. 'Goods' ahead, sir—very heavy train, and the rails uncommon greasy."

Wrathful Gentleman.—Then by Heavens I won't stand it. Of all the disgracefully mismanaged lines—

Nervous Gentleman.—Are you sure, guard, there's no other train coming up behind us? Really it's not very pleasant.

Guard.—There's the 6.45 Birmingham, due at Euston 10.20; but she's generally late, and they can see our tail-light at 11 o'clock.

This is the kind of dialogue, it is to be observed, which takes place when the authorities are in a bending and affable humour; but in nine cases out of ten the guard lays himself up in profound silence, and only deigns to hold converse with the driver in front. Presently some few of the most fidgety of the detenus open the doors—that is, if they be not locked—and give signs of an intention to "stretch their legs," a proceeding which is immediately repressed by the powers that be, with a stern "Gentlemen mind your seats," for it is obvious to the merest tyro in railway management, that, had all the passengers descended, and had the expected train come up at the rate of forty miles an hour, it would find nothing but mere empty trucks to smash before it. At length, however, we crawl ahead; a great whistling ensues, and theories are discussed as to whether an extra pilot engine has or has not taken the "goods" in tow. At all events we are again in cheery motion, and soon after passing the lights of a station we perceive our hindrance—half-a-mile of piled-up trucks, with a broken-winded engine puffing on the siding. A mile a minute, then, to make up for lost time!

THE ROYAL ACADEMY DINNER.

The Council of the Royal Academy gave their anniversary festival on Saturday evening last, at the National Gallery, Trafalgar-square. The attendance of noblemen and gentlemen was more than usually numerous, and embraced the leading members of both the great political parties, and many distinguished literary and political characters.

The banquet was served in the Great or East Saloon, where tables were laid out for nearly 200 guests. The appearance of this apartment, with its beautifully decorated walls illuminated by a ring of brilliant gas jets, was exceedingly gorgeous.

The President of the Academy (Sir Charles Locke Eastlake) took the chair a six o'clock: upon his right were seated in the order named the Earl of Derby, the Right Hon. B. Disraeli, the Marquis of Salisbury, the Home Secretary, the Foreign Secretary, the Colonial Secretary, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Secretary at War, the Master of the Rolls, the Attorney-General, and the Right Hon. J. C. Herries. Upon the chairman's left were his Grace the Duke of Beaufort, Duke of Newcastle, Duke of Wellington, Marquis of Lansdowne, Marquis of Abercorn, Marquis of Westminster, Marquis of Normanby, Marquis of Northampton, Marquis of Granby, and Lord Ashburton. Amongst the other principal guests at the table we remarked—the American Minister, the Prussian Minister, the Turkish Minister, the Portuguese Minister, Earl of Aberdeen, Earl de Grey, Earl of Cawdor, Viscount Palmerston, Earl of Rosse, Earl of Clarendon, Earl Grey, Lord John Russell, Earl of Harrowby, Earl of Ellesmere, Earl of Yarborough, Earl Granville, Viscount Canning, Earl of Carlisle, Earl Lovelace, Lord Monteagle, Lord Londesborough, Lord de Tabley, Lord Ward, Lord Townshend, Lord Seymour, the Lord Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Lord London, Right Hon. Sidney Herbert, Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay, Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps, the Dean of St. Paul's, Mr. Serjeant Kinglake, M.P., the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, Sir Roderick Murchison, Dr. Whewell, the Chairman of the East India Company, Sir Charles Wood, the Governor of the Bank of England, the Chairman of the Board of Customs, the President of the College of Physicians, the Right Hon. M. Labouchere, Professor Wheatstone, Professor Faraday, Mr. Charles Dickens, Mr. Hallam, Mr. Cubitt, Mr. Forster, Sir J. Lubbock, Sir E. Landseer, Professor Owen, the Master of Dulwich, Mr. Grote, and Sir George Staunton. The following were among the artists present:—Mr. Grant, Mr. Stanfield, Mr. Roberts, Mr. Wright, Sir R. Westmacott, Mr. Redgrave, Mr. Lee, Mr. Sidney Cooper, Mr. Creswick, Mr. Abraham Cooper, Mr. Egg, Mr. Lane, Sir W. Ross, Mr. Hardwick, Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. Bailey, Mr. Batt, Mr. Webster, Mr. Stone, Mr. Cousins, and Mr. Frost.

The dinner was magnificently served by the proprietors of the Thatched House Tavern, St. James's-street.

After the usual loyal toasts,

The President gave "The Army and Navy," coupling with them the name of the Duke of Wellington.

The Duke of Wellington said he had no objection to return thanks for both, although there was a noble friend of his present who was more conversant with the sister service than himself—he meant the Duke of Northumberland. The chairman had been pleased to allude to the efficiency of the British army, and to its readiness to act when the call of duty required it. He, himself, believed that whatever difficulties the army might have to contend with, they would always maintain their reputation for subordination and bravery. (Hear.)

The President next gave "The Health of her Majesty's Ministers."

The Earl of Derby, in responding, expressed the extreme pleasure he felt at being present at a meeting where no differences of political opinion could possibly arise. (Hear, hear.) He thanked the President and the company for the honour they had paid to the Ministry of which he was a member; and he could conscientiously assure them that he was most desirous, with the aid of his hon. friend, Mr. Disraeli (laughter), to do what he could towards providing a better building than they had at present for the cultivation of the arts in this country. (Hear, hear.)

The toast of the "Illustrious Guests who had honoured the Academy with their presence," brought upon his legs

The Marquis of Salisbury, who said it was the first time he had ever dined with the Royal Academicians; but, from the amount of gratification he had derived from his first visit, he hoped it would not be the last. (Cheers and laughter.)

The President now proposed "Literature and Painting," coupling the name of Mr. Disraeli with the toast.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he saw many members of the literary profession present who were much more qualified to return thanks than himself. As, however, it had pleased the President to mention his name, it might not, perhaps, be considered presumptuous if he responded to the toast. (Hear.) Although he wished -indeed, everyone wished—to have a new building in the place of the present National Gallery—one that should be worthy of this great metropolis—in his position he was not able to act unless his noble friend, Lord John Russell, would assist him. (Laughter and cheers.) He thought that if so eminent a statesman as the noble Lord had proved himself to be would lend him his assistance, there could not be the least doubt they should soon be able to rear a building at once worthy of the advanced state of the arts and of the great country in which they lived. (Cheers.) After paying a very high compliment to the talents of his noble friend the ex-Premier, Mr. Disraeli said he thought he might be excused for deviating so far from the beaten track on this occasion as to propose, without asking leave of the President, "The health of Lord John Russell." (Loud cheers and laughter.)

The President said, as the toast was received so well, he felt that all he had to do was to put it formally from the chair. (Renewed cheering.)

Lord John Russell, in rising to respond, said he had thought himself this evening perfectly safe. Last year, when the toast of the "City of London" was proposed, the Lord Mayor being absent, he was called upon to speak. This year he had observed that the Lord Mayor of London was present, and he had felt in consequence perfectly at ease.—(Laughter, and "Hear, hear").—an ease which had only been disturbed by the ingenuity of his hon. friend. (Renewed laughter.) As an old Minister, he was perfectly aware that people in office had a very difficult task to play.—(Hear, hear.)—and to please at by everybody. (Laughter.) They all very well knew that if a site for a new National Gallery were found in London, there would be plenty of people who would declaim against it, and say that dirty work was would get in and spoil the pictures were it built in such a locality. If the country were selected for a site, the distance would then be too far. As a commission had been ordered to act upon it, and he hoped it would solve the very question and come in time, to an end. (Laughter and cheers.) His right hon. friend would find that this was not the only difficulty that had been bequeathed to him. There were several others besides, which he would discover in time, and which he hoped he might get well out of. (Laughter.) The noble Lord proceeded to say that Mr. Disraeli was a very clever man, and, perhaps, as he had been selected to respond to the twofold toast of "Literature and Painting," he might prove to have a twofold aptitude for surmounting the difficulties of his position. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) In conclusion, his Lordship expressed his full concurrence in the noble sentiment enunciated by Lord Derby—that differences of political opinion ought never to interfere with private friendship. (Cheers.)

The toast of "The Foreign Ministers" was acknowledged by his Excellency Chevanier Bunsen in a long speech, which was listened to with much attention.

"The Health of the Lord Mayor," and several other toasts, followed, and the party broke up at half-past ten o'clock.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.—At the annual meeting of the members of this Institution, held on Saturday last, in Albemarle-street—Mr. Pole, the treasurer, in the absence of the report stated that the receipts for the year ending the 31st of December (including the produce of the sale of Exchequer Bills and of renewal fines from under-tenants) had amounted to £3936 19s. 5d., and that the gross expenditure for the same period had been reached the sum of £3805 6s 5d., including the payment of the renewal fine of £600 to the Duke of Northumberland, as well as various investments to the extent of £1086 19s. 5d. The real expenditure of the year, for the general purposes of the institution, had amounted to £3411 15s. 4d., against £3726 0s. 10d. of real receipts from admission fees, subscriptions from new and old members, subscribers to the lectures, and from miscellaneous items, giving an excess of receipts over expenditure equal to £201 0s. 6d. for the year. In that branch of the institution devoted to lectures the profits had amounted to £479 18s. 7d., being a considerable increase over the sum realised in the preceding year. The amount of funded property on the 31st of December was greater by £768 1s 1d. than on the corresponding day in 1850. In conclusion, it was observed that 975 volumes had been added to the library during the year, and the institution had attained a position of unprecedented success.

THE WEST INDIA MAIL PACKET SERVICE.—In order to facilitate the voyage of the Mexican Gulf steamer as much as possible, the Admiralty have ordered that she is not in future to call at Jamaica and Porto Rico, but is to proceed direct to Havannah and the Gulf through the old Bahama Channel. The Havannah mails will, in consequence, have to be made up on the 24 of the month instead of on the 17th, as heretofore. A steamer will run between St. Thomas and Jamaica twice a month instead of once, and by that means there will be a fortnightly instead of monthly communication with Jamaica. The Jamaica steamer will not accompany the Honduras, as at present, but a branch steamer will be employed specially to perform the Honduras mail service to and from Jamaica. In case of bad weather, the Gulf steamer will be allowed an additional 60 hours' stay at Tampico, instead of 36 hours, according to the present arrangements. Only two days' stoppage will be allowed the Barbadoes and Demerara steamer at Demerara. The West India Company have guaranteed to the Government that the speed of their steamers shall average in future ten miles an hour between Southampton and St. Thomas. In consequence of the new arrangements the Mexican mails and dividends will arrive here occasionally in the British Channel at the beginning of the month There is to be no alteration in the Brazilian mail service, with the exception that the River Plate mails are to be despatched from Rio de Janeiro on the 13th instead of the 14th of the month.

THE FIRE IN BERMONDSEY, recorded at page 335 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of last week, broke out, not in New Weston-street, as there stated, but at between 200 and 300 feet distant, in Manning-street.

Mr. William Grey, S.C.D., has been created by his Majesty the King of Prussia Count of the Phœnix of Hohenstein, and Knight of the Red Eagle, the honour having been suggested by the Academy of Berlin, as a mark of the value attached to his scientific communications to that body.

USHER'S STEAM-PLOUGH.

THE application of steam to ploughing has hitherto involved a number of physical difficulties, which it is stated in the Scottish Press, Mr. James Usher, of Edinburgh, has overcome.

This invention consists, first, in mounting a series of ploughs in the same plane around an axis, so that the ploughs shall successively come into action; and, secondly, in applying power to give rotary motion to a series of ploughs or other instruments for tilling the earth, so that the resistance of the earth to the ploughs or instruments as they enter and travel through the earth shall cause the machine to be propelled; thus making the ploughs act in the earth in the same way as paddle-wheels do in the water, by which the vessel is moved along; and the resistance of the earth being greater than the water, the power obtained is proportionally more.

Fig. 1 shows a side elevation of the steam machinery; Fig. 2 is a plan thereof, the steam boiler and engine being removed. In Fig. 1 the under edge of the mouldboard and share is formed to a curve struck from the centre of the shaft or axis on which the ploughs are affixed: a a indicate the bed-frame or carriage of the machine. The fore carriage wheels (b b) are mounted on an axle, which turns in bearings (c) attached to the swivel frame (D), which moves on the bolts (d) for turning the machine round in a small space. A portion of the swivel frame (D) is toothed, and acted upon by the pinion and winch. The hind part of the carriage is here shown, supported upon the hollow cylinder or roller f, composed of two extreme parts, *f*¹ and *f*², which are wheels similar to b b, the intermediate part (f) being by preference removable at pleasure, so as to render these bearing parts suitable to different stages of cultivation. This compound cylinder has its axle supported in the bearings g, attached to the lever *g*¹ on the inner side of the carriage frame. The axle of this cylinder carries also at one end the wheel h, to be afterwards noticed. A moveable lever frame (i i i) is supported on an axle or shaft (k), as a fulcrum. The free ends (i i) are formed into the toothed segments l, and are concentric to k; these segments being acted upon by the two toothed pinions and spind es m, which elevates or depresses the hind part (i i) of the lever frame, and all that it carries, at the pleasure of the conductor. On the carriage thus constructed is placed the locomotive boiler, with its engines (as n n), the power of which is applied through the medium of connecting rods (o) to the crank shaft p, supported on two standards (q). On the shaft p there is a so fixed the spur pinion, indicated by the dotted circle *p p*¹ in Figure 1; and the pinion, by taking into the wheel r, mounted on the shaft k, gives motion, at the same time, to the pinion t, which is carried round on the same shaft (k). The pinion t, thus actuated, takes into the wheel h, before referred to, on the bearing cylinder (f); and it is preferred that the point t should be applied so as readily to be put into and out of gear with its wheel, though not so shown in the Engraving. By this arrangement of parts a slow progressive motion is obtained for the whole machine, on the one hand, through the cylinder f; and on the other hand a separate rotary motion, at a certain increase of speed, is communicated through the wheel r to the pinion s, fixed upon the shaft u u, which last-named shaft has its bearings (v v) attached to the moveable frame i i. On the shaft u u are placed a series of plates or projections, fixed at regular distances. Or such plates or projections, with their ploughs, may be placed upon separate shafts, each with its own proper gearing; but it is preferred to place them on one shaft. These plates or projections have affixed to each of them several ploughs, which in revolving penetrate the soil, and by their mould-boards elevate and turn over portions thereof: a a are the plates or projections fixed upon the shaft u. Each plate (*a*¹) has three arms or prolongations (b, b, b), which terminate in the radial direction shown; a further prolongation (*d*¹ *d*¹) is carried obliquely upon each of these arms. Upon the plate and projections thus constructed is affixed the tilling apparatus, which consists, firstly, of the part *e*¹, which acts the part of the mould-board or turn-furrow in the common plough; and it is to be fixed by screw bolts or otherwise to the prolongation *d*¹ *d*¹. To the fore part of this mould-board (e e) is affixed a bar of wrought iron, which is also furnished with a lug by which it is attached to the plate by means of screw bolts or otherwise: the bar, thus secured, forms a head or share-bearer, as in many common ploughs. To the fore part of the bar the share is adapted, and fixed by its socket. The mould board, and also the share, may be varied in form. An adjustable fore-cutter or coulter is affixed in front of each share. It will be seen that not only the ploughs which are set in the same plane around the axis follow each other into action, but that the ploughs of the other sets (which are affixed around the axis in parallel planes) are arranged and come into action so that two ploughshares will not strike the earth at the same instant.

The first public trial of the Steam-Plough took place at Bangholm, near Edinburgh, on the 14th of November last, when only four ploughs were used, although the locomotive is adapted for six. The amount of power that may be introduced is, of course, indefinite; and the machine might be made capable of working a series of ploughs to compass any proportionate breadth of land. The plough-share penetrated deeper than is reached by the horse-plough, and the loam was thrown up and pulverised as loosely as if the spade had been at work. The field was level, and the operation was viewed with great interest by the spectators. A second trial took place on the same farm on the 21st November, with similar results. Practical men present expressed their surprise at the superior manner in which the soil was turned. Another trial took place on Friday, the 27th of February: the plough traversed the field six times with perfect success, and, as on the first occasion at Bangholm, to show its capability to travel over a soft surface, it ploughed a part of the land twice over. This experiment was supplementary to one which had taken place on the previous day, in presence of the committee of the Highland Society.

The cost of the machine is about £300, and it is adapted to ploughing, thrashing, rolling, and harrowing. It travels 2550 yards per hour, turning over 40 inches in breadth, which is equal to 7 acres in 10 hours, at a daily expense of 17s. or 18s., which is about 2s. 6d. per acre, while it costs 9s. or 10s. to plough an acre with horses. Although the first machine may not be perfect, still the fact is undeniable that the great obstacle to ploughing by steam has been got over, and with a little improvement the inventor has no doubt of making the machine perfect.

The cost of the Steam-Plough per day is estimated as follows:—

12 cwt. coals	6s. 0d.
Engineer	3s. 0d.
Two labourers	4s. 0d.
Horse, two hours	1s. 6d.
Interest on machine and repairs	2s. 6d.
	17s. 6d.

Such is a brief account of the invention, achievements, present state, and prospects of Mr. Usher's Steam-Plough.

BRITISH AGRICULTURE.

BY THOMAS ROWLANDSON, F.G.S

HAMPSHIRE.

Population .. .. 355 004 | Area .. .. 1,018,550 acres.

THE north-eastern part of Hampshire is of a sterile character, being placed on the western division of the Bagshot Sands, a large part of which is still in the state of open heath, an example may be seen on the South-Western Railway, in passing to Southampton by Farnborough, Fleet Pond, &c. The latter place possesses some interest at the present moment to the inhabitants of the metropolis, as exhibiting a copious sample of the water, which is to form part of the supply which the Board of Health proposes to favour them with at some future day. To the westward of the Bagshot Sands are outcropping beds of the London and plastic clay formation, of a most tenacious character, and wholly unsuitable to arable cultivation, if we except beans, rape, and cabbage, for which crops it is well adapted, if previously well drained: in consequence of the rapidity with which the rain permeates the overlying sands, the lower grounds are wet and liable to fogs.

The district to the south of the above-described, and comprising half the area of the county, is formed of strong flinty loams and hazel mould, or chalk interstratified occasionally with gravel, the whole of which are, however, underlayed by an unbroken bed of chalk. Some of the higher parts of the district under notice is composed of a light, friable, sandy soil, well adapted for the growth of root crops and barley, which in seasonal pastures afford a short bite of sweet grass, forming excellent sheep pastures. The lower lands of this class are frequently composed of soils similar to the above, with a considerable intermixure of carbonaceous or decayed vegetable matter; in other places, perhaps over the widest extent, the soil consists principally of fine chalk, rendered grey by vegetable substances: sheep that graze this soil are remarkably free from disease, owing, no doubt, to the naturally dry character of the pasture and the climate.

Intermixed with the above are occasional patches of deep, strong, red, flinty loams, which form the main part of the arable soils of the Hampshire chalk downs. Along the margins of the rivers and brook which intersect the downs, are generally to be found strips of dark-coloured mouldy loams. In numerous instances the fields so situated are converted into water meadows. The practice followed in various parts of the country varies, some flooding the land to obtain the greatest amount of summer produce, others for early spring-food: those who practise the latter mode water as frequently as possible, or continuously during winter, until the commencement or the middle of March, at which time an acre of water meadow is considered equal to feeding 400 couple of sheep for one day. When these meadows be on a sound dry bottom, they are occasionally hurdled off, leaving open hurdles for the lambs to pass through and feed ahead: they are seldom suffered to remain on the water meadows all night, but are folded on other grounds. The usual hours of keeping them on the meadows are from 8 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock in the evening, this continuing from the last week in March to the first week in May. As soon as the first of the grass has been eaten by ewes and lambs, the carriers and lateral conductors of the water are examined, and the flooding renewed. At the expiration of six or seven weeks, a crop of hay is taken, the watering being continued to within about ten days previous to the grass being mown.

The clay lands of the northern part of Hampshire are usually cultivated as follows:—1st, wheat; 2d, turnips; 3d, barley; 4th, clover and rye-grass, with occasional intermixture of oats. The extensive district overlying the chalk is well suited for the growth of sainfoin, a circumstance not overlooked by many extensive farmers, as it is found very productive on such soils as permit the plant to send its roots down amidst the crevices of the chalk, in which case it is always found to grow stronger than on places where its roots are confined to a shallower range. Sainfoin, holy hay, so called on account of its fragrant smell, is one of the most valuable plants which can be grown on such a district; for while other plants are liable to suffer from drought, sainfoin is scarcely injured during the longest continued dry weather. It owes this valuable property to the extraordinary depth to which it sends out its roots. On the other hand, wet weather increases the weight of the crop. When converted into hay, it is more relished by sheep and horses, and keeps in the stack better than ordinary hay, being equally good in the third as in the first year.

Sainfoin does not arrive at perfection until after the second year, it is therefore usual to sow the hop, or yellow clover with it; the sainfoin is usually allowed to remain five or six years.

A small portion of the north-eastern corner of Hampshire, adjoining Surrey and Sussex, is about equally divided into a cold tenacious clay and some light sandy soils of the greensand formation. Alice Holt Forest principally comprises the former; whilst Woolmer Forest, with Grey Shot Downs, in the state of open common, occupy a large breadth of the latter. In the vicinity of Liphook the soil is found occasionally sufficiently fertile to be converted into hop-grounds; and at Bramshot there are some well irrigated meadows, the water from which the Board of Health contemplate appropriating for the use of the inhabitants of London.

The cattle in Hampshire are of various sorts, the predominating sort being the Norman and Channel Island breeds. The sheep are mostly a coarse Down breed, by no means such handsome animals as are to be found in the neighbouring county of Sussex; this coarseness of frame is probably owing in some measure to an admixture of Wiltshire blood, which was a favourite cross many years ago.

Hampshire bacon and Hampshire hogs have been long celebrated. The native hog is as coarse and lanky a brute as can be imagined; few such, however, are now to be found, for, like their Berkshire brethren, they have been greatly improved by crosses with Chinese and other breeds. Notwithstanding these somewhat deprecatory remarks respecting the original breed, it is highly probable that the high character of Hampshire bacon was founded on a solid basis, the true cause arising from the fact of numerous herds being fed in the extensive forests which at one period covered this county, the albuminous food of acorns being well calculated to form fine firm bacon.

Not being acquainted with the southern part of Hampshire, I requested Mr. W. C. Spooner, of Southampton, to favour me with a brief account of its agricultural features, an account of which follows. This gentleman is favourably known to the public as the author of the prize essay on feeding horses, and on super-phosphate of lime, and an excellent article on farm building, as well as an active promoter of general agricultural improvements:

"The town of Southampton, equidistant between the eastern and western extremities of the county, is situated on a peninsula or narrow neck of land, having on either side the mouth of a river which here empties itself into the sea. These rivers are the Itchen on the East, and the Test on the west. The former rises about twenty miles in a north-eastern direction at Itchen, near the town of Alresford, and passes through a portion of the city of Winchester, and discharges itself into an arm of the sea a few miles above Southampton. The valley through which it runs is for the most part very fertile, and is particularly distinguished by the productive water meadows on either side, to the irrigation of which much attention is paid. The river is rather rapid in its fall, though of no great width, and for the space of twelve miles is fed by the springs which issue from the chalk hills on either side. The chalk formation disappears a few miles south of Winchester under the plastic clay which with the London clay forms the subsoil of the southern point of the county extending from forty miles from east to west. The character of the land for miles on either side of the Itchen may be judged by this description. The land on the hills is a thin chalk soil, but increasing in value as the river is approached, still improving in quality as following the course of the river, it nears its termination; and about midway between Southampton and Winchester the best land in the county is found, being a kind though rather strong loam, naturally drained by a gravelly subsoil, and capable of bearing good wheat, and even beans and swedes, and yet not too strong for barley. This fertile land does not extend above a mile in width, but speedily degenerates as we east to a wet clay, and on the west to a poor hungry gravel, which forms the character of much of the land on either side the turnpike road from Winchester to Southampton.

"The arm of the sea into which the Test is discharged, extends a few miles west of Southampton, having a portion of the New Forest on its southern side. This river is longer in extent than the Itchen, rising on the borders of Berkshire, and extending from the north to the southern extremity of the county, a distance, as the crow flies, of 25 miles. It passes by the towns of Andover, Stockbridge, and Romsey, and discharges itself at Redbridge, near Southampton. The vale through which it runs, though embracing in spots some excellent land, and particularly near Romsey, between that place and Redbridge, yet, on the whole, is of inferior fertility to the vale of the Itchen. The water meadows, too, are much less productive, especially those above Romsey, which, for the most part, are incumbent on peat, and are too low as regards the river to be effectually drained. Much improvement might be made by deepening the course of the river, which does not possess that gradual fall which distinguishes the Itchen. The arable land on either side the Itchen is very variable in character; deep loam, a burning gravel, and a heavy clay are all to be found; and a few miles north of Romsey is the chalk which extends to the northern border of the county. Probably about one-half of the county lies on the chalk, here sheep breeding is carried out to a large extent, and has been much improved of late years, the Hampshire Down sheep being the favourite breed. There has been a great increase within these last few years in the growth of turnips by the use of artificial manures. The New Forest occupies a large portion of South Hampshire, and consists, for the most part, of barren soil, ranging from a cold thin clay to a light blowing sand. There has been great misrepresentation as to the quality of the land in this forest. There is certainly a very small proportion of comparative fertility, but at least seven-tenths will not pay for cultivation, particularly at such low prices for agricultural produce as are now obtained. There is some good land on the borders of the Avon, which, rising on the Wiltshire hills, passes near Fordingbridge, and falls into Ringwood, and on to Christchurch, where it discharges itself. Again there is some very good land on the south-eastern part of the county, near the towns of Portsmouth, Fareham, and Titchfield; the land being, for the most part, kind, and well-adapted for fattening sheep, and the improved husbandry which attends it. From this locality the chalk hills extend to the north-eastern part of the county, where the upper greensand crops out under the chalk, in the neighbourhood of Petersfield, and the land is distinguished for that fertility which generally prevails throughout this formation, good crops being ordinarily raised with but little manure. In no county in England is there a greater diversity of soil, nor in any such a wide extreme between the good and bad husbandry, which is there to be found."

HEREFORD CATTLE.

In treating on the agriculture of the counties of Hereford and Monmouth, we made some remarks as to the probable origin of the white-faced and white-backed breed of Herefords, which have elicited some observations from a correspondent. The communication with which we have been favoured states, that our informant was induced to believe, from a statement made by Mr. P. Tully, that the introduction of the white-marked cattle was accidental, and occurred in the stock of one of that gentleman's ancestors, who lived at Huntington, in Holmer, and in the manner following:—"That about the middle of the last century, the cowman came to the house, announcing, as a remarkable fact, that the favourite cow had produced a White-faced Bull Calf This had never been known to occur before, and, as a curiosity, it was agreed, that the animal should be kept and reared as a future sire. Such, in a few words, is the origin of a fact that has since prevailed through the county, for the progeny of this very bull became celebrated for white faces.

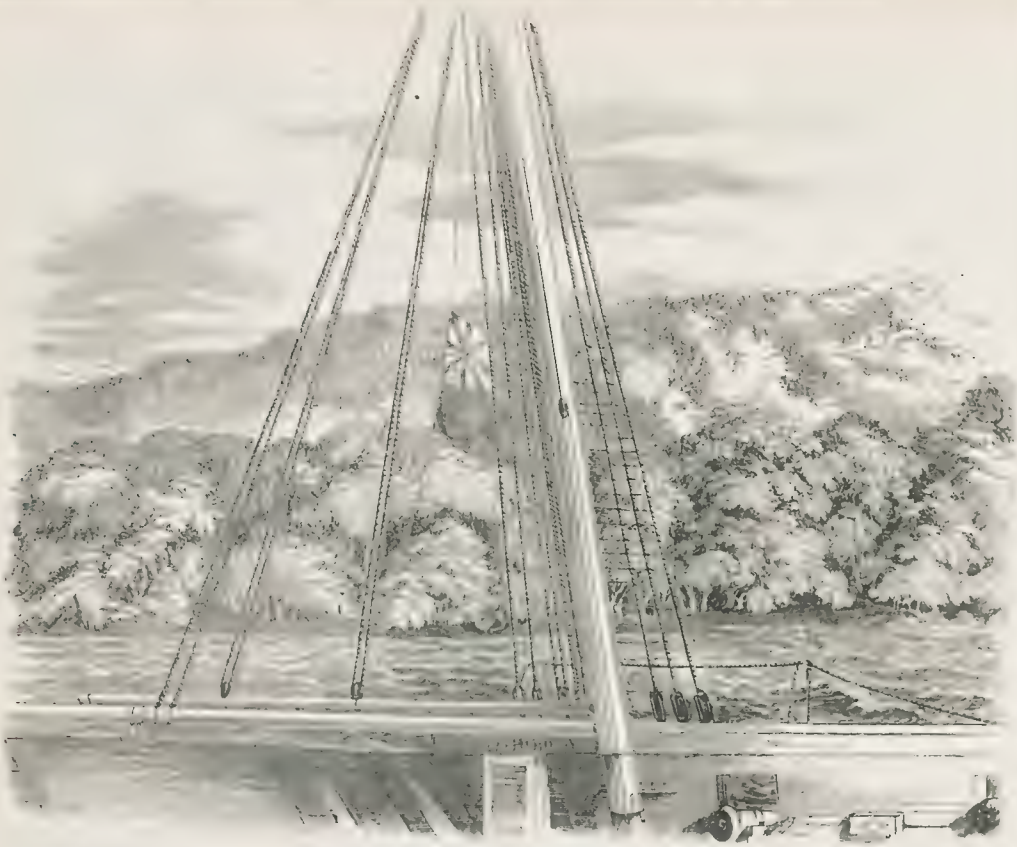
Nati natorum et qui nascentur ab illis.

The writer proceeds to state, that "About two years ago, on mentioning the circumstance to the late Earl of Cranford, he took the shine (as he supposed) out of me, by calling my attention to the fact, that 200 or 300 years ago, on the authority of Flemish and Dutch painters, nothing is more frequent in cattle pieces than to see them portrayed with white faces; from which he inferred that the Hereford stock may have descended from a Dutch or Flemish bull imported for the purpose."

The same informant states, "That it ought never to be forgotten that our county breed might have remained for years localised, if it had not been for Mr. Westcar, who, from 1779 to 1819, never omitted visiting the Hereford October fair, and making purchases: that it was this gentleman who induced the Duke of Bedford, the Duke of Manchester, Lord Talbot, and other noblemen, to adopt the same plan."

We are prepared to concede the point stated by our Correspondent, that the white-faced Hereford breed has been recently introduced as a prevailing feature of Hereford stock in the manner described. We, however, may still be permitted to suggest, that "the white-faced bull-calf in question may have possessed a distant affinity to the white cattle alluded to in our article on Denmark." We are more inclined to this opinion, as white-faced cattle are to be found with all the gradations from red, brown, deep brown, and black, through the greater part of Glamorgan and some other Welsh counties, possessing, at the same time, the general physical contour of Herefords. The pure red breed is now more in favour, and, we believe, with justice. There is so strong a resemblance between the North Devon and Hereford breeds, that we have little doubt of their having a common origin, the larger-framed Hereford being in a great degree occasioned from pasturing on the luxuriant herbage of the cornstones, whilst they, at the same time, enjoy a milder and drier climate as compared with North Devon.

ROMANTIC AND MERITORIOUS RISE TO FORTUNE.—At a recent meeting of the electors of Dartmouth, Mr. Lindsay, the great shipowner, who is canvassing that borough to become its representative in the new Parliament, gave, in reply to an attack upon him by a Tory elector, the following interesting account of his fortunes:—"He should be the last to mention a word about what had been taunted with falsehood. He was told he was a mere commonplace shipbroker—God knew he was commonplace enough once: he was the architect of his own fame, and he hoped no one would despise him on that account. (Cheers.) He was but a young man now, and at the age of 14 he was left an orphan boy to push his way in the world. He left Glasgow to find his way to Liverpool with 4s. 6d. only in his pocket, and so poor was he that the captain of a steamer had pity on him and told him that he would give him his passage if he would trim the coals in the cabbin of the steamer. He did so, and thus worked his passage. He remembered that the fireman gave him a part of his homely dinner, and never had he ate a dinner with such relish, for he felt that he had wrought for it and earned it; and he wished the young to listen to this statement, he had derived a lesson from that voyage which he had never forgotten. (Cheers.) At Liverpool he remained for seven weeks before he could get employment; he abode in sheds, and 4s. 6d. maintained him, until at last he found shelter in a West Indiaman: he entered as a boy, and before he was nineteen he had risen to the command of an Indiaman. At twenty-three he retired from thence, his friends, who when he wanted assistance had given him none, having left him that which they could no longer keep. He settled on shore—his career had been rapid; he had acquired prosperity by sheer industry, by constant work, and by keeping ever in view that great principle of doing to others as you would be done by. (Cheers.) And now, instead of being a commonplace shipbroker, he would tell them what at thirty-five—for he was no older—was the amount of business which the firm which he had established, and was at the head of, and the acting partner of, transacted. During the last year alone their charters executed amounted to upwards of 700, and this year it bade fair to be larger. The amount of their insurances was £3,000,000 sterling; they had shipped, as contractors, upwards of 100,000 tons of coals, and upwards of 150,000 tons of iron. They had imported in the famine year, as brokers, 1,800,000 quarters of corn. (Hear, hear.) Then, as to the next charge, that he was no shipowner, and did not own a ton of shipping. In consequence of this statement he has been induced to copy out a list of the ships in which he owned a proportionate rate, and was managing owner of all, a large and high class of British built ships. He then read a list of eighteen, screw-ers, besides steamers and others, ranging from 860 to 310 tons burthen, the total tonnage being 21,009, the largest portion of which he owned himself, and was manager for the whole." (Loud cheers.)



PIONEER COVE, SPANIARD HARBOUR, TIERRA DEL FUEGO.

PIONEER CAVERN, THE DEATH-PLACE OF MR. MAIDMENT, OF THE PATAGONIAN MISSION.

THE PATAGONIAN MISSION.

IN our Journal of last week we gave our Correspondent's painfully interesting narrative of the fate of the Patagonian Mission Society in Tierra del Fuego. We now engrave the views of the localities of the calamity, from the Sketches named by our Correspondent; and subjoin, almost entire, Captain Moorshead's official report received by the Admiralty.

Having received information from the Rev. G. Packenham Despard, of Redland, Bristol, honorary secretary to the Patagonian Missionary Society (now Captain Moorshead), I learned that the party—consisting of Captain Allen Gardiner, R.N., superintendent; Mr. Williams, surgeon and catechist; Mr. Maidment, catechist; John Irwin, carpenter; John Badcock, John Bryant, John Pearce, Cornish fishermen—left Eng.and in September, 1850, in the barque Ocean Queen. I also learned that the stores had been forwarded to them in June last, off the Falkland Islands; and should the party be unable to maintain their position at Picton Island, Beagle Channel, being provided with partially-decked launches, that they would fall back on Staten Island. Having called at the Falkland Islands, and embarked these stores, consisting of 30 casks, cases, &c., I sailed from thence on the 6th of January, 1851, and stood along the north coast of Staten Island, with large ensigns flying at the mastheads to attract attention, and fired shotted guns into the mouth of St. John's Harbour, Cook's Harbour, and New Year's Harbour; and observing a flag-staff erected, with a flag on it, on New Year's Island, I came to an anchor under it, at 8 P.M. on Sunday, the 11th. The next morning, Jan. 12, I sent Lieutenant Gaussen in the cutter to ascertain the cause, and went myself at the same time into New Year's Harbour, and found a ship's long boat lying hauled up on the beach, with Aladdin, Spendwell, on the stern. She was fitted with oars out from these on the spot. By a tally left on the beach I found the schooner J. E Davison, of New York, W. H. Singly master, had called here on the 16th of October, 1851, on her way to Picton Island to relieve the missionaries. I returned to the ship at the same time as Lieutenant Gaussen, who reported that pieces of wreck were on the island, but, excepting the flag, which he brought on board, there were no indications of how or where any vessel could have been lost. It blew a perfect hurricane that night off the land, and, being unable to heave the ship up to her anchor, I fully expected to be blown off with the loss of anchor and cable, but the ship held on with 90 fathoms of chain in 22 fathoms water. I sailed the next day, but could not attempt the Straits of Le Maire, as it still blew free from the southward. Having passed Cape St. John, I stood along the south coast of Staten Island, and got a good view of Port Vancouver, the only harbour on the south side of Staten Island; and seeing no signs of the party being there, I made direct for Picton Island till the 17th, when the weather proving very thick and hazy, with squally baffling winds, I was compelled to bear up, and stood along the east and south coast of New Island, getting a good view of Richmond Roads. I endeavoured to beat up to Picton Island through Goree Roads, and got well up so as to open the Beagle Channel, when, the wind falling, and current setting to the southward, I bore up, and anchored in Goree Roads for the night.

The next day, Jan. 18, it blew a heavy gale from the southward; but the ship rode well, with two anchors ahead, and 100 fathoms of chain.

Jan. 19.—The wind having moderated in the night and shifted to the northward, I weighed at four in the morning, and beat up through Goree Roads and stood along the south-west coast of Picton Island, and, passing Cape Maria, beat up to the north-east coast of the island. The wind again falling light, it was long before we could tow the ship to her berth in a cove formed by an islet on the coast, called by Captain Gardiner Banner Cove, and the scene of his early troubles.

The following day, January 20, was devoted to securing the coast and the adjacent isles, and after many hours of fruitless search, without a sign of the party, and when on the point of giving them up, some writing was seen on a rock across a river, which we instantly made for, and found written, "Go to Spaniard Harbour." On another rock adjoining we read, "You will find us in Spaniard Harbour." On a third piece of rock we read, "Dig below," which we instantly did, but found only a broken bottle, without any paper or directions. On searching one of the numerous wigwams in the neighbourhood, we read on one of the poles, "A bottle under this pole;" but we could not find it, although we sent for shovels and crowbars, and dug deep and carefully for it; but it was evident, from some fragments of stores found on the spot, that the mission had rested there.

Accordingly, the next morning, January 21, I sailed early for Spaniard Harbour, and entered it on the same evening at seven o'clock. Our notice was first attracted by a boat lying on the beach, about a mile and a half inside of Cape Kinnaird. It was blowing very fresh from the southward, and the ship rode uneasily at her anchor. I instantly sent Lieutenant Pigott and Mr. Roberts, the master, to reconnoitre and return immediately, as I was anxious to get the ship to sea again in safety for the night. They returned shortly, bringing some books and papers, having discovered the bodies of Captain Gardiner and Mr. Maidment unburied.

From the papers found, Mr. Maidment was dead on the 4th September, and Captain Gardiner could not possibly have survived the 6th September, 1851. On one of the papers found was written legibly, but without a date, "If you will walk along the beach for a mile and a half you will find us in the other boat hauled up in the mouth of a river, at the head of the harbour, on the south side—delay not—we are starving." At this sad intelligence, it was impossible to leave that night. Although the weather looked very threatening, neither the aneroid barometer nor sympiesometer being very unfavourable, I held on for the night.

I landed early the next morning (January 22), and visited the spot where Captain Gardiner and his comrade were lying, and then went to the head of the harbour, with Lieutenant Gaussen, Mr. Roberts, and Mr. Evan Evans, surgeon. We found there the wreck of a boat, with part of her gear and stores, with quantities of clothing, with the remains of two bodies, which I conclude to be Mr. Williams (surgeon), and John Pearce (Cornish fisherman), as the papers clearly show the death and burial of the rest of all the mission party.

The two boats were thus about a mile and a half apart. Near the one where Captain Gardiner was lying was a large cavern, roofed by him "Pioneer Cavern," where they kept their stores, and occasionally slept, and in that cavern Mr. Maidment's body was found.

Among Captain Gardiner's papers, which I will notice presently, I extract the following: "Mr. Maidment was so exhausted yesterday that he did not arise from his bed till noon, and I have not seen him since." Again, on the 4th of September, alluding to Mr. Maidment, he writes:—"It was a merciful providence he left the boat, as I could not have removed the body." Captain Gardiner's body was lying beside the boat, which apparently he had left, and being too weak to climb into it again, had died by the side of it. We were directed to the cavern by a hand painted on the rock, with "Psalm 62, v. 5-8," under it.

Their remains were collected together, and buried close to this spot, and the funeral service read by Lieut. Underwood. A small inscription was placed on the rock near his own text, the colours of the boats and ship struck half mast, and three volleys of musketry was the only tribute of respect I could pay to this lofty-minded man and his devoted companions, who have perished in the cause of the Gospel for the want of timely supplies; and before noon the Dido was proceeding safely on her voyage.

In looking over the papers found in the cavern, I am enabled to trace out the wanderings and many of the sufferings which beset the party up to the time of their unhappy end. Some of the papers are on private affairs, unconnected with their position, and some on religious subjects, but I quote only from those which bear upon their fate.

Having arrived at Picton Island on the 5th of December, 1850, they landed and pitched their tents on the 6th, but were compelled to re-embark in consequence of the annoyance of the natives, until their boats could be got ready. Their boats were named the Pioneer and Speedwell, and they finally disembarked and slept in them on December 18. The ship sailed the next day, and their troubles seem to have commenced.

THE REMAINS OF CAPT GARDINER, R.N., AND THE "PIONEER," HIS SLEEPING-BOAT.

Both boats immediately got under way for the opposite shore, on the south coast of Tierra del Fuego, to a place they have named Bloomfield Harbour, as the natives annoyed them, but, before clearing the anchorage, the Speedwell got on the rocks, lost her anchor, and injured her rudder. It appears to have been blowing fresh, as both boats swamped their dinghies and lost them. The Pioneer reached Bloomfield Harbour, but returned the next day, and joined the Speedwell. Both boats then weighed for Bloomfield Harbour, but on this occasion the Pioneer grounded, and the Speedwell, having been out all night, rejoined her the next morning. On January 6 I find both boats in Lennox Harbour, where they had gone to beach them and stop their leaks; but, in tacking, the Pioneer was thrown on a nest of rocks, and she was not afloat again until the 17th January. They left Lennox Harbour on the 20th January for Bloomfield Harbour, to refit their boats; but, finding the natives there in great force, they bore up for Spaniard Harbour, which they reached on the 24th January. Here they seem to have experienced many vicissitudes, from the surf and storms, till the last of February, when the Pioneer was driven on the rocks, and her bow stove in irreparably. The party in this boat then took to a cavern, but, finding it damp, and the tide washing into it, they hauled the wreck of the Pioneer on the beach, and, covering her with a tent, they made a dormitory of her; the Speedwell being higher up, at the mouth of a river which they named Cook's River, after a lady and benefactress to the mission.

Feb. 18.—The tide rose higher than usual, and I find the following remark by Captain Gardiner:—"The box which contained my most valuable books and papers was floating about in the surf, and the beach strewn with its contents in all directions. By this unforeseen accident I lost a reference bible, my private journal, and some useful memoranda, chiefly on missionary subjects, which I had been collecting for many years; also my rings, and a purse containing £8 8s., all the money I possessed, with the exception of 8d.; all my warm clothing was washed away, but providential y thrown up again by the tide in the course of two or three days."

Feb. 28.—Mr Williams is unwell in the boat, and Captain Gardiner removes to a tent to make room.

March 13. This tent, named a hermitage by Captain Gardiner, is burned down.

It appears two casks of biscuits and one of pork had been buried at Picton Island to disencumber the boats, and nourishing food being wanted, as Mr. Williams and J Badcock have got the scurvy, they resolved to go to Picton Island for it, which they reach on the 23d of March, intending to remain there till the expected vessel arrives from England with stores. Having got these provisions on board, and finding the natives still troublesome, they print the notices on the rocks mentioned above, buried some bottles, and returned to Spaniard Harbour on the 29th of March.

In the beginning of April another of the party (J. Bryant) gets the scurvy, and the disease gaining on the others, they become enfeebled in consequence.

April 24. "They have provisions enough to last for two months, but some are very low, and are suffering from them. They kill him by putting a piece of pork opposite the muzzle of a gun attached by a string to a trigger, and, as they can only issue pork three times a week, they dine off this for and salt the remainder. Altogether they appear to have been very frugal with their supplies. I find a notice of five large fish caught, and an account kept of the number of ducks shot; as their powder has been left on board the ship, and a flask and a half being all they have, they keep it for emergencies.

May 12 is a note of the biscuit being short; and, altogether, as they have not supplies for more than three weeks, all but the sick go on short allowance.

May 19.—The preserved meat is out, and Mr. Williams appears to be failing.

May 22.—Set apart for special prayer on behalf of the sick, for supplies of food, and the arrival of the expected vessel.

Frequent mention is made of the ride washing into the cavern, carrying away their stores, and endangering their sleeping boat, which they endeavour to counteract by building breakwaters of stones, but in the night the surf washes away their work of the day. On one occasion I find Captain Gardiner and Mr. Maidment have to escape from the cavern to save their lives, and taking refuge on a rock washed by the surf, they kneel down in prayer.

June 11.—J. Irwin, another of the party, takes the scurvy, and misfortune seems hovering around them; their fishing-net is swept away, and J. Badcock dies on the 28th of June, and is buried on a bank under the trees at Cook's River: after performing the last offices they return to their boat for prayers.

July 4. Having been seven weeks on short allowance, and latterly even this having been curtailed, the party was utterly helpless; everything found in the shape of food is cooked and eaten; a penguin, a scaw, a half-devoured fish washed up on the shore, and even the salted fox washed out of the cavern, is thrown up again on the beach, and used for food. Captain Gardiner writes:—"We have now remaining half a duck, about 1lb of salt pork, the same quantity of damaged tea, a very little rice (a pint), two cakes of chocolate, four pints of peas, to which I may add six sloes. The mention of this last item in our list of provisions may startle some of our friends should it ever reach their ears; but, circumstanced as we are, we partake of them with a relish, and have already eaten several of them; they are very tender, and taste like rabbit."

July 22.—They are reduced to living on mussels, and feel the want of food, and sometimes the craving of hunger is distressing to them. Capt. Gardiner writes: "After living on mussels for a fortnight, I was compelled to give them up, and my food is now mussel broth and then a bit part of limpets."

July 28.—Captain Gardiner writes of the party in the other boat:—"They are all extremely weak and helpless. Even their garden seeds, used for broth, are now all out."

August 14.—Captain Gardiner takes to his bed; but a rock weed is discovered, which they boil down to a jelly, and find nourishment from.

August 23.—John Irwin dies.

August 26.—J. Bryant dies, and Mr. Maidment buries them both in one grave. John Pearce, the remaining boatman, is cast down at the loss of his comrades, and wandering in his mind; but Mr. Williams somewhat better.

Sept. 4.—Mr. Maidment has never recruited from that day of bodily and mental exertion. The remaining remarks I transcribe literally, and they must speak for themselves.

"Sept. 3.—Wishing, if possible, to spare him (Mr Maidment) the trouble of attending on me, and for the mutual comfort of all, I purposed, if practicable, to go to the river and take up my quarters in the boat: this was attempted on Sunday last. Feeling that without crutches I could not possibly effect it, Mr. Maidment most kindly cut me a pair (two forked sticks), but it was with no slight exertion and fatigue in his weak state. We set out together, but soon found that I had no strength to proceed, and was obliged to return before reaching the brook over our own beach. Mr. Maidment was so exhausted yesterday that he did not rise from his bed until noon, and I have not seen him since; consequently, I tasted nothing yesterday. I cannot learn the place where I am, and know not whether he is in the body, or enjoying the presence of the gracious God whom he has served so faithfully. I am writing this at ten o'clock in the forenoon. Blessed be my Heavenly Father for the many mercies I enjoy—a comfortable bed, no pain, or even cravings of hunger, though excessively weak—scarcely able to turn in my bed—at least it is very great exertion; but I am, by his abounding grace, kept in perfect peace, refreshed with a sense of my Saviour's love, and an assurance that all is wisely and mercifully appointed; and pray that I may receive the full blessing which it is doubtless designed to bestow. My care is all cast upon God, and I am only waiting his time and his good pleasure to dispose of me as He shall see fit. Whether I live or die, may it be in Him. I commend my body and my soul to his care and keeping, and earnestly pray that He will take my dear wife and children under the shadow of his wings, comfort, guard, strengthen, and sanctify them wholly, that we may together in a brighter and eternal world praise and adore his goodness and grace in redeeming us with his precious blood, and plucking us as brands from the burning, to bestow upon us the adoption of children, and make us inheritors of his heavenly kingdom. Amen.

"Thursday, Sept. 4. There is now no room to doubt that my dear fellow-labourer has ceased from his earthly toils, and joined the company of the redeemed in the presence of the Lord, whom he served so faithfully. Under these circumstances, it was a merciful providence that he left the boat, as I could not have removed the body. He had left a little peppermint-water which he had mixed, and it has been a great comfort to me, but it is the was no other to drink, bearing I might suffer from thirst. I prayed that the Lord would strengthen me to procure some. He graciously answered my petition; and yesterday I was enabled to get out and scoop up a sufficient supply from some that trickled down at the storm of the boat, by means of one of my underrubber over shoes. What combined mercies am I receiving at the hands of my Heavenly Father! Blessed be his holy name.

"Friday, Sept. 5.—Great and marvellous are the loving-kindnesses of my gracious God unto me. He has preserved me hitherto, and for four days, although without bodily food, with it any feeling of hunger or thirst."

It is to his own Captain Gardiner's unfinished letter to Mr. Williams, quoted in our Journal of last week, Captain Moorshead has also forwarded two unfinished letters, written by Captain Gardiner shortly before his death (found in the cavern, and addressed to his son and daughter). Captain Moorshead has also sent the following list of papers and other articles found near the boats, hereafter to be sent to England :—

"A list of articles belonging to the late Captain Gardiner enclosed viz. a mahogany case, containing two silver pencil-cases, two halfpence, a piece of a thermometer, a half-crown, a silver watch, and two memoranda regarding its effects; a spyglass, a piece of a quadrant, a leather case containing letters and papers, a sketch-book, two pocket books, one Patagonian vocabulary (manuscript), manuscripts, three memorandum books, 29 books, a few pamphlets and periodicals, an atlas, and chart." Eight letters addressed to the mission party, in Captain Moorshead's care, all having been exposed to the air and sea for months, are nearly valueless in themselves, but may prove of interest to their friends.

The following admirable letter upon the melancholy fate of Capt. Gardiner appeared in the Times of Wednesday :—

"SIR,—While deprecating with you the rashness with which enterprises like that referred to are often entered on, I would desire to point out, in terms of strong admiration, the high spirit and unflinching constancy with which Capt. Gardiner carried out his ill-fated mission. It is not judgment, or want of judgment in the adaptation of means, that should bind us to the good or evil of a proposed end. Means and end we must ever keep distinct; for while no Napoleonic dexterity in the use of the one can justify the other, so no errors in the pursuit can possibly affect the true value of an object aimed at. In Captain Gardiner and his friends, or the Patagonian mission, I never heard till now; but I find and all who read his journal must find—that a most noble and lofty spirit has lately passed to its rest on the desolate shores of Terra del Fuego and I would fain desire that the luxurious and self-indulgent of this land should be helped to contrast their enervated life with his self-denying career—with all self-sacrifice, whether in Patagonia or St. Giles'—and to recognise that, in spite of every mistake in judgment, no Stephen beneath the showered stones, no Ridley or Latimer at the flaming stake, was ever more distinctly and unquestionably a martyr to the uncompromising sense of duty than he whose fearful death we now deplore. There need be little fear that many will be found to covet that fate, those miserable days prolonged without food or water, that friendless and unsupported death beside the boat, because he was too weak to crawl into; little fear, indeed, of a crush of candidates for such a lot; but much and just fear that many will turn with a scoff from the "injudicious" sufferer, and hug themselves anew in the consciousness that they are far too wise, too sensible, too prudent, ever to have acted his part; and thus the benefit of his example is lost. His loyalty and courage, his manly fortitude and uncomplaining endurances, are a legacy to his country, one of which his own fine profession may especially be proud—a profession which has never been more rich in such qualities than in the present day. Let such conduct ever be duly appreciated, in whatever cause, that if we do not go and do likewise, we may see to it that we in our own path do equally. The abandonment of home and country, wife and children, the braving of danger, privation, and death from a sense of duty, is no such trifling work that we can in any case afford to speak lightly of it. When done in the cause of science, however unsuccessfully, however uselessly, men gladly bring their tribute of applause and sympathy, as is testified by a subject now prominently before the public. No religious mission could be more vague or visionary than, to some minds, appear the Arctic expeditions; yet the sympathies of all parties freely go with the generous explorers, appreciating their conduct, judging it by its motive, not its result, and readily making allowance for the very different views which different minds will take of any given subject. Let us take this candour in deciding on the conduct of Captain Gardiner, and, in pronouncing on the brave dead, let our consciences reverently bear him this testimony—

He hath done what he could."

WATER SUPPLY OF THE METROPOLIS.

On Tuesday, after a lengthened investigation, which extended over seventy days, the committee of the House of Commons, to whom the question of the supply of London with water had been referred, adopted the following draft of a law on the subject, which comprises both the future regulation of the water companies and public supply of the metropolis. The cost of this inquiry is estimated at the rate of £1000 a day, including fees to 20 counsel, parliamentary agents, solicitors, conferences, publication of short-hand notes, and other matters. The provisions are understood to be satisfactory both to the promoters of the Government measure and to the various water companies, and no doubt will now be gone into seriatim by the committee. The bill of the Chelsea Water Company is now under consideration, and there are ten others to be taken. Owing, it is said, to the determined opposition of the com panies, the provisions are quite different from those proposed in the Government measure as originally brought in :—

Whereas it is expedient to make provision for securing the supply to the metropolis of pure and wholesome water, and otherwise to make further and better provision in relation to the water supply of the metropolis: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows :—

Clause 1. From and after the —— 1855, it shall not be lawful for any company to take for the supply of the metropolis, or of any part thereof, any water from any part of the River Thames below Teddington Lock, or from any part of any of the tributary rivers or streams of the river Thames below that point where the tide flows in such tributary rivers and streams respectively.

Clause 2. From and after the 31st day of December, 1855, every reservoir within a distance in a straight line from St. Paul's cathedral, in the city of London, of not more than five miles, in which water for the supply of the metropolis, or any part thereof, is stored or kept by any company, shall be roofed in, or otherwise covered over, provided always, that this provision shall not extend to any reservoir the water from which is subjected by the company to efficient filtration after its discharged from such reservoir, and before it is passed into the mains or pipes of the company for distribution, or to any reservoir in which the whole of the water from which is distributed through district mains or pipes for other than domestic purposes.

Clause 3. From and after the 31st day of December, 1855, no water shall be brought or conducted within the metropolis by any company for the purpose of domestic use otherwise than through pipes or through covered aqueducts, unless the same shall be afterwards filtered before distribution.

Clause 4 is to the following effect :—From and after the 30th day of August every company shall effectually filter all water supplied by them within the metropolis for domestic use before the same shall pass into the pipes for distribution

Clause 5 states that three months before any company shall resort to any new source of supply, such company shall give notice in writing thereof to the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Plantations, hereinafter called the Board of Trade; and thereupon, within one month after receipt of such notice, the said Board of Trade shall, if they think fit, appoint a competent person as an inspector, who shall report with respect to any sources then authorised by Parliament, whether the directions of the special act have been complied with in reference thereto; and with respect to any new sources, not authorised by Parliament, whether the same are capable of supplying good and wholesome water for domestic purposes

Clause 6 provides that the inspector so appointed as aforesaid shall, within ten days after such appointment, give notice in writing to the company thereof, and of the time at which he proposes to visit and inspect the sources.

Clause 7 directs that the Board of Trade shall, within twenty-one days after the receipt of the said inspector's report, send to such company, with respect to any such new sources of supply not authorised by Parliament, a certificate in writing of their approval or disapproval thereof; and, with respect to any such sources as shall then be authorised by Parliament, a notice in writing stating whether in the judgment of the said Board of Trade the directions of the special act have in reference thereto complied with.

Clause 8 specifies that in certain cases the matter may be referred to the Attorney-General

Clause 9 provides, that if at any time complaint as to the quantity or quality of the water supplied by any company for domestic use be made to the Board of Trade by memorial in writing, signed by not less than 20 inhabitant householders paying rates for and supplied with water by the company, it shall be lawful for the Board of Trade, at any time within one month after the receipt of such complaint, to appoint a competent person to inquire into and concerning the grounds of such complaint, and to report to the Board of Trade thereon.

Clause 10 stipulates that the person so appointed shall, within three days after such appointment, give notice thereof in writing to the company, and after such notice as aforesaid he shall have power to inspect and examine the waterworks of the company, and to inquire into and concerning the grounds of such complaint, and the company and their officers shall afford all reasonable facilities for such inspection, examination, and inquiry.

Clause 11 fixes the penalty for any person obstructing such inspector in the due prosecution of such inspection, examination, or inquiry, at any sum not exceeding £10.

Clause 12 directs that if, after receipt of such report, it shall appear to the Board of Trade that the said complaint is well founded, the Board of Trade sha l give notice thereof in writing to the company.

Clause 13 provides that if the company shall fail to remove the ground of complaint, the matter is to be referred to the Attorney-General.

Clause 14 makes it compulsory that every steam-engine, furnace, or other work in which coals shall be consumed by any company for the purpose of the waterworks, sha l be constructed on the most effectual principle for consuming its own smoke.

Clause 15 provides that after the expiration of five years from the passing of this act every company shall, subject to the provisions of the special act relating to such company, provide and keep in the district mains already laid down, or hereafter to be laid by them, a constant supply of pure and wholesome water, sufficient for the domestic use of the inhabitants of all houses supplied by such company, at such pressure as will make the water reach the top story of such houses, but not exceeding the level prescribed by the special act of such company.

Clause 16 provides that it shall be lawful for any company from time to time, with the approval of the Board of Trade, to make such regu ations as sha., be necessary or expedient for the purpose of preventing the waste or misuse of wa.e

The question of rates and tolls is to be determined in relation to the peculiar cases of the respective companies, to be inserted in the several bills.

PRICES FORMERLY AND NOW.—TEA.

From the highest to the lowest we are all interested in prices. The old-clothesman or the rag-dealer higgles with the housewife about the price of a worn-out coat or of kitchen stuff, very much after the fashion of a merchant bargaining for a cargo of sugar or tea, or a millionaire bidding for a ducal estate. Higher and lower still we trace the practice. At the beginning of a new reign, the people by their representatives, and the Sovereign by his Ministers, bargain and battle for a civil list, and higgle about the price which is to be paid for the pageant of Royalty. So the humble beggar, anxious to get as much to eat as he can for the alms he has received, will bargain with the baker for his oldest and stalest crust. Every service that man renders to man has its price, and tithes, dignities, incomes, peerages, salaries, and pensions are, like the halfpenny changed for a crust, or the shilling given for an old coat, the price paid by other men, settled a long time ago, perhaps, for services which the living or the next generation may estimate differently from their ancestors.

On a practice so universal much may be said. What use can the old-clothesman make of a worn-out coat? He rips it to pieces, finds some portions of it that serve to mend other garments, and these portions he sells: the other portions go to the rag-bag and to the shoddy-mill, the owner of which will give a reasonable price for them. In this mill all the wool that yet remains in the pieces is winnowed out from the dirt and grease, appropriately called devil's-dust, with which it has been caked and preserved, and is again spun into woollen yarn, and woven into woollen cloth, died scarlet or blue, sold from 2s. 6d. to 8s. 6d. a yard first cost, and sent to India, or employed to clothe her Majesty's or the East India Company's forces. The worn-out coat is worth more than the shilling to the old-clothesman, and is the material by which some men perform services in the process of manufacture for which other men pay, till in the end the soldiers are clothed that protect the nation. Transferred to a collector of grease, the kitchen-stuff may become a portion of the soap, part of a candle, or it may be made to yield some of the purest and finest oil that can be procured. It, too, has for the collector a greater price than he gave for it, which pays him for his labour. Whether the great—we may say enormous—prices paid at the other end of the scale are equally remunerative, is a large question to those who pay them a very large and important question into which we do not mean to enter: we merely allude to it to show the inexhaustible nature of the subject, and pass on to remind some of our readers and inform others of the great alterations which, from time to time, have taken place in the price of commodities very generally in use.

When tea, to begin with an article which almost every one uses, was introduced into Europe, in the early part of the 17th century, the price for a single pound was £10. The average price of repeat was then about 8s. 9d. per bushel; and, consequently, to obtain a pound of tea, the great feudal Barons of that period the only persons, probably, who could afford to make the purchase had to give forty bushels, or five quarters, of wheat. In 1660 tea was subjected to an excise duty, and its price had then fallen to 60s. per lb, or was equivalent to twelve bushels of wheat. In 1784, after the restoration of peace with America, when the country was flourishing and tranquil, and therefore a fit period for an intermediate comparison, the lowest price of congou, independent of duty and all retail charges, as will be all the prices now to be stated, was 3s. 1½d., the highest price 6s. 4d.; the lowest price of hyson was 4s. 10d., the highest 9s. 0d.; and the medium price was therefore 6s. At that period the price of a bushel of wheat was also 6s., and a pound of tea was therefore equivalent to a bushel of wheat At present, according to the price current in the Economist of January 31st, the lowest price of congou is 7½d., the highest 1s. 6d.; the lowest price of hyson is 10d., the highest 2s. 0d. The average price of bohea tea which sells 1d. or 2d. per pound lower than the lowest congou, but there is scarcely any that sells for a higher price than the best hyson. The medium price is 1s. 7d. The average price of wheat is now 5s. per bushel, and, consequently, one bushel of wheat will buy 3¼ lb. of tea. Compared with the very highest price mentioned, the very lowest (6d.) is less than the 60th part, or the fall of price is within a very small fraction of 100 per cent.; or, strictly, it has fallen to next to nothing. But leaving out of view the ridiculous price of £10, and even the well authenticated price of £3, the reduction in the price of tea since the time of 1784 is nearly 70 per cent, or more than two-thirds. In the same period the reduction in the price of wheat has been only 17 per cent.; and if it should turn out, as we believe it will, that the price of the greater number of things which the landowners and farmers purchase, has fallen in equal or greater proportion, they and the public at large will have to seek out some other cause to account for the fall in the price of wheat for the complaints of these classes.

The distinction above mentioned as having been in existence in 1784, between congou and hyson, and between different qualities of tea, conveys some information worthy of notice. At first there was only tea or one quality imported, or all the teas imported were lumped together under one name. At present there are forty-one different kinds or qualities of tea enumerated, not including assam tea, which is imported, though it appears not to find a sale. The list will be interesting to many readers, and we transcribe it from the circular of Messrs. Capel and Co., of January 22, 1852, with the prices of two years It will be seen that the prices at the close of 1849 were lower than the prices at the close of 1851, owing to excessive importations; but we have taken the prices of the present time as the fairest :—

In almost all other things there takes place a similar discrimination; and our readers will find cotton, coffee, timber, &c., which in common life are spoken of each as one, as it only the genus existed, divided in the actual business of the merchants into a great many species. There is a kind of natural history of the objects of trade, as well as of plants and animals, though the knowledge has not yet been collected in books and classified, and is confined to dealers and those who read their circulars. The increase, however, in the number of sorts and kinds is much more than the wonderful extension of the use of tea In 1661, Mr. Pepys, then Secretary to the Admiralty, "sent," as he recorded for the information of posterity, "for a cup of tea (a China drink), of which I had never drunk before." It was then only little known amongst the highest classes of the metropolis. At present the use of tea is universal: it gives a name to one of the most social and popular meals; it relieves the tired brain of the student, and imparts vigour to the almost worn-out washerwoman. To import it employs annually upwards of 100 great ships; in 1850—51 115 were despatched from Canton and Shanghae with tea and silk; last year no less than 71,647,202 lb. were imported, and no less than 63,644,102 lb. were consumed, yielding a revenue to the State of £5,587,927 8s. 10d. Of these 63,644,102 lb. upwards of 42 000,000 lb. were of the cheapest kind of tea; congou, of which the medium price was 1s. 0¾d.; and as the tax is 2s. 1d. per lb., it is very nearly 200 per cent. on the price. At that rate upwards of £4,000,000 is annually levied on the lowest priced teas, consumed by the bulk of the people. To estimate the amount of capital engaged in this vast trade, and the number of persons to whom it gives employment, including all those who build and navigate the ships that carry on the trade, all those who manufacture the articles exchanged for tea, and all those who distribute to retail it, is beyond our power, though such estimates are sometimes made. To us it seems the trade is so interwoven with the whole frame of society, that we may almost say all its growth and improvement since the first pound of tea was imported, in the beginning of the 17th century, is connected with the tea trade, and would scarcely have come into existence had it never been known. Into the moral effect of the use of tea it is as little our business now to enter as into the vast extent of the trade; we merely allude to it as binding in amity the most distant nations, and as helping to improve the manners of our people, substituting cheerful sobriety for boisterous, quarrelsome, disease-giving drunkenness. Our special object is only to show how much the leaf has decreased in price since it was first known, and how amazingly that decrease in price has contributed to extend the use of it, including as part of its effects a wonderful extension of trade, a vast increase of the wealth of the State, and an equally wonderful improvement in the moral condition of the people.

LARGE ARRIVAL OF SHIPS IN THE THAMES.—On Monday and Tuesday no fewer than 331 vessels of all classes arrived in the river, and were below the Custom-House. Of this number 139 were from foreign and colonial ports, and were in the aggregate, by the official returns, 31,075 tons burden; 15 of these were from India, China, Australia, and the Indian Archipelago, of tonnage varying from 400 to 1100; 25 from the British possessions in the West Indies, 5 from the Mediterranean, 2 from the Cape of Good Hope (including Algoa Bay), 4 from South America, 2 from the United States and British America, 3 from the Australian colonies, 8 from the Western Islands (Azores), 2 from the Levant, the northern ports of Spain, France, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Prussia, Russia, and Sweden; and in the latter number are included the steam-vessels trading to those countries. The remaining 192 vessels were coasters and fishers.

PRINTERS' DRAMATIC SOCIETY.—The second annual entertainment in aid of the funds of the Printers' Pension Society and the Almshouse Endowment Fund took place on Saturday night, under the distinguished patronage of his Royal Highness Prince Albert and the Duke of Cambridge, at the St. James's Theatre. The pieces selected for representation were Shakspeare's comedy of "Much Ado about Nothing," with "Catching a Heiress," a ballet divertissement, and an appropriate poetic address by Mr. Frasing, from the pen of R. H. Horne, Esq. The house was crowded in every part.

CONVICTS IN THE WEST INDIES.—The Governor of Guadaloupe has published a proclamation on the subject of the regulations to be observed at the island, when they become a penitentiary colony. No vessel will be allowed to approach within gunshot of the coast after sunset. Any vessel neglecting this order will have a warning gun fired from the fort; and if that is unattended to, she will be fired on.

THE NATIONAL DEBT.—The following is a return of the amount of capital of the national debt which did not pay the income-tax for the year 1850: £3 per Cent. Consolidated Annuities, £26,634,389 16s. 6d.; 3 per cent. Annuities, 1726, £176 4 2 8s.; New £5 per Cent. Annuities, £22,035 19s. 8d.; Reduced £3 per Cent. Annuities, £14,847,012 2s.; £3 5s. per Cent. Annuities, £1,241,515 1s.; Long Annuities, £74,216,693 10s. 9d. Terminable Annuities, £154,467 1s. 11d. Per account. The account is made up by the chief accountant of the Bank of England.

By a Parliamentary paper printed on Monday, it appears that the total amount of sales effected through the instrumentality of the Encumbered Estates Court in England up to the 1st February last, was £4,652,877 2s. 3d. The total number of estates, or parts of estates, sold was 559, and the number of lots sold 2966. The number of states acres sold was 658,328. The total amount distributed, including the sum of £237,931 4s. 9d. which was allowed to encumbrancers who became purchasers to the 31st of January, 1852, was £2,003,803. The amount actually distributed to the 31st January, 1852, to 9th March, 1852, including £39,406, which was allowed to purchasers who became encumbrancers, was £248,505, making a total allowed to encumbrancers of £277,428. The cash payments made by the Commissioners amounted to £1,871,029 19s 1d.

William Wright, the driver of the Conway carriage No. 9111, was a few days ago called off his stand at Canonbury to convey a gentleman to the London Docks. In the evening, after his day's work, upon shaking his mat, he perceived a pocket-book drop from it on the ground. In the pocket-book contained five £10 notes and six sovereigns, all of which the driver immediately delivered up at the police-court, Broad-street. The owner, who was soon discovered, upon receiving his property, presented the driver with the reward of £16.

The whole of the contents of a large number of packages which arrived a few days since from Treport, in France, and containing a large amount of valuable property, have arrived at Claremont, and been placed in the illustrious owners at that place. They included a very considerable portion of the contents of the Château d'Eu, and we believe comprised much-valued portraits of the late King Louis Philippe, and the numerous members of the Orleans family. A further consignment of property belonging to the heirs of the late ex-King of the French, Louis Philippe, has taken place.

NARRATIVE of a RESIDENCE at the CAPITAL of the KINGDOM of SIAM: with a Description of the Manners, Customs, and Laws of the Modern Siamese. By F. A. NEALE, Author of "Eight Years in Syria," &c. 227, Strand.

The publishers of the NATIONAL ILLUSTRATED LIBRARY, of which this work forms the fifteenth volume, have chosen a very appropriate time to bring it under the notice of the public. While the merchants and manufacturers of Manchester, ever on the watch for new outlets for the produce of British industry, have successfully memorialised the Government to make some commercial treaty with the King of Siam, and the Government have instructed Sir James Brooke to proceed to Siam on an embassy for that purpose, the public will doubtless welcome this book, which gives, more fully and faithfully than any modern work on the subject with which we are acquainted, an account of the natural resources of Siam which British enterprise wants to develope, and of the character and habits of the Siamese people, whom the Manchester manufacturers want to get as customers. Besides, Siam lies between China on the one hand, and the Burmese Empire, with which we are now at war, on the other; it has petty Kings tributary to it down the peninsula of Malacca, and close to our settlements at Singapore and Penang; and, sooner or later, we must have to deal with the Siamese as close neighbours, to be regarded as friends or foes. Should the conduct of the Burmese be such as to compel us to take possession of their country, Siam will be the only independent state between our boundary of the Indus on the west and Hong-Kong on the east.

The author of this work is well qualified to write it, from the fact of his having resided for a considerable time in the country, of his having mixed in almost all the society that the Siamese capital affords, seen nearly all the "lions" of the kingdom, and served in both the army and navy of the Siamese. The work is written in an easy, smartly flowing style, interspersed with interesting sketches of customs and habits, and accounts of personal adventures both by land and sea. It contains some very vivid pictures of the typhoons in the China Seas, an interesting as well as amusing account of a Siamese festival; a Siamese legend, wonderful as a story of the "Thousand and One Nights;" some curious specimens of Siamese songs; and a very graphic description of the white or sacred elephants of Siam.

CHOU-PAA, THE REIGNING PRINCE OF SIAM.

The country is described by the author as "rich in its soil and productions—possessed of valuable mines and gums, spices, and pepper, the best and cheapest rice and sugars, and the land absolutely encumbered with the most luscious fruit in the world." The cupidity of the kings has hitherto proved a barrier to profitable intercourse with Europeans; but the reigning Prince is said to have "often confidentially hinted that he prayed to see the day arrive when the gates of Siamese commerce might be opened to the world at large." The habits of this Prince, of whom we give a portrait, are thus described:

"The Prince had some favourites that had picked up a little spluttering of English, and assisted him in his more scientific amusements. Opposite the armoury, and just on the very threshold of his palace, was a very pretty little fancy-house, surrounded with glass windows, and over the entrance door to which was placed a board with the inscription of "Watches and Clocks made and repaired here," written in large letters of gold; and here would he be seen, seated at a table that was liberally bestrewed with fragments and little mites of wheels, pursuing his favourite occupation of watchmaker. It was a strange sight in such an out-of-the-way place as Bangkok, and amongst such a set of uncouth beings as the Siamese, to come suddenly upon the strange figure the Prince presented, with a pair of huge goggles protruding from his eyes, and surrounded by a group of inquisitive and inquiring favourites. Watch-making and repairing were, perhaps, of about the time that the King's trumpet gave notice that he had had breakfast, and then the Prince retired to the harem, to partake of that pleasant meal also. But he was a frugal man, and was never long seated at a meal except upon occasions as he had any Europeans to dine with him, and then he adopted the English fashion of sitting long at table.

Prince Chou-Faa would generally spend an hour or more in his library, which was well and even handsomely fitted up, and contained some valuable books on various topics of literature and science; and of an evening a little exercise, either on horseback or a row up the river, to inhale the fresh and invigorating evening breeze—never more specially, or which none can better enjoy than those subjected to the relaxing heats of an Indian clime. Night closed in, and the Prince, in his brilliantly lighted palace, partook of tea and bread and butter, "a l'Anglaise," and billiards, cards, or bagatelle filled up the moments between ten-time and ten o'clock, the hour at which Chou-Faa invariably retired for the night. Occasionally, and especially if any European were passing the evening with him, the Prince gave us a tune on the flute; for amongst his really manifold accomplishments, he was a good musician, and I have heard him execute "Deh coote," with variations, in a style to be by no means sneered at.

The work is profusely illustrated by engravings from original drawings, and embellished with a very meritorious map of Siam.

THE JESUITS.—Considerable excitement seems to prevail just now regarding the movement for causing the act of George IV., passed in the tenth year of his reign, to be put in rigid force, which require all Jesuits and other similar orders to register themselves in a given time. Several meetings have been held, and petitions adopted to both Houses of Parliament.

THE CHESS TOURNAMENT.

A COLLECTION of the GAMES PLAYED at this CELEBRATED ASSEMBLAGE, &c. With Notes, Critical and Explanatory, by H. STAUNTON, Esq. Bohn's Scientific Library. London: 1852.

The Literature of Chess has begun to occupy a position of considerable prominence, and to exercise a wider influence than is perhaps suspected by those whose attention has not been specially directed to the subject. It has estab ished its regular periodicals both in this country and on the Continent, and almost every month sees new additions to its stores; nor need we be any doubt that at this moment it boasts a more devoted band of adherents, and calls out a greater amount of mental effort than anything in the shape of an amusement has ever before done. There may doubtless be some who look upon such a fact with concern, who see in it only another proof of the degeneracy of the age, and who, while admitting it, perhaps, to be one degree less dangerous and alarming than the prevalence of the gaming-table, yet view it as partaking of the same nature and tinctured with the same evil results.

From any such view of the case we entirely dissent, and are prepared to maintain not merely the innocence of the pursuit as a relaxation and change from more serious occupations, but its value as a mental exercise and discipline. We apprehend it to be capable of the clearest demonstration, that no severer intellectual study can be engaged in and pursued without leaving behind it a marked advantage from the process; and unquestionably one of the most valuable results of the acquisition of any branch of science is to be found not so much in the positive fact of the knowledge acquired as in the process of mental training which has been gone through in attaining it. In this point of view we are inclined to consider the game of chess as of considerable importance, and to claim for it a position closely analogous to that of mathematical science, the study which has always been justly regarded as most powerfully adding to the strength and exactness of the logical faculties. We rejoice to see the ranks of its admirers becoming rapidly more numerous, and view it as a decidedly favourable symptom, that an amusement which consists in purely mental and abstract calculations should in any degree supersede the exciting and pernicious pursuits which are presided over by chance.

It is to one individual, certainly, that the chess-players of the present generation more deeply indebted than to the editor of the volume at the head of this article, who for many years past, in a variety of ways, has devoted his abilities to their improvement and information; and the "Book of the Tournament"—a book equally valuable and unique—will be to them at once an interesting and useful accession to their libraries, and a record of his persevering zeal in their service. It cannot be necessary for us here to explain with any particularity the circumstances which have called it forth.

Our readers are aware that the idea of an assembly of all the chief chess-players of the world, long contemplated as desirable though impracticable, was brought actively and vigorously forward by the leading members of the St. George's Club on the occasion of the late Great Exhibition, and that in spite of all opposition and difficulty the scheme was eventually matured and became successful. Many of the best known names in chess from all parts of Europe, hitherto strangers to each other, were for the first time brought together, and in a series of exciting contests proved the target of each other's weapons. The volume before us is the result of this singular gathering, and contains a full account of all its circumstances and preliminaries, with an exact record of all the games, and a most valuable commentary of notes by Mr. Staunton.

The chief part of the introductory observations are unfortunately but perhaps necessarily directed to a review of the difficulties and opposition with which the committee had to contend in their efforts for the promotion of their object, and especially to the course adopted by the London Club in first refusing to aid the undertaking and then in actively opposing it. We approach this part of the subject with extreme reluctance; nor shall we dwell upon it further than to express the opinion which, in common we believe with most unbiassed observers, we have formed respecting it. Now that the heats and animosities of the contest are, or at least ought to be, passing away, we should be unwilling to say a word that might embitter or prolong them, but justice seems to require that the circumstances should not be overlooked. It appears to us, then, that the statement of facts which Mr. Staunton has made, which, so far as we know, are unimpeached, places the London Club completely in the wrong, and we are at a loss to imagine by what motives they can have been induced to take up an untenable a position. Their best friends must most regret the false step they have taken, and the pernicious counsels by which they have allowed themselves to be guided. It is, we fear, too evident that a foolish spirit of exclusiveness, or a petty dread of the superior influence of the St. George's Club, has been sufficient to call up this spirit of discord, and to lead the London Club, under the guidance of false teachers, to peril their reputation and their usefulness in this fruitless crusade against an object which the remainder of the chess world received with universal approbation.

But we gladly pass on to more agreeable topics. Despite all attempts to destroy it, the Chess Tournament was held as originally proposed; and when the names of those who took part in the principal series of matches is called to mind, it must be admitted that it obtained a high degree of success. Szen, the well-known veteran of Hungary, and his countryman (perhaps equally skilful), Lowenthal; Kieseritzky, as the delegate of France; Andersen, of Germany, destined to be the chief prize-bearer in the ensuing conflict, with Mayet Horwitz, and Lowe, formed unquestionably a phalanx of no ordinary power, and were not unworthily opposed by their English competitors.

The result of the contest was unquestionably in many cases a very unexpected one, both as regards the order in which the prize-bearers stood and the list of the losers; and there can be no doubt, that, highly interesting as the encounter was, it could only yield a very uncertain indication of the actual relative merit of the players. For, in the first place, it is quite obvious that the principle of pairing by ballot, however unexceptionable as to fairness, involves the great uncertainty, that two very good or very inferior players falling together, in the one case one of the best players is necessarily excluded from any further competition, and, in the other, one of the worst becomes a prize-bearer. This is too clear to admit of dispute; and, as Mr. Staunton observes, was strikingly illustrated "in the instance of Kieseritzky and Andersen, two of the most eminent professors of the day:" and was equally shown, on the other hand, in the case of Mr. Mucklow and Mr. E. S. Kennedy, where the former became entitled to a prize. We have all along regarded this mode of arrangement as a great mistake on the part of the managing committee, and one which we have no doubt will be rectified, (as it easily might be) in any future similar contest.

In the next place, an unanswerable objection to our regarding the result as any exact criterion of skill, arises from the small number of games played in each series. This difficulty was, indeed, pointed out at an early period by Mr. Staunton, and in the latter part of the match was partially remedied by substituting a majority out of seven games, instead of three, as the winning number. We think, however, that, to a great extent, it was inseparable from the mode of pairing already alluded to, and of disentitling the losers to any further part in the contest; because it is evident that to play a sufficient number of games in each series, would have required a much greater expenditure of time than the foreign players especially could have been expected to give. The objection, however, still remains in all its force. It is unquestionably known that, in meeting with a new antagonist, considerable time and practice are requisite before he can apportion the relative forces. He knows how often, in first encounters, he has been worsted by a player of superior power, or who mistook on the part of the managing committee, and one which we have no doubt will be rectified, (as it easily might be) in any future similar contest.

He knows how often, in first encounters, he has been worsted by a player of superior power, or who mistook the character and habits of the Siamese people, whom the Manchester manufacturers want to get as customers. Besides, Siam lies between China on the one hand, and the Burmese Empire, with which we are now at war, on the other; it has petty Kings tributary to it down the peninsula of Malacca, and close to our settlements at Singapore and Penang; and, sooner or later, we must have to deal with the Siamese as close neighbours, to be regarded as friends or foes. Should the conduct of the Burmese be such as to compel us to take possession of their country, Siam will be the only independent state between our boundary of the Indus on the west and Hong-Kong on the east.

The author of this work is well qualified to write it, from the fact of his having resided for a considerable time in the country, of his having mixed in almost all the society that the Siamese capital affords, seen nearly all the "lions" of the kingdom, and served in both the army and navy of the Siamese. The work is written in an easy, smartly flowing style, interspersed with interesting sketches of customs and habits, and accounts of personal adventures both by land and sea. It contains some very vivid pictures of the typhoons in the China Seas, an interesting as well as amusing account of a Siamese festival; a Siamese legend, wonderful as a story of the "Thousand and One Nights;" some curious specimens of Siamese songs; and a very graphic description of the white or sacred elephants of Siam.

CHOU-PAA, THE REIGNING PRINCE OF SIAM.

The country is described by the author as "rich in its soil and productions—possessed of valuable mines and gums, spices, and pepper, the best and cheapest rice and sugars, and the land absolutely encumbered with the most luscious fruit in the world." The cupidity of the kings has hitherto proved a barrier to profitable intercourse with Europeans; but the reigning Prince is said to have "often confidentially hinted that he prayed to see the day arrive when the gates of Siamese commerce might be opened to the world at large." The habits of this Prince, of whom we give a portrait, are thus described:

"The Prince had some favourites that had picked up a little spluttering of English, and assisted him in his more scientific amusements. Opposite the armoury, and just on the very threshold of his palace, was a very pretty little fancy-house, surrounded with glass windows, and over the entrance door to which was placed a board with the inscription of "Watches and Clocks made and repaired here," written in large letters of gold; and here would he be seen, seated at a table that was liberally bestrewed with fragments and little mites of wheels, pursuing his favourite occupation of watchmaker. It was a strange sight in such an out-of-the-way place as Bangkok, and amongst such a set of uncouth beings as the Siamese, to come suddenly upon the strange figure the Prince presented, with a pair of huge goggles protruding from his eyes, and surrounded by a group of inquisitive and inquiring favourites. Watch-making and repairing were, perhaps, of about the time that the King's trumpet gave notice that he had had breakfast, and then the Prince retired to the harem, to partake of that pleasant meal also. But he was a frugal man, and was never long seated at a meal except upon occasions as he had any Europeans to dine with him, and then he adopted the English fashion of sitting long at table.

in his play." Mr. Horwitz, indeed, seldom or never does himself justice in set matches. Whether from too great excitability, and consequent rapidity of style, we know not; but this is clearly the fact, as is shown not merely in the games before us, but in his previous encounters with Harrwitz and others.

As to Herr Anderrsen there can be but one opinion, we think, as to the ability he displayed. He is, besides, a first-rate match-player. Throughout the whole, his imperturbable sang froid and coolness were the subject of general remark. His honours were fairly won; but his absolute superiority over at least one of his rivals we take leave to question, until it is established by a more even and a longer struggle.

We have not space to refer in detail to the matches of the provincial players, which added materially to the interest of the proceedings, and for which ten gentlemen contended. In this case the first prize fell to the lot of Mr. Boden, of Hull, whose play was certainly of a high order of merit; and the remaining three prizes to Mr. Banken, of Oxford, Mr. Hodges, of Reading, and Mr. Brien, of Oxford. Although the games in this section are decidedly inferior in care and elaborateness to the former, many of them are highly creditable specimens of skill.

The Tournament was appropriately closed by a series of matches appointed by the committee between several eminent players, and in which Staunton, Jaenisch, Williams, Horwitz, Bird, Löwenthal, Buckle, Deacon, and Lowe took part. On the opportunity of joining in the early proceedings, took an active part in them. We allude, of course, to Mr. Buckle, one of the very first of our English amateurs; and to Major Jaenisch, so well and favourably known by his admirable "Analyse," a most original and elaborate treatise on the openings of games at chess. For the particulars of the games themselves, we must refer our readers to Mr. Staunton's volume, which we confidently anticipate no lover of chess will long be without. We have only now cordially to thank this gentleman for the labour he has bestowed in editing and preparing for the press this record. Any one in the slightest degree conversant with the subject must see at once that his has been no sinecure office; and, in fact, when we look at the mass of notes which he has given us—many of which must singly have cost hours and hours of hard labour—we feel that nothing but genuine enthusiasm in the cause could have induced him to undertake the task. These notes are unquestionably one of the most valuable parts of the work. Without them, few amateurs would have attempted carefully to examine the games; with them, it is a matter of comparative ease, and of incalculably greater profit. A great part of the more remarkable and critical positions are also displayed on diagrams; thus at once giving to them a permanent form, and most materially lessening the labour of the student. Whatever difference of opinion may exist upon other points, there can be none as to the ability and care with which Mr Staunton has executed this part of his duty, and which will, we have no doubt, be fully appreciated by the chess community.

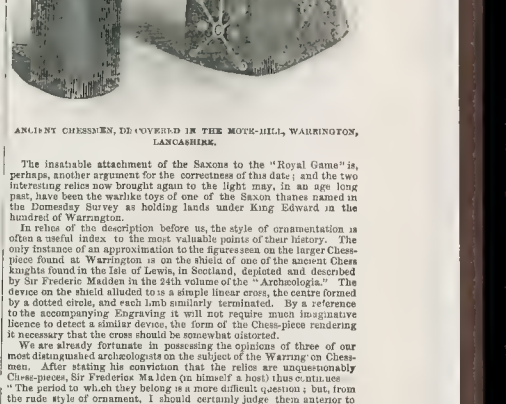
TWO ANCIENT CHESSMEN, DISCOVERED IN THE MOTE-HILL, WARRINGTON, LANCASHIRE.

(Exhibited at a General Meeting of the Lancashire and Cheshire Historic Society, held at Liverpool on the 16th of April, 1852.)

THE interesting relics of which the accompanying Engraving affords an accurate delineation, were found, at intervals of several years apart (1841 and 1851), in an earthen mound or tumulus, known as the Mote-hill, a few hundred yards to the east of the parish church of Warrington, in Lancashire. All the antiquarian authorities to whom they have been shewn agree that they are ancient Chessmen, and that many points of interest are involved in the question of their age and country.

The pieces are formed of remarkably fine jet or "brown-coal," a fossilised lignous product, and similar in quality to that obtained from the aluminous shale in Yorkshire, where it is employed, even to the present day, in the manufacture of ornamental articles. It is likewise found abundantly in France, Saxony, and Prussia. Mr. Fosbroke, in his "Encyclopædia of Antiquities," states that prior to the Christian era the Britons were in the habit of carving rings and beads from this material, ornamenting them on the outside with imperfect circles scratched upon them by some hard instrument.

The close affinity which this description bears to the present relics would at first view carry us back to this period of our history for their origin; but all authorities are unanimous in considering that the game of Chess was introduced into this country by the Danes, in the reign of Canute. A date farther back than this, therefore, we cannot assign to them.



ANCIENT CHESSMEN, DISCOVERED IN THE MOTE-HILL, WARRINGTON, LANCASHIRE.

The insatiable attachment of the Saxons to the "Royal Game" is, perhaps, another argument for the correctness of this date; and the two interesting relics now brought again to the light may, in an age long past, have been the warlike toys of one of the Saxon thanes named in the Domesday Survey as holding lands under King Edward in the hundred of Warrington.

The relics of this description before us, the style of ornamentation is often a useful index to the most valuable points of their history. The only instance of an approximation to the figures seen on the larger Chess-piece found at Warrington is on the shield of one of the ancient Chess knights found in the Isle of Lewis, in Scotland, depicted and described by Sir Frederic Madden in the 24th volume of the "Archæologia." The device on the shield alluded to is a simple linear cross, the centre formed by a dotted circle, and each limb similarly terminated. By a reference to the accompanying Engraving it will not require much imaginative faculties to detect a similar device, the form of the Chess-piece rendering it necessary that the cross should be somewhat distorted.

We are already fortunate in possessing the opinions of three of our most distinguished archæologists on the subject of the Warrington Chessmen. After stating his conviction that the relics are unquestionably Chess-pieces, Sir Frederick Madden (in himself a host) thus continues:

"The period to which they belong is a more difficult question; but, from the rude style of ornament, I should certainly judge them anterior to the twelfth century, and perhaps as early as the tenth. * * * The workmanship of the pieces found at Warrington is so rude that they may have been executed by a Scandinavian, an Anglo-Saxon, or a German hand; and no doubt the history and supply of the material of which they are made (as in the case of the Lewis Chessmen, made of the teeth of the walrus) would have considerable weight in determining the people by whom they were cut and engraved." Mr. Charles Roach Smith says "the Chessmen may be as old as the ninth or tenth century. At the same time they may be as late as the twelfth. I should not think they are of a date much more recent than the latter, and it is more likely they are older." Mr Albert Way concurs with Mr. Roach Smith in the date which he assigns to the relics, and further considers them undeniably the fabrication of this country, and not of its foreign invaders.

HENSON'S PATENT RAIL.—Mr. Henson, of the London and North-Western Railway, whose covered waggons have already associated his name with the most valuable improvements in rolling stock, has devised a mode of construction for rails, by which greater stability, with an equal amount of elasticity, is gained, and a saving caused at the same time of the serious expense attendant on the old system of laying the rails on rigid bearings, as well as the enormous amount of wear and tear and injury to the locomotives and rolling stock. This rail is of a concave form, expanding at the base, and therefore, as it were, self-sustaining. In place of going crosswise, like a bar-bridge, from one sleeper

H.M. CORVETTE "AMAZON," IN A SQUALL.

HER MAJESTY'S SHIP "AMAZON."

CONSIDERABLE interest is attached to the return of the Amazon, 26, Capt. Barker, with 58 survivors of the lamentable wreck of the Birkenhead.

The Amazon arrived at Spithead this morning from the China station and the Cape of Good Hope. She is 95 days out from Trincomalee, and has run over a distance of 14,076 miles during her commission. She has had perpetual summer the whole of her time, having been two summers at Hong Kong, the intermediate time being the summer season in the Straits of Malacca, with Capt. Broughton as senior officer, the remainder has been on the Singapore station, with Captain Barker as senior officer.

The Amazon sailed for Trincomalee on the 24th of January, and arrived at the Cape on the evening of the 2d of March, and sailed on the afternoon of the 7th. The Castor and Rhadamanthus were at anchor in Simon's Bay, and the Styx in Table Bay. While at Simon's Bay, she received on board 68 officers, seamen, marines, and boys, being the survivors of the Birkenhead, whom she has brought to England. She arrived at St Helena on the morning of the 16th ult., and sailed on the afternoon of the same day. She arrived at Ascension on the morning of Sunday, the 21st, where she was detained until Monday afternoon to bring home eight invalids, five of whom were engaged and wounded in the expedition against Lagos.

About eight o'clock on the evening of the 30th March, being in latitude 2 deg. N., longitude 21 deg. 40 min. W., the Amazon, being nearly becalmed, was struck by a sudden squall, which made her heel over nearly 25 deg. She had at the time thirteen sails set, out of which eight were split, viz. fore royal, fore topgallant-sail, fore topmast studding-sail, jib and flying jib, main royal, main topgallant and main-sails, mizen topsail, and topgallant-sails.

We are indebted to our obliging Correspondent for the accompanying Sketch of the vessel.

PATENT ANCHORS.—Six anchors have been landed at Woolwich dockyard, to contest the claim for superiority asserted by the several inventors. Monday and Tuesday they were subjected to the preliminary proof strain to entitle them to be transmitted to Sheerness, there to undergo a series of practical tests and trials in order to ascertain their relative holding powers, in presence of a committee of six naval officers selected by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and six of our most eminent shipowners, whose province it will be to select and determine by their verdict which possesses the greatest claim for future patronage. As soon as the holding properties of each are determined, they will again be sent to Woolwich to test their utmost strength by the hydraulic machine constructed for that purpose, strength and holding power being the two great essentials required in an anchor. The following is a brief summary of each invention. One made by Brown, Lennox, and Co., differs from the Admiralty anchor in section and length of shank, with a spear-shaped palm; another, by the same makers, patented by an American gentleman named Isaacs, somewhat complicated, with the view to avoid fouling. A Mr. Mitcheson has produced a very creditable anchor, made by David Rolsgrove, of Sunderland. Lieutenant Rogers has two, made by Fox, Henderson, and Co., same as exhibited by him in Hyde Park, one being a kedge. Mr. Hurlbutt and a Mr. Trotman have one each, combining many advantages, and made by Wood Brothers, of Liverpool and Stourbridge, who have obtained considerable renown in the manufacture of chain cables, for the superiority of which the Great Exhibition medal was awarded them.

EMIGRATION FROM LIVERPOOL.—The number of emigrants despatched from Liverpool for the United States during the last month was 26,492, the largest number that ever sailed in one month. The next greatest number was in the corresponding month of last year, when 24,000 and upwards left that port. The increase in April as compared with March was about 1000. The greater proportion of the emigrants are German and Irish, chiefly agricultural labourers. The emigration for Australia by means of Government aid is also very considerable. Between the 7th and 26th of last month three vessels with 926 emigrants sailed from the depôt at Birkenhead, and on the 12th and 18th instant two large ships will sail thence for Australia with about 1300 emigrants.

NATIONAL EXHIBITION OF ARTS, MANUFACTURES AND MATERIALS, TO BE HELD AT CORK.

FROM the accompanying Sketch, as well as the daily reports, it will be perceived that the Building for this Great Exhibition is progressing; likewise the list of subscriptions from the wealthy and powerful of the land. This week we find, amongst other names, those of the Duke of Devonshire and the Earl of Derby. Gratifying as these manifestations in favour of the movement must be to the original promoters of the Exhibition, a still more welcome result is the fact of the unprecedented (in Ireland) unanimity which pervades all classes, sections, and divisions of the entire country. Thus we find north and south, east and west contributing, not alone objects to fill the vacant space in its vast halls, but also large sums to aid the objects of the promoters.

Our View represents the entire vista seen through the circular end of the Building, and looking into the great hall, which is 250 feet, with 72 feet wide and 65 feet high. As will be seen, large numbers of workmen are employed, and the architects, J. Benson, Esq., and Sir Thomas Deane, who are most unremitting in their attendance, state that no doubt exists as to the certainty of the Building being ready to open as originally intended, on the 10th of June.

THE FRENCH MILITARY FESTIVAL.

THE populace of every country is fond of a show; but more than any other populace, and more than any other show, spectacle, or celebration whatsoever, the French love an assemblage of troops. "The pride, pomp, and circumstance" of mimic war are their delight. From his very earliest boyhood the Frenchman is a soldier. As an infant he wears a lilliputian uniform. He sports the shako, the belt, and the sword when he is scarcely able to run; when at school he wears a military cap, and is subjected to military discipline; when his beard and moustache are nascent, if not visible, his mental pabulum is of the battles of Napoleon, and of the deeds of the plebeian heroes who became Marshals of France, or of the sons of innkeepers who founded dynasties or swayed the destinies of the world. When a full-grown man, he is as much, if not better, acquainted with the talk and the manners of the barrack and of the guard-room than with those of the shop and the counting-house. In Paris or in the provinces, in high life or in low life, it is the same. The wars of Napoleon have demoralised the character of the nation. The miserable peasant proprietor glows at the recollection of the deeds of the "little corporal" and the "capote grise;" and the man of the town, who ought to be attending to his business, instead of leaving it to the almost exclusive care and control of his wife, smokes and plays at dominoes and billiards among soldiers and National Guards when he is idle, and mounts guard himself when no other business more pressing calls him from his semi-military haunts and his extravagant waste of time.

This military mania of the French, to our thinking, has met its due and fitting reward. Sindbad has got his master. The French are saddled, and bridled, and ridden by the most rigid, cold-blooded, and unrelenting military despotism that ever afflicted that or any other nation. The least that the despot can do is to give his people an occasional show of the kind that they esteem and applaud most highly. Nothing could more admirably answer his purposes. Their vanity, their love of display, and their appreciation of the picturesque and the theatrical, are alike flattered by it. The dilettanti of all ranks and conditions, all ages and sexes, approve of such scenes, as much as they would of a new grand opera of Meyerbeer, and for about the same reasons. The waving of banners, the firing of cannon, the steady march of the plumed array, the prancing and wheeling of squadrons, the glittering of lances, and bayonets, and swords, and the sound of military music, are circumstances that even singly have a powerful effect upon imaginations more torpid than those of the modern Gauls; but when all these circumstances are combined, and when the enthusiasm of the dominant and military class is excited to the highest pitch, the frenzy spreads from the soldiery to the crowd. Under such a contagion of enthusiasm the French would applaud the founder and cause of the spectacle were he ten times more ferocious than a Nero, or fifty times more depraved than a Heliogabalus. Louis Napoleon knows the military mania of his nation. It is an element of which he has duly calculated the powers and the capabilities, and without which he could not govern the State, or even retain his position for a day. He has made the most of it; and, as a man of the world, it will be generally admitted that he has not acted without reason.

Few people will be surprised that the great military festival of Monday last was planned, or that it was witnessed with such delighted approbation. If it has had no such result as the proclamation of the Empire by the soldiery — which was certainly possible, and perhaps desired—it has, at least, had the effect of gratifying a national taste, and of proving that the grim power which can afford to consign all the real fighting chiefs of the army to exile and to disgrace, has not yet reached its culmination. Every Government in that country, whatever its origin or its pretensions must administer to the popular taste for show, or incur the risk of falling into disrepute. Unhappily for King Louis Philippe and the fortunes of the House of Orleans, his grandest display was the funeral and apotheosis of the bones of a man that might far better have been left in their first resting-place in St. Helena; but even that misjudged celebration answered its purpose for a time. Great was the show, great was the moral, and great was the apparent and temporary profit. The festivals of M. Ledru-Rollin were better planned, and more successful but the more recent display of Louis Napoleon has been better than all, and we know of no reason why Europe should be particularly dissatisfied at it. If the French prefer a fierce and foul bird of prey for their national emblem, instead of the more harmless and domestic, although vainglorious, cock, in which Louis Philippe delighted, let them have it. There is none to say them nay; and as they have got their eagle in due form, and with the ceremonies that their hearts desire, we wish them joy of it. The bird of plunder is once again emblazoned on the banners and on the buttons of a country that knows not how to be peaceable, and that, in spite of the warnings of ages, and the miseries of her people, bent under the load of fiscal and social miseries, produced by her bygone wars with Europe, aspires, in an age of science, trade, and manufactures, to imitate the savage glories of the Roman Empire, and to lord it over the world. As long as they keep their emblem to themselves, the wiser world on this side of the Straits of Dover will make them heartily welcome to it.

Yet Louis Napoleon, while apparently desirous that foreign nations should not think the real Imperial eagle more formidable than the sham and tame bird which years ago he carried in the steamboat from London to Boulogne, is compelled by the dramatic necessities of his position to dilate upon the subject of the wars and the "glory" which alone give the emblem its significance. The prayers of an Archbishop, the "Hymn to the Creator," the solemn "Mass of the Holy Ghost," the sprinkling of the flags with holy water, though sadly in disaccordance with English common-sense and with our philosophical notions of true religion, are quite in unison with French ideas. Their god is the god of armies. The "glory" of France is the subjugation of the world; and "war," in the modern French idiom, means conquest, not legitimate self-defence. "Nations, like armies," said the President, "entertain a religious veneration for those emblems of military honour which sum up in themselves a past of trials and misfortunes;" and, as far as the world is enabled to judge, the spectators approved of the religious, quite as much as of the military, part of the spectacle, and approved the theology equally with the strategy displayed on the Champ de Mars. Indeed, the Archbishop, who officiated on the occasion, might fill the office of a priest in the temple of Mars with far more propriety than the more holy and Christian office which he assumed, but did not merit, when he so solemnly blessed the eagles—"those Roman eagles which," to quote the words of the President, "were adopted by the Emperor Napoleon at the commencement of the present century as the most striking signification of the regeneration and grandeur of France." No doubt France claims to be a Christian country, and is so to some extent; but Louis Napoleon's address to his army, and the religious feeling expressed by him, expounded by the Archbishop, and responded to by the soldiery, if not by the spectators, is as Pagan in spirit as if it had happened in Greece or in Rome three centuries before the Christian era.

Nevertheless it appears from all accounts to have been a fine operatic spectacle. We recommend it for the imitation of Mr. Lumley; and if Mdlle. Wagner, wise with the wisdom learned in the Court of Chancery, would but sing in a similar piece upon the stage, it might be made a grand coup for Her Majesty's or for any other theatre.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.—THE FETES DES AIGLES.

The 10th of May, which, according to the provisions of the Constitution of 1848, was to have seen Louis Napoleon descend from the supreme office of President of the Republic into the ranks of private life, has witnessed, amidst all "the pomp and circumstance of glorious war," his entrance upon a career of sovereign sway, which is in fact, as it will soon become in name, the restoration of the Empire under Napoleon II.

The "Feast of the Eagles," in the Champ de Mars at Paris, on Monday, was one of those gorgeous spectacles which the French, above all others, are so skilled in creating, and so well know how to enjoy; and as it was very magnificent in its military display, and therefore very flattering to the national vanity, was the most successful point of national character—military glory—the people entered into the spirit of the occasion with the utmost zest and earnestness; but, as an appeal to the army for its favour and support towards the accomplishment of the Imperial views which Louis Napoleon is generally considered to entertain, several of the various accounts which have been published would lead to the belief that it has not been quite successful, the enthusiasm displayed by the troops for Napoleon "the Nephew" being, according to some, of the most moderate character, while, according to others, it was of the most decided and zealous kind—the absence of all cries and vivats from the ranks of the artillery (the most intelligent section of the army) —being, however, remarked on by all as somewhat ominous.

The fête itself, however, was brilliant in the extreme, and the weather was most propitious, a bright warm sun illuminating the picturesque pageant throughout the day.

The Champ de Mars, which has been the theatre of so many similar pageants since the terrible days of the great Revolution, stretches in the form of a parallelogram, upwards of two-thirds of a mile in length, from the Ecole Militaire to the Pont de Jena on the Seine; and here were massed together the 60,000 or 70,000 troops who were the actors in the pageant. The coup d'œil was grand and imposing in the highest degree.

From daybreak a vast multitude, more curious to witness the show than attracted by enthusiasm, gathered on the grassy ramparts, shaded by elms, which flank the long parallelogram on the side of the Invalides, and on the opposite side towards Grenelle. By a popular regard for the convenience of the people on foot, the range of stands was restricted to the southern portion of the long square towards the Ecole Militaire. The immense area stretching thence to the Pont de Jena was surrounded by nearly half a million spectators. A multitude outnumbering the population of some of the largest capitals of Europe was crowded in the stands of the amphitheatre erected for the occasion, or stood densely massed on foot on the borders of the square unobstructed by these temporary buildings. All round the square, from space to space, were planted flag-staffs, from whose tops streamed broad tricoloured pennons, while half-way up they bore shields with the cipher of Louis Napoleon, adorned with a group of flags of the national colours. The stands were similarly ornamented, every column which supported the awnings being surmounted by a group of tricoloured banners.

The end of the Champ de Mars furthest from the river, and closed by the Ecole Militaire, a stately pile, erected in the middle of the last century, and now used as barracks, was occupied by the light and elegant theatre of evolutions, consisting of balconies, galleries, and pavilions, erected for the President, his court, and the great bodies of the state and their families. Before the centre of the façade of the Ecole Militaire rose, pre-eminent, the tribune of the President. This magnificent pavilion, the floor of which was on a level with the first story, formed an arched portico, fifty feet in height, and the same number of feet wide and deep. It was hung inside with crimson velvet, sprinkled with gold stars, and in front curtains of the same rich material were looped back with gold cords. The architectural decorations of this tribune were covered with symbols of the Empire. Above, in the centre of the entablature of the arch, shone the grand cross of the Legion of Honour, supported on either hand by winged Victories. Groups of banners spread from the spandrils. The side-pieces were adorned with two stories of Corinthian columns, supporting gilded eagles with niches between, filled with trophies, and surmounted by the cipher of "L. N." A broad carpeted staircase, which widened at each of its two landing-places, and was adorned on either hand with three statues, representing Force, Justice, and Victory, descended into the Champ. Upon the crimson velvet curtain were embroidered the President's arms. The shield bore a spread eagle upon a field azure. Round the escutcheon ran a cord of eagles, suspending the grand cross of the Legion of Honour between two branches of oak and olive, with entwined stems, the whole surmounted by a casque with vizor barred and white plume. The tricoloured flag floated over the tribune, above whose roof towered the dome of the edifice of Louis XV. Seen from the side of the Champ, the President's tribune presented two open arches, with similar decorations to the front. Through these open arches you saw the colours of the regiments standing together, with their gilded eagles displayed, massed in close perspective. Among these standards moved about the high dignitaries and personages of distinction, with a good sprinkling of ladies, awaiting the arrival of the President. Contiguous to the central tribune, reserved for the President and his suite, were four others, two of which, on the left, were occupied by the family of the President, consisting of the sons of Jerome and Lucien, the Princess Matilde, and others, and by the wives of the ministers, marshals, admirals, and other high dignitaries of the State. The two corresponding boxes on the right contained the diplomatic corps and their ladies next to the central group, on either side, were long galleries, containing the Senate, the Corps Legislatif, and the Council of State, all of whom appeared in full costume. The other constituted bodies, which appeared officially by deputations, in their respective uniforms, were ranged in the same portion of the building. There were the judges of the various courts in their square caps and robes, the learned bodies, with the Institute at their head, the civil engineers, the masters of the Ecole Polytechnique and St. Cyr, the conservatories of the various religious professions not Catholic, the staff of the National Guard of Paris, and the staff of the army and navy. These long galleries, furnished each with seats for 720 persons, were flanked by spacious pavilions, each with accommodation for more than 400, which were taken possession of by the families of the great bodies of the State. Two other lateral tribunes, detached from the building and advanced before its wings, contained more than 1200 employés in the different branches of the Administration. Under the galleries of the Senate and Corps Législatif were tribunes of great extent, benches extending into the arena, and open to the sky, crowded with distinguished foreigners, the greater part of whom were foreign military officers

In the tribunes of honour were remarked—The Duke of Cleveland, the Marquis of Clanricarde, Viscount and Viscountess Sydney, Lord and Lady Alfred Paget, Lord and Lady Grey, the Earl of Sheffield, Viscount and Lady Follington, Lord Vernon, Lord and Lady Poltimore, Viscount and Lady Dillon, Lord and Lady Lilford, the Countess of Elgin, Lady Burghersh, Sir Frederick Adam, Sir Wm. Fraser, Lord Bury, Lord and Lady Ossulston, Lord Bateman, Col. Cadogan, Col. Torrens, Col. Heyworth, Capt. Arthur Hardinge, Col. Lord George Paget, Col Cartwright, Lieut.-Col. Russell; Captains Baillie, Dudley, de Ross, Streatfield, Williams, &c. Besides these, and numbers more of our own countrymen, were the Austrian Count and Countess Scotti, Count Diefenbach, Baron Roger Oldenburg, and Baron von Geyling, the Prussian Prince Salm and Liebnowski, General Wagner, Colonel von Olberg and Count Schulenberg. Russia was amply represented: Prince Welkouski, the Prince and Princess Wittgenstein, the Prince Dolgorouki, the Prince and Princess Shakowskoy, Prince Ladislas Troubetzkoy, Prince Soltikof, Prince Gorousouff, Count Panim, and several other of their countrymen, were in the tribune. The Polish, Hungarian, and Italian emigration were represented by Prince Adam Czartoryski and his two sons, Counts Ladislas Zamoyski, Xavier Branicki, and Bathyani, General Pepe, General Dembinski, and General Chrzanowski. Belgium, Bavaria, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, Portugal, Greece, Turkey, Naples, in short all European countries, were represented. General Cooper, commandant of the troops of the state of New York; Mr. Van Buren, a cavalry officer, and Colonels Roteh and Lawrence, aides-de-camp of the Governor of Massachusetts, were likewise in the tribunes. Among these some English red coats blazed sonsplcuous, and contrasted well with the green uniforms of Russia. The simple white vestures of the Arab sheik was set off by the profusion of gold embroidery spent upon the many-coloured dresses of the north.

Among the long lines of tribunes extending on the sides of the vast square, that of the municipality, towards the Invalides, was the most conspicuous. Here were collected the Prefect of the Seine, the Municipal Council, and the Prefect and Commissioners of Police.

The troops were drawn up on either side of the square, in two lines, facing each other—the infantry on the left as you entered from the Pont de Jena, and the cavalry on the left. The line of infantry was ranged in battalions; the cavalry by squadrons in close column. The artillery closed the Champ de Mars on the side of the river, leaving in the direction of the Seine an interval for the passage of the staff of the Prince and his suite. The deputations of the different corps of the army and navy were ranged in the void space between the lines and the Ecole Militaire, under the direction of staff officers of the first division of the Army of Paris.

Between the two lines of troops on either side of the field, and at the distance of about one-third its whole length from the President's tribune, stood the temporary chapel, with its high altar. This magnificent structure was about 50 feet high from the ground to the top of the gold cross that surmounted the dome. The altar was placed upon the raised platform, 25 feet high, immediately under the dome. Four pilasters supported the four arches, terminating in a dome, of light and elegant appearance, on the summit of which was a Latin cross. Four gilded eagles coupled the angles of the arches, and upon the top of each pilaster there was a fluted Corinthian column, supporting a statue. Level with the architrave were four rich velvet canopies, composed of alternate broad stripes of crimson and gold. A flight of carpeted stairs, facing the Ecole Militaire, led up to the altar. About 300 priests, in soutane and surplice, with the Archbishop of Paris, M. Libour, in gold-embroidered cope and mitre, took up various positions beneath the dome and on the steps.

The President set out from the Tuileries on horseback shortly before noon. He wore the uniform of a lieutenant-general of infantry. His only decoration was that of the Legion of Honour, of which he wore the star, the broad red ribbon over his breast, and the small silver cross and medal in his button-hole. He was accompanied by his uncle the Prince Jerome, who wore the uniform of Marshal of France; by Generals de St. Arnaud, Minister of War; General Magnan, Commander-in-Chief of the Army of Paris: Marshals Reille, Harispe, Excelmans, and Vaillant, with their aides-de-camp; and a numerous and brilliant staff of general officers, besides the Prince's own military household. Particular orders had been issued that no officer should be allowed to join the cortege without a special invitation. A strong escort of carabineers hemmed in the Prince and his superb cavalcade, who were received in their progress along the quays by cries of Vive Napoléon! from the crowd who lined the way. About twenty bronze-faced Arab sheiks, wearing scarlet scarfs over their white burnouses, and with long guns slung behind them, cavolling upon fiery steeds of the Elysée, were not the least attractive feature in the Prince's suite, and excited the admiration of the multitude. Louis Napoleon rode a superb black horse, with gold housings. He looked uncommonly well, and admirably managed his steed, which chafed and pawed under him.

The Prince reached the Pont de Jena punctually at noon. His entrance into the Champ de Mars was announced by a salute of twenty-one guns, and by acclamations which were drowned in the peal of the artillery. First he galloped down between the lines, acknowledging, by repeatedly taking off his cocked hat, the chorus of acclamations uttered by the troops. On passing the altar the Prince and his suite uncovered. When the President reached the front of the Ecole Militaire, he wheeled to the left, and galloped back along the front of the cavalry regiments. The cries were evidently reserved for the thing off. He then crossed before the artillery, and resumed a second time during the front of the infantry. When he reached the foot of the staircase leading up to his tribune he dismounted, and, ascending, saluted, by taking off his cocked hat, the Min sters and high dignitaries, who came forward to meet him on the first landing-place. He then took his seat in the arm-chair set for him. On his right stood the standard of Rome, in the uniform of Marshal of France. On either side and behind were ranged the ten Ministers, the Marshals, and Admirals, the French Ambassadors present in Paris, and the military household of the Prince. At the back of the platform, where Louis Napoleon sat, were set the stands of colours to be distributed. The flags and standards were set upright in frames of woodwork, called by the French ifs (yew-trees), so as to form groups. The top of each flag-staff was surmounted by a gilt eagle, with wings displayed, about a foot in height. The model was exactly that of the Empire, but the three colours of the flag were not arranged as the tricolour was under Napoleon, for then the bands were perpendicular to the staff (as in fact the colours of the lancers' flags are now); whereas the tricolour, as now arranged, is parallel to the staff, and come in the order of blue next the staff, white in the middle, and last red. On the white portion was inscribed the name and number of the regiment, and the battles in which it has been distinguished. On the red and blue were four crowns, encircling the cipher of Louis Napoleon. The eagle, proud symbol of conquest borrowed from the ancient Roman standard, was first introduced by Napoleon to replace the Gallic cock, when he established the Empire and the Legion of Honour; and the part which the Imperial bird has played in the early adventures as well as late decrees of Louis Napoleon, is too well known to need repetition here. The ceremony of Monday was in fact a close imitation of the Emperor's distribution of the eagles in his famous Champ de Mai before the battle of Waterloo. Jerome Bonaparte stood beside his brother, the Emperor, on that occasion; and singular must it have appeared to him, at an interval of nearly forty years, to assist at the solemn restoration by his nephew of the Imperial emblem which was shattered in that disastrous rout. Louis Napoleon, then a child of six years old, was also present on that celebrated day. Immediately the Prince reached the platform the ceremony of the distribution of colours began. The colonels of the regiments stood in ranks at the foot of the platform on which the Prince was stationed. At a given signal the first colonel on the left ascended the steps of the platform towards the Prince, followed in single file by all those of the first rank. The President, taking the colours from the hand of the Minister of War, delivered to the colonels in turn the banners of their regiments. These officers, descending in the same order, on reaching the ground formed again at the bottom of the staircase. There were 164 stand of colours; and so rapidly was this operation executed, that the distribution of the whole did not occupy more than a quarter of an hour. After the distribution of all the colours, the right salutes of the regiments, at a given signal, ressconded the staircase of the platform all together, and stood upon the steps, while the Prince came forward and came down to the first landing-place. He took off his hat, and held a paper in his hand, from which he read the following speech:—

Soldiers! The history of peoples is in great part the history of armies. On their successes or on their reverses depends the lot of civilisation and of the country. Conquered, they are humiliated; victorious or scarcely vanquished, they glory and order. For this reason, nations, like armies, bear a religious veneration towards those emblems of military honour which sum up in them a whole past of struggles and of trials. The Roman eagle, adopted by the Emperor Napoleon in the beginning of this century, was the most striking signification of the regeneration and grandeur of France. It disappeared in our misfortunes. It was destined to return when France, recovered from her defeats, mistress of herself, should seem no longer to repudiate her own glory.

Soldiers!—Resume, then, these eagles, not as a menace against foreign nations, but as the symbols of our independence, as the souvenir of an heroic epoch, as the badge of nobility of each regiment.

Resume, then, these eagles, which have so often led our sires to victory, and swear to die, if need there be, to defend them.

This speech was no sooner uttered than all the colonels extended their right arms towards the Prince and exclaimed "Nous le jurons!" ("We swear it!") The President walked up again to his seat, while the colonels, shouldering the standards, descended the steps together, and walked towards the altar.

At six o'clock the cannon announced that the religious ceremony had commenced. The Metropolitan Chapter, the Honorary Canon of the Paris Church, in full canonical costume, the Curés and the Vicars in surplices and red stoles, the members of the Diocesan Seminaries en soutane, and already assembled at eleven o'clock, in the Church of St. Peter, of the Grès Caillou, and moved in procession at a quarter past 11, with the Cross of the Chapter carried before them, and chanting the hymn "Veni Creator," to the Chapel of the Champ de Mars, and took their places according to their rank. When the guns gave the signal, the Archbishop, arrayed in full canonicals, commenced the Mass of the Holy Ghost. At the close of the Gospel the Archbishop descended the steps from the high altar, attended by his Grand Vicar and other clergy, while the colonels, with their standards, remained grouped at the foot of the steps. He then preached the following discourse, the length and rhetoric of which, accompanied by animated gesticulation, contrasted strongly with the brevity and sedate gravity of the President's speech:—

Prince and Soldiers!—The God of peace, of whom we are the ministers, is also the God of armies. That is why our pacific hymns are full of religion, as is marked out in the warlike ode. There has always been a religion in combats. With the Jewish people it was God who directed battles who foretold to the great captains, and who inspired the prophets with the first warlike accents. The Romans placed their gods by the side of their eagles at the head of their legions. Catholicism accepted his greatest victories under the standard of the Cross. For most valiant soldiers, before proceeding to fight against the infidels, the priests veiled their arms beneath the Christ. I do not speak of the flag of the old Monarchy which might be seen to receive from the hands of religion at the altar of St. Denis before their warlike expeditions, the reimbalance of that well natural to occur to every mind

According circumstance. The Church, which preaches peace to all—the Church, whose holy army only knows how to shed its own blood, and has even a horror of that of the enemy—the Church has always had abundant benedictions for the soldier, for his arms, and for his standards.

The explanation of this mystery is not difficult, and it is the whole meaning of this great solemnity, at once military and religious.

Peace is the design of God. It is the object towards which human societies proceed when they follow in their way the eternal courses of principles of justice and inspirations from on high. War is only legitimate on condition of its securing peace. Armies are in the hands of God as the powerful instruments of pacification and public order.

Right requires force to make itself respected; but, in its turn, strength requires right to remain itself in the providential order. Peace is, therefore, always the object in view; war is sometimes the means, a terrible, but, alas! a necessary one, from the effect of the passions which agitate the world.

That is why God has approved of it—that is why the prophets apply to it the words sanctify the nations bellum—that is why the Church has for it words of benediction, of encouragement, and almost of love—and why now, as in the past, the soldier and the priest hold out their hands to each other.

The soldier and the priest, both placed under the austere laws of discipline, having at heart the same principles of conduct, the love of duty, above all things, and the spirit of devotedness, even to the sacrifice of life—work together, though differently, to procure, by calming down the passions, the triumph of justice in human society.

What glorious services to the cause of public peace have been rendered by the glorious army which comes to-day to bend its head before the Majesty on high! Whence comes it that those murmurs which were heard in the bowels of France and of Europe are suddenly hushed? Why are the menaces of civil war and of the sword, which were scarcely into consternation, disarmed? Who has arrested this work of dissolution, which was making such rapid progress? It is a firm and resolute will, supported on one hand by the national voice, which forms his strength, and on the other by an invincible army, which forms his strength.

And now, hail to you, glorious standards, symbols of so many victories! Our pontifical heart, which has never ceased to beat with the strongest feelings of patriotism, is moved at again seeing you. Their glory effaces from our eyes the former misfortunes of their country.

O Prince! whom the will of a great people has placed at the head of its destinies, we can understand what these heroic signs must say to your heart.

We rely on your wisdom; it will protect us from the dazzling effects of glory. France thirsts for tranquillity and order. Fatigued with disorder, she wishes to repose under the shelter of a strong and tutelary Government. Continue to lead her in the pacific path on which she has entered; and may she be able to develop all the elements of strength and of prosperity concealed within her fruitful bosom.

The moral interests of a country are superior to her material ones. They are the soul and the heart of a great people, without which they must decline and fall. Be you always their defender. The religion which you love asks neither privileges nor favour from you; it only asks of you to always preserve to it what the Emperor your uncle restored to it in the palmy days of his glory—liberty to live and to do good. You will gain by it the gratitude of the people, its only glory, and, perhaps, that a great mind can now be ambitious of.

Prince, look less at the past than at the future. Peace may be spoken of when possessed of such valiant armies. Your eagles will have a vastfield of flight from the heights of the Alps to those of the Alps and Pyrenees. Providence destines you for a great and holy work. Remember, that, in order to build the temple, God preferred Solomon to David. Continue to rebuild in peace that society which has been so deeply shaken, holding it up with one hand, while the other holds the glorious sword of France.

You have understood that, in an epoch when institutions tend to become more impregnated with the spirit of the Gospel, the social edifice cannot be so well cemented as by love and clemency.

O God, sovereign master of war and peace, Thou who causest plots to be dissipated, calmest tempests, and breakest, when Thou willest, the sword drawn for the combat—qui confers bella—come and bless these standards; imprint on them the striking signs of Thy power and holiness. In seeing them let courage be animated and ascend to its celestial principle; da calo fortitudo est. Render them the terrible terrors of the enemies of the public peace, and to the nations, if any there be, jealous of our glory and prosperity, and who may attempt to disturb them. Let them be for our valiant soldiers a protection and assured pledge of victory (victoria cerny). Let them contain in their glorious folds peace and war, for the security of the good and the terror of the wicked; and, under their shade, let France respire, and be for the happiness of the world the greatest and happiest of nations.

While M. Sibour spoke, the field presented a magnificent coup d'œil. There were the regiments of infantry and carabineers, with their red-crested helmets and breastplates flashing back the sunlight. Then the regiments of mounted chasseurs, with their neat red shakos and black cocks' feathers; next came the Garde Républicaine, with their red breastfacing and yellow cross-belts. The bands stood close to the altar, altogether.

At the close of this address the Mass was resumed. At the moment of the elevation, another salute was fired; the drums beat to arms; the trumpets sounded the advance; 60,000 men presented arms, the whole of the infantry kneeling, and the officers not in command bent on one knee to the earth, with head uncovered. The multitudes on the mounds took off their hats. When Mass was over, the Archbishop, surrounded by the officiating clergy, proceeded to where the eagles were arrayed round the altar. He raised his voice to chant the prayer, "Adjutorium nostrum in nomine Domini," and the clergy responded "Amen!" After the "Oremus Omnipotens sempiterne Deus," the prelate sprinkled the flags with holy water and blessed them; and then took his seat on a throne, and assumed the mitre. The standard-bearers advanced separately, knelt on the ground, each with the eagle in his hand, and the Archbishop spoke the following prayer:—

Acalpite vexilla celesti benedictione sanctificata: sintque inimicis populi Christiani terribilia; et det vobis Dominus gratiam, ut, ad ipsius nomen et honorem, cum illo hostium cuneos potenter penetretis incolumes et securi.

Receive these standards sanctified by the blessing of Heaven; may they be the terror of the enemies of the Christian world, and may God, for the honour of his name and glory, give you that grace that securely and unscathed you may pierce the battalions of your enemies.

When the prayer was ended the Prelate gave for the whole army the kiss of peace, with the words Pax tibi: and the foremost standard-bearer, rising from the ground, pressed to his lips the Pontifical ring, and then resumed his place. One hundred salutes from the cannon of the Bridge of Jena accompanied the blessing of the eagles. The Prelate then blessed, sprayed in mitres and cope, and holding the crosier, raised his hand aloft, and gave an universal blessing to the army and the people, and another salute announced that the religious ceremony was over.

The colonels to whom the standards were delivered by the Archbishop descended, and defiled round the chapel. They then proceeded to their respective regiments, delivered the eagles to the ensigns, and had them recognised by the corps in the usual manner.

At this moment cries of "Vive l' Empereur!" and "Vive Napoléon!" were uttered up the former with more enthusiasm by the cavalry.

At two o'clock the President descended from his pavilion, mounted his horse, and took up his position in front. The defilé commenced, and cries of "Vive l'Empereur!" "Vive Napoleon!" were again heard.

The défilé, which was over at three o'clock, took place in the following order: General Magnan, Commander-in-Chief of the Army of Paris, led the way at the head of a brilliant staff. Next followed deputations from the Artillery, Engineering, and Polytechnic Schools, the School of Instruction for Staff Officers, and the Special Military School, under the orders of the respective Governors of those establishments. General Carrelet, commanding the infantry on the ground, passed next with his staff. The fourth in order was the deputation of Invalides and the veterans, commanded by General Saunier. The fifth in succession were deputations from the battalions of chasseurs à pied, of the African Light Infantry, of the companies of discipline, of the battalions of Arab riflemen, of the battalions of riflemen of the garrison of Paris, of the artisans of the War Department, all commanded by General Forey. Next advanced deputations from the various regiments of the line, of the marine corps, of the Zouaves, of the regiments forming the foreign legion, the brigades of infantry of the 1st division of the army of Paris, commanded by General Martin de Bourgon. These were followed by two battalions of each regiment, composing the brigades of the 2d division of the army of Paris, commanded by General Renault. The 8th in order were the deputations from the regiments composing the 3d division of the army of Paris, commanded by General Levasseur. The 9th consisted of deputations from the Engineers, with the military band of the 1st regiment, commanded by General Sallenave. The 10th was composed of land and sea gendarmerie, Sapeurs-Pompiers, Gendarmerie Mobile, Garde Républicaine, commanded by General Lourau. The 11th in order consisted of deputations from the land and marine artillery, 10 batteries of the army of Paris, with the staff and band of the 7th regiment, the third squadron of artillery, and a detachment of the third and fourth squadrons of the waggon train, commanded by General Hubert. 12th. General Letang, Commander-in-Chief of the cavalry, with his staff. 13th. A deputation from the School of Cavalry, deputations from the regiments of cavalry and the guides, commanded by General Guyon. 14th. Division of light cavalry, composed of two brigades (the first under the orders of General Oraison; the second brigade, of General Daumas), commanded by General Pays de Bourjolly. 15th. A division of heavy cavalry, consisting of two brigades, under the orders of Generals Partouneaux and Bruno, commanded by General Grand. 16th. A division of Curassiers, composed of two brigades, under the orders of Generals Allonville and Tartas, together with squadrons of the Gendarmerie of the Seine and the Garde Républicaine, the whole commanded by General Korte. During the défilé the generals of division alone stopped in front of the President. The generals of brigade and the colonels followed the movement of the troops. The band of the 1st regiment alone of each division of infantry or cavalry remained in front of the President, and continued to play during the défilé of the entire division. General Magnan, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army of Paris, commanded the operations. The military deputations, when leaving the Champ de Mars after the défilé, returned to the Ecole Militaire through the cavalry gate. They deposited their respective colours in a hall prepared for that purpose, whence they are immediately to be dispatched to their regiments. A salute of twenty-one guns was fired as Louis Napoleon quitted the Champ de Mars.

The troops entered their respective quarters at about half-past four. The clergy, who were, including the ecclesiastical seminaries, upwards of 800 in number, remained on the ground to the last. A guard of honour of the Gendarmerie Mobile was assigned to them, and they were conducted in the Croix de Gros Caillou, in front of which the Archbishop delivering his blessing to the multitude through whom he passed, and who received it with uncovered heads and with indications of deep respect.

Those of the army and gendarmerie who received medals or crosses of the Legion of Honour amount to about 2000.

As the regiments returned to their quarters, the standard-bearers held their new colours aloft, but not unfurled.

Some accidents took place during the day. At the first discharge of cannon the horse of a hussar took fright and threw the rider, who had his leg broken; and a man was trampled under foot by the crowd just as the President was crossing over the Bridge of Jena, in his approach to the field. One of the clergy received a kick on the head from a horse, and was carried off the ground to the Ecole Militaire; and during the benediction of the banners the colonel of a cavalry regiment managed, by the exercise of some wonderful ingenuity, to hold his standard in such a position that it completely overbalanced him and threw him to the ground. The discomfited standard-bearer suffered no physical injury, and escaped with a little ridicule. One man in the crowd died from a sun-stroke; and this was the only fatal accident which occurred, though some thousands must have suffered material damage from the "mauvais sujets," which shone so powerfully throughout the day. Altogether the number of accidents did not amount to more than fifteen or twenty, and some of them, and especially the episode of the awkward colonel, only seemed to contribute to the general amusement.

The proceedings of the succeeding days are thus described in the letters

TUESDAY.

To-day the Champ de Mars was filled with persons who had not yet examined the decorations of the altar and tribune. Workmen were busily engaged in finishing the arrangements for the ball that evening at the Ecole Militaire.

Upwards of 20,000 persons were invited, 8000 of whom were provided with supper tickets. This was a fête offered by the army to Louis Napoleon, and it was reported that the Prince President intended to show his appreciation of the compliment by giving double pay to the army during the month of May. The subscription among the officers of the army of Paris for the expenses of the ball was managed in the following manner:—The Commander-in-Chief gave up fifteen days' pay; Generals of Division gave up twelve days; Generals of Brigade, nine days; Colonels, six days; Chefs de Bataillon (corresponding to our majors), five days; Captains, four days; and Lieutenants, two days.

The ball took place in the court-yard of the Ecole Militaire which was boarded over, and formed a magnificent place for dancing, about 70 yards in length, 40 in breadth, and 27 in height. On each side of the ball-room, at a height of about six feet, two galleries had been erected, the balustrades of which were formed of infantry swords, the whole very richly draped with gilt arms. At one end of the room, and over the orchestra of 300 musicians, conducted by Strauss; at the other, a tribune had been erected for the reception of the President and the diplomatic body. On each side of the ball-room was an ante-room, 70 yards in length and 20 in breadth; one of these was intended as a reception-room, the other for the ladies to rest in. The number of ladies present was not more than 3000, while the gentlemen numbered upwards of 16,000. Each lady, on entering the room, was presented with a bouquet.

The supper-room contained twelve tables, independently of the table reserved for the President. This latter accommodated about 100 persons, while the others, which were arranged four together in three rows, held covers for upwards of 700 ladies, who retired and made way for another party of ladies, and so on until they had all supped. The official programmes announced the important fact, that a reasonable time would be allowed to each party.

In other rooms refreshments had been placed for the dancers and for the suppers of the gentlemen, who supped standing, and 500 at a time.

The conversation-room was provided with two military bands; and, independently of numerous buvettes and vestibules, there was a room where medical attendance was at hand, in case of ladies fainting, or of any of the numerous accidents peculiar to crowded ball-rooms taking place. A sufficient body of sapeurs-pompiers, or firemen, was present, in readiness to extinguish fire in whatever part of the building it might appear.

Those who are fond of statistics, even in the ball-room, will be pleased to hear that the flooring of the court yard, contained 6000 square yards of the metre being about two inches longer than the English yard; that 10,000 metres of waterproof cloth were employed for the covering, that 600 metres of fir were used for the scaffolding, that 50,000 metres of drapery formed the hangings, and that 24,000 wax candles were decreed to the lighting of the whole. The service of the ball-room was performed by 300 huissiers in court dresses, while the attendance at the supper and refreshment tables was supplied by about 600 cooks, maitres d'hôtel, and their employes.

A leaf has been taken out of the book of our English Lord Mayor as regards the composition of the banquet, for we find the following details on the subject scattered through various journals, which announce the large supply of salmon, the enormous quantity of Bordeaux, or the prodigious number of the glasses of punch, according to which appears most pleasing to the gastronomic mind of the writer. The illustrious Chevet, of the Palais Royal, sent 136 salmon, of which a large number are said to have been trout; he sent 108 galantines, 116 pâtés de Chartres and Strasburg, 68 Bayonne and Westphalia hams, 13 carefully selected pâtés de foies gras, besides 12 "rosbifs." There were, moreover, 50 lobster mayonnaises and the same number of creams and jellies, 100 dishes of roast fowl, 100 bundles of asparagus, 216 large tarts, 744 dishes of pastry, and 444 plates of different fruits. In the matter of wine there were 3500 bottles of Bordeaux, neither more nor less than 2126 bottles of champagne, 30,000 ices and sorbets, 25,000 glasses of punch, 1000 lb. of rolls, and 400 loaves. When the doors of the supper-room were thrown open, and the officers reviewed the regiments of pâtés, the bastalions of pastry, and the brigades of ices, to say nothing of the deputations from the "armies of the land and the sea" as represented by the "rosbifs" and the salmon respectively, the greatest satisfaction is prevailed. The Prince President arrived at ten o'clock, accompanied by the Princess Mathilde, the Marchioness of Douglas, the Marshals of France, and the Corps Diplomatique, and was received with enthusiasm. Dancing was kept up until six o'clock on Wednesday morning.

WEDNESDAY.

Was the day fixed for the dinner given by the President, at the Palace of the Tuileries, to the commanders of the different corps and regimental deputations who were present at the distribution of the eagles—the Fête des Aigles, which it appears is to be its historical name. The table at which the President sat was placed in the Salle des Maréchaux; the principal dignitaries of State were the only guests who sat with him. The other tables were arranged in the Salon d'Apollon, the Salon Blanc, and the Galérie de la Paix. It would tend to repletion were we to enumerate the dishes which composed the dinner of Wednesday, after the generous description which we have given of the supper of Tuesday. The fish consisted of salmon, turbot and soles. We heard of nothing in the way of meat except hams, and these were York hams, and roasted. The birds of the air were present in abundance, some of them being stuffed with truffles; and the amphibious tribes had of course been laid under contribution. Prawns, pastry, cream, French beans, strawberries, coffee, and green peas, formed the less substantial part of the repast; but, as there were 800 ices and 800 demi-tasses, we presume that 800 was the number of invitations issued. We were surprised to find that there were sixty-four plates of bon-bons; but, on the other hand, the military taste was catered for by a supply of sixty large bowls of punch. After the dinner the company of the Théâtre Français played "Mademoiselle de la Seigliére," known to the English public as the "Man of Law," and "Le Rendezvous Bourgeois," from which the quasi English farce of the "Rendezvous" is taken.

THURSDAY.

The fête of Thursday consisted of a display of fireworks on the high ground facing the Ecole Militaire, called the Trocadero. Every attempt was made to render it the grandest exhibition of the kind ever seen in France. It began at nine in the evening, and the signal for itscommencement was given by the Prince President, this was a Bengal light, which appeared on the Ecole Militaire. In the meantime a tour de feu having commenced with a discharge of bombs and variegated stars, and eighteen cannon were at the same time fired. After the first salvo, rockets, giving forth variously-coloured fires, were let off, and were succeeded by other rockets, from which blue and green fires fell and the form of pistol-shots. After wards a succession of what appeared to be a species of internal combat took place. The infantry fired Roman candles, carrying the most brilliant and fantastically coloured balls, in the direction of the artillery, who responded to this polite attention by a rolling fire of bombes, which were discharged by 70 different mortars, and by a concurous cannonade. After the efforts and fireworks of the soldiers had been completely exhausted, four hundred red flames burst forth from the heights of the Trocadero, which the imaginative were to suppose had caught fire. The display of fireworks concluded with a representation, by Bengal fire, of the triumphal arch in the Place du Carrousel. The pyrotechnic copy was twelve times the size of the original, and, instead of being surmounted by a car, had a colossal eagle, with outstretched wings, soaring over it. It bore the inscription "Vive Louis Napoleon!" and the columns at the right and left were adorned with a gigantic cross of the Legion of Honour, and with the new military medal, on the same large scale. At the same time a bouquet of bombes was fired from the largest mortars, and three lines of rockets were sent into the air. Altogether, the number of rockets fired amounted to 60,000!

Even Thursday was not to be the last day of these fêtes, for on Friday the Prefect of the Seine was to give a grand banquet to all the Generals and Colonels of the army of Paris.

The celebrated astronomer, M. Arago, the director of the Observatory, having, on Monday morning, written to the Minister of Public Instruction to say that he must refuse to take the oath of allegiance to the President of the Republic, and offering his resignation, the Government has declined accepting the resignation of that philosopher, and has intimated its willingness to exempt him from taking the oath required from all public functionaries. M. Arago will, therefore, resume his office as Director of the Observatory

General Changarnier has, also, in a letter to Louis Napoleon, dated Malines (Belgium), the 10th instant (Monday), in reply to a demand to take the oath of allegiance to the President, refused in the most pointed terms to take such a step. His letter concludes with these spirited words:—

This oath—exacted by the perjured man who has failed to corrupt me—this oath I refuse.

M. Grédel de Bacarat, Councillor-General of the Meurthe; MM. Barbédienne and Etienne de Tascherolle, of the Eure et Loire; M. Esmein, of the Charente; Dauthony, of the Drôme; and MM. Guichard and Lacave, of the Yonne, have also refused the oath. At a meeting of the Municipal Council of St. Quentin, convoked for the purpose of taking the oath, six members then present refused. Several members more who did not attend are also expected to refuse. It is believed that several members of the Conservatoire will follow the example of M. Arago.

These refusals—especially those of M. Arago and General Changarnier, appearing, as they did, concurrently with the commencement of the fêtes—have caused considerable sensation in political affairs.

A mission of Jesuits for Cayenne has been organised by the Government; three have accompanied the convicts to their destination, and three more are about to follow. The Government has granted them a house and lands in Cayenne.

SPAIN.

A crusade against the press, both in the provinces and in Madrid, is at present actively pursued by the Spanish Government, who have lately had a most restrictive law enacted against the newspapers, on the harsh provisions of which they declare their fixed intention to act. The journalists have no other remedy than a silent protest, and this they accordingly make by voluntarily ceasing to appear. In Madrid the evening journals have all suspended their publication, as well as the morning ones. The Esperanza, Epocha, Observador, Catolico, and Opinion Publica issued notices on the 4th instant to that effect; and the only political papers now published are the Orden and Espana. The political journals of Cadiz, Seville, Barcelona, &c. have also ceased to appear. Thus the Ministers have everything at present their own way, and no sound of opposition is heard either in the tribune or the press. The Minister of Marine, General Francisco Armero, has resigned, after a conference held in Madrid with Senors Mon and Pidal, who think that matters are going too far. A council of Ministers was held subsequently at Aranjuez, at which it is said that a decree, effecting certain alterations of a restrictive character in the electoral law, was adopted by the rest of the Cabinet, General Armero dissenting from it, and supporting his reasons against it. It to be entered in the minute of the meeting; and subsequently a violent scene is said to have taken place between him and Senor Bravo Murillo Lieutenant-General Vigodet, now Captain-General of the Cadiz Naval Department, was appointed in his place, but refused to accept office.

UNITED STATES.

The accounts this week from New York are dated the 1st inst.

The anniversary of the patron saint of England, St. George, was celebrated, both in New York and Philadelphia, with great spirit by the English societies, who always evince great national pride in the day. An agreeable feature of the evening in both cities was the interchange of toasts and sentiments between the St. George's societies of the two cities, by means of the electric telegraph!

The New York Crystal Palace does not appear to be making much headway. About half the capital stock is said to be subscribed, but coming, yet, paid in.

The shock of an earthquake had been felt in several parts of the United States on the afternoon of the 20th ult. It was very sensibly felt at Washington, Baltimore, and throughout Maryland.

Late accounts from Newfoundland report that a dreadful storm had visited that coast, whereby upwards of sixty sailing vessels had been lost, in addition to many other vessels.

The political advices are not of importance.

From California, under date the 1st ult., we have news from the mines of a cheering character. The arrivals of gold-dust at San Francisco were extensive.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Advices to the 1st of April state that H.M. steamer Hydra, Master Commander Belgrave, which left Plymouth on the 10th of February, arrived with the new Governor, General Cathcart; Lieut.-Colonel Seymour (Secretary), and the Hon. B. Curzon (Aide-de-Camp), on the 31st March. His Excellency intended to proceed from the Cape in the Styx steamer for the seat of war forthwith.

On the arrival of the Governor an address was presented to him, when his Excellency expressed his hope that the Constitution would do for the Cape colonists all that they expected from it.

From the seat of war we learn that the Kaffirs continue to avoid a general action. The cruelty of their conduct to their unfortunate English captives is described as of the most horrible character, and the protracted tortures inflicted as of the most savage kind.

Two actions at the Waterkloof are noticed during the preceding month, in one of which the Hon. H. Wrottesley, of the 43d, lost his life, and ten men of the 91st were wounded. In the second action on the 6th of March) Colonel Yarborough was wounded. Our troops took 38 horses and 90 head of cattle, and were returning, when the Hottentots killed Sergeants Frane and Huggin, and four privates of the 45d, captured Sergeant Laing, and killed a private of the 74th. The Kaffirs fought vigourously, but were subsequently repulsed with considerable loss by Captain Carey and some Cape Mounted Rifles.

The colonists generally regret the removal of Sir Harry Smith.

The Legislative Council had subscribed £500 towards the sufferers by the wreck of the Birkenhead: about £1600 had been subscribed to the end of March.

AUSTRALIA.

We have accounts this week from Melbourne and the Victoria Gold Mines, dated January 27, from which we learn that the excitement was rapidly increasing, and that about 20,000 people had already reached the place from the neighbouring colonies. Special instances were mentioned in which parties had obtained gold valued at about £30 day: several successive days, while even since the search of wells to average at the chief point of operations had been £3. These were principally obtained from surface diggings on a slope of the ran, not a quarter of an acre in extent. It was estimated that since the discovery the general yield, including what had found its way into the banks, had been at least £1,000,000 sterling, and that already up to the 1st of January, £660,000 had been exported to this country. When the winter rains should set in, it was anticipated that the most extraordinary consequences would be witnessed. In the meantime labour was fetching high rates, wages were paid 28s. a day, besides a considerable allowance of spirits, and servants, who previously obtained about £30 to £35 per annum, were now readily engaged at £60. The retail business of the place had improved in proportion, the expenditure by the mining population being distinguished for its extravagance. The latest price of gold was £2 18s. to £3 per ounce. The amount brought by the vessel which conveys the present intelligence is understood to be upwards of £160,000. The Himalaya and Sarah Anne, which left previously with 26,547 and 14,904 ounces, have yet to arrive.

THE RUSSIAN COURT.—From Berlin we learn that the Emperor and Empress of Russia arrived at Cove on the 7th inst., at two o'clock in the afternoon. They were there received by the King of Prussia. After a short time the Emperor set out for Vienna, where he arrived at Eleven p.m. on the same day, accompanied by the King of Prussia, proceeded to Breslau, and Berlin. The Empress and King reached the latter city on Thursday, and the Ministers and some high State dignitaries were presented to her Imperial Majesty, and she subsequently left for Potsdam, with the King and Queen.

CAPTURE OF AN OUTLAW NEAR ALLAHABAD, IN THE NORTH-WEST DIVISION OF BENGAL.

It is customary during the cold season for those officers who have charge of districts of the regulation provinces to make a tour through them, by which means they become personally acquainted with the capabilities or deficiencies of the land over which their jurisdiction extends; and are enabled to maintain a more efficient check on the native officials, by whom are confided the immediate details of administration. It was during a tour of this kind that the capture which we are about to describe, and which our Illustration depicts, was effected.

Rundheer Singh, of Syfabad, in the kingdom of Oude, a large landholder, and son of Firtpal Singha, taloogusaar, or head of a district, had rendered himself notorious by his crimes; so much so, that even the Oude Government, patient and long-suffering as it is to criminals who carry matters with a high hand, saw itself compelled to take notice of his misdeeds. But Rundheer Singh's exploits were not confined to the kingdom of Oude; there were in our own territory some who had felt the weight of his hand, and was trembled at his name. Proscribed by the King and a price of 1000 rupees set on his head, Rundheer Singh was hard pressed by the Oude frontier police, two battalions of which ordered his stronghold taken, a large portion of his property s himself obliged to retreat, and requisitions for his capture addressed by the Oude Government to the British authorities. All efforts, however, proved unsuccessful; and he probably flattered himself that he had effectually baffled pursuit, as he had succeeded with a number of his men in leaving Oude, crossed the British territory, and taking up a temporary residence in the native state of Rewah.

On Tuesday, Feb. 10, Mr. R. H. Dunlop, joint magistrate, while on his tour through the Barra and Khyraljurh districts, which lie south of the Jumna, form a portion of the Allahabad commissionership, had pitched his tents at the large mound of Jajherra, when three men requested an audience with him, and producing documents which showed them to belong to the Oude police, commanded by Captain Orr, of the King of Oude's service, and consisting of a detachment from the British authorities, informed him that Rundheer Singh, whom they had, with the untagging persevering hounds, tracked during the last four months, was then just within a few miles of that place, and requested his assistance to enable them to effect the capture.

The great difficulty was, that the outlaw had pitched his camp just within the boundary of the territory of the Rajah of Rewah, an independent prince, and Mr. Dunlop, not feeling himself empowered to attempt, of his own motion, the invasion of foreign territory, sent his time in referring the question to the Commissioner, his immediate superior, the magistrate of Allahabad, Mr. H. C. Raikes, who, with great spirit and promptitude, unhesitatingly took upon himself the responsibility, thus leaving the joint magistrate at liberty to act.

It was known that Rundheer Singh had with him about three hundred men, all of whom were desperadoes like himself; and it was also known that he had lost no time before cut to pieces five of the King of Oude's troops, who attempted his capture. It was necessary, therefore, to provide for extraordinary contingencies. Dunlop collected, in haste, such of the police and revenue establishments as were available. He succeeded in mustering thirty-four men, headed by the native deputy-magistrate of the Barra district, who was the only person to be depended upon in the very likely case of a scuffle. Fortunately, Captain Orr's men were bold, resolute fellows; and, still more opportunely, an old soldier, Mr. Sheels, then employed on the repairs of a neighbouring road, arrived in the nick of time and volunteered his services.

A portion of the Rewah frontier is formed by the river Tons, and it was in a grove of trees on the southern bank of the stream that Rundheer Singh's camp was said to be pitched. At between two and three A.M. of the 12th February, Mr. Dunlop and his party, all well armed, started, and fording the river by moonlight, crossed at about six hundred yards below the grove indicated. Hitherto all had gone on admirably; but when within one hundred yards of the spot, the "lightning throwers" began to exhibit some diminution of alacrity, apparently not relishing the prospect of the greeting which 300 dacoits might be disposed to bestow upon any intruder on their morning slumbers. Daylight was approaching, and, notwithstanding all precautions, the alarm was beginning to spread: it was necessary to use despatch. Captain Orr's men, drawing their swords, told Mr. Dunlop that they would show him the man, and, accompanied by that gentleman, dashed on in advance, and entering the camp seized on Rundheer Singh, whose couch was laid under the close branches of a baier tree. In an instant all was uproar; the dacoits, awakened by the sound of the scuffle, sprang to their feet, and with naked swords rushed to rescue their leader; Mr. Dunlop, however, sword in hand, confronted them. Many a native who would not hesitate to encounter a coloured opponent, or meet the cut of a native sabre, yet dreads to close with the pale-faced representatives of Europe, and shrinks in horror from the deadly thrust of an English sword: at the talismanic words, therefore, "In the name of the British Government!" every sabre was lowered, and the majority of Rundheer's men took to flight. [This is the moment which our Artist has selected for Illustration]. Whilst this was going on, Mr. Sheels and the native deputy magistrate galloped up, the former dismounting, and handing his sword to the deputy magistrate, rendered Rundheer's capture no longer matter of doubt, by tying that worthy's hands behind his back. Some of the police, who had prevailed on themselves to approach the spot, then disarmed such of the dacoit's men as had remained.

Thus was effected, without bloodshed or accident, an important capture, which, but for the awe inspired by the presence of two Europeans, and the decision and courage which they displayed, under circumstances of no inconsiderable danger, must, to a certainty, have been purchased at the cost of human life; and the success of which, even at that price, would have been more than doubtful, had the business been left in the hands of a native official. Property to a considerable amount, including seven elephants and an unusually large and intractable rhinoceros, was seized in the outlaw's camp, and has been made over to the Lucknow authorities. Annexed is a Sketch of the rhinoceros, taken while the animal was asleep.

In addition to the 1000 rupees offered by the King of Oude for Rundheer Singh's capture, which sum has been divided between Mr. Sheels, Captain Orr's men, and such of the police as aided in disarming the dacoits, his Majesty has been pleased to testify his sense of the obligation conferred on his Government by presenting Mr. Dunlop with a handsome sword, dagger, and shield. The stringent rules, however, issued by the Court of Directors against the retention of presents from native courts by civilians, will preclude the local Government from permitting these articles to be retained by that gentleman; they must, as in all similar cases, be transferred to the Company's treasury, and sold for the benefit of Government. Still more valuable than such presents, however, must be the high encomium which he has received, not only from his immediate superiors, but also from his Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces. The deputy-magistrate, who behaved with a coolness somewhat unusual among men of his cast (the Kayeth, or writer), has also received a suitable reward, in the shape of a "thillat," or dress of honour, of the value of five hundred rupees, from the British Government.

Rundheer Singh's life is forfeited to the offended justice of Oude: but not only is he rich himself, but he has wealthy relations; and it is not improbable that their gold may arrest the sword, now ready to fall on him. Should this be the case, and Rundheer Singh, as would most probably happen, recommence his career of violence and wrong, and become again an outlaw and fugitive, let us hope there may be at hand some one gifted with judgment and courage equal to that which has been displayed by Mr. Dunlop, to secure to him that punishment which his misdeeds merit, and which, sooner or later, must overtake him.

The following notice of the affair is from the Friend of India, of March 16th, 1852:—"The Delhi Gazette of the 6th inst. contained a notice of the capture of an Oude robber, named Rundheer Singh, by Mr. R. H. Dunlop, the joint magistrate of Jumpore, and the seizure of his property, including several elephants and a rhinoceros. We were struck at the time with the appearance of so remarkable an item in the inventory of the baggage of a robber chief: but we have since had an opportunity of inquiring further details of the affair, which was in fact a most dashing exploit, and calculated to raise the credit of the British Government as much as that of the officer who performed it."

The accompanying Illustrations are from Sketches by F. Slinger, Esq., Deputy-Collector of Allahabad.

CANNON-STREET, OPPOSITE LONDON-STONE, REMOVED FOR THE CITY IMPROVEMENT, JULY, 1850.

The thoroughfare now in progress from St. Paul's Churchyard to King William-street will form one of the most striking changes since there-construction of the City after the Great Fire of 1666; both as regards local trade, and as a medium passage from London-bridge and the docks, and the commercial traffic between the eastern and western parts of London.

Previous to the Fire, the leading thoroughfares of the City lay in much the same disposition as constructed by its Roman founders; London-stone marking the centre of the original establishment, on the line of Watling-street whereof Cannon-street was a portion, being supposed to have formed the principal street and prætorian road of Roman London.

CITY IMPROVEMENTS.—CANNON-STREET, OPPOSITE LONDON-STONE.

The name of Dowgate or Dwr (water) gate, whence a ferry in connexion with this line crossed the Thames, suggests, by its Celtic origin, the probability of this thoroughfare having been a British road prior to the Roman occupation. London-stone stood originally on the south side of Cannon-street, and an examination made after the Great Fire, by Wren, when in its original position, may be noticed as affording an interesting collation with the remains recently discovered a little westward, on the opposite side of the way, noticed in this paper April 17th.

In the course of his operations, Wren laid bare the foundations of this monument, which he believed to be the central milliarum or point whence distances were computed on the military roads traversing London. "In the adjoining ground to the south, upon digging for altars," says the author of "Parentalia," "were discovered some tesselated pavements, and other extensive remains of Roman workmanship and buildings. Probably," he continues, "this might in some degree have imitated the Milliarum Aureum at Constantinople, which was not in the form of a pillar, as at Rome, but an eminent building, for under its roof, according to Cedrenus and Suidas, stood the statues of Constantine and Helena, Trajan, an equestrian statue of Hadrian, a statue of Fortune, and many other figures and decorations."

London-stone may be looked upon as the only existing monument of which record is made prior to the Conquest, being mentioned as a landmark in a list of rents belonging to Christ Church, in Canterbury, at the end of "a fair Gospel-book" given by Athelstane. This is quoted by Stow, who describes the appearance of the stone as it was in his day, being "fixed in the ground very deep, fastened with bars of iron, and otherwise so strongly set, that if carts do run against it through negligence, the wheels be broken, and the stone itself unshaken." In 1742 this venerable monument was ordered to be removed as a nuisance, when Mr. Thomas Maddan, of Sherburne-lane, printer, prevailed upon the churchwardens of St. Swithin's (the church being then under repair) to allow its remains, or a fragment thereof, to be enshrined in the wall of the edifice under their charge, where it now appears encased in freestone, still somewhat in bulk beyond comparison with "an agate stone on the forefinger of an alderman," yet greatly diminished from its original dimensions. The projection shown on the right hand of the accompanying Engraving, at the base of the Church, gives a side elevation of the case which contains this relic, the most time-honoured of the few vestiges of old London, now rapidly passing away.

The houses opposite exhibited a good specimen of the brickwork subsequent to the Great Fire, especially that on the left, formerly the corner of Bush-lane, which displayed some ornamentation. Several of those houses retained their original signs and badges, among which was a spirited representation of a grey-hound in full career, with an ornamental framework, cut in stone. These edifices are now replaced by structures which appear as stately and spacious to modern eyes as their predecessors may have done to those of nearly two centuries ago.

CRYPT OF GISORS HALL.

THIS very interesting vestige of the architecture of the thirteenth century, a view of which was given in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for September 20, 1851, has recently been completely cleared; the bins appropriate to its former use as a wine-cellar having been removed, the floor disencumbered of about three feet of soil, by which means the bases of the pillars are revealed on their original level, and the windows opened out, so as to give the place quite a different aspect, exhibiting its entire proportions under an access of daylight sufficient to render the whole distinctly visible.

The Crypt is now accessible by its original entrance, down a short flight of steps from Basing-lane; and every attention being paid to the interest shown by numerous visitors, the place is resorted to by all classes, and the question as to the means of its preservation has become a topic of public interest. But for various reasons this desirable object can hardly be anticipated, insomuch as that the building being situated about the middle of the intended line of street, the crown of the arches would project about two feet above the roadway as its level is ordered: independent of which, supposing the street to be elevated in this part in order to cover this projection, the dilapidated state of some of the supports could afford but frail resistance to the pressure of heavy vehicles likely to pass over it in the course of daily traffic. Moreover, as lying directly in the way of the main sewer to be constructed along the middle of the roadway, the Crypt would present an obstacle to a feature of the utmost importance in a sanitary point of view.

The accompanying View is taken from the north end of the Crypt—the building, it may be remarked, standing north and south; and it will be observed that the first clear pillar is greatly shattered, the stone appearing to have been calcined by fire: this, with some corresponding appearances on the exterior, are probably tokens of the Great Fire of 1666, when the ancient superstructure succumbed to that formidable conflagration. In other parts the roof has been damaged, and portions of the ribs broken away for the purposes of modern alteration. It is remarkable that no vestige of pavement has been discovered, unless some few fragments of Purbeck stone which were found may have been part of a flooring removed at some former time. The whole skeleton of the edifice is of Caen stone, and the roof is chalk, with key-stones of fire-stone.

At a meeting of the Archæological Association, on Wednesday evening, there was a very interesting discussion on the history, architectural character, and proposed means of saving the above crypt from demolition; Dr. W. Pettigrew in the chair. Mr. White dwelt with much emphasis on the ability and alacrity with which the crypt had been cleared and rendered accessible to the public, adding that it could not possibly be preserved in its present situation. Mr. Deputy Lott suggested its removal to the space now occupied by modern brick cellars beneath the Guildhall, the crypt of which occupies but a moiety of the area. Time would be left for the erection of the Statue, and a work of centuries in contrast. With this view Mr. Lott has procured a suspension of the destruction of the crypt by the concession of the Commission of Sewers. Meanwhile, the crypt proves very attractive.

INAUGURATION OF THE SALFORD MONUMENT TO THE LATE SIR ROBERT PEEL

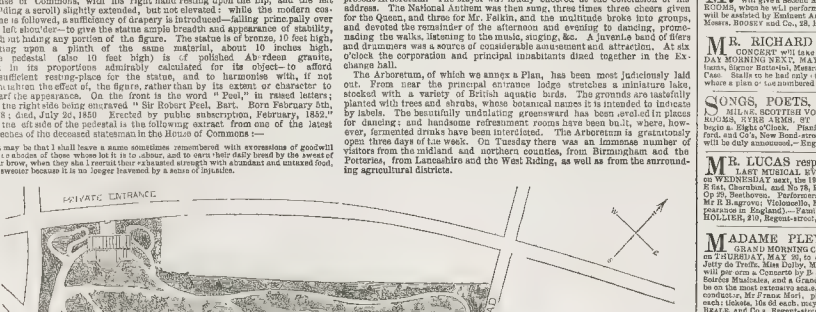
It will be recollected, that, soon after the death of this lamented statesman, the erection of a statue to his memory was determined upon in many towns of the kingdom, of which Salford has taken the lead, the Statue there having been inaugurated on Saturday last. It has been appropriately placed in Peel Park, named after Sir Robert Peel, who was a liberal contributor to the arrangements for this park by the people of Manchester and Salford. The statue stands on the lawn in front of the public library, and is seen to advantage from the great public thoroughfare through the borough, called the Crescent. The sculptor is Mr. Matthew Noble, of Bruton-street, London, whose model received in the competition the highest prize, £50. The likeness is admirable; the attitude of the figure is dignified, easy, and natural; Sir Robert being represented, as he has often been seen when addressing the House of Commons, with his right hand resting upon the hip, and the left (holding a scroll) slightly extended, but not elevated: while the modern costume is followed, a sufficiency of drapery is introduced—falling principally over the left shoulder—to give the statue ample breadth and appearance of stability, without hiding any portion of the figure. The statue is of bronze, 10 feet high, resting upon a plinth of the same material, about 10 inches high. The pedestal (also 10 feet high) is of polished Aberdeen granite, but in its proportions admirably calculated for its object—to afford a sufficient resting-place for the statue, and to harmonise with, if not to heighten the effect of, the figure, rather than by its extent or character to dwarf the appearance. On the front is the word "Peel," in raised letters; on the right side being engraved "Sir Robert Peel, Bart. Born February 5th, 1778; died, July 2d, 1850. Erected by public subscription, February, 1852." On the left side of the pedestal is the following extract from one of the latest speeches of the deceased statesman in the House of Commons:—

It may be that I shall leave a name sometimes remembered with severeations of goodwill in the absence of those whose ill will is to abate, and to earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow, when they shall have recruit their exhausted strength with abundant and untaxed food, the sweeter because it is no longer leavened by a sense of injustice.



PLAN OF THE NOTTINGHAM ARBORETUM.

The inauguration of the Statue on Saturday was an interesting ceremony. The members of the corporation of Salford, headed by the Mayor, Frank Ashton, Esq., walked in procession from the Town-hall to Peel Park, where, the Statue having been uncovered, Mr. Brotherton, M.P., addressed the assembly, and concluded by presenting the transfer of the Monument to the corporation, which was received by the Mayor, who then paid a graceful tribute to the character of Sir Robert Peel.

Mr. Gibson, the town-clerk, then read the deed of transfer, and the outdoor ceremony concluded. The corporation and the invited strangers then retired to the library to partake of a cold collation. A number of appropriate toasts followed, to which Sir John Potter, Sir Charnah Armitage, Mr. Edward Grundy (of Bury), Mr. Brotherton, and other gentlemen responded. The public assembled in thousands during the afternoon to view the Statue, and appeared much gratified.

OPENING OF THE NOTTINGHAM ARBORETUM.

On Tuesday this long-anticipated festival took place at Nottingham. A procession was formed at two o'clock, in the Market-place, in front of the Exchange, and marched up Clumber-street and Mansfield-road to the top entrance, and thence round the entire grounds, in the following order:—The "pinders," the livery of green turned up with silver lace; the Enclosure Commissioners; magistrates; bellman and sheriff's officers in livery, bearing small silver maces; the Mayor's serjeant in scarlet gown, bearing the large gold mace; the Mayor (Mr. W. Felkin), supported by Mr. Bal., the sheriff of the borough, and the town clerk, in their robes of office, the clerk to the magistrates, magistrates, aldermen, common councilmen, bearing wands; architect and assessors, citizens, four abreast; South Nottinghamshire Yeomanry band; citizens, four abreast; the North Leicester Yeomanry band, including part of the band of the Duke of Rutland; citizens; the Sampsonian band; citizens. Having perambulated the walks of the entire area, about 18 acres, the Mayor addressed the vast multitude, alluding to the progress making in the benefit of the working classes in every branch of science, and specially referring to the rapidly-improving position of the town of Nottingham up to the present time. The townspeople had but 300 acres for public recreation; but by an act of Parliament passed in 1845, they have gained the present Arboretum. The Mayor was loudly cheered at the conclusion of his address. The National Anthem was then sung, three times three cheers given for the Queen, and three for Mr. Felkin, and the multitude broke into groups, and devoted the remainder of the afternoon and evening to dancing, promenading the walks, listening to the music, staging, &c. A juvenile band of fifers and drummers formed a source of considerable amusement and attraction. At six o'clock the corporation and principal inhabitants dined together in the Exchange hall.

The Arboretum, of which we annex a Plan, has been most judiciously laid out. From near the principal entrance lodge stretches a miniature lake, stocked with a variety of British aquatic birds. The grounds are tastefully planted with trees and shrubs, whose botanical names it is intended to indicate by labels. The beautifully undulating greensward has been levelled in places for dancing; and handsome refreshment rooms have been built, where, however, fermented drinks have been interdicted. The Arboretum is gratuitously open three days of the week. On Tuesday there was an immense number of visitors from the midland and northern counties, from Birmingham and the Potteries, from Lancashire and the West Riding, as well as from the surrounding agricultural districts.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 15, 1852.

THE position of the Ministry, with reference to public affairs, is fertile of subjects for the discussion of our morning and evening contemporaries; but it changes so rapidly from day to day, that the duty of the writer whose lucubrations appear at intervals so far asunder as a week, becomes that of the narrator rather than of the commentator. The great Free-trade Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, promulgated last week, has already lost its novelty, and been succeeded by other subjects of ministerial and personal importance. It should not be forgotten, however, by those who watch the current of events, that Mr. Disraeli has found it convenient to qualify his truthful, but, to his party, his damaging admissions of the prosperity of the country, and to re-assert his determination at the fitting time to "do justice" to the agricultural interest. The Premier, in like manner, has endeavoured to rally his bewildered adherents, by a kind of disavowal of Mr. Disraeli's supposed Free-trade leanings, and if not in direct and set terms to reprimand the right hon. gentleman, to read him a lesson on the propriety of not being too outspoken. But Lord Derby's own speech can scarcely be considered of a more consolatory character than Mr. Disraeli's, to those who hoped and imagined that the statesmen who were friendly when out of office to the re-imposition of a corn-law, would be equally friendly to it when chance, rather than necessity, placed them in power. Lord Derby took unusual pains at the Lord Mayor's dinner, when no avowal or statement of any kind was expected of him, to explain that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had, notwithstanding his Budget and admissions, left himself and the Ministry at perfect liberty to legislate on behalf of the Protectionists; and dwelt at considerable—if not tedious—length upon the mutual "compromises" upon which our Constitution and our whole political system are based. All his Lordship's assertions in this respect were perfectly correct, and so familiar as to be properly classed among the truisms of statesmanship. It is clear, however, to what point they tend, and that the particular "compromise" to which his Lordship desires to reconcile his late party and the country has reference to the Corn Laws. But if Lord Derby have not yet received the same schooling from figures and facts as that apter scholar the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it is likely enough that he will attain the same proficiency in due time, and that he will see by the light of an enlarged experience, that though there may be "compromises" yet to be made between the leaders and the rank and file of his party, the day for any compromise on the great principle of untaxed food has gone by, and that abundance is too agreeable, and "the reason why" too evident, for any man claiming to be a statesman to destroy the one or to deny the other.

But of more immediate importance than the Free-trade conviction at which Mr. Disraeli appears to have arrived, and towards which the current of the Premier's ideas is running, is the defeat which the Ministry has suffered on the question of Parliamentary Reform. Although, in consequence of a variety of causes, the debates and divisions on the Militia Bill have exhibited the Government as one supported by a majority in the Legislature, its real weakness has been made manifest on the very first occasion of its breaking its compact with the House of Commons, and introducing a measure that could not, by any stretch of Parliamentary courtesy, be considered one of urgency, or even of expediency. The transfer of the four representatives, justly forfeited by the delinquent boroughs of St. Alban's and Sudbury, to new agricultural divisions in the great county of York, with a railway for the line of demarcation, however desirable a measure in itself, opened up too large a question to be fairly discussed in the present expiring Parliament. It was, besides, a breach of the covenant which the Ministers made on entering office; and the House showed, by the large majority in favour of Mr. Gladstone's amendment, that it was determined to hold them to their agreement, and to precipitate one of the two constitutional results—a resignation, or an appeal to the country. Hitherto the Ministers have made no sign of taking either the one or the other course; but, in the meantime, they suffer a loss of character and of confidence. Other defeats of equal, if not of greater, significance are looming before them, in face of which a lengthened session of Parliament, if it do not become impossible, will most certainly become unconstitutional. The issues to be presented will be too clear and precise for any of Lord Derby's favourite "compromises"—at least, with the present Parliament, and we may, therefore, expect a dissolution sooner than the Ministry intended, but not sooner than good faith and constitutional practice require it.

THE results of the three several divisions on Mr. Milner Gibson's motion for the repeal of the advertisement and stamp duties on newspapers, and the Excise duty upon paper, though unfavourable for the present, are of a nature, when coupled with the circumstances under which they were brought forward, and the admissions of the parties who opposed them, to lead to the confident belief that the obnoxious "taxes on knowledge" are not destined to be much longer continued. Indeed it is evident, from the whole tenour of the debate on Wednesday, that no party has any disposition to retain more than one out of the three—the stamp on newspapers; and that a general conviction prevails, as well in Parliament as out of it, that the advertisement duty, as the Times says, "is not worth its keep;" and that the Excise on paper is not simply a tax upon knowledge, but a very serious tax upon the trade and industry of large classes of the people. The stamp on newspapers is a matter on which, as we have often before observed, public opinion is not sufficiently ripe to justify the hope of speedy, if of any, legislation. The other two questions—which were very properly separated from it by Mr. Gibson, so that members might vote upon each without prejudice to the other—stand upon a different footing, and appeal solely upon fiscal, economical, and commercial grounds to the common sense of Parliament and the country. When we know that Mr. Disraeli formerly voted for a motion identical with Mr. Gibson's, that Mr. Gladstone and his party support the repeal, that the greater part of the Whig and Liberal party look upon these taxes as fit for immediate abolition, and that the minority of the Whigs and Liberals, in conjunction with other parties, only object to immediate legislation on considerations of revenue, we may be tolerably certain that their doom is fixed. It seems not improbable that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, though he opposed the motion of Mr. Gibson on Wednesday last upon fiscal grounds, will be the statesman to repeal two if not three of the obnoxious duties. The question has made great progress, and its friends are quite content to abide the issue.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE future of the Crystal Palace is settled. On Thursday last Messrs. Fox and Henderson met Mr. Francis Fuller and his friends in the Transept, late the scene of so many glories, when the transfer was executed, the price (£70,000) paid, and possession formally delivered. At a luncheon which followed the serious part of the business, the plans of the new purchasers were to some extent explained in speeches from Messrs. Scott Russell, Fuller, S. Lang (chairman of the Brighton Railway), and others. A park of 150 acres has been secured in the neighbourhood of Sydenham. Railway communication from the interior of the Building will be opened up with the Brighton and South-Western Railways, on which the public will be conveyed in a quarter of an hour for a few pence to and from the Park and Winter Garden, to be laid out by Sir Joseph Paxton, decorated by Mr. Owen Jones, assisted by Mr. Digby Wyatt. All that trees, shrubs, flowers, fountains can do will be done to adorn the Palace, dedicated to the innocent amusement and instruction of all classes, but especially of the working classes.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE MAY MEETINGS

The "May Meetings" during the week were as follow

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN SCHOOL SOCIETY.—The 46th anniversary of this society was held on Monday. The examination, which took place in one of the large school-rooms of the building in St. George's-in-the-Fields, was attended by a great number of ladies and gentlemen. Amongst the visitors were Lord John Russell and party, Viscount Ebrington, Earl of Carlisle, Sir John Boileau, Bart., Sir Walter Stirling, Bart., Charles Hindley, Esq., M.P., Chevalier Bunsen and Ernest Bunsen, the Baroness Rothschild, J. Scholefield, Esq., M.P., &c. The examination was carried on by two of the pupil-teachers, who have been appreciated under the auspices of the Government Inspectors. At its conclusion, Lord John Russel expressed the great satisfaction which he had felt in witnessing the examination. His Lordship then addressed himself to the boys, affectionately reminding them of the responsibilities which rested on all those who have received the blessings of intellectual training, and urging them to improve the advantages which they possessed at school; and to seek the divine blessing to enable them to use those blessings aright. The company then proceeded to the girls' school-room, and the annual meeting (Lord John Russell in the chair) then followed. The report, which was read, stated the average number of children in daily attendance in the model schools had been 1030, 29 pupil-teachers were serving their apprenticeship. The normal schools for teachers were full; 60 candidates were preparing for certificates. 123 teachers had obtained certificates of merit from the Committee of Council; 181 students had been during the year in the normal school for young men, and 143 in that for young women: 163 had been appointed to schools—viz. 85 to boys' schools, and 78 to girls' schools. The schools throughout the country were prospering. The foreign operations of the society, it was stated, were also extending, embracing the colonies and almost every part of the world. The receipts from the "afflicted Island" of Jamaica stated that the people there sent their children to dig yams, rather than pay 3d. a week for the maintenance of legacies, the society having been £103 8s. 3d. in arrear at the commencement of the past year. The meeting was addressed by the Earl of Carlisle, Viscount Ebrington, and Lord John Russell, in support of resolutions which were passed in furtherance of the objects of the society. Amongst the subscriptions announced was £100 from her Majesty and Prince Albert.

PROTESTANT ASSOCIATION.—On Wednesday the annual meeting of this association was held at Exeter Hall; the Earl of Roden in the chair. The report was read by the chairman of the committee, and gave a full account of the extension of the operations of the society, and stated the receipts of the year to be £1013 6s. 8d., and the expenditure £963 13s. 7d., leaving a balance of £50 4s. 9d. Resolutions in favour of the principle of returning men to Parliament "who will make the cause of Protestantism paramount to mere party considerations," and declaring that "all grants of public money for the support of Popery in any shape may be withdrawn," were unanimously agreed to. The principal speakers were the noble chairman, the Rev. T. Nolan, and the Rev. Dr. M'Neill.

CHURCH PASTORAL AID SOCIETY.—The great annual meeting of this society was held on Tuesday, at Exeter Hall—the Earl of Shaftesbury in the chair supported by the Earl of Waldegrave, Sir John Kennaway, and many others. The report, which was read, was very satisfactory, and showed a considerable increase had been made in the number of the agents of the society.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.—On Tuesday morning, at six o'clock, a public break'ast, in furtherance of the objects of this association, took place at the Freemasons' Tavern; the Earl of Harrowby presiding, supported by the American Minister, the Rev. R. C. Robinson, the Rev. Mr. Harrison, the Rev. T. Nolan, and other clergymen of the Church of England. The guests numbered about 300. It appeared from the report that the receipts of the association during the year were £3108 9s. 7d., being an increase over that of the previous year of £1059 9s. 4d. The total expenditure of the year was £3438 1s. 2d., and the balance due to the treasurer £79 14s. 2d. The excess of expenditure was caused by the special efforts made during the Exhibition, the cost of which amounted to upwards of £500. At nine o'clock the business terminated.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The 58th annual meeting of this important society was held on Thursday, at Exeter Hall, Strand. The Lord Mayor was in the chair. The report stated that the total number of European missionaries now employed by the society amounts to 176, with 700 native agents, and gave an account of the progress made by the missionaries in China, India, the West Indies, South Africa, Madagascar, China, India, &c. The receipts of the year amount to £69 048 12s. 3d., including £3215 2s. 1d. raised for the relief of the immediate sufferers from the war at the Cape, and for the relief of the widows and orphans of deceased missionaries. This was more than £1000 over the income of the previous year. The gross expenditure exceeded the income, having amounted to £73,831 1s. 6d.

THE ROYAL ASYLUM OF ST. ANN'S SOCIETY.—The anniversary dinner of this institution, the object of which is the maintenance and education of the children, whether orphans or not, of persons of all nations, who have been once in prosperity, was held on Wednesday, at the London Tavern; the Earl of Yarborough in the chair. After the usual toasts, the children were introduced into the room, a poetical address written for the occasion was delivered by one of the boys, and they were addressed by the benevolent founder. In the course of the evening, it was stated, that since the establishment of the institution 1000 boys and 600 girls had been passed out and apprenticed, and there were now maintained 300 children, of whom 226 were wholly provided for in the asylum at Brixton, and the remainder were partially assisted in their education and maintenance in town. Donations amounting to about £1400 were announced to have been received.

RAGGED SCHOOL UNION.—On Monday evening the Earl of Shaftesbury presided over the eighth annual meeting of the friends of this institution, held at Exeter-hall. In the course of his Lordship's address, he stated that at the first anniversary, which took place in 1844, there were 30 schools, 300 voluntary teachers, and 2000 children; and the amount collected in subscriptions was only £61. These numbers had gradually increased from year to year, and at the present time there were 110 schools, 1000 voluntary teachers, and 200 paid teachers, and 13,700 children; whilst the sum collected was £2813. The report, which was adopted, stated that fourteen new schools had been added during the past year, many boys had been placed out in situations, and 200 admitted had now under their consideration a plan for granting certificates of merit. Schools on the same system had been established in all the large towns in the kingdom.

MENDICITY SOCIETY.—The annual general meeting of the Society for the Suppression of Mendicity was held on Saturday last, at the society's office, No. 1, Red Lion-square. The Marquis of Westminster, the president of the society, occupied the chair. It appeared from the report that the number of recipients for the year 1851 were 25117 17s. 8d., against 26047 7s. 6d. received in 1850; and the expenditure £4613, against £5275. The number of mendicants relieved, or whose appeals were rejected, amounted, 1100, against 787 in 1850: vagrants admitted in 1851, 900; in 1850, 970: discharged in 1851, 577; in 1850, 295. Begging letters referred for investigation in 1851, 3901; in 1850, 4117. The total receipts for the year were £5117; the balance on the 31st Dec. was £381 14s.

THE NEW ASYLUM FOR FATHERLESS CHILDREN.—On Tuesday evening the anniversary festival in aid of the funds of this institution took place at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street; C. S. M. Peto, M.P., presiding. The chairman, in proposing "Prosperity to the Institution," stated that the institution was formed for the purpose of relieving fatherless children, without respect to age, sex, place, or party; and the only qualification was that the child must be destitute, and above the condition of the mere pauper. In the space of seven years the board had received on the foundation 178 children, and they had now under their care 101; but the numbers seeking admission had been far greater than those actually received to the benefits of the charity. It was therefore thought expedient and necessary to erect a suitable habitation for the accommodation of these helpless children sufficiently near to London for convenience, and yet so far removed as to secure an airy situation. The children of the asylum had previously walked round the room, and the chairman took the opportunity of observing that their appearance afforded a stronger argument in favour of the charity than any could advance. The space of seven years the board had received on the foundation 178 children, and they had now under their care 101; but the numbers seeking admission had been far greater than those actually received to the benefits of the charity. It was therefore thought expedient and necessary to erect a suitable habitation for the accommodation of these helpless children sufficiently near to London for convenience, and yet so far removed as to secure an airy situation. The children of the asylum had previously walked round the room, and the chairman took the opportunity of observing that their appearance afforded a stronger argument in favour of the charity than any could advance. The plan of the institution were so far responded to, that the list of subscriptions announced in the course of the evening comprised an amount exceeding £1000, of which sum a donation of 250 guineas was presented by the chairman.

PHILANTHROPIC SOCIETY'S FARM SCHOOL.—The anniversary festival of this school was held on Saturday last, at the London Tavern, when about 100 gentlemen sat down to dinner. Sir J. Duke, Bart., M.P., presided, and was supported by Lord Lyttelton; Sir W. Jolliffe, M.P.; C. B. Adderley, M.P.; R. M. Milnes, M.P., &c. The subscription list read exhibited contributions to the amount of about £1400

DOMESTIC SERVANTS' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—The annual meeting of the friends of this institution was held on Tuesday, at the Hanover-square Rooms, Lord Robert Grosvenor in the chair. It appeared by the report that was read, and subsequently adopted, that there were 12 recipients of pensions during the past year. The financial statement showed the receipts for the past year, including subscriptions £1344 10s., donations £97 8s. 2d., to have been £1773 17s. 2d., and the expenditure for same period amounted to £1647 18s. 6d., leaving a balance in hand of £126 2s. 2d.

FEMALE SERVANTS' HOME SOCIETY.—At the sixteenth annual meeting of this society, held on Saturday last, in Exeter Hall Mr. C. J. Bevan in the chair—it was stated that more than 22,000 servants had registered in the homes free of expense, and that above 4000 inmates had been received. There were about 100,000 domestic servants employed in London, and general 10,000 out of place. In the course of the evening, seventeen servants, who had lived three years in their situations, received the society's reward of a handsomely-bound Bible and a sovereign. The chairman, with his accustomed liberality, presented the sovereigns. Previous to the meeting 120 servants took tea in the hall, including a party of young women about to emigrate under the auspices of the Female Emigration Society. Among other ladies and gentlemen there were present the Hons. Mrs. S. Herbert and Mr. Acourt.

THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.—Thursday being the Queen's birth-day, the bells of the metropolitan churches rang a merry peal, and the flags at the Horse Guards, the Admiralty, and Somerset-house, and the different city churches, were hoisted His Royal Highness Prince Albert and his Grace the Duke of Wellington, who were attended by a brilliant staff, reviewed the troops on the parade behind the Horse Guards At two o'clock the Speaker of the House of Commons proceeded to Buckingham Palace from the House, according to usual custom. Several of the river steamers hoisted flags. In the evening the illuminations were as extensive as usual. The weather, however, was not very propitious.

THE NATIONAL CLUB.—The annual meeting of the members of the National Club was held at the Club-house, Old Palace-yard, on Wednesday afternoon, for the purpose of receiving the report of the committee for the year just elapsed. Lord Berners occupied the chair; and Mr Bellamy, the secretary, read the report, which, amongst other things, recommended that every candidate at the approaching election should be required to pass the following tests:—"First, will he maintain the institutions of our country, and will he maintain them Protestant? Second, will he defend the Christian character of the British Parliament, as declared in the form of the oath required from Protestants—"on the true faith of a Christian?" Third, what are his views of the claims of the Romish priesthood? Is he for the supremacy of the Pope or of our laws? And, fourth, will he pay the Queen's debts? Will he maintain the act which gives British money to Romish colleges? Subsequently a large party of the gentlemen dined together at the Clubhouse over which the Attorney-General for Ireland (Mr. Napier, M.P.) presided, havier for his supporters Lord Berners, Viscount Bernard, M.P., the Bishop of Cashel, Sir W. Verner, M.P., Sir Brook Bridges, M.P., Mr. Newdegate, M.P., Mr. Smith O'Brien, M.P., &c

ROYAL LITERARY FUND.—The sixty-third anniversary of this institution was celebrated on Wednesday by a dinner at the Freemasons' Tavern. About 120 gentlemen sat down. Lord Campbell presided, and amongst those present were the Belgian, the Prussian, the United States, and the Danish, and the Persian Ministers, Lord John Stuart, Mr. Justice Talfourd, Sir A Cockburn, Sir Frederick Pollock, Attorney-General and Solicitor-General for Ireland, the Queen's Advocate, Mr. Charles Hindley, M.P.; Mr. Monckton Milnes, M.P.; Mr. Campbell, M.P.; Mr. Thackeray, the Rev. Professor Brown, Professor Creasy, &c. From the annual report, which was read, it appeared that £1635 had been distributed during the past year to 51 necessitous authors, being an excess of £600 over the charity of last year. The following is the classification of authors relieved:—History and biography 8 grants, £360; biblical literature, 2, £45; science and arts, £240; topography and travels, 7, £260; classical literature and education, 6, £170; poetry, 4, £110; essays and tales, 11, 285; drama, 6. £175; medicine, 2, £70: total, £1635. A list of subscriptions was announced amounting to £869.

ARTISTS' BENEVOLENT FUND.—The anniversary of this justly-celebrated charity was held on Saturday last at the Freemasons' Tavern; Sir Charles Eastlake, president of the Royal Academy, in the chair. The Artists' Fund was established in the year 1810, and obtained a Royal charter of incorporation in 1827. Her Majesty is the patroness of the institution. It consists of two separate and distinct branches—the Artists' Annuity Fund, and the Artists' Benevolent Fund. The Artists' Benevolent Fund is raised and wholly supported by the contributions of its members, for their own relief, in sickness or old age or cessation. Three hundred artists are at present members of the Annuity Fund. The Benevolent Fund is raised and supported by the donations and subscriptions of the patrons of the fine arts, for the relief of the widows and orphans of the members of the Annuity Fund. About ninety gentlemen sat down to dinner. Mr. Thackeray proposed "The Royal Academy;" and the toast was responded to by David Roberts, Esq., R.A. The other toasts were "The British Institution, and other societies established for the promotion of the fine arts." "The Superintendent and members of the Artists' Annuity Fund," and "The Artists' General Benevolent Institution." The usual complimentary toasts followed. The gross amount of the subscriptions announced was £450

PUBLIC DISPENSARY, CAREY-STREET.—A general meeting of the subscribers and friends of this charity was held on Tuesday at the chambers of Mr. R. Twining in the chair. From the secretary's report it appeared that 1243 patients had received medical advice and assistance during the past quarter. Of the number 219 had been visited at their own residences. There were three physicians and one surgeon connected with the charity. The full average number of patients had been attended to, but the funds of the institution were described as being at rather a low ebb, and subscriptions were solicited.

ADULT ORPHAN ASYLUM.—On Tuesday a special general meeting of the friends and subscribers to this charity was held in the board-room of the Institution, Regent's-park, for the purpose of electing three candidates into the house, upon their votes for nominees; Earl Manvers in the chair. The number of inmates, including those just elected, is now 40. The total income of the society for the past year, exclusive of a balance in hand of £390 13s. 1d., was £2841 4s. 8d., and after all the necessary expenses had been defrayed, the balance in the hands of the treasurer was reduced to £238 14s 3d.

LONDON HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL.—The annual distribution of prizes took place on Tuesday, Mr William Cotton, D.C.L., vice-president of the hospital, in the chair, in the presence of a large body of the governors and friends of the hospital and school. The hospital gold medals awarded by the governors for the most distinguished proficiency in attendance on the patients in the wards:—Medical—Frederick Hall, Lincoln. Surgical Alfred Adams Mantell. Bitton. Medicine—Senior Class: Gold Medal, F. Hall. Honorary Certificate, Harry May, the Potteries. Junior Class: Silver Medal, Robert Walker Jenkins, London; Honorary Certificate, Joseph Portier, Rotherhithe. Surgery—Senior Class: Gold Medal, R. W. Jenkins; Honorary Certificate, F. Hall. Junior Class: Silver Medal, Samuel Peat Woodhill Footaway. Anatomy and Physiology -Senior Class. Gold Medal, Horace Kersey Dobenham; Honorary Certificate, John Charles Robertson, Purbrook. Junior Class: Silver Medal, James Hedger Edmunds, Burnham. Midwifery.—Gold Medal, Robert Brudenell Carter, Leytonstone; Honorary Certificate, C. C. Robertson. Chemistry—Silver Medal, Alfred Phipos, Deaton; Honorary Certificate, Alexander Robert Kilroy, Plymouth. Materia Medica—Silver Medal, R. W. Jenkins; Honorary Certificate, H. K. Debenham. Forensic Medicine—Silver Medal, R W. Jenkins, Honorary Certificate, William Henry Carter, Billericay. Botany Silver Medal, R. W. Jenkins; Honorary Certificate, H. M'Pherson, Lanchester. At the conclusion of the distribution, Mr. Cotton delivered a kind and able address to the students.

ARCHITECTURAL PUBLICATION SOCIETY.—On Monday evening the annual meeting of the members of this society took place at the rooms of the Royal Institute of British Architects, in Grosvenor-street; Mr. David Mocatta in the chair A report was read, which recommended, among other things, that, instead of working out the scheme of a cyclopædia, as hitherto contemplated, the project be carried into execution as a dictionary of explanation and reference, with woodcuts and lithographic plates, so arranged as to be completed in about seven years, at the present amount of subscriptions. The balance-sheet showed that the amount of receipts for the year was £904 14s. 4d., whilst the expenditure was £459 9s. 9d., leaving a balance of £44 4s. 7d. The report was adopted, and various resolutions were passed with a view of promoting the objects of the institution.

SCREW STEAM SHIPPING COMPANY.—On Wednesday a general meeting of this company was held at the London Tavern. Mr. Ellis, who took the chair, stated that they had arranged with the Board of Trade for the composition which they had to make They proposed to raise the capital of the company by the issue of £30 shares, instead of £100, and that they should have the power of borrowing to the extent of one quarter of the amount of capital. The present charter limited their powers of borrowing to £15 000, while all other corporations could borrow to any extent. He proposed the rescinding of the clause stating the duties of the office of the company secretary, and that the minute book should not be open to inspection without the order of the board. He a so proposed that voting in person should be secret, but that by proxy open. Lastly, he proposed that 2s. 6d. be charged for the transfer of the shares and above that number. The various alterations in the deed were then submitted and agreed to unanimously.

AUSTRALIAN WOOL.—On Wednesday afternoon a meeting of merchants, manufacturers, and other persons engaged in the woollen and worsted trades of the West Riding of Yorkshire was held in the rotunda of the Coloured Cloth-hall, Leeds, for the purpose of taking steps with respect to the supply of wool from the Australian colonies. Sir George Goodman, of Leeds, was called to the chair; and, among the persons present, were some of the principals in the chief firms engaged in textile manufactures at Leeds, Bradford, Huddersfield, and other towns. The feeling of the meeting was unanimous that it was desirable in favour of the Government taking immediate steps to send out a large number of emigrants, who would meet with remunerative employment in the Australian colonies as agricultural labourers, shepherds, &c. Resolutions of many formerly engaged in such employments having gone to the gold diggings; and a deputation was appointed to wait upon the Government, with a view of urging the adoption of the measure. The local association for promoting it was agreed to by a formal resolution, and Sir G. Goodman was elected its president

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—The births registered in the metropolis for the week ending Saturday, May 8, were—Males, 810; females, 800: total, 1660. The deaths during the same period were—Males, 698; females, 474: total 972. The rate of mortality now prevailing differs little from the average standard. Of the persons enumerated in the present return, 498 were males and 474 females; 451 died under 15 years of age, 339 at 15 years and under 60, and 176 at 60 years and upwards. As compared with the results of the previous week there is a decrease both in the deaths caused by epidemic taken altogether, and those by diseases of the respiratory organs, the former having declined from 232 to 193, the latter from 187 to 166.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean daily reading of the barometer was above 30 inches on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday; the mean of the week was 29 965 in. The mean temperature of the week was 48·1 deg, or 3·5 deg. below the average of the same week in ten years. The wind blew generally from the north-east till Friday, when it changed to south-west.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

CHANCERY REFORM.

On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, the Masters in Chancery Bill was read a second time, and referred to a select committee. The noble and learned Lord then laid on the table three other measures intended further to carry out various improvements in the administration of justice in the Court of Chancery. The first of these bills was read a first time.

CONVOCATION.

Lord RADNORDALE drew the attention of the House to the question of the revival of Convocation, and referred to the Convocation at York for several years past, at which no business was transacted, and the Archbishop did not attend. He expressed a hope that in future years the Archbishop would allow the session to be opened as had been done in the province of Canterbury, in compliance with the wishes of the clergy.

The Archbishop of YORK stated that on the occasions referred to, all that was strictly consistent with ancient practice and usage. He could not, however, consider himself as binding himself to depart from the ordinary observations of the noble Lord would receive his best consideration, referring to his bill in the session of 1850 for regulating the proceedings of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council in all questions of religious doctrine, said he should next year introduce another bill upon this subject, which would differ from the previous measure in an important point. He still intended to provide that questions of doctrine shall be referred to the bishops, or to the Upper Houses of Convocation, for their opinion; but their opinion should only be communicated to the judicial committee of Privy Council and not be binding. It would be merely communicated to them in the way of advice, and not of direction. The right reverend prelate expressed a hope that some proposition of this kind would receive favourable consideration from the Government.

The Earl of DERBY said he could not pledge the Government to the course they might take on such a proposition; but he was strongly of opinion that, where questions of false doctrine or heresy arose, the opinion and judgment of the bishops, although they might not lay down an absolute and binding authority, must be very important in directing and guiding the minds of those by whom the final decision was to be pronounced.

The Ecclesiastical Muniments Bill was referred to a select committee.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. ISAAC BUTT, Q.C., took the oaths and his seat for Harwich. The hon. member was introduced to the House by Sir R. Inglis and Mr. G. A. Hamilton.

THE WEST INDIES.

Sir J. PAKINGTON having presented petitions from Jamaica, numerously signed, and from British Guiana, signed by 4000 persons, complaining of severe distress, and praying that a remedy might be speedily applied, stated, in reply to Sir R. H. Inglis, that there was no intention on the part of the Government to propose any measure in the present session, by the re-enactment of discriminating duties or otherwise, to relieve the distress in the West India colonies, and declined to say what they might consider it proper to do in another parliament.

THE FORFEITED SEATS (SUDBURY AND ST. ALBAN'S).—DISTRESS AT THE GOVERNMENT.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in accordance with previous notice, moved for leave to bring in a bill to assign the four seats in Parliament, rendered vacant by the disfranchisement of Sudbury and St. Alban's. The right hon. gentleman recalled attention to his statement in March last, that her Majesty would not be advised to dissolve Parliament until certain measures of extensive, or at least of paramount importance were passed, amongst which he had enumerated the Militia Bill, the Chancery Reform Bill, and a measure for making up the total number of representatives. This he thought would exonerate him from the charge of being even in appearance a breach of faith, in introducing this bill in the present session. He knew of no magic virtue in the number of 658 which should entitle it to express the aggregate composition of the House of Commons, any more than in 13 as the number of a jury; but, considering that to violate prescription was always a dangerous order, it was proper that the aggregate should be completed. Ministers had no intention to defer the distribution by bringing in this measure, for it was their interest, seeing they had at present Parliament again this year, to dissolve as soon as possible, in order to have time to prepare their measures to submit to the new House of Commons. The various propositions for introducing some new element in the formation of constituencies, were deserving attention. The claims of learned societies to parliamentary representation appeared at first sight reasonable, but learned societies in the nineteenth century did not consist always of learned men; and if the Royal Society were followed by others, where, how could the House refuse the Geological, the Geographical, the Ethnological, and the Astronomical Societies, or any new societies of the same character that might arise, the same privilege. And if several of such institutions were grouped together (the members of them being self elected), they would still not present the proper elements of a parliamentary constituency. Again, as to the Scotch universities and the Lancashire University—they did not possess a seat at present; the same organisation for an electoral body as the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The claims of the cities of court he was not disposed to slight, but it would be hopeless to propose to allocate to them the exact seats to them under existing circumstances. It was then proposed to adhere to the existing seamens, dealing with the claims of the different communities according to relative representation they now possessed, or to proceed according to the number of the constituencies as compared with the population. Taking this principle, the East Riding of Yorkshire seemed paramount; accordingly, the Ministerial project was to divide it into two constituency. The Ridings would be divided by the line of the Midland Railway—all that part lying on the south-west of the line to form the southern division, and all that part on the north-east to form the northern division; each to possess two members. The towns intersected by the railway to go to the northern division to which Leeds would belong, as the chief town; Wakefield being the principal polling town of the southern division. This would give a constituency of 17,965 for the northern, and 18,785 to the southern division. It would be unreasonable to say that the result of this division would be to give a preponderance to the agricultural interest in the northern division, seeing that the constituency in the other division would be wholly manufacturing; and if the result of giving that preponderance to the south should be to keep Mr. Cobden permanently its representative, he should rejoice, believing it was better, where a man had the power of influencing large masses of the population, that he should be in a position where he was responsible to the House of Commons. The other two members it was proposed to give to South Lancashire, which would be divided by the hundreds of West Derby and Salford, the former containing the important town of Liverpool, and a constituency of 9500, and the latter the equally important town of Manchester, and a constituency of 12,900.

Mr. GLADSTONE opposed the motion of the right honourable gentleman, and proposed as an amendment that the House should pass to the orders of the day, on the ground that the measure was not one of urgency, nor was there any constitutional necessity for it, while there was a positive constitutional reason against dealing with the subject in the present "moribund" Parliament. There was not only no cabalistic or magic power in the number 658 as the aggregate of the House of Commons, but there was not even law. The number was the result of accident, and the prescription was that of but some 40 or 50 years. There was nothing to prevent Parliament from either reducing or increasing it according to convenience or policy. The distinct understanding upon which the Government had been allowed to carry on the business in a minority was that no legislation except such as was of unquestionable urgency should be proposed in the present Parliament, and that the policy of Free Trade, which its supporters could not permit to exist on sufferance, or at the mercy of those who were, disguise it as they might, opposed to it, should be finally by the country at the next general election. To apportion seats, to create new constituencies, and decide on the conflicting claims for parliamentary representation, should be the work of a strong executive, not one that held power on sufferance.

A pause ensued, when no hon. member rising, a division took place.

The members were—For the motion of the Government, 148; for the amendment, 234: majority against the Government, 86.

THE MILITIA.

The House then went into committee on the Militia Bill, resuming the discussion at clause 7, when

Mr HUME took occasion to urge that the consideration of the bill should be postponed to the next session.

Mr. WALPOLE described the proposition as unreasonable, after the House had so repeatedly affirmed the propriety of proceeding with the measure.

In the course of a long discussion, Mr. WAKLEY moved that progress be reported. On division, the mot on was rejected by 156 to 85: majority, 71.

The clause was then put, and Mr. Hume dividing the committee, was carried by 163 to 83: majority, 87.

On clause 8,

Mr. MILNER GIBSON moved its postponement, which was resisted by Government, and rejected on division by 216 to 99: majority, 117.

After considerable discussion the clause was agreed to, and the chairman then reported progress.

Adjourned at half-past twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The proceedings in their Lordships' House were limited to the presentation of petitions, and advancing by a stage the Colonial Bishops Bill, the Repayment of Advances (Ireland) Bill, and the Diabolical Papal Bill.

Amongst the petitions were some against the continuance of the grant to Maynooth, presented by the Ear. of Shaftesbury and the Duke of Argyll.

Lord MONTEAGLE presented a petition complaining of the practical exclusion of natives in India from superior official employments.

Their Lordships adjourned to Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

EGYPT AND THE PORTE.

In reply to Mr. Anderson, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER announced that official information had been received of the satisfactory arrangement of all differences between the Porte and Abbas Pacha—the power of life and death having been conceded to the Pacha for seven years.

THE CAPE.

Sir J. PAKINGTON, to a question by Sir W. Molesworth, replied that the constitutional ordinances for the Cape not having yet received the assent of General Cathcart, would not at present be laid before Parliament, and added that the recent despatches were more favourable than those previously received as to the attitude taken by the Boers at the Orange River territory.

THE REV. MR. BENNETT

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in consequence of an appeal from Mr. Bennett, assured the House that every effort had been made by Government to the circumstances attending the induction of Mr. Bennett to the living of Frome was unremitting, and he hoped soon to be able to communicate something definite in regard to the inquiry which had been instituted.

UNSTAMPED PUBLICATIONS AND THE BOARD OF INLAND REVENUE.

Mr. HUME reverted to the case of the Dunfermline News, to which he had referred on the previous Friday as having been threatened with a prosecution for being without a stamp. He had a letter signed "A. Ingram, solicitor," on behalf of the Board of Inland Revenue, in which the printer of the publication was threatened with prosecution, and asked the Attorney-General to reconcile the circumstance with his former statement that no proceedings would be taken against the printer of papers.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL supposed that Mr. Fletcher must be the solicitor to the inland department of the board in Scotland. The Solicitor of the Inland Revenue office in London, whom he (the Attorney-General) had seen, had informed him that he knew nothing of any prosecution being instituted or threatened against the editor of the publication in question, and that no proceedings could take place without the sanction of the board.

Mr. HUME trusted, that, when the question of the stamp duties would come under consideration, the House would hear no more about this prosecution. One department, however, ought surely to know what was going on in another.

MAYNOOTH.

Petitions, to which several thousand signatures were attached, having been presented against the continuance of the endowment out of the Consolidated Fund to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth,

Mr. SPOONER proceeded, according to previous notice, to bring forward his motion for a select committee to inquire into the system of education carried on at the College of Maynooth. He charged the system of education at that college as injurious to society, immoral in its tendency, and totally subversive of the principles of allegiance to the Queen. He contended that any grant for such a species of education as being bad in principle, and asserted that all the forebodings of those who had from the first opposed it were fully borne out by the result. It was said that it would be a breach of faith to revoke this grant to Maynooth; but this he denied, for the grant prior to 1845 had been dealt with by Parliament as it pleased. Some years ago the grant—in other years it had been larger grants than ordinary; and in others, again, smaller grants; thus clearly showing that Parliament was free to act with respect to it without rendering itself liable to a charge of bad faith. It was said that since 1845 it was to be considered as a permanent grant. This he also denied; for the Roman Catholics had made no sacrifice, had given up nothing to obtain it. It was the free gift of the Legislature, and it was, of course, in the power of the Legislature to revoke it at its pleasure. The hon. gentleman went on to argue that the doctrines taught at Maynooth were opposed to religion and morality, and that it was a national sin to support the means for maintaining such an establishment. He wished it to be understood that he did not impute to the Roman Catholic gentry the concurrence in such doctrines as were taught at Maynooth. Indeed, he was aware that they did not, and that in fact they were not aware that such doctrines were inculcated in that institution, and were ready to repudiate them as being Catholic; but the very ignorance of well educated Roman Catholics themselves of those doctrines was perhaps the strongest argument in favour of his inquiry. He asked for Arundel's other doctrines contained in the books taught at Maynooth was one to the effect that an oath might be relaxed or abandoned for a just cause, or might be taken with a mental reservation; in fact, that there were four-and-twenty ways of getting out of an oath. His object was that there should be an end put to such teaching; that at least youths should not be brought up in a way rendering allegiance to their Protestant Sovereign a nullity. His quarrel was entirely from the moral law which was taught at Maynooth, drawing especial attention to the doctrines relating not only to oaths, but also to theft and confession, which it was impossible to defend or palliate.

The Marquis of BLANDFORD seconded the motion, and observed that, if the facts adduced by the hon. mover were true, he could see no alternative for the House but to repeal the grant to Maynooth. He had supported the grant of 1845 to Maynooth purely on the ground that it was the best arrangement that could be taken impressions, although the feeling actuating Sir Robert Peel at that time was a generous and a noble one.

Mr. ARKETT seconded the amendment, the following resolution:—"That this House will resolve itself into a committee for the purpose of considering of a bill for repealing the Maynooth Endowment Act, and all other acts for charging the public revenue in aid of ecclesiastical establishments." The hon. and learned gentleman said that his object was to supply a deficit in the proposition of Mr. Spooner, by moving for the repeal of the grant to Maynooth, but he went one step further than the hon. gentleman, by proposing in the amendment that other endowments for religious purposes, whatever might be the tenets held by the parties.

Mr. SCHOLEFIELD seconded the amendment, and said he would not be one to make an invidious attack upon a Roman Catholic grant, when there were so many larger ones to other religious persuasions, which were not at all attacked by the motion of Mr. Spooner.

Mr. Secretary WALPOLE thought Mr. Anstey's proposal, if brought forward, at all, had better be submitted as a substantive motion; but in reference to the main question, he considered that, as Parliament had made the grant, it could revoke it, and it was a fit subject for inquiry whether it had answered the purposes intended. In 1845 Sir R. Peel proposed to increase the grant and alter its form, believing that it would tend to break up that formidable conspiracy then existing in Ireland against the British Government and British connexion, and provide a loyal, well-educated priesthood for the people of Ireland. With regard to the priesthood, there was reason to believe that many of those educated in the college were disposed to enter upon the duties of foreign monastic orders, instead of remaining for the benefit of the Irish people. Then there was evidence showing that there was a confederacy against the British Crown and Britain's rule, and that since the arrival of Archbishop Cullen the character of the priesthood had changed, and foreign instead of domestic influences prevailed; and on the point of poverty, it was seen that the Roman Catholics, obeying the decrees of the Synod of Thurles, refused to avail themselves of the Government provision for education, but found means to provide it for themselves. The inference was, that the conciliatory and benevolent objects of Parliament had been defeated and destroyed by those who were acting under foreign influence. Under all the circumstances, therefore, the proposal for inquiry was fully justified.

Mr. B. OSBORNE would not join in the fanatic no-popery cry, however detrimental it might be to him on the eve of a general election, but called on the House to remember Sir R. Peel's declaration against any inquiry, as tending to excite religious bitterness between Protestants and Roman Catholics in England as well as Ireland. He asked how Ministers could reconcile the speech of the Home Secretary with Mr. Disraeli's declaration in 1844, that until Ireland had ecclesiastics equality, there would be no basis of peace and order in that country? So long as there was no ecclesiastical equality, he would be no party to any one-sided blow against his Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen. He denied that the grant was in the character of a compact; it was restitution; and with regard to the disloyalty of the priesthood and the interference of Archbishop Cullen, the Home Secretary did not appear to know that Archbishop Cullen was not educated at Maynooth, but amongst the sympathiser with Mr. Smith O'Brien there were far more Trinity men than Maynooth men, and that it was a Trinity man who was the author of "Who fears to speak of '98?" To be consistent, then, the inquiry should extend to Trinity, and all other endowments. Hon. gentlemen talked of grants for Roman Catholic purposes in Ireland, yet all the money granted for such purposes since the Union was £3-5,670, while in the same time £5,167,000 had been voted for the Established Church, and £1,019,000 for dissenting bodies. He would be no party to an attempt to prop up Protestant ascendancy by humiliating the Roman Catholics of the empire

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER begged the indulgence of the House for one moment. The honourable member who had just sat down had referred to a speech which he (Mr Disraeli) had made on the Maynooth grant in 1845. The hon member had said that he supported the present motion as a continuance of what he found in that speech. There could be no mistake as to the speech to which the honourable member had referred, for besides giving the date of it, he had read several passages from it during the conduct of the Government of the day. The hon. member then called the attention of the House to what he styled a graphic description of Ireland in that speech. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) felt compelled to say, at the time that there was no such passage in the speech, and, on sending for Hansard, he found that there was not one single syllable in the speech of that which the hon member had quoted

Mr. OSBORNE said the right hon. gentleman was getting out of it in his usual quibbling way—(Loud cries of "Order")—he begged the right hon. gentleman's pardon—he should, perhaps, have said, his usual ingenious way. (A laugh.) The passage referred to was spoken in the debate of February 16, 1844. He had quoted also from the speech of April, 1845, but the words referred to were used in the debate of February 16, 1844. The right hon. gentleman could not now eat those words.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that the hon. gentleman had quoted his speech on Maynooth, and gave the date of it, April 11, 1845. It now appeared there was no such passage as that quoted of the date of April 1845, and the hon. member now said that it was spoken in 1844 in the debate that day had to do with the assertion of the hon. gentleman that he grounded his opposition to the motion on the speech which he had attributed to him.

Mr. A. B. HOPE protested against the hybrid motion of Mr. Spooner, which breathed forth the spirit of religious intolerance and persecution under the guise of calling for inquiry.

Mr. NEWDEGATE supported the motion.

Mr. MONSELL had not expected, in the present day, a Secretary of State would cast an insult on the religion of one-third of her Majesty's subjects. He would not oppose the inquiry, believing the closer the investigation the stronger would be the proof that it carried out the intentions of its founders, and that the teaching was satisfactory.

Mr. J. DUFF thought, if an investigation was to be instituted, it should extend to Trinity College

Mr. MOORE accused Mr Spooner of perverting and falsifying some of the extracts he had read, and of bringing forward a motion to different from that which he had formerly proposed, betraying in that House agitation to which he pandered out of it.

Mr. GLADSTONE declared his intention of voting for inquiry. He did not contend that Parliament could not withdraw the endowment; but it would be most unwise and dangerous to do so, unless the purposes for which it was founded could be shown to have failed, which he did not believe. If it were withdrawn, Parliament must be prepared to enter into an examination of the whole question of ecclesiastical endowments in Ireland; that would be the inevitable consequence. But there had been points referred to which might properly be investigated; as, for instance, whether priests were educated in Maynooth for foreign countries instead of the religious instruction of the Irish people—whether the vow was taken that the allegiance of the students should be preserved, of which he felt it a doubt, and as to the proper application of the funds. but as to the teaching of the Roman Catholic religion in the college, that was not a subject for inquiry. Neither was the question whether the endowment should or should not be rescinded one to be entrusted to a committee under the guidance of Mr Spooner, who had expressed a foregone conclusion, but should be carried on by the Government.

Mr H. GRATTAN spoke of the motion as an insult to the Irish Roman Catholics.

Sir R. INGLIS regarded Mr. Gladstone's sypathesis of a revision of all ecclesiastical endowments in Ireland as a sort of threat of a further conditional on of the property of the Established Church in Ireland. With the prospect or a dissolution within three weeks or a month, the proposed inquiry could scarcely produce any result; but, as the leaders on both sides concurred in it, he should vote for the motion as a recognition of a principle.

Mr. HUME thought it most inconsistent, when Ministers were calling for an additional force of 80,000 men for the defence of the country, that they should give their sanction to a measure which must increase the discontent of the people of Ireland.

Lord PALMERSTON said he would, if the House should divide, vote against both the amendment and the original motion. The latter, if agreed to, would lead either to a nullity or to a policy decidedly mischievous. He thought no case whatever had been made out against the course of teaching at Maynooth, all tough the hon. member for Stockport had indulged in long diatribes against the tenets of the Catholic religion. That motion originated in the aggressive measures taken by the Court of Rome, which had given rise to such a feeling on the part of the people of England that they urged retaliation. The present motion might therefore be regarded as one of vengeance, and of vengeance alike unjust and impolitic. If, however, inquiry were necessary, there was no worse way of conducting it than by a committee of the House of Commons. If they agreed to the motion, it would be nothing less than yielding to a fanatical cry for the purpose of securing their seats at the approaching election. If an inquiry were to take place at all, it should be conducted by a commission appointed by the Government.

Mr. Serjeant MURPHY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. RAPHAEL said it was a disgrace to England to open the question of adjournment, severally declared that they were not bound by the declaration of Mr. Monsell.

Mr. HEYWOOD desired to hear if the Secretary of Ireland agreed in the no-popery speech of the Home Secretary. The people of Ireland should know that, if the Government were strong enough, they would repeal the act of 1829.

Mr. H. DRUMMOND spoke to the adjournment.

Mr. KNOX rose, amid manifestations of impatience on the part of the House, to support the motion for adjournment. He had heard an hon gentleman connected with the Government state that this was an open question with the Administration, and he thought the opinion of the members of the Ministry should be manfully expressed (Hear, hear.) He hoped the House would allow him to say a few words in explanation of a personal matter. His hon. friend near him (Mr. Osborne) had quoted certain passages from a speech of the Secretary of the Exchequer, and he understood that right hon. gentleman to convey to the House that he was not only disposed to repudiate the sentiments he at that time expressed, but that the fact was that he never uttered such opinion had entirely escaped his memory. Now, lest there should be any mistake upon the subject, he (Mr. Keogh) begged permission to read, from the authorised version of the Standard, the passage to which his hon. friend had alluded. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking upon a motion brought forward by the noble member for the city of London (Lord J. Russell), and referring to agitation in Ireland, used these words:—

> They heard a great deal of Reform Associations, of Anti-Corn Law Leagues, Roman Catholic and Repeal Associations, Birmingham Unions, and other combinations of that kind. Now, those things were very dangerous in any country, because the government of the country into their own hands, because the Government would not administer matters themselves (Hear, hear.) Then going on to ask what the Irish question really was, the right hon. gentleman said:—
> One said it was a physical question, another a spiritual. Now it was the absence of the aristocracy, then the absence of railroads. It was the Pope one day, potatoes the next. They had a starving population, and a domineering an Alien Church (Hear, hear;—and, in addition, the weakest Executive in the world.

But the right hon. gentleman did not stop there. He proceeded:

> But the right hon. gentleman asked the question, and very properly, what is the remedy for the present condition of a country in that position? They could say at once, "The remedy is revolution." But the Irish could not have a revolution; and why? Because the Government was commanded by a most powerful people.

(Hear, hear.) Then going on to ask what the Irish question really was, the right hon. gentleman said:—

> One said it was a physical question, another a spiritual. Now it was the absence of the aristocracy, then the absence of railroads. It was the Pope one day, potatoes the next. They had a starving population, and a domineering an Alien Church (Hear, hear;—and, in addition, the weakest Executive in the world.

But the right hon. gentleman did not stop there. He proceeded:

> But the right hon. gentleman asked the question, and very properly, what is the remedy for the present condition? They could say at once, "The remedy is revolution." But the Irish could not have a revolution; and why? Because the Government was commanded by a most powerful people.

(Hear, hear.) The right hon. gentleman was perfectly candid, and followed all his propositions to their necessary conclusion; for he said—

> Then, what was the consequence? The connexion with England then became the cause of the present state of Ireland. If the connexion were dissolved, the Irish aristocracy, and a revolution were the only remedy. Eng and, logically, was in the odious position of being the cause of all the evils in Ireland.

Now, he begged the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. gentleman was now an English Minister. Here were the right hon gentleman's words on that occasion to the House:—"What, then, was the duty of an English Minister?" The right hon. gentleman was at that time engaged in hunting down a man who was a great English Minister. (Cries of "Hear, hear," and a laughing allusion to the late Parliamentary placeman, "who bamboozled one party and plundered another." (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") He was then calling upon his House, above all other earthly duties, to put an end to every species of Parliamentary hypocrisy. (Hear, hear.) Let the House put an end to hypocrisy which would represent the hon. member (Mr. Osborne) as misrepresenting the sentiments uttered by the hon. gentleman. (Hear, hear.) Here were the final words:—"What was the duty of an English Minister? To effect by his policy all those changes which a revolution would do by force." (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. Keogh) would only put the moral to the tale which was drawn by the right hon. gentleman himself, and address the right hon. gentleman's words to his benches opposite when he said that he was then advocating Tory principles, but "they were not the Tory principles of those who would associate Toryism with restricted commerce and with a continual assault on the liberty of the subject." (Cheers.)

The debate was then adjourned; and, on the motion of Mr. SPOONER, next Tuesday was fixed for resuming the discussion.

On the motion of Mr. MONCREIFF, the House went into committee to consider of enabling burghs in Scotland to maintain and improve their harbours; a resolution was agreed to as to the foundation of a bill for the purpose, and the House resumed.

The Property-Tax Bill, as amended, was considered, and ordered to be read a third time. Adjourned at twenty minutes after twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon to six o'clock.

LOCAL ARRANGEMENT OF THE HOUSE.

A conversation, in which several members took part, was originated by Sir Benjamin Hall, as to the inconveniences suffered by hon. members serving on committees in consequence of the limited time permitted them to reach the House in order to record their votes, which, it was urged, called for immediate remedy. It was also suggested that the exclusion of reporters and strangers during divisions was unnecessary—the presence of reporters would do away with the ventilation and atmosphere of the House was likewise touched upon; but ultimately, with regard to all these matters, it was generally admitted that interference should be postponed until next session.

The Parish Constables Bill passed through committee pro forma.

QUALIFICATION OF MEMBERS.

In reply to a question from Mr. HUME, Mr. TUFNELL said he had done all he could to forward the bill for removing the qualification of members of Parliament; but finding it impossible to carry it, owing to the pressure of other business, he would withdraw it for the present session.

THE TAXES WHICH OBSTRUCT THE SPREAD OF EDUCATION.

The debate, adjourned from the 22d of April, on Mr. M. Gibson's motion for repealing the duties on paper, advertisements, and newspapers, was resumed by

Mr. COWAN, who said he had been thirty years engaged in the manufacture of paper, and had all that time exerted himself with various Governments to get those duties abolished, but entirely without avail. He entered into a detail of the advantages the trade would derive by the duties repealed, in order to convince the House that the tendency of the Excise laws was to prevent any improvement in the manufacture of paper, which of itself was, he contended, a sufficient reason to justify their repeal. He did not wish to have those duties repealed during the present year, which was an exceptional one as regarded financial arrangements; but he wished, by a vote of the House, to convince the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the subject was one requiring the earliest consideration of the Government.

Mr. GLADSTONE hoped it was clearly understood that for the present year they would already round the Chancellor of the Exchequer in maintaining the existing scale of revenue. When the whole question of finance was again under consideration, he thought paper used for packing and paper employed for printing newspapers and periodicals would be deserving of consideration, but he wished the Chancellor of the Exchequer now, in regard to paper employed in the printing of literary productions, he interfered with the public revenue for the advantage of a particular and a very small interest. The impudent and unwarrantable restrictions of the booksellers to keep up the price of books, and frustrate the exertions of those who would supply the public at a reasonable rate, not only limited the market in this country, but deprived us of the advantage which the international copyright bill ought to have provided the country in the foreign market, and in the colonies encouraged the introduction of pirated editions. Except such works as Macaulay's "History of England," only about five per cent. of the new books published sold 500 copies, and very few paid their expenses—the consequence of the combination among the book trade being to create a combination among the printers as against the trade, and thus, while limiting the sale, to increase the cost of the book. England had great facilities for producing cheap books, notwithstanding the paper duty; and when that was removed, and the combination of the booksellers abolished, we could produce them far easier than any other country.

Sir W. CLAY suggested that Mr. M. Gibson should not divide upon his first resolution respecting the paper duties, but rather do so on the two latter propositions—for the repeal of the newspaper stamp duty and for the repeal of the advertisement duty. He believed the paper duty ought also to be repealed, but he thought it should form one of the subjects to be considered in conjunction with the general financial arrangements of the country.

Mr. MOWATT supported the motion.

Mr. REYNOLDS cautioned Mr. M. Gibson against adopting the advice of Sir W. Clay. The tax on paper was a tax on human labour, and its repeal would much contribute to the comforts of the working population. He was, however, doubtful whether they should repeal the newspaper stamp duties, for reasons connected with their transmission by post.

Mr. RICARDO hoped that Mr. M. Gibson would withdraw no part of his motion. He believed that the surplus of the ensuing year would more than cover any loss sustained by the repeal of the paper duties.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL entered into the particulars of the case of the "Crown against the Household Narrative," and said that as his predecessors in office thought the state of the law unsatisfactory—an opinion in which he entirely concurred—he had directed that another information should be filed, on which a special verdict would be taken, with a view to bring the case fairly before a court of error. He intimated that it was under his consideration to prepare a measure to allow defendants their costs in that case.

Mr. MACGREGOR supported the motion.

Mr. BARROW supported the motion, and said he thought the surplus revenue would be much better appropriated in doing away with those taxes than in giving bounties to the militia.

Mr. K. SEYMER thought the subject should be left to to the consideration of a future Parliament.

Mr. WALLEY regretted that Mr. Seymer should vote, now that the Earl of Derby was in office, against the very motion which he supported when Lord J. Russell was in office.

Mr. M. GIBSON said the question upon which he would ask the House in the first instance to divide was, that such arrangements should be made to do away with the duties on paper as early as may be consistent with the safety of the public revenue.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said hon. gentlemen were mistaken in supposing he had any surplus which could justify him in remitting any taxes, and hoped the House would not agree to the motion.

The House then divided on the first resolution, as regarded the abolition of the duty on paper, when the numbers were—For the resolution, 107; against it, 160: majority against, 53.

The House next divided on the second resolution, as regarded the abolition of stamps—For the resolution, 105; against it, 159: majority against, 99.

The House again divided on the third resolution, referring to the abolition of the advertisement duty—For the resolution, 116; against it, 181: majority against, 65.

All of Mr. M. Gibson's propositions were thus rejected.

COUNTY COURTS FURTHER EXTENSION BILL.

The House went into committee on this bill, when clauses up to 25 were agreed to; and it being then 1 o'clock

The House adjourned over Thursday (the Queen's birthday) to Friday.

LAW AND POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

LUMLEY v. WAGNER AND GYE.—THE OPERA.

This case, which has been noticed more than once in our columns, was decided by Vice-Chancellor Sir J. Parker, on Monday, in favour of the plaintiff Lumley, thus confirming the injunction which had been obtained by the plaintiff to restrain Mdlle. Wagner from singing at the rival opera-house in Covent-Garden, of which the defendant Gye is the lessee

The question as to the validity of the contract between Mr. Lumley and Mdlle. Wagner was fully canvassed by his Honor in all its various bearings as presented in the arguments of counsel, and he came to the conclusion that it was fully and perfectly binding.

Mdlle. Wagner is, therefore, bound, on her peril at Common Law, to sing at Her Majesty's Theatre in the Haymarket, and at no other establishment in London.

Two men, of the names of John Middleton and William Steward Sheridan, were severally charged before Mr. Henry, the magistrate of Bow-street Police-office, Westminster, with having committed a most disgusting assault on the Earl of Derby for the purpose of extorting money. The former prisoner, who exhibited indications of madness, was remanded for a few days with a view to further inquiry, and the latter was ordered to find bail, himself in £100 and two sureties of £50 each, to keep the peace for twelve months.

In the Court of Exchequer, on Tuesday, an action was brought by a boy named Cook, aged sixteen years, against Mr. Batty, the proprietor of the Hippodrome at Kensington, for compensation in damages for injury sustained from the kick of a horse during the performances that took place on the 7th of September. The plaintiff, who was a gentleman's page, had paid 6d. for his admission, and while occupying a place in the front of the arena on the night in question, he was kicked on the cheek and knocked down. The wound bled profusely, and being insensible from the injury he was immediately taken to St. George's Hospital, where he remained for a few weeks until the wound was healed. It left, however, an ugly scar upon his cheek, although no bone was broken. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, with £20 damages.

THE LATE MATRICIDE IN LAMBETH.—On Wednesday, Thomas Catlin Wheeler was charged, before Mr. Justice Maule and Mr. Baron Platt, at the Central Criminal Court, with the wilful murder of his mother, Catherine Wheeler, by cutting off her head. On the prisoner being placed at the bar, he evinced all the appearance of a confirmed maniac—a perception that he was observed by a crowded court, without a knowledge for what purpose the observation was. During the evidence given as to his insanity, he frequently raised his eyes, looked round the court, and then dropped into a silent laugh, or rather chuckle, which was repeated as each portion of the details of his accompanying atrocity was brought before the jury, without the slightest apparent a verdict that the prisoner was of unsound mind, and incapable of pleading.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON AND THE REV. MR. GLADSTONE.—In the Arches Court, Wednesday, Mr. Tabbs, the proctor, called upon the Court to proceed in hearing his appearing for the rev. defendant in the future proceedings of the citation. The learned judge (Sir John Dodson), on the petition of the rev. defendant, then continued the assignation of articles until the first session in next term.

THE DEAN AND CHAPTER OF ROCHESTER AND THE REV. MR. WHISTON.—This case, which was appointed to be resumed on Wednesday morning before the Bishop of Rochester, Mr. Bargus Ellis, and Mr. Lushington, in relation to the dismissal of Mr. Whiston from the Mastership of the Grammar School at Rochester, is adjourned sine die, information having been received of the inability of Mr. Baron Parke, through indisposition, to attend.

THE AMALGAMATED ENGINEERS.—On Wednesday night, at a meeting of trades' delegates, held at the Bull Inn, Old Bailey, a report was read from the deputation which had, according to appointment, waited upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at Downing-street, on Saturday last, relative to the subject of the recent conduct of employers of operative engineers. By this report it appeared that the deputation had before the Chancellor of the Exchequer a copy of a petition which is about to be presented to the House of Commons, praying for inquiry into the conduct of the master engineers, to which they requested the support of the right hon. gentleman, with his colleagues in the Government, and with the House of Commons. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply, admitted that the conduct of the master engineers was subversive of the spirit of the law, and that the deputation in their petition had adopted the right course of procedure, as he should himself have proposed something of the kind. He would give the petition his most serious attention, and, when presented to the House, consider it both as a member of the House and a Minister; for the deputation were right in supposing that he and his colleagues in the Government intended to protect the interests of the British workmen and to do justice to all classes COLLIERY EXPLOSION.—LARGE LOSS OF LIFE.—A frightful accident, attended with extensive loss of life, occurred on Monday at the Duffryn Colliery, Aberdare Valley, Glamorganshire, a colliery which has been for a long time in very full work. The accident was occasioned by an explosion of fire damp. There were at the time about 160 men and boys at work in the mine, and of these 67 have been killed. From 60 to 70 were saved by being in another part of the colliery, and some others escaped with life. None of them were able to say in what way the explosion was caused; but, as they were all supplied with Davy safety lanterns, it must have been the result of either carelessness or recklessness on the part of one or more of them. The scene which followed the accident was of a very harrowing kind. The occurrence will doubtless undergo a very rigid investigation; but the cause is not likely to be discovered, as all those who could give an account of it have perished.

Sir De Lacy Evans and Mr. Duffy have prepared and brought in a bill to amend the 1st and 2d William 4., cap. 60, for the regulation of vestries with reference to joint parishes. The object of the act is, that parishes maintaining poor in conjunction with other parishes may adopt the above recited act. The act is not to affect any law, usage, or custom as to the maintenance of the poor by joint parishes.

The Belfast News-letter says that the Earl of Glengall is about to be appointed Governor-General of India, in succession to Lord Dalhousie.

FINE ARTS.

COLOURED VIEWS OF THE GREAT EXHIBITION. Dickinson, Brothers.

We have before us the first part of a very beautiful work, one more than any other we have yet seen likely to preserve the distinguishing features of that Exhibition in Hyde Park, of which art alone will enable future generations to obtain any adequate representation of its beauty and resources. To represent the Exhibition truly in character, colour, variety, and extent, would seem an undertaking at first sight almost beyond the powers and resources of art. But when we call to mind the three celebrated artists whom the spirited publisher has employed to carry out his great undertaking, it is easy to see that the work would be safe in their hands. Mr Roberts is a master of perspective; Mr. Haghe excels in character, form, and colour; and Mr. Nash is not to be surpassed in the art of transferring to stone and paper the minuter beauties of detail. So far Mr. Dickinson did well in securing the services of such men. Nor is his firm unmindful of the importance of the artists employed, for of the Great Exhibition itself The three large plates which form the number represent Zollverein, Prince Albert's birth-place; a division in the Tunis department; and the exquisite Mediæval Court as arranged by Mr Pugin. All who have seen the originals of the three plates will at once admit the great truthfulness and beauty of the prints before them: while the thousands who have not had the opportunity of seeing the Exhibition will find less occasion to regret their loss in the careful representations which Mr. Dickinson's public spirit has provided for them. The whole of the drawings were executed on the spot, and the whole of the plates are engraved under the watchful superintendence of the artists by whom the drawings were made.

We cannot imagine a work of greater interest to all our brethren in the East than this in every respect adequate representation of a noble scheme - living in the memories of the present, and preserved to all time in these comprehensive and minute illustrations.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—The following preferments and appointments have recently taken place: - Colonial Bishoprics: The Rev. John Philip Gell, to Christ Church, New Zealand. Deanery Rural: The Rev. William Lewis, vicar of Sedgley, to Hinkley. Archdeaconries: The Rev. E. L. Freer, to Hereford. Rectories: The Rev. W. Brown, to Little Hormead, near Buntingford; the Rev. C. Trollope, to St. Cuthbert's, Bedford, the Rev. J. H. B. Green, to Normanton-on-le-Heath, Leicestershire; the Rev. John Richardson, to St. Ann's, Manchester, the Rev. John Jenkins, to Bowness. Vicarages: The Rev. G. W. Bramwell, to East Markham, with West Drayton, Notts; the Rev. J. Lockhart Ross, to Avebury, with Winterbourne Monkton, Wilts.

TESTIMONIALS.—The following clergymen have recently received testimonials of esteem and regard: The Rev. J. H. Burges, curate of St. Stephen's, South Shields, from the ladies of the congregation, on his removal; the Rev. G. D. Parry, vicar of Ruyton, from his parishioners and friends; the Rev. Wm. Gunning, of Buckland Newton, near Cerne, Dorset, on his retirement from the office of hon. secretary to the Bath and Wells Diocesan Society; the Rev. Wm. John Marshall, curate of Christ Church, West Bromwich, from the congregation, on his resigning the curacy; the Rev. Samuel Crowther, incumbent, from the parishioners of Knowle

THE CLERGY ORPHAN SCHOOL.—The 198th anniversary festival of this charitable institution was held on Wednesday, and was commemorated in the first instance by the celebration of divine service at St. Paul's Cathedral. The choir service, performed by the united choirs of her Majesty's Chapel Royal, St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, and St. George's Chapel, Windsor, under the direction of Mr. Goss, organist of St. Paul's, as usual, attracted, notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather, a numerous and fashionable congregation. In the evening the supporters did not assemble at Merchant Tailors' Hall; the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor presiding. Among the company were—the Archbishop of Canterbury; Bishops of London, St. Asaph, Salisbury, Ripon, Bangor; Dean of St. Paul's; Archdeacons Hare, Bevan, Thorp, Macdonald; Rev. Drs. Spry, Vivian, Fox, and Foord-Bowes; Rev. Messrs. Hartwell Horne, H. Brown, Jennings, John Jackson, Linwood Strong, R. G. Baker, Thomas Bowdler, C. B. Pearson, W. J. Hall, J. C. Hall, &c.; the Lord Mayor, Alderman Copeland, M.P., Alderman Salney, M.P., Alderman Challis, and Alderman Farebrother; Chamberlain of London, Mr. Sheriff Cotterell, &c. The principal speakers on the occasion were the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London. From the report it appeared that £73 had been collected in the cathedral; that £902 had been contributed at the dinner; that the annual subscriptions amounted to £280; that the dividends on stock were £365; and that the total receipts reached the sum of £1620, exclusive of 30 guineas each from the stewards. During the past year relief had been given by the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy to 198 clergymen, to the amount of £2716; widows, 397, £4125; daughters, 402, £3685; sons, 5, £45; apprentice fees, £1400; outlets, 75, £1139. Total number relieved, 1122; money, £14,203.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The second and final conference for the regulation of the succession to the Danish throne was held at the Foreign-office on Saturday, when a treaty in which the young Duke of Glücksberg was formally recognised as heir presumptive to the Crown of Denmark and its dependencies, was signed by the representatives of the great European Powers who signed the protocol of August the 2d, 1850, on the same subject, as well as the Prussian Minister, who was not present at the signature of that protocol.

The New York Sun says the telegraph between New haven and Waterbury, Connecticut, has been put to a commercial use. Conversation between friends (one in each place) is carried on for any required length of time, the operators acting alternately as spokesmen and interpreters. This they are enabled to do without having the message written, by listening attentively to the clicking of the machine. The charge for this service is very moderate—only 10 cents for five minutes, and one cent per minute over that.

Accounts from Honolulu, received via California, indicate a desire on the part of the people of the Sandwich Islands to declare a republic; but American citizens resident there hint the probability of annexation to the United States. Several Americans were engaged in the revolution that threw off the yoke of Queen Pomare in the Society Islands. At Honolulu a territorial organisation had occurred.

The Royal pleasure-grounds at Kew will be open to the public every day in the week (Sundays excepted) for hours of one and six, from this day (Saturday) to Saturday, the 18th of September; and (Sundays excepted) on communications will at the same time be opened between the pleasure-grounds and the Royal Botanic Garden.

A preliminary meeting was held lately at the Shakspeare Hotel, in New York, having for its object "to devise measures and means to secure the election of Charles Gavan Duffy, editor of the Dublin Nation, as a member of the British Parliament, from New Ross, Ireland, for which office he is now a candidate." This is certainly a novel, and rather an amusing specimen of inter national intervention.

A soldier of the 67th dépôt, quartered at Dover Heights Barracks, while confined at the guard-house on Monday night last, confessed to the sergeant of the guard being the murderer of the late Lord Norbury, in Ireland some ten years since, at noonday, in his park. The man stated that he shot the unfortunate nobleman, and gave a detailed account of the murder. He adds that he entered the army after committing the deed. The man is now under confinement. Information has, however, since been received that the statement of this man is utterly devoid of truth

Of wheat flour (actual weight) the there were 1,747,499 quarters in the third quarter, and 858,647 quarters in the fourth. Of wheat flour (reduced to its equivalent in quarters of wheat) the importations in the third quarter were 499,295 quarters, and in the fourth quarter £748,185. The aggregate of wheat and wheat flour in the third quarter was 1,673,743 quarters, and in the fourth quarter of the year 682,985 The barley imported in the third quarter numbered 250,055 quarters, and in the fourth 78,393, whilst of oats there were 881,468 quarters imported in the third quarter, and 196,818 in the fourth quarter of the year.

The nett annual value of the land in respect of which consolidated annuities are granted is, for the year ended the 31st of March last, 26,924,736 sterling. The amount of the annuities in all parts of the unions was £41,810 15s 11d. The highest number of years for which the annuities are granted is forty, and the lowest twenty-five. The value of town lands rated separately to the annuity is 6440, and the area of acreage 3,338,306. These facts are derived from Parliamentary returns moved for by Sir Robert Ferguson

The steamer Propontis, which sailed from Table Bay on March 3 for England, took two very fine lions and, for ostriches.

The boy, named George Murrell, who was taken up on suspicion of having caused the recent fire at Harwell, Berks, which destroyed in one night (April 4) no less than twenty-one dwelling-houses and some farm homesteads, has confessed that he committed this malicious and wilful act, which has involved so many poor families in the utmost distress. He stated that he went into Isaac Hedge's rick-yard ignited a lucifer match, which he put on a tile, and then placed both in a straw-rick. The boy, who is seventeen years of age, and of weak intellect, stated that he committed the act for the sake of some apple which were promised him.

A Prague journal states that on the 3d inst. Kossuth's mother and sixteen of his relatives passed through that city on their way to England.

By a Parliamentary paper just printed in reference to the British Museum, it appears that in the year ended the 31st of March last the expenditure was £51,386 1s 9d, from the grants amounting to £52,639. The balance in hand (£3698 12s 4d.) was carried to the account for the present year.

Recently a housebreaker, who had been liberated from Carmarthen County Gaol, was found encamped outwards at the prison gardens, with rope ladders and other implements of escape, his object being to rescue a female prisoner under sentence of transportation. A note, enwrapping a piece of coal, had been thrown over the wall as being the least costly to be procured by visitors, and, falling into the hands of the matron, it only led to preparations being made for escorting him. He has since been committed for trial.

It appears from returns just printed, that there has been an increase in the value of watches and clocks imported into the United Kingdom. In the month ended the 5th ult. the value of watches chargeable with duty was £18,286, and in the like period of 1851 the value was £9975. The clocks were of the value of £6726 in the month ended the 5th ult., and in the corresponding period of the preceding year £5432.

A letter received in London from an officer on service at the Cape, mentions that Macomo, the Kaffir chief, appears to have been so badly wounded in one of the recent skirmishes, that his left arm has been amputated

According to a return just issued, there were imported, of all sorts of grain into Great Britain from Ireland, 3,205,454 quarters in 1843; and in 1851, 1,324,668 quarters.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF THE NEW TRAINING-SCHOOLS, VICTORIA-STREET, WESTMINSTER.

THE NATIONAL SOCIETY.

On Tuesday his Royal Highness Prince Albert laid the foundation-stone of a new building in Victoria-street, Westminster, to be dedicated by the National Society to a Training Institution for Masters and Mistresses of National Schools. A large circular marquée was provided in the centre of the ground, beneath which the stone was to be laid; around which were seats crowded with elegantly-dressed ladies and gentlemen, the outer seats being occupied by upwards of 4000 children of the schools of St. Margaret's and St. John's. There was a large assemblage of distinguished persons, among whom were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of York, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Harrowby, the Marquis of Abercorn, the Earl of Lilford, the Bishops of London, Oxford, Ripon, Winchester, Salisbury, Chichester, St. Asaph, and Glasgow, Archdeacon Hale, Dr. Milner, Lord Lyttleton, Sir T. Phillips, Mr. Cotton, and the Rev. J. G. Lonsdale, secretary to the National Society. At ten minutes past one the cheers of the people outside the marquée, and the hoisting of the Royal standard, announced the arrival of Prince Albert, who, on entering the tent, was also loudly applauded. The school children, under the direction of Mr. Hullah, chaunted the 122d Psalm, "I was glad when they said unto me we will go into the house of the Lord."

The Archbishop of Canterbury then offered up a solemn prayer, invoking the blessing of the Almighty upon the undertaking; at the close of which

The Bishop of London stood forward and addressed his Royal Highness, explaining the object to which the new buildings were to be dedicated, and requesting his Royal Highness to lay the foundation-stone. The right rev. Prelate said that the importance of the occasion would be fully appreciated by his Royal Highness, when he stated that the National Society were thereby endeavouring to extend their means of sending throughout the length and breadth of the land well taught and trained men and women, competent in every way to undertake the education of the poor. It was not now for the first time that the society assumed that duty a duty rendered more important by the march of civilisation, the progress of knowledge, and the great social improvements of the age. Already, with its limited resources, it had sent forth from 1200 to 1300 well qualified instructors, and no one was better able than his Royal Highness to appreciate the advantage which accrued to the cause of education from having teachers well taught and trainers well trained. They were desirous to combine sound religious instruction, which was the basis of education, with every branch of useful secular knowledge, and for this end they were again enlarging their means of teaching and training those who were to educate the poor. The interest which his Royal Highness had manifested in the objects of the Society by honouring them with his presence would be of the greatest service to the cause; and he begged, in the name of the committee, to offer his Royal Highness their best thanks.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert said:—I shall have great pleasure in fulfilling the duty which devolves upon me; and I can assure you that the committee have only done me justice when they allude to my desire to promote the sound and moral education of the people. I take the greatest interest in the welfare of these institutions, and I am glad to see the members of the Church of England united in endeavouring to raise an institution for the diffusion of knowledge and of the truths of their holy religion among the children of the poor.

Attended by the dignitaries of the Church and the other distinguished personages around him, Prince Albert then ascended a platform where the foundation-stone was placed, bearing the following inscription:—"The first stone of the Westminster Training Institution of the National Society was laid by H.R.H. Prince Albert, May 11, 1852. Laus Deo." The stone was then deposited with due masonic skill and pomp. At the close of the ceremony the Old Hundredth Psalm was sung by the children, and a blessing having been pronounced, the proceedings terminated with the National Anthem; and the Prince, having shaken hands with a number of noblemen and gentlemen by whom he was surrounded, then retired amidst loud cheers. The occasion excited considerable interest among the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, large numbers of whom were present.

The Schools, which we have engraved from the architect's design, will occupy a plot of ground nearly an acre and a half in extent, distant 700 yards from the central schools, at a rent but little exceeding the sums now paid by the Society for its present imperfect accommodation. This site is on the line of Victoria-street, leading from Westminster Abbey in the direction of Buckingham Palace. It is easily accessible on two sides, adjoins at the back open ground belonging to the trustees of the Dacre Hospital, and is within a convenient distance of St. James's Park; thus combining, both in extent of area and convenience of situation, advantages rarely presented amidst the dense population of a large city.

The new buildings, when completed, will accommodate 100 masters and 100 mistresses, some of them specially prepared for the charge of infant schools. The cost of suitable buildings for 200 students, including accommodation for the officers of the institution, is estimated at £25,000. This sum is exclusive of the amount required for the purchase of the freehold of the site, which will amount to £14,000 more; so that the whole sum required will be nearly £40,000.

Judging from the design, the buildings for the Westminster Training Institution promise to be a handsome addition to the scholastic edifices of London. The entrance gateway, with its deeply recessed arch, its square-headed windows, niches, and octagonal stair turret springing from a bold corbel, the stair windows winding in a spiral form, somewhat in the style of many of the mediæval buildings of the Continent, is very good. Adjoining the entrance is one end of the chapel, with a traceried window of lofty pitch and rich design. The dwarf tower and tall crocketed spire are novel features, and add much to the general character of the design. The masses of buildings forming the quadrangles, their windows of various design and character from those of unpretending single lights to the elaborately-decorated bay windows and high-pitched dormers, are extremely effective; and the angle towers of octagonal plan break with good taste the uniformity of the arrangement. The architect is Mr. Henry Clutton, of Charles-street, Haymarket.

ANCIENT GOLD TORQUE.

GOLD TORQUE.

THIS interesting specimen of Celtic art has been presented to the Royal Irish Academy by Captain R. Pbibbs. It was dug up by a peasant, in June, 1850, in the Bog of Curry, in the county of Sligo, and consists of a piece of thin, pure gold, twisted in an open spiral, and having at its termination small knobs of gold at the end of loops, so as to link together. The torc, or torque, was worn round the neck, and was an ornament used by chiefs of the Celtic nations; and this specimen is a very fine one.

ANCIENT BRITISH URN.

CELTIC URN.

WE have been favoured by a Correspondent with the accompanying Sketch of an ancient Urn, lately found at Towdenack, near St. Ive's, Cornwall. It appears that some men, while at work on the Moor, had occasion to remove a cairn, or pile of stones, for building purposes. After displacing a considerable portion, they discovered the fragments of an urn, resting on a large flat slab of granite; and, on further search, they found this to cover another urn, inverted and containing bones, but unaccompanied by coins, arms, or ornaments. There was, however, found among the fragments of the upper urn a small bit of bronze; but it was too much corroded for us to say whether it was part of a weapon or ornament.

The urn is undoubtedly Celtic; and, from the absence of coins or inscriptions of any sort, probably before the time of the Roman occupation, at least in the west of Britain.

This valuable relic of antiquity has been deposited in the Institute at St. Ives. It was wantonly broken soon after its discovery by one of the workmen, but has since been ably put together by Mr. Hodda.

DESTRUCTION OF THE R.Y.S. SCHOONER "TITANIA."

IN our Journal of last week we announced the destruction by fire of this handsome schooner, on Wednesday night, the 5th inst., at her winter quarters, or rather where she had been placed since her return from the Mediterranean for the purpose of being refitted. At the time of this lamentable accident the Titania was in complete order; and, with the exception of the sails, which were not bent, she was ready for sea. Her owner, Mr. R. Stephenson, M.P., was expected the same evening. The fire originated in the cabin. There was no watch, nor any of the crew, out of eighteen persons, on board when the fire was discovered. The flames appears to have been first observed by some of the yachts' crews in the neighbourhood, a little before ten o'clock; and, on the alarm reaching Cowes, the town engine, as well as that from the dock, were despatched to the conflagration. At half-past ten the fire defied all efforts to extinguish it. There is no doubt, that had she been bereft of her powder and magazine (and which no vessel ought to have in a harbour like Cowes), the hull, spars, and rigging would have been saved. Nothing now remains of her but her iron shell, her bowsprit, figure-head, &c.: she is completely gutted, even the deck-beams consumed.

When the fire was first descried, some of the Trinity men and yachts crews proceeded to the yacht and endeavoured to extinguish it by a plentiful supply of water, it being flood tide; but, in consequence of a cry that there was powder on board, they withdrew. At midnight the vessel was, fore and aft, one sheet of fire, which having burnt the rigging and deck, her mainmast fell aft. About half-past two A.M. the foremast also fell aft; great anxiety having previously been felt for the fate of the neighbouring yachts, of which there were about twenty hauled up on the mud, and all within a few feet of each other. The night was splendid, and the moon shone brilliantly, and not a cloud to be seen. The fire burnt out of itself about four o'clock, and the magazine was secured afterwards.

BURNING OF THE R.Y.S. SCHOONER "TITANIA," AT COWES

NEW EXPEDITION TO THE SOUTH SEAS.

H.M.S. Herald, Captain H. Mangles Denham, R.N., F.R.S., and the Torch steam-tender, Lieutenant Chimmo, are now about to proceed to the South Pacific, to explore and survey all the islands between Australia and Valparaiso, and particularly the Feejee Islands. Although Captain Cook and several other navigators have touched at these groups, and marked their position on their charts, yet very little is known respecting them, further than that many of them are surrounded with coral reefs, the land exceedingly fertile, and the climate salubrious, and also that the natives are addicted to cannibalism.

The Herald, although a frigate, is not armed as such. She only carries six 32-pounder carronades and four long guns, a howitzer, &c.: and these, with the small arms, are thought quite sufficient for her defence in case the natives should prove hostile, while her limited number of guns will excuse saluting, on account of her chronometers. The Torch has one long 32-pound pivot gun, capable of being trained in every direction. She has also a number of swivel guns mounted on her bulwarks; and, to prevent the natives boarding her from their canoes, she will be completely enclosed with nettings, but the Herald, standing higher out of the water, will not require such protection. Notwithstanding the ships are thus defended against pirates and hos tile tribes, they are at the same time quite as well prepared, and a great deal more disposed, to treat the natives in a much more peaceable manner, if they evince at all a friendly disposition; and, for this purpose, no less than two tons of trinkets, knives, axes, looking-glasses, printed cottons, &c., have been sent on board.

In the scientific department nothing has been neglected; every instrument that can possibly be required in surveying has been supplied, of the best description.

The experienced officer who has been entrusted with the command of this expedition is already distinguished by his love of scientific research, his skill in maritime surveying and construction of charts, as well as his kindness and attention to the comforts of his officers and men under his command; and we could not name an officer in her Majesty's service better suited for the command of such an expedition. Lieut. Cummo, so far as we can learn, is an officer of considerable scientific acquirements; and this part he will take in carrying out the object of the expedition will be no trifling one. Indeed, all the offi cers and men of both ships have been selected either for their abilities as seamen, or for some other qualities peculiarly fitting them for the service on this present.

Mr. M'Gillivray, well known in the scientific world as a naturalist, has been appointed to the Herald, to attend to the natural history department; and Mr. S. Glen Wilson, a young artist, has also been appointed to make drawings of objects likely to prove interesting in illustration of those islands, and the manners and customs of the people. By order of the Board of Admiralty he has been supplied with a photographic apparatus. This is the first occasion we have had very few drawings from this part of the globe that could be depended upon, but now that photography is to be employed, we may expect to have representations of a very superior description. The poor, half-naked savages, their rude canoes, their dwellings, the coasts, headlands, coral islands, and objects of natural history, botany, &c., all may be given by this wonderful process with an accuracy of detail unattainable by any other means.

The Herald has been a great attract on during the past week at Woolwich, nearly 200 persons having been on board on each day for the last six days. On Friday week the vessel was removed by Commander Pullen, who expressed himself highly pleased with all he had witnessed on board, and the excellent a rangements that have been made for the accommodated lengthened service of the officers and crew of the vessel in the South Seas. Among those on board on the same day was the Rev. Mr Hooks, of the Missionary Society, who brought with him vocabularies of the languages spoken by the natives of many of the islands, and instructions to the missionaries in connexion with the Society to render every assistance in their power to the officers of the two vessels. Sir William Hooker and Dr. Hooker, from the gardens at Kew, also visited the Herald, and have sent limited to the stock of plants and seeds which are to be transported to the Ant podes. A certificate has also entrusted to Captain Denham's care a copy of the first edition of "Cook's Voyages."

Altogether, the Herald has been fitted and equipped in the most efficient manner, with her tender, for a long period of four years, and for a seven years. She is twelve able seamen short of complement of as fine a ship's company as ever trod a deck, and is excellently relieved. The medical officers in the expedition have been selected with much taste and zeal in natural history; and it is expected they will send home many valuable additions to the museums of this country, although the hydrographical department of the is ands of the South Seas they are about to visit is the superior object of the expedit on. The Herald, in her internal as well as her external order, presents an excellent specimen of what a ship may be rendered in two months, owing to the liberal directions accorded by the Admiralty; and the excellent co nfrivance and adaptation of all that has been considered requisite for ship and boat service, in the company of which the captain and first lieutenant have had the able co-operation of the assistant-ma of Chatham Dockyard, has rendered the Herald admirably adapted for the service in which she is to be employed.

On Tuesday the Herald was visited by Lord John Russell and the Earl of Clarendon, when their Lordships appeared much pleased in examining the p eparations for her departure on Wednesday after noon, on her voyage to the South Seas, which she will reach by passing Sydney, instead of round Cape Horn.

The ac company ng Engraving of the vessel is from a drawing by Mr. Wilson, the artist to the expedition.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

LIGHTS TO PREVENT COLLISION AT SEA.—The Admiralty commissioners have issued a notice directing that the following regulations respecting signal lights be strictly observed by steamers and sailing vessels. All previous regulations relating to the exhibition of lights by steamers are revoked by the same document, which is as follows

All British sea-going steam-vessels (whether propelled by paddles or screws) shall, within all seas, ports, channels, bays, creeks, roads, roadsteads, harbours, havens, ports, and rivers, and under all circumstances, between sunset and sunrise, exhibit lights of such description and in such manner as hereinafter mentioned; viz.—A bright white light over the foremast; and a red light over the foremast head; a green light on the starboard side; a red light on the port side. 1. The mast-head light is to be visible at a distance of at least five miles in a dark night, with a clear atmosphere; and the lights at the sides are to be so constructed as to show a uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of 20 points of the compass, being 10 points on each side of the ship, viz. from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on either side. 2. The green light on the starboard side is to be visible at a distance of at least two miles in a dark night, with a clear atmosphere, and the lantern is to be so constructed as to show a uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of 10 points of the compass, viz. from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the starboard side. 3. The red light on the port side is likewise to be fitted so as to throw its light the same distance on that side. 4. The side lights are moreover to be fitted with screens, on the inboard side, of at least three feet long, to prevent the lights from being seen across the bow. When at anchor—A common bright light. Sailing vessels.—We hereby require that all sailing vessels when under way, or sailing, or proceeding or being approached by any other vessel, shall be bound to show between sunset and sunrise a bright l ght, in such a position as can be best seen by such vessels, and in sufficient time to avoid collision. All sailing vessels a s at anchor in roadsteads or fairways shall be also bound to exhibit between sunset and sunrise a constant br ght light at the mast-head, except within harbours or other places where regulations for other lights for ships are legally established. The lantern to be used when at anchor, both by steam-vessels and sailing vessels, is to be so constructed as to show a clear good light all round the horizon.

The document is accompanied by diagrams illustrating the working of this mode of fitting lights, and directions are given for steering in accordance with the form in which the lights present themselves to the "look out."

LOCH LOCHBOUND SHIPS SUPPOSED TO BE THOSE OF SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.—A few weeks since we noticed at some length the accounts which were given by the mate and crew of the merchant ship Renovation, of two wrecks which they had seen a twelvemonth ago on an iceberg off the coast of Newfoundland, and which it was supposed were the Erebus and Terror, belonging to the Arctic Expedition of Sir John Franklin. The only piece of testimony wanting in the case of evidence as given on that occasion with respect to the actual existence and appearance of the wrecks was that of the captain of the Renovation, Mr. Coward, who was then and is now at Venice with his ship. Captain Coward has been communicated with on the subject at Venice, and been interrogated by the authorities there; his testimony having been forwarded to the Admiralty, they have published it. The answers of Captain Coward to the several questions put to him all confirm, in every minute particular, the statement of his mate Mr. Simpson, and of the other parties whose accounts have been already given.

Lieutenant Russell Patey (1844), who served as first-lieutenant of the Sampson, steam-frigate, in the late bloody affair at Canton, for which as small and inadequate a promotion has been made, and who was subsequently appointed lieutenant-commander of the Bloodhound, steam-vessel, died on the 4th March, off the island of Ascension, aged 35.

ELECTION INTELLIGENCE.

HARWICH.—Mr. Isaac Butt, a gentleman connected with the Irish bar, and of Protectionist principles, was returned on Saturday last as representative for this borough. The vacancy was occasioned by the resignation of Sir Fitzroy Kelly, the Solicitor General who had been elected about a month ago for Harwich, but who had been subsequently returned for East Suffolk, and had elected to sit for the latter place.

BRADFORD.—The statement that Mr. Milligan would retire if Col. Thompson's return was in danger," is contradicted. Mr. Milligan never gave authority to any one to make such a declaration, and has no intention of retiring in favour of Col. Thompson.

EXETER.—The active canvass which has been commenced this week by the present representative, Sir John Duckworth, and by Mr. George Stucley Buck, gives promise of a triumphant success to the Conservative cause.

UPPINGHAM.—The seat vacated by the Lord Norreys, it appears that his Lordship does not intend to contest the county at the coming election.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY.—A strong desire prevails in certain quarters to substitute the late quiz of Blandford for Mr. Gladstone as a representative of the University in Parliament.

TWENTY-SEVEN MEN DROWNED IN A COAL-PIT.—At Pembrey, South Wales, on Monday night, a melancholy accident happened, by which 27 colliers were drowned. About midnight the stock waters of some ancient work ngs broke into Mr. Watney's great anthracite colliery, in the vale of Gwendraeth, from which only one man escaped. Being near the bottom of the pit at the time, he was carried upon the surface of the water to the top of the pit, a distance of upwards of 500 feet. The water rapidly rose to the surface of the pit, and overflowed into the valley below. Had the accident happened in the daytime, more than five times the number now lost would have perished.

MUSIC.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The amateurs, who successfully "agitated" some fifteen years since for the revival of the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven by the Philharmonic Society, which purchased the work, and from 1823 to 1829 negotiated through Mr. Neate, for the presence of the composer in London to conduct its sublime conception, experienced on Wednesday night, at Exeter Hall, feelings of the gratifying nature at again witnessing the decided triumph of their predilections. It is well known that the second act in 1838, under Mascheles' direction, and more recently at Drury-Lane Theatre, for the Beethoven Monument, failed through inadequate means to interpret the great work. Even in 1847, when Costa first conducted its perform ance, the locality, the Hanover-square Rooms, was quite unfit to held the number of chorister and instrumentalists requisite to do justice to the vast design of the composer, and the rehearsals were too restricted to develope with advantage the complications of the score. At the Bonn Beethoven Festival, in 1845, under Spohr's direction, there was a noble interpretation. At the Paris Conservatoire the orchestral rendering has always been superb, but the choral features have been very deficiently done. It was thus reserved for the New Philharmonic Society to achieve the greatest success that yet attained in the development of Beethoven's intentions. It is Berlioz who has succeeded in making this choral symphony intelligible to the masses, and presented it with that coherency and clearness which, to the early hearers of praises in this country had long so confidently asserted would be the result of repeated. careful, and conscientious rehearsals. We heard on Wednesday night professors of no little note, whose careers and acquirements date from the days when Spohr first forced to make the avowal that it was incomparably the grandest emanation of Beethoven's genius. With our confined space it would be impossible here to repeat our appreciation, and to explain the analysis by which the colonel inspiration. It embodies Schiller's "Ode to joy"—physical and material, the joy of the heart, of love, of friendship, of victory, of devotion. Beethoven has created all the figures of speech and shades of sentiment, with ever powering effects. In the startling surprises and continuous breaks of the opening movement in D minor; in the grotesque imagery and fantastic forms of the scherzo; in the fervent utterance of melody of the intensely passionate adagio in B flat, and, finally, in the summary of the pressing subjects in the finale, leading to the choral outbreak, in which are interwoven still for the soprano, tenor, and bass, and a quartett. Never for amusement does the listener flag; the ear is left on the stretch of perpetual expectation; the imagination runs riot in the composer's revellings of joy; and as emaxx is heaped upon climax, the conclusion comes almost with a sense of relief from the enormous excitement of the entire symphony. With the exception of a passage missed in the horns, and of Mr. Sims Reeve's imperfection in the tenor part, there was not a hitch in the wondrous execution. Honour be to all the artistes who contributed to the magnificent display of musical skill—honour be to the orchestra, to the chorus, to the principals. Madame Clara Novello, Miss Williams, and Herr Staudigl, for their zealous exertions; and, above all, honour and glory be to the gifted conductor, who wielded Prospero's wand, and subdued all the combined elements to one harmonious whole. Well did Berlioz earn the ovation bestowed by the moved thousands who filled the hall on this memorable occasion, one to be for ever treasured in our musical annals

Mdlle. Clauss, who created such a prodigious sensation by her splendid playing of Mendelssohn's pianoforte concerto in G minor, the lovely andante being encored, would be entitled to especial notice, if space permitted, for her exquesite finished performance, but we can but briefly record her brilliant triumph. She is but young in years and fragile in form, but the associated attributes of intellectuality, sentiment, taste, feeling, power, decision, and poetry are combined in her style

With this concerto, which opened the second part, the programme of the night virtually ended. The change of conductors, after the symphony, wh ch occupied the whole of the first part of the scheme, was such an obvious and grievous mistake, that nothing but the glorious reception of the Beethoven work prevents us from a more decisive condemnation of the bad policy of confiding the baton into the hands of a young, inexperienced professor, unless it be intended that the New Philharmonic Society is to become a school for conductors, and an experimental academy for composers.

THE QUARTETT ASSOCIATION.

At the second meeting, on Wednesday afternoon, at Willis's Rooms, there was the welcome novelty of a Quartett in G minor, composed expressly for the association by Mr. Macfarren. It was beautifully played by Sainton, Cooper, Hill, and Piatti, and in form and style quite worthy the high reputation of the distinguished composer. Mr. Cooper led in Beethoven's Posthumous Quartett in A minor with much skill. Mdlle Clauss, Sainton, and Piatti performed Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor; and the young and gifted pianiste also played one of Chopin's elegant Nocturnes, and a grand Sonata by Scarlatti, bearing date 1705, showing that digital mechanism must have been of no mean order at that period.

MUSICAL EVENTS

The fourth concert of the Amateur Musical Society took place on Monday, at the Hanover-square Rooms, under Mr. Osborne's direction; in the programme was a new work by Mr. Cooper, entitled "An Evening in Granada," performed amateur——The third matinée of the English Glee and Madrigal Union was given at Willis's Rooms last Monday.——Herr Jaina's third soiree came off at the Queen Anne-street Rooms on Wednesday evening.——Mr. Emery, assisted by Mdme. Macfarren, the Misses Messent, Stabbach, Signor Calsyno, Herr Molique, Mr. Wrighton, M. Rousselot, and Mr. F. Mori, gave a concert, on Tuesday, at the Queen Anne-street Rooms.——Miss Anne Van Each Taylor, the vocalist, had an evening concert on Wednesday at the Hanover-rooms, with the co-operation of Misses L. Pyne, Rose, Pyne, and Poole; Herr Reichardt, Herr Formes, Herr Borchs, Mr. Wrighton, and Mr F. Bodda, Herr Molique, Don R. de Cubra, M. Aguilar, Signor Piatti, Mr. F. Chatterton, Mr. Lucas, and Signor Regondi.——The Musical Institute held its last meeting for the season, last night, in Sackville-street.——Miss Birch and Miss Eliza Birch, the pianiste, announced yesterday evening, at the Queen Anne-street Rooms, a series of soirées, assisted by Mdme. F. Lablache, Mdme. Goulon, Signor F. Lablache, Miss U. Barclay, Mr Swift, Mr. Nicholson, Mr. Lucas, Mr. Aguilar, Mr. Hill, Mr. Cooper, Signor Negri.——Signor Briccialdi, the flautist, gave a morning concert yesterday, at the Hanover-square Rooms, aided by Miss Goddard and Miss Parkes, Mdme. Sainton, Mr. Sainton, Mr. Cooper (violin), Mr. Hill (viola), Piatti (violoncello), Bottesini (contrabasso), Maffei (cornet-a-piston); with Mdme. F. Lablache, Mdme. Lemaire, Mdme. Schütz Oldosi, Misses Lanzillo, Rabbeni, and Dolby; Messrs. Swift and Fredda, Signori F. Lablache and Giubilei, as vocalists; the accompanyists were Signori Pilotti, Fossa, and Belumi.——Last night, by the Sacred Harmonic Society, at Exeter Hall, under Costa's direction, Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was performed, with Mdme. Clara Novello, Misses Dolby and Williams, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Herr Formes as vocalists.——On Tuesday last, a trial of the qualities of the four organists, Messrs. Burrow, Rutland, Abbott, and Dr. Gauntlett, who are candidates for the post of organist of St. James's, Piccadilly, took place at St. Michael's, Cornhill: the judges were Messrs. Goss (St. Paul's) and Turle (Westminster Abbey). Relative to the contested election, we understand, on extraordinary and as to the exclusion of the names of the eminent organpayers, Dr. Gauntlett and Mr. Best, Messrs. Dearle, Pritchard, and Layfield, by a select committee of the vestry, from the list of candidates.

GERMAN PLAYS.—Mr. Mitchell, the enterprising lessee of the St. James's Theatre, has announced a series of twelve German plays, the first of which will be represented early in June by artists of celebrity in the principal German cities. Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet," "Hamlet," "Othello," and Goethe's "Egmont" and "Faust;" Schiller's "Die Rauber," "Kapa. und Liebe," and "Don Carlos;" Lessing's "Emilia Galotti," Kotzebue's "Der arme Poet," "Der Gerade Weg der Beste," and "Schneider Fips;" together with many modern plays by Birch-Pfeiffer, Mosenthal, Carl Blum, &c.; translations from Shakspeare's "Hamlet" and "Romeo and Juliet," and Sheridan Knowles's "Love Chase."

GALLERY OF ILLUSTRATION.—His Grace the Duke of Wellington, accompanied by the Marchioness of Salisbury and Lady Victoria Talbot, honoured the above establishment with a private visit on Monday last, when his Grace expressed his entire approbation of the Diorama.

VAUXHALL.—The various alterations are on the eve of completion, and the gardens now look brilliant with new views and novel points of effect. A very elegant theatre, formed out of the old equestrian circle, is erected, which is to be occupied by a ballet company, selected from the Grand Opera at Paris. The great picture is a representation of the celebrated Piazza de Toros at Madrid, on the occasion of a Royal bull-fight. The regular season will commence on the 31st inst.

M. ALEXANDRE THOMAS'S LECTURES ON FRENCH HISTORY.—M. Alexandre Thomas, ex-Professor of History at the ancient University of France, and now an exile in this country on account of his disapproval of the late coup d'état of Louis Napoleon, delivered the first of his promised series of lectures or conferences, at Willis's Rooms, on Tuesday, in presence of a highly distinguished audience. The subject was the Revolution of Monarchy in France during the reign of Louis XIII; and, trite as this topic may appear, he contrived by the sustenance of his reflections and the attractive character of his illustrations, to invest it with a more than ordinary degree of interest. The address of the cultivated, accomplished, and discriminating listeners never flagged from the commencement of the lecture till its conclusion, although it lasted nearly an hour and a half. Amongst the distinguished company present were the Duchesse d'Orleans and the Duke d'Aumale, the Count and Countess d'Harussonville, M. Charles de Rémusat (ex-Minister of the Interior), Madame d'Hautpoul, Madame de Vick, M. and Madame Jules de Lasteyrie, the Count de Montguyon, M. Lisenlon, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Earl of Carlisle, Lady Mary Howard, the Ear. and Countess of Granville, Lord Blantyre, the Countess of Garendon, Lady Teresa Lewis, Sir John and Lady Catherine Boileau, Mr. Vernon Harcourt and the Countess of Waldegrave, the Earl of Aberdeen, the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, the Right Hon. E. Ellice and Mrs. E. Ellice, Mr. and the Hon. Mrs Monckton Milnes, Lady Jane and Miss Peel, Mrs. Hugh Seymour, Mr. Panizzi, Mr. H. Reeve, Mr. Dallam, Mr. Hayward, &c.

APPROACHING MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—We understand that the Lady Caroline Pepys, third daughter of the late, and sister of the present, Earl of Cottenham, will very shortly be led to the hymeneal altar by the eldest son of Sir John Lister Kaye, Bart., of Denby Grange, Yorkshire.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

It is not at all necessary, in noticing an effective performance of Verdi's "Il Trovatore" on Saturday night, to establish that the composer is not a Mozart or a Mc erbeer, a Beethoven or a Bellini. It would be just as absurd to attempt to show that Claude of Lorraine is not a Rubens, or Salvator Rosa not a Leonardo da Vinci. The differences of standpoint, of sympathy and of opinion between connoisseurs of taste, feeling, and learning, touching the lyric drama, are certainly very various; but the general public will soon come to a decision opposite to that of the critical craft, and will not adopt it the dre inscription of the powers of modern composers, so obstinately insisted upon by prejudiced professors Verdi has been most outrageously abused since the first introduction of his works into this country; but season after season his operas are reproduced, and we never yet have observed the slightest diminution in the interest and effect created by his dramatic power and colouring. There is not the slightest difficulty in pointing out the vices of his school; but it is against the wholesale condemnation of his productions that we have always protested and we must continue to protest. The objection that he strains and ruins the voice is, with all due submission, the question of the singers, and not that of the audiences, who frequent the theatre for audition and sensation, and not for the purpose of deciding whether the upper octave of an artiste's register can stand the wear and tear of Verdi's vocal writings. "Ernani" is full of musical movement and excitement. Let the theatre and performers be what they may, the interest and effect created by such an act in which the hearers are not strongly moved; and the present cast was eminently calculated to call forth continued plaudits; Mdlle. Cruvelli being the Elvira; Belletti, Don Carlos; and Calzolari, Ernani. The aria d'entrata, "Ernani! Ernani! involami," was splendidly sung by Cruvelli; and the duo, "Da quel di," between her and Ferlotti, and the quintett, "Vedi, Ernani," were also admirably. Belletti sings the air "Infelice" to perfection. The sestet in E flat, "Vedi come," with the spirited cede; the trio in three-four time, "Oro quant' oro;" the finale of the first act, commencing with the scene of the catacombs, with its imposing finale, "O sommo Carlo," in which Cruvelli's penetrating organ thrills above the throng, and the concluding powerful trio finale, made the usual impression on the house, which liberally rewarded the immense exertions of the principal vocalists.

Rossini's "Italiana in Algeri" was to have been repeated on Tuesday, but it was first changed to "Norma," and subsequently to "La Cenerentola," owing to Mdlle Cruvelli's indisposition.

Don Sebastian" Don Pasquale," announced for the extra night on Thursday, was replaced by the spark.ing "Barbière." The National Anthem was sung amidst the loyal plaudits of the audience

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

At the third performance of the "Huguenots," on Saturday night, which was honoured by the presence of her Majesty and Prince Albert, the magnificent singing of Mario was the theme of universal admiration.

On Tuesday night Mozart's "Il Flauto Magico" was revived, in the presence of her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, and Prince Alfred. Mdlle. Zerr made her first appearance this season, in Astrafiammante, the character in which she created such a sensation last year. She was most enthusiastically received, additional sympathy on her behalf being excited on account of the heavy penalties imposed on her by the Austrian Government, in consequence of her singing at a concert here for the distressed Hungarians. The two airs of the Queen of Night, "Oh, non temer," and the "Gli angui d'inferno," were magnificently executed by her, the former being encored. In her recitatives, except a tendency to exaggeration, her declamatory powers merit praise. There are very rarely singers to be found in these days with the extraordinary compass required for the music of the Queen of Night; and Mdlle. Zerr, perhaps, has alone the flexibility and brilliancy of the high notes calculated to give due effect to airs and roulades which Mozart wrote for an exceptional organ in his days. Grisi was announced for Pamina, a part quite out of her line; and, as in last season, Mdme. Lucchesi became its charming representative. In no opera is Herr Formes heard to such advantage as in the "Zauberflote." His Sarastro has never been surpassed, if equalled; nothing could be finer than his delivery of the "Possente Nume" and the "Qui sdegno" (in diesen heiligen hallen), and the repetition of the last-mentioned solemn strain being insisted upon. Mdlle. Bellini, a young artiste, in whom there is evidence of much promise, was the successor of Madame Viardot in the trifling part of Papagena, undertaken by the last-mentioned great singer as her bonne-bouche of Mozart, as artistical display of enthusiasm which Mario would do well to imitate, and not render Tamino merely as a waiking gentleman. Stigelli, Soldi, and Polonini, in Monostato, Oronte, and Decebalzo, were respectable; and Mr. Thomas, Mesdames Cameron and Braham, in the three benencent gems, had little to be desired: but Madame Coti, Mdlle. Bertrandi, and Mdlle Meriani in the three attendants on the Queen of the Night, and who sustain the trio and concertino, would, undoubtedly, in the most grotesque pantomime in the by-play, be never lost sight of the legi imate claims of the composer to have his music conscientiously interpreted, and the whole was carried off to the uproarious plaudits of the auditors of the burdcatcher, which were delivered with a piquancy, an accuracy, an arch and polished reading difficult to describe to do justice to the genius of Bottesini, who from the lofty minutes of high tragedy down to the racy points of broad farce is equally at home.

Amongst the auditors of the "Flauto Magico" (which will be given again this evening) was Miss Wagner, who seemingly had a keen relish or its beauties. Her legal advisers have appealed from the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Parker, and the question of the injunction will be definitively decided by the Lord Chancellor, who has fixed next Saturday, the 22d inst., to hear the cause.

On Thursday night "Don Giovanni" was represented, with Mdlle. Zerr as the heroine, Herr Ander as Edgardo, Signor Polonini Raymondo, and Signor Bartolini (the new barytone) as Enrico. The third and fourth acts of Donizetti's "Lucia" will be followed, on Saturday, by Signori Ronconi, Marzal, and Tamberlik. The admirers of the German school would find points to admire in the acting and singing of Mdlle. Zerr and Herr Ander, but the ama teurs accustomed to the Italian style were called upon to exercise much charitable consideration. Signor Polonini, as Ferdinand, gave the spasms of passion not only with force, but discrimination. He had, at a bound, to leap into the situations and various moods that damaged his voice and subdued the effect of the old experiment in the style of a master. The applause at the conclusion was vehement and universal, and the triumphant actress was led on by Mr. Creswick to receive her well-merited ovation.

PRINCESS'.

A capital one-act piece has been brought out for the display of Mr Wigan's peculiar forte in French characterisation. It is entitled "A Lucky Friday. Its scenes are of the most antiquated order, and the various elements being admirably blended by the actor. The story is a mere nothing, the character all; and turns upon Paul Rambaut (Mr. Wigan), the eccentric cashier of a confectioner's house, being honored on his accession to a revenue. On the faith of this, the old man, under great urgency, abstracts the sum of £300 from a strong box to aid a friend; and his delight on finding he has been enabled to serve him. His haste is accompanied, and he feels his situation in the most intense degree. Here Mr. Wigan proves himself to be a fine actor, and rose to an equality with the finest of these French scenes which we are accustomed to commend at the St. James's. At once artistic and pathetic, the performance justified the warmest approbation.

M. ROBIN' SOIRÉES PARISIENNES.—Madame and M. Robin have commenced a new programme of performances, n less remarkable for their elegance than those that have preceded; indeed, we think that they are even superior. M. Robin manifestly improves in the celerity of his manipulations. Always neat, we once thought him rather slow, but his operations are now much quicker. His effects are exceedingly curious. Wrought by the aid of ingenious mechanism, it is next to impossible to divine the process. He still continues his master trick, called "the Invisible Lady of Madame Robin;" and his apocopic views are among the most delightful of modern exhibitions

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

A State concert at Buckingham Palace on Monday last, and the Birthday Drawingroom on Thursday, have contributed to render the past week one of the gayest during the present season.

The concert was a very brilliant reunion. Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Kent, the Duchess of Cambridge, and the Princess Mary and the Duke of Cambridge, were present. The Count d'Aquila, who had had an audience to take leave of her Majesty during the afternoon, arrived at the Palace at half-past 9 o'clock. Her Majesty received her illustrious guests in the Yellow Drawingroom. Shortly before ten o'clock her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert and the assembled visitors were conducted from the Yellow Drawingroom to the saloon, which was fitted up for the concert with rows of seats of crimson and gold. The singers included the leading artistes of the Royal Italian Opera, with Signor Lablache and Mdlle. Cruvelli.

On Tuesday her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Lord Charles Fitzroy, visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge, at her residence in St. James's Palace. In the evening her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the Prince of Wales and Prince Alfred and suite, honoured the Royal Italian Opera with their presence.

On Wednesday evening her Majesty and the Prince Consort honoured the Duchess of Gloucester with their presence at Gloucester House.

On Thursday her Majesty held her third Drawingroom for the present season, at St. James's Palace.

Viscountess Jocelyn has relieved the Countess of Charlemont in her duties as lady-in-waiting to the Queen.

THE DRAWINGROOM.

The Queen held a Drawingroom on Thursday, in St. James's Palace, in celebration of her Majesty's birthday, which was most numerously and brilliantly attended.

Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert arrived from Buckingham Palace at two o'clock, escorted by a detachment of the Royal Horse Guards, and were received by the great Officers of State.

Soon after her Majesty's arrival, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Oxford (Lord High Almoner), the Bishop of Chester (Clerk of the Closet), the Bishops of Gloucester and Bristol, Worcester, Bangor, Norwich, Hereford, Peterborough, Chichester, Rochester, St. Asaph, Salisbury, Ripon, and Cape Town, were ushered to the presence of her Majesty in the Royal Closet, when the Archbishop of Canterbury delivered an address of congratulation to the Queen on the auspicious return of her Majesty's birthday.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary, and his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, were present at the Drawingroom.

The Queen wore a train of cloth of gold, trimmed with bunches of wild daisies and blue corn flowers and ends; the petticoat was of white satin, covered with white tulle, and trimmed with bunches of wild daisies and blue corn flowers to correspond to the train. Her Majesty's headdress was composed of a wreath of wild daisies and blue corn flowers, ornamented with diamonds.

The Lord Chief Justice of England (Lord Campbell), the Lord Chief Justice Jervis, and the Lord Chief Baron appeared in their splendid gold collars of S S, with the portcullis.

The Master of the Rolls, Lord Cranworth, Vice-Chancellor Turner, Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, Vice-Chancellor Parker, and the Chancellor of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, all wore their gold robes.

The Lord Mayor, the Speaker arrived in state to attend the Drawingroom, wearing his gold robes.

The attendance of the nobility and gentry was so numerous, that not only were the suite of State reception-rooms filled, but the throng of company extended down the grand staircase and entrance lobbies.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited the Duke and Duchess d'Aumale at Thames Ditton, on Saturday.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary, and his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, attended Divine service, on Sunday in the Royal Chapel, St. James's.

Their Royal Highnesses the Count and Countess d'Aquila have left town, on the return to the Continent.

The Prince Rajah of Coorg, accompanied by his daughter and numerous suite and retinue of native servants, arrived on Monday at Hivart's Hotel, from India, via Southampton. The Prince was accompanied by Major and Mrs. Drummond.

The Duke of Devonshire entertained a large and distinguished party at his villa, at Chiswick, on Saturday last.

THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.—The members of the Government gave full-dress banquets on Thursday to large parties, in honour of her Majesty's birthday. The Queen's Birthday had a brilliant assembly the same evening, at the noble Ear.'s official residence in Downing-street.

BANQUET TO HER MAJESTY'S MINISTERS.—The Lord Mayor gave a grand entertainment at the Mansion-House, on Saturday last to her Majesty's Ministers and a numerous and distinguished company. The guests, who were all attired in official costume, were received by their host in the drawingroom. Amongst the company were his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, attended by Lord Fermoy, the Right Hon. Spencer Walpole and Countess Walewski, the Earl and Countess of Derby, the Earl of Lonsdale, the Marquis and Marchioness of Salisbury, the Right Hon. Spencer Walpole and Mrs. Walpole, the Earl and Countess of Malmesbury, the Right Hon. Sir John and Lady Pakington, the Duke and Duchess of Northumberland, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Mrs. Disraeli, the Right Hon. J. C. Herries, the President of the Board of Trade and Mrs. Henley, the Earl and Countess of Hardwicke and Lady Elizabeth Yorke, the Duke and Duchess of Montrose, the Marquis of Exeter, the Prussian and American Ministers with their ladies, the Sardinian, Greek, Turkish, Portuguese, Brazilian, Sullian, and Danish Ministers, &c., and a large number of members of both Houses of Parliament. The Lord Mayor proposed the "Health of the Earl of Derby and her Majesty's Ministers," which was acknowledged by the Prime Minister in an eloquent speech of great length and brilliancy.

THE HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The first of the series of exhibitions of fruits and flowers, under the auspices of the society, was held on Saturday last, at the celebrated gardens at Chiswick. The grounds and green-house plants, which were of the finest character, were, as usual, displayed beneath the large tents erected by Mr. B. Edgington, of the Borough, and in the long avenues of which the visitors promenaded. His Royal Highness Prince Albert was present, and among many other persons of rank and fashion were—the Duke of Devonshire, the Earl and Countess Grey, the Earl of Ilchester, Earl Beauchamp, the Marchioness of Hastings, Lord and Lady J. Russell, Lady Bradport, Lord and Lady Charles Wellesley, Lady Rolle, the French and Turkish Ambassadors, &c.

JOB AND POSTMASTERS' BENEVOLENT FUND.—On Thursday evening the anniversary festival of the society was celebrated at the London Tavern, Alderman Salomons in the chair. The report stated that during the evening, the chairman stated that the society now expended nearly £130 a year in casual relief to its members. From the commencement, two periods had been laid down from which to date their claims to participate in the funds of the society, viz. that of £10,000, and when they obtained £20,000. They had now upwards of £9500, and he believed that evening they would cover the £10,000. The receipts of the evening afterwards amounted to above £300.

SAILORS' HOME.—On Thursday the annual meeting of the friends of this society was held in Wells-street, London Docks; Admiral Bowles, M P., in the chair. It was stated that during the past year 4745 boarders had been received at the home, and £30,587 of their money had passed through the cashier's hand. The total number of seamen who had become depositors in the savings'-bank was 1040, and the aggregate amount of the sums invested reached £8362, the present amount standing in the names of 321 depositors was £3392. A number of resolutions in support of the institution having been passed, the meeting separated.

DESTITUTE SAILORS' ASYLUM.—On Thursday the annual meeting of the society was held at the Sailors' Home, Wells-street, London Docks; Admiral Bowles in the chair. The report stated that the institution was established in the year 1827, since which time it had received and rescued from destitution 27,647 sailors; and during the past year 999 had been relieved, of whom 828 were British, and the remainder foreign seamen. The report was adopted, and a series of resolutions in support of the institution passed.

ALARMING RIOT IN THE CORK WORKHOUSE.—About dinner-hour on Sunday last, a riot of a most serious character commenced in the Cork workhouse, in consequence of an attempt made by the master to wrest from the hands of one of the male inmates a bottle of whisky which he had secreted, and had smuggled into the place while being employed as sentries at one of the gates. The master being struck, he called in the aid of the police, who were violently assailed by the whole body of the male inmates, armed with clubs, and aided by a large crowd of persons in the neighbourhood, who took part with the rioters. The doors were broken open, and the mob, numbering about a thousand persons, headed by the most violent of the women, assailed the police with stones of the largest size, thrown from every window of the building. The military having come to the assistance of the police, the inmates were forced into the respective wards, the glass, locks, and door-frames of which they immediately smashed to atoms. The riot lasted for several hours. Many of the police were severely hurt, and a few of the inmates had to undergo the same ordeal. Two were carried off severely wounded and the muskets of the forces. On the following morning another disturbance arose in consequence of a large party of men and women breaking out of the wards with the intention of renewing the combat. About forty of the most prominent of the rioters were, however, arrested, and sent to gaol. The military were again sent for, and stationed inside the workhouse, in consequence of the excitement having been raised.

Forty-nine bodies have been washed up from the wreck of the unfortunate Birkenhead. One of them was recognised as that of Dr. Lang, staff-surgeon, by a gold watch and £18 in money which he had about his person. A number of packages of clothing, &c. have also been washed up.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The ensuing week does not promise anything great in the shape of racing, but will be a busy one with the speculators, in comparing and squaring books on the coming Derby allowed to be one of the most extraordinary in the vicissitudes of the favorites ever known, and certain to be disastrous in its consequences, should that mysterious animal Hobbie Noble happen to get his head in first. The meetings for the week are—the East Surrey, on Monday; Bath, with a good list, on Tuesday and Wednesday; Liverpool Hunt, on Wednesday and Thursday; North Herts, on Thursday; and Harpenden, on Friday. The Cricket fixtures embrace a match between two select elevens at Lord's, and an All England match at Sheffield, on Monday; one between the Zingari Club and the Guards, at Lord's, on Wednesday; and one at Cambridge, on Thursday, between the M.C.C. and the University.

TATTERSALL'S.

The Valentine, eight tons, belonging to Mr. B. Wallis, won by twenty minutes, beating the Ottilia, the Jdas, the Idas, the Britannia, and the Albatross.

By a bill brought into the House of Commons by Lord R. Grosvenor and Mr. B Denison, the time for taking the poll in counties at contested elections in England and Wales is limited to one day—from eight o'clock in the morning until four o'clock in the afternoon.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly has become the purchaser of the Chauntry estate, near Ipswich.

The Limerick Reporter says:—"Father Kenyon, of Templederry, has just received a long at-ser, dated last December, from his friend John Mitchel, the Irish political exile. It affords a glowing picture of the present position and prospects of the exile and family, who are enjoying the sweets of domestic happiness in Van Diemen's Land, whither Mrs. Mitchel and their children are all in the best health; John Martin, another of the exiles, is living with them, and his health also is greatly improved. John Mitchel has taken a large tract of land, which he is now cultivating, and which affords him constant occupation. He writes in high spirits, by no means in love with the Whigs, however; and his map rations for the liberation of Ireland are said to be vigorous and as constant as ever."

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The amount of money purchases in the national securities, this week, has been by no means large. On most days prices have fluctuated to some extent; yet, as a rule, fine rates have been well maintained, with a general tendency to a manifestation of feeling, they have been well supported. The Bulls have commenced full average operations for the next Account, and not a few of them have great confidence in the ensuing settlement proving favourable. The Consol Account just closed has passed off remarkably well. The highest price paid for Stock whilst it remained open was 100; the lowest, 99¾: consequently, the extreme fluctuation was ¼ per cent.

Another large arrival of gold—valued at £160,000—has taken place from Port Philip. Advices from the colony state that the total shipments of the precious metals to England had exceeded £860,000, that the produce of the mines was increasing, and that further heavy remittances would be made. The value of gold was £2 18s. to £3 per ounce; hence it is clear that the banks are reaping a rich harvest from the efforts of the gold-finders. Although the exchange at New York (109¾) is against shipments, the usual steamer has brought over £12,000 this week. Prior to the departure of that packet, £100,000 in bills had been purchased on London and Liverpool; but the future movement of bullion will undoubtedly be regulated by the supplies of flour which will reach us during this and the coming month. Several parcels of gold and silver (the Brazilian steamer having taken out £40,282 in gold to Rio) have been forwarded from London; nevertheless, the stock at the Bank of England is now over £20,000,000, or the largest quantity ever held by that institution.

The controversy in reference to land titles in California, and which materially affects the interests of all purposing the making their capital in mining speculations, has not yet been brought to an issue. The Agua Fria Company have caused strict inquiries to be made on the subject, and we may, possibly, soon be placed in possession of some definite information. The Mexican Government do not object to the mode of acquiring rights to land by American citizens, in every case of annexation, has been for parties to appropriate a certain district of land. Having cleared and improved it, a petition is made to the Courts of the country for a title, which is almost invariably granted, after the necessary surveys have been made. We shall not enter into the question of right, but it appears to us, that, under existing circumstances, a squatter's title will improve a good one, that is to say, if all the necessary forms have been complied with.

On Monday the Consol Market was much depressed, and the Three per Cents were down as low as 99¾. They were a trifle better on the following day, at 99⅞ ⅞; whilst on Wednesday the highest figure was 99¾. The attendance of jobbers in the Exchange on Thursday was by no means extensive; yet Consols were a shade higher, they having touched 99⅞, closing at 99⅞. The Three per Cents Reduced marked 99¾ ⅞; the New Three-and-a-Quarters per Cents, 100⅛. Consol for Account were 99¾ ⅞. Bank Stock sold at 220, Ex. Bills 81s. Exchequer Bills, Small (March), 70s.; Ditto, June, £1000, 6s. to 6ds. Small and the £500 Bonds for the June were done at the latter figures. Long Annuities, 1860, were 6 13 16.

The produce markets—strong chiefly from the present low interest charged for money, and the liberal advances made by the various bankers—have been again active, and prices of cotton, indigo, and some other articles have steadily improved. Much interest is exated in the manufacturing districts, in which great activity still prevails, on the subject of the future supply of wool from our Australian colonies. On this subject an important public meeting has been held this week.

The dealings in the Foreign house have not been important. Peninsular, Northern, and South American stocks, as well as Sardinian securities, have been steady, but Mexicans have suffered a considerable fall, arising from the unfavourable accounts at hand from head-quarters. It is true that 70,000 dollars have come in; but it is plainly intimated that the dividends due next month will not be paid in the course. On Wednesday the old bonds were down to 20¾; and the Three, 20¼. The following are the official quotations of Thursday's transactions:—Brazilian Five per Cents, 98¾; Granada Deferred, 9¼; Mexican, for Account, 22¾ to ⅞; Ditto, Three per Cents, money, 25¾ to 25½; Peruvian, for Account, 104; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 103¾. Sardinian Five per Cents, 96¾ to 97; Spanish Three per Cents. 47; Ditto, New, Deferred, 21 to 2⅛; and Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 61¼; Chilian Six per Cents have marked 104; Danish Five per Cents, 105; Equador Bonds, 4¾; Portuguese Five per Cents (Brazil Guarantee), 100¾; and Venezuelan Three-and-a-Half per Cents, 45.

Bank Shares, especially those in connexion with our Australian colonies, have been again on the advance, Australasias having risen £2, or to 47. THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE.—Notwithstanding that the arrivals of English wheat up to our market this week, inclusive and by land carriage, have been on a very moderate scale the demand for all kinds has ruled very heavy, and the currencies have undergone a decline in the quotations of from 1s to 2s per quarter. Fine foreign wheats have been mostly sold at full prices, but low and middling qualities have given way 2s in value per quarter. On the whole the inquiry for barley—especially malting parcels—has been steady, at late rates. Beans and peas have made dowdy, and grinding lots have been enumerated as one, whilst both beans and peas have advanced 1s per quarter. Flour dull, but not lower. Indian corn and all other articles alike quiet and steady.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 37s to 42s; ditto, white, 39s to 43s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 37s to 41s. ditto, white, 40s to 42s; rye, 31s to 34s; grinding barley, 26s to 28s; distilling ditto, 30s to 32s; malting ditto, 32s to 34s; Norfolk and Lincoln malt, 70s to 78s; Ware and Hertford ditto, 68s to 72s; Kingston and Ware, 68s to 69s. Chevalier, 62s to 64s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 19s to 22s; potato ditto, 23s to 26s; Youghal and Cork, black, 16s to 21s, ditto, white, 19s to 22s; tick beans, new, 28s to 29s, ditto, old, 28s to 32s, grey peas, 29s to 31s; maple ditto, 30s to 32s; white, 31s to 33s; boilers, 32s to 35s per quarter. Lower flour, 38s to 40s; Suffolk, 29s to 32s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 30s to 32s per 280 lb. Foreign.—Free arrivals of wheat, flour, and barley. Prices 2s to 3s per qr. cheaper.

The Seed Market.—As the season for sowing is now over, the demand for all seeds is very inactive, and prices are barely supported. Cakes are a fair request, and quite as dear as last week.

Linseed, English, sowing, 50s to ——; Baltic crushing, 44s to 47s, Mediterranean and Odessa, 46s to 48s; hempseed, 32s to 37s per quarter Coriander, 12s to 13s per cwt. Rapeseed, 22s to 24s per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £8 8s to £8 10s, foreign, £7 10s to £8 15s per ton. Rape cakes, £4 5s to £4 10s per ton. Canary, 37s to 39s per quarter. English clover seed, red, 24s to 26s; white ditto, 40s to 46s; foreign, red, 42s to 54s; white, 42s to 56s per cwt.

Bread.—The price of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 6½d to 7d; of household ditto, 5d to 5d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 41s 1d; barley, 28s 1d; oats, 19s 8d; rye, 30s. 8d, beans, 30s 8d; peas, 30s 8d.

The Sea Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 40s 11d; barley, 28s 9d; oats, 19s 6d; rye, 31s 11d; beans, 30s 1d; peas, 29s 9d.

Duties.—Wheat, 1s 0d; barley, 1s 0d; oats, 1s 6d; rye, 1s 0d; beans, 1s 0d; peas, 1s 0d.

Tea.—The show of samples continues very extensive; nevertheless, the demand for rood kinds is steady, and common sound Congous is held firm 7, at 8½d to 9d per lb. The quality of the Pekoe grown qualities is moderate, compared with the bulk at the late sale.

Coffee Most descriptions have changed hands to a fair extent, at full quotations. Good ordinary native Ceylon has sold at 55s to 56s; good to fine ditto at 57s to 58s; and inferior, 50s to 54s per cwt.

Sugar West India sugar is in fair request, at fully the late improvement in the quotations Yellow sold on Barbadoes is as dear as 39s to 40s, good middling to good 36s 6d to 38s; low to middling, 34s 6d to 36s; middling to good, 33s to 34s. SARL'S ARGENTINE SILVER PLATE, 37 and 18, CORNHILL. This beautiful metal continues to stand unrivalled for every purpose for all the substitutes for silver. Its intrinsic lesson, combined with its brilliant appearance, defies all competition. It is upwards of 10 years since this manufacture was introduced by SARL and SONS, to the public, and, notwithstanding the many Pretenses and unprincipled imitations, the present demand exceeds all former experience, giving a convincing proof of the high favour bestowed on the article, which was to produce an article possessing the durability and appearance of solid silver at one sixth its cost. The magnificent stock has recently been enriched with many splendid novelties in Dinner, Tea, and Breakfast Services, and the power possessed so many attractions as at the present time. The Fiddle and Fiddle-thread patterns (Ladies' Fancy patterns) have been manufactured in solid silver, and orders to any extent can be executed at the shortest notice. Country and export orders receive the utmost attention in London. A new and enlarged pamphlet, containing 200 engravings, is just published, and now ready for circulation. It may be obtained gratis by applying at the Manufactory, 37 and 18, Cornhill, 17 and 18 Cornhill.

THE GOLD FEVER IN CALIFORNIA AND AUSTRALIA.

THE treasures of California and Australia continue to arrive in large quantities. The world has become afflicted with a gold fever, which threatens to exceed in virulence the famous "railway mania" of six or seven years ago. The nations of the earth are stirred: the young and the adventurous, the needy and the greedy, the speculative, who never speculated before, and the insolvent and the bankrupt, who, by the excess and the folly of their speculations, have eaten themselves out of a resting-place in the Old World—all these, and hosts of others, are moving to the golden centres of attraction in the west and the south. It is not alone the men who are anxious to try the fortunes of the "diggins" in their own persons, and to labour with the spade and the cradle, but those who desire to work to the full extent those abundant and well-known home Californias—the Cupidity and Folly of those who would grow suddenly rich—who are on the alert on the subject of gold and of gold mines. The daily papers begin to teem with advertisements of gold associations, some in embryo, and some fully formed and developed. The race of stags has plucked up courage, scrip is again in the market, and premiums are delights that are not only promised but paid to fortunate allottees. After a long night of sorrow the morning of a golden day has dawned upon the share-markets; and we shall, no doubt, have to record, after the lapse of a certain time, that the old experiences have been repeated—that countless bubbles have risen, floated, and glittered in the sunshine, that they have been borne aloft for the credulous to admire, and that they have collapsed with the customary results, bitter regrets expressed too late, and the misery if not the ruin of thousands of people.

But it is not upon these phases of the golden madness that we desire to dwell. The moral to be drawn from them is but the same old lesson in a new form, which has been taught a thousand times —and always, unhappily, in vain—that undue speculation and reckless adventure never end in any solid and lasting advantage to those who foster or who yield to them. But the results of this remarkable and almost simultaneous discovery of such quantities of gold in the dominions of the two most powerful nations of the world promise to be, in other respects, remarkable. As yet, these results are but imperfectly understood, though the current history of almost every day tends to foreshadow singular changes in the intercourse and the fate of nations as likely to grow out of them. So vast an accession to our present wealth, and so rich a prospect of the future, as either California or Australia seems singly sufficient to afford, will necessarily work to new and possibly to beneficial ends.

The settlement and colonisation of the extreme west of the North American continent, by which the new and the old civilisations of Europe and Asia have been brought into closer proximity than has yet been known, is a result for which, of itself, were there no other, the world might well be thankful, even though it should be at the expense of some present suffering. Even if these civilisations should happen to come into collision, as seems highly probable, from the determination of the far-seeing Yankees to walk unbidden into the long-sealed fastnesses of Japan, the world at large will be the gainer. But it is not alone by means of warfare that the West and the East seem destined to become better known to each other. The all-powerful stimulant of gold works in a thousand different ways. The people of Great Britain, of Ireland, and of northern Germany are now proved to be not the only swarming and emigrating races in the world. The aboriginal inhabitants of the North American Continent have hitherto been dispossessed of their homes, an l almost of their existence, by Europeans only; or by Africans, "imported" by by nefarious slave traders, or "reared" on that soil by slave owners. But a new class of claimants has at length appeared upon the scene; gold has done what example was powerless to accomplish; and the Chinese have become competitors for a share of the Californian treasures, and for homes in the great American Republic. A recent letter from New York calls attention to the fact, hitherto overlooked by the American and all other journals, that the Chinese emigration to the Californian "diggins" is carried on upon a large scale. The Chinese are stated to be among the most ingenious, laborious, economical, and docile of labourers among the mines. "Some of the Californians (says the writer) have made arrangements by which contracts are entered into in China for shiploads of Chinese, who engage on their arrival to labour for the meagrest pittance per diem. As many of them struck for higher wages soon after their arrival, a law has been proposed to enforce the execution of those contracts. The curious people have also made their way to the island of Cuba, and entered successfully into competition with negro labour."

These results are eminently curious, and may hereafter become as highly important. We say nothing on the consequences, proximate or remote, to the trade of the world, and to the relationship now subsisting between debtor and creditor in every part of our overburdened Europe, which may flow from the increase in the current quantities of gold; but the new relationship that is springing up between the long-divided populations of the globe, and which might have been indefinitely delayed were it not for the opportune discovery and the powerful incentive of these treasures, is an event too gratifying to enlarged philanthropy to be left unnoticed, even by the most cursory recorders of the events of our time.

In Australia—quite as rich in gold, and blessed with a far finer climate than California—with resources agricultural, pastoral, and commercial far superior to its American rival, and which point it out as one of the most favoured spots on the surface of the globe—the results of the discovery of gold are widely different. It would seem that, for the present, the discovery has proved more of a curse than of a blessing. California has no treasure but its gold; but Australia possesses that which is better than gold, and of which gold is but the arithmetical gauge and measurement.—It possesses flocks and herds in countless abundance; it grows corn, and wine, and fruit; and produces every article necessary for the subsistence, the health, the comfort, and even for the luxury of man. It has a fine soil, a splendid climate, harbours and rivers, and every natural advantage to make it the seat of one of the most powerful empires that ever existed on the globe. But it has one great want—that of human arms. It needs but men to possess wealth sufficient to buy up a score of barren and pestilential Californias, and to become a Southern Britain, richer, and possibly happier than its motherland. But its gold fields, with their glittering prizes, by the discovery of which men hope to gain, and very many do gain, rapid fortunes in periods of time that to our sober judgments on this side of the world look incredibly short, appear to be destroying a far truer and more valuable source of wealth than the most unsupported gold can ever become. A army of convicts has reached this country from Australia, that the flocks and herds are left untended, that all the available population has drafted itself off to the mines, that the sheep remain unshorn, that an amount of property in wool alone worth far more than all the gold yet obtained has been lost to the colonies, and that, unless a large supply of men, women, and children be immediately sent out, and be followed at regular intervals by other supplies as large and continuous, the noblest colony ever possessed by any empire, and one of the noblest countries in the world, will be totally ruined, notwithstanding its gold. Of what use is gold, except to procure other commodities? of what use would all the bullion in the Bank of England be to a company of breadless sailors floating about on a raft upon the wide Atlantic? and of what use are all the "diggins" if the real substantial and enjoyable wealth represented by abundant food and warm clothing is wanting? Australia is in a position as bad. She has the gold, but better than gold is being sacrificed to obtain it. For the last eight or ten years, and long before California was discovered to be a gold country, Australia has complained of the want of labour, and offered in vain her almost boundless pasture lands and corn fields to the enterprise of men with thews and sinews, and strong hands and hearts, not afraid of hard work. England has been overburdened with such men, and has groaned in bitterness of spirit at being compelled to maintain them and their families in bastiles and union workhouses; yet, in consequence of official apathy, and the dread felt by men in office of doing anything that might seem to interfere with what they are pleased to consider as the "principles of political economy," no attempt has been made to send the surplus and damaging excess of population in the old country to the relief of the clamorous colony. Is this state of things to continue? The island of Skye alone can afford to part with as many willing and serviceable families as would save from ruin the perishing fortunes of the Australian sheep farmers. It is not only Australia that complains, but Yorkshire has taken the alarm; and, anticipating a scarcity in the supply of Australian wool to keep our mills and factories at work in that great centre of the woollen manufacture of the world, sees before it the gloomy prospect of bankruptcy for mill-owners, and pauperism for many thousands of labourers. Of course it is useless, with the present unstable Ministry, and with the present moribund Parliament, to expect that so great a question as this can be fully considered; but among the results of the discovery of Australian gold, we cannot omit to notice so extraordinary a state of things as that which we have pointed out. We cannot bring ourselves to believe that the art of colonisation is wholly lost. At some future time—we hope it will not be too remote—the lands of Australia and the idle hands of England, Scotland, and Ireland will be made better acquainted, and the Government of this great nation will not be scared from doing its duty by the parrot-cry of "interference with the laws of political economy." There are things to be done in the interest of nations, of which the embryo science of political or social economy has yet taken no cognizance, and this appears to be one of them.

THE GOLD FIELDS OF AUSTRALIA.—THE DISORGANISATION OF SOCIETY.

THE increasing productiveness of the gold fields of Australia, particularly those in the Port Phillip district (Victoria), and the total disorganisation of society therein in consequence of the sudden wealth thus thrown in such profusion into the hands of the working and labouring classes, continue to form the sole theme of the address from this true El Dorado, the latest of which are dated to the close of January.

The receipts of gold at Sydney for the week ending January the 31st had, with the remittances from Melbourne, been to the extent of £120,750, the price being 65s. 3d. per oz.

The Meroo Diggings were yielding such large quantities of gold, that men could not be had under £3 per week with rations. At Braidwood, also, matters were progressing favourably. Deposits of the precious metal had been found at Tamworth, on the River Peel, while at Bathurst gold had been picked up in several of the streets in the shape of both nuggets and quarts.

The Port Phillip journals state that the influx of adventurers from the neighbouring colonies continued uninterrupted, and from nine to ten vessels arrived almost daily with passengers, of which about one-half were from South Australia. The number of diggers at the Melbourne fields was estimated at from 30,000 to 40,000, and the quantity of gold collected up to the middle of January alone amounted to £1,000,000.

The following letter, which has been published by the Times, from a correspondent at Melbourne (the capital of Victoria), shows the latest aspect of this colony under the influence of "the gold fever."

Melbourne, Jan. 1.

"In my opinion this place is inevitably and irretrievably ruined; I cannot see it in any other light. Still the matter is a mauta quæsto. Some are sanguine that all will be well: I cannot see how. The gold fields are inexhaustible. Last night a statement was made that two men had just arrived from Gipps' Land with the intelligence that new gold fields were discovered there, which leave the Mount Alexander fields altogether in the shade, that they had brought in £10 000 worth of gold, and there was a supply for the whole world. With these fields before us, how can this place be otherwise than ruined? What is to be done for labour? Suppose 100,000 labourers came out here during the next year, will any of them remain in the city or farms, at a few shillings a week, when they can go to the gold fields and make £3 a day? It is idle to suppose it. At this moment I cannot get a pair of boots made or mended in Melbourne, if I were to give my money that might be asked. I got my bread at Collingwood by sufferance. The baker will not undertake to supply me regularly, but will do the best he can. I pay 8s a load for water, and 30s. for a single horse load of wood. It with difficulty a dray can be obtained to carry a box, and if obtained the charge is ad libitum. I cannot at any price get a man to chop my wood, and I think myself fortunate if I can prevail on the black gins to work for half an hour.

"The judge's servants are all gone; he has put down his carriage, and his sons clean the knives and shoes—this, I assure you, is true—and wheel their afflicted father about in an invalid chair. In this state he goes to his court of a day. The men from the gold fields are rolling in gold, and so perfectly reckless of it, that the anecdotes told of them are not only amusing but astonishing. One man put a £5 note between two pieces of bread and butter, and ate it up as a sandwich. Another rolled two £5 notes into a small ball, and swallowed it as a pill. Another went into a confectioner's to eat a few tarts, put down a £5 note, and would not accept the change. They seem to have no idea of the value of money, and take their losses and robberies as complacently as philosophers, merely remarking, 'Well, there is plenty more.' This was the remark of a man at the bank when he had been robbed of a check for £140; and which had been cashed before he called about it. If the gold fields were limited in extent, and would only suffice for a limited number of fortunate diggers, or if they were in their nature inexhaustible, I should say that the misfortune of this place would be limited only to time—that it would be in fact only a question of time; but the fields are unlimited in extent and inexhaustible in their treasures. What hope is there that we shall have labour—good, wholesome, reasonable-priced labour—here? It is madness to suppose it. Every article of all trades, necessaries as well as luxuries, will never go down again; and here we shall be living in the most expensive place in the world, in the midst of all the reckless vagabonds from all parts of the world. The merchant, the trader, wholesale and retail, will do very well, because he makes his profit commensurate with the state of things around him; but it is the man with a settled, defined income who will suffer. However, time will set right all things, and in twelve months' time we shall see the result, or the probable result, of all this wonderful change

"It will be the ruin of Adelaide. 1200 people arrived here on Saturday and Sunday from that place; eight shiploads were on their way, and twelve more loading at the port Sydney people are coming in shoals; and I suppose Americans will be sending. Yankee, revenons nous moutons, as the French say. However, I do not hear that these latter gentlemen will meet with much sympathy here, for I believe, upon the whole, the diggers are well conducted."

The illustrations upon the preceding page are three of a series of Sketches we have just been favoured with by Mr. E. C. Dunn, of Chepstow, Mount Emu, Port Phillip, from whose communication the following are extracts:—

"The gold at Ballarat is seldom found in large quantities till the miner has penetrated through a hard stony soil for a distance of ten or twelve feet, and reached a species of blue clay, in which at this place the gold is principally found; but it has been found in larger quantities at a depth of 35 feet, and imbedded in ironstone.

"I forward you a Sketch of the first escort leaving the Buninyong inn. The first evening I passed at the inn during my visits to these diggings, a labouring man named Cavenagh walked up, carrying with him his day's earnings; they amounted to £600. His mate marched behind him, carrying a double-barrelled gun. This man and his brothers have since, I understand, realised many thousands of pounds in this way; but this is by no means a rare instance.

"The diggers are usually formed among themselves into parts of four: one digs by turns, one or two cart the earth to the water, and one washes the earth. Nearly the whole of the ground in the western parts and the creek, except where stones are left, is completely hollowed out into pits, averaging from 10 to 30 feet deep, and 10 feet square, the latter being the quantity allowed to each digger. Each digger is expected to pay a license fee to Government of £3, and a further sum for which he is allowed 8 feet square to dig. The fee may be paid in gold dust. A great many pay, as so doing secures to the proprietor his pit, if it should prove a good one; whereas, if he has not paid the fee, another who applies and pays may turn him out. But by far the greater portion of the diggers do not pay, and Government is not strong enough to compel them. A late attempt of the Government to raise the license fee to £4, and a further near the railway terminus, London-bridge, has just been proved, and the personal property sworn under £120,000. The will bears date 21 of August, 1849. The testator possessed very large estates at Stockwell, in the City, and elsewhere, which are devised to his children, his eldest son taking the Stockwell estate. He widow has a large annuity secured to her

The late George Robinson, Esq., of Richmond (formerly an extensive builder), died possessed of £120,000 personalty, and by his will has left very large legacies to his daughters, and the residue to be divided equally between his two sons, who are the sole executors.

MUNIFICENT CHARITABLE BEQUESTS.—The late Emanuel Henry Brandt, Esq., of York-terrace, Regent's-park, formerly of St. Helen's-place, has bequeathed to the German Hospital, Dalston, £2000; Look Hospital, Harrow-road, £1000; St. Mary's Hospital, Paddington, £1000; Poplar New School, Haverstock-hill, £1000; Infant Orphan Asylum, Wanstead, £1000; National Benevolent Institution, £1000; Governesses' Institution, £1000; Royal General Annuity Society, £1000; Female Orphan Asylum, Lambeth, £2000; and the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, Glasgow, £500. The late Alexander Mackenzie, Esq., of Devonshire-place, has left to the Middlesex Hospital £500; Orthopœdic Hospital, £500; Charing-cross Hospital, £500; Marylebone Charity School, £300; Emigration Fund of the Grotto Passage Ragged School, Marylebone, £300; St. Marylebone General Dispensary, £300; and to St. Marylebone Provident Dispensary, £300. Also, a sum equal to £4000, for the erection of a church in India. The late John Hudson, jun., Esq., of Beverley, has bequeathed the following:—To the British and Foreign Bible Society, Church of England Missionary Society, Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, and the Church Pastoral Aid Society, £100 each; to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, Achai Mission, Irish Education Society, Religious Tract Society, Infant Orphan Asylum (Wanstead), Poor Parish Clergy, School for the Daughters of the Clergy at Casterton, and the Hull General Dispensary, £50 each.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The decisive and damaging refusals of men eminent in various departments of public life to take the oath of allegiance to the Prince President, upon his inauguration of the Reformed Republic, is the leading topic of the week in Paris, and forms a strong contrast with the main features of the preceding week's news. The letter of refusal from General Changarnier has been followed by a similar communication from General Lamoricière to the Minister of War. It is dated Brussels, the 14th instant, and is as follows:—

General,—Torn from my home, thrown into prison, proscribed in contempt of the laws, I did not believe that men would be gone so far as to ask me for an oath of fidelity to the man whose power, usurped by violence, is only maintained by force.

But a document emanating from your department contains a paragraph which evidently applies to the generals who have been banished, and imposes on them the obligation of the oath. Two months are allowed to those who reside in Belgium to reply to this summons.

I hear it said on all sides that the oath is not binding towards a person who has not kept his own. Widely as this doctrine is now used, I reject it—delay I do not require—the oath I refuse.

I know the consequences of my resolution. 29½ years passed in the army, 36 campaigns resulting from 18 years' war in Algeria (from May, 1830, to January, 1848), some services rendered to France abroad, and during the fatal days of June, 1848—services which, perhaps, are not yet forgotten—all this will be reduced to nothing; I shall be struck out from the lists of the army. Once more it will be proved that rank is at the mercy of arbitrary power. That rank was made the patrimony of the officer by the laws of the 19th May, 1834: he could not lose it but by the sentence of a court-martial. That law is trampled under foot by a Government which respects neither persons nor property.

Thus the sword which I had devoted to the service of France is about to be torn from my hands. What could I do with it under such a Government? But it (which God forbid) our frontiers should be threatened, I would hasten to resume it, and I should find, in that moment of danger, as in all others, that I am not unmindful of the duties which I have to fulfil. For history sufficiently tells me that, in presence of extreme dangers brought about by ambition, despotism does not require an oath from brave men who march in defence of their country.

General DE LAMORICIÈRE.

Several other refusals penned in the same spirit have been published from the leading members of the departmental Councils-General, Municipal Councils, and other bodies in various localities

The matter appears to create much annoyance at the Elysée, especially the letters of Changarnier and Lamoricière, if we are to judge by an article in the Constitutionnel from the pen of M. Granier de Cassagnac, whose hireling vituperation was poured out a few days past on the aged astronomer, Arago (who, however, as we noticed last week, has been specially exempted from the obligation of taking the oath). M. de Cassagnac, in his attack on the recusant Generals, unhesitatingly denies to General Changarnier the high military character claimed by that officer, and always accorded to him; and in the General's capacity as a "man of order and legality" he makes the following charges against him:—

First—That in the month of March, 1849, he, General Changarnier, demanded from Louis Napoleon a written authorisation to throw the Constituent Assembly out of the windows.

Secondly—That he subsequently urged Louis Napoleon, in the strongest manner, to make a coup d'état

Thirdly—That, in the month of November, 1850, at the time of the Alma plot, he assembled together at his head-quarters in the Tuileries a number of political personages, by whom he proposed to arrest Louis Napoleon and lodge him in Vincennes, to prorogue the Assembly for six months, and make him, Changarnier, Dictator.

M. de Cassagnac adds that Count Molé, one of the persons present, would straightway to Louis Napoleon, and informed him of Changarnier's conduct.

The last charge, in which the name of M. Molé is involved, has been denied, so far as he is concerned, by that gentleman, who, in a letter to the Constitutionnel, not only contradicts the statement of his having been present at the meeting described to have been held at the Tuileries, but feels quite sure that no such meeting ever took place. His indignation at having been made to play the part of an informer and denouncer is strongly expressed. He calls it an infamous calumny, and administers a rebuke to the man who ignores the noble attempts to serve, by the audacity of his insults and the fury of his outrageous attacks on every man, whose services can never be forgotten by France, or, if they could be forgotten, would be brought back to its heart by such frantic attempts to blacken them. M. Changarnier will most probably also notice these charges. In the remainder of the article in the Constitutionnel assailing General de Lamoricière, M. de Cassagnac admits his courage, but denies his capacity. Lamoricière, however, in the public estimation, bears the highest name of any of the African Generals.

The "sword of Damocles" is still held over the heads of journalists. The following note, signed "Communiqué," thus intimating its official character, has been published in the Moniteur:—

Several journals, in the hope of evading the penalties decreed against the authors of false news, make use of such terms as "on dit," "on assure," in order to spread reports which are without any foundation These expressions, being only a sub erfuge in order to render illusory Art. 15 of the organic decree of the 17th February, must be considered between the journals whom it makes of them from the penalties enacted by that decree.

The Moniteur is also made the vehicle of an announcement of the reason why the Government did not authorise the printing of Count Chambord's address to the Legitimists. It was because the address advised a refusal to take the oath of allegiance, thereby treating the Constitution with disrespect. The director of the Corsaire and the editor of that journal were each sentenced by the Police Court on Tuesday to imprisonment for one month and 150f. fine, for publishing a libel against the Government. In the provinces we find the Prefect of the Pas de Calais giving a "warning" to the editor of the Progrès of Arras, for "having commented on an administrative act in a malevolent spirit."

General Parchappe has presented to the Legislative Body a report in the name of the committee charged to examine the bill authorising the levy, in 1853, of 80,000 men for the army, of the class of conscripts of 1852. The report states that, in order to keep up the armed force of France at 500,000 men, it is necessary to call out 80,000, as has been annually done for twenty years past; and, as an additional reason for the levy, it says:—"Foreign countries do not reduce their armies. England feels great anxiety with respect to our progress, and the firm and becoming attitude of the country; her Chambers have voted subsidies for the organisation of a numerous militia and the increase of the navy. In Austria, the Sovereign and the Emperor of Russia have passed in review the troops assembled at Vienna."

The splendid gallery of paintings and sculpture belonging to the late Marshal Soult—the spoil of the churches and convents of Spain—formed during the week an object of great curiosity and admiration; and the street, Rue du Sentier, No. 8, Boulevard Poissonière, where the pictures were exhibited previous to the sale, which commenced on Wednesday last, was crowded daily. It was visited by the Prince President.

On Sunday morning the Minister of War gave a grand farewell breakfast to the Arab chiefs, and to a large number of generals and other officers who have served in Algeria. Generals Daumas, Canrobert, Rivet, de Loarmel, Espinasse, d'Esterhazy, and Colonel Fleury were among the guests. After breakfast the chiefs were invited to enter the drawingrooms, where several magnificent presents, in arms, jewels, stuffs, &c., were offered to them by General St. Arnaud. The Minister at the same time exhorted them to persevere in the fidelity which they had hitherto maintained towards France. "You must have perceived," added he, "during your short stay in Paris, the extent of our strength; and, on your return, you can tell your countrymen that if France knows how to recompense with munificence her faithful servants, she is powerful enough to chastise her enemies. The hospitality offered to you, the reception which you have everywhere met with, are manifest proofs of the firm determination of the Government that France and Algiers shall form but one and the same country but one and the same people." St Thar, one of the chiefs, replied, in the name of all, "We will carry back with us an ineffaceable remembrance of the grandeur of France, and of the kind reception which we have received from the Government and the population. Reckon us amongst your most faithful subjects, ready to take up arms for our common interest, wherever you may meet with enemies." The Minister then conducted the chiefs to the Elysée, where the Prince President gave them an audience of leave. On their being admitted, the Prince expressed how much he had been pleased to see them take part in the military fêtes. He did not doubt their devotion to France, which had adopted them as her children. He said that his desire was to be able one day to return the visit which they had now made to France. He recommended them to profit by the benefits of the peace so dearly won for them, by following the path traced by his Government for the welfare of all, and then added:—"I reckon you amongst my soldiers, and I have shown that I do so by placing you in the midst of them." The Prince then presented to each a rich present. The Agha Mohamed-bel-Hadri preferred, to everything that could be offered him, a portrait of the Prince. The President also distributed amongst them three decorations—one to the son of General Ben Ismael, killed in the French service; a second to his nephew, El Mezary; and the third, to the Agha of the Beni-Ameur. The Prince also presented to Colonel Durrieu, under whose care the chiefs have been placed in Paris, a superb carbine. The Arab deputation is to leave Paris this day. This banquet was the conclusion of the fêtes.

The marriage of M de Persigny and Mdlle. de la Moskowa is to take place on Saturday (this day), in the chapel of the Senate. The Prince President and all his household will attend.

UNITED STATES.

Under date the 8th inst. from New York we learn that in Congress General Cass had made a speech in the Senate in favour of an increased grant to the Collins line of steamers. An amendment to strike out the clause for additional aid was negatived, and another afterwards adopted, giving Congress the privilege of withdrawing the additional appropriation after 1854, by giving six months' notice. This amounts to a decision in favour of an augmented compensation for this line. The Convention in favour of an augmented compensation for this line. The Curcision, in favour of an augmented compensation for this line. The Curtis Bill, the passing of which was considered expedient by the Administration, was about to be taken up.

The health of Mr. Henry Clay, one of the United States most able statesmen, which has for some time been precarious, was pronounced hopeless. According to a telegraphic despatch of the 4th from Washington, he was sinking fast, and it was feared would not survive the night. Though much reduced in strength, he was perfectly conscious of his awful position, and seemed fully prepared to meet death. President Fillmore had visited him, and the interview is said to have been of a most solemn and touching character.

Kossuth was still at Boston.

The officers of the Dutch man-of-war Prince of Orange had been received with much attention at Washington.

In the west a severe hurricane had been experienced, by which the town of Leavenworth, Indiana, had been nearly destroyed. The lake navigation was not completely free from ice.

Accounts from California to the 5th of April have been received. The population of the State was increasing at a rate truly astonishing. The Vigilance Committee, which was recently resuscitated, had hanged a Mexican for murder. A duel was to take place at San Francisco on the evening of the 5th, between a member of the Assembly and a naval officer.

From the mines the accounts were most encouraging. The value of the gold exported from Jan. 1 to April 5 was 14,000,000 dollars. A lump of gold valued at 12000 dollars, and another massive piece weighing 96 lb., are reported to have been found at San Andreas and Valecit. The value of a piece of gold picked up at Kelsey's dry diggings was estimated at 4000 dollars. Numerous instances are given of the discovery of lumps of gold weighing from 1 lb. to 9 lb. Tunnelling was being extensively carried on by the miners. At Duggan's Flat a party of 30 men were engaged in tunnelling through the solid rock. They had bored 100 feet, and expected to go 50 feet farther before finding the gold.

Under the head Central America an accident of most perilous character is noticed as having occurred to the mail steamboat, on the Chagres river, with the Californian mails on board. The boat struck a snag and sank. Had the accident occurred a few yards further down the stream, she would have been irrevocably lost. The passengers by the Crescent City came over the Panama Railway from Buena Vista. The road was about to be opened to Frijola, and in a few weeks would be completed to San Pablo, six miles from Gorgona.

From the west coast of South America there is no news of interest. Flores' expedition against the existing Government of Equador was still lying at the mouth of the Gunyaquil river.

INDIA.

The usual advices overland from Bombay, under date April 17, communicate full accounts on the subjects briefly noticed in our late edition last week, by telegraphic despatch from Trieste.

From these advices we learn that the first division of the force intended for the invasion of Burmah arrived off the Rangoon river on the morning of the 31st of March, and the remaining steamers and troops from Bengal and Madras were hourly expected. The campaign was to open formally on the 5th of April, and it was expected that Rangoon would be attacked about the 10th.

The Burmese preparations for war are described as being on a much more extended scale than in 1823; the people pretend to be very anxious for a trial of strength, and evidently attribute Lord Dalhousie's anxiety for peace and our delay in commencing operations to timidity. When Colonel Kemp, the Commissioner at Moulmein, in delivering a copy of the Governor-General's ultimatum to the Burmese Commissioners of the Governor-General's ultimatum to the Burmese Commissioners of the Governor-General's ultimatum to the Burmese Commissioners

THE GRAND BALL IN THE COURT-YARD OF THE ECOLE MILITAIRE.

THE FETES DES AIGLES, AT PARIS.

We this week complete our Illustrations of these magnificent Fêtes with views of the Ball in the Grand Court of the Ecole Militaire, and the Procession of the Clergy, fully described in our Journal of last week. (See page 386.)

For the Ball in the Court-yard were constructed three spacious saloons parallel to each other, with two long lateral galleries. The centre saloon or nave was that set apart for dancing. The entrance was by means of a vestibule, at the angles of which were piers, with their base respectively supported by four pieces of cannon and four mortars; the caps of the piers formed of cavalry pistols, &c. Instead of bullets or shells, bouquets of flowers were seen issuing from the mouths of the field-pieces. In front of the door communicating with the vestibule stood two figures of horsemen wearing complete armour, and holding a lance, and who had the appearance of sentinels guarding the banner or the castle of some feudal chief. On each side of the inner entrance of the ball-room were two columns 15 feet high, formed entirely of implements of war—bullets, cannons, muskets, and sabres; and their summit was terminated by lance-heads decorated with streamers, and supporting, one the bust of the Emperor Napoleon, the other that of the President of the Republic. The cross of the Legion of Honour, and the military medal recently instituted, of large form and proportion, were suspended behind these columns. The ball-room was about 64 feet in height, and along its entire length ran 30 square columns reaching to the roof, and sustaining two long galleries raised about 24 feet from the ground, and to which access was had by wide staircases. The decorations of the galleries were in the style of the 15th, 16th, and 17th centuries, and the front was ornamented with tapestries in crimson velvet, with fringes and tassels of gold. The four pillars that supported it were ornamented with shields. In front of and between the pillars were placed figures of armed knights, mounted on barbed steeds. A long scroll, with the words "Honneur et Patrie," traced in gold, ran round above the upper story. At one extremity was constructed an estrade for the President. The orchestra had its place in front, in a spacious gallery constructed right over the principal entrance; and above it was the effigy of an eagle holding a scroll, with the words "L'Armée au Prince Louis Napoleon!" At the base of the columns, which seemed to rise from beds of flowers, were placed mortars, whose mouths were filled with sweet-scented garlands. The balustrades of the galleries were formed of sabre blades and pistols. From out of a mass of gilt bronze lustres, holding 24,000 wax lights, gushed a stream of light, which was reflected back from these warlike ornaments.

Between the upper part of the galleries and the ceiling, which was covered with white tapestry, were seen immense garlands of ivy, encircling escutcheons, on which were traced, in characters of gold, several of the victories of the French army since the Revolution of 1789.

VESTIBULE OF THE BALL-ROOM.

M. ARAGO.

In our Journal of last week we stated the refusal of M. François Arago to take the oath of allegiance to the President of the Republic, and tendering his resignation. The following is M. Arago's letter to the Minister of Public Instruction:—

Paris, May 9.

Monsieur le Ministre,—The Government has itself admitted that the oath prescribed by Art. 14 of the Constitution ought not to be required from the members of a purely scientific and literary body like the Institute. I cannot say why the Bureau des Longitudes, an astronomical academy, in which, when a vacancy occurs, an election ensues to fill it up, is placed in another category. The simple circumstance would perhaps have sufficed to induce me to refuse the oath; but considerations of another nature, I confess, have exercised a decisive influence on my mind. Circumstances rendered me, in 1848, as member of the Provisional Government, one of the founders of the Republic. As such (and I glory in it at present) I contributed to the abolition of all political oaths. At a later period I was named by the Constituent Assembly President of the Executive Commission; my acts in this last named situation are known; the republic forbids me to have need to mention them here. You can comprehend, Monsieur le Ministre, that in presence of these reminiscences my conscience has imposed on me a resolution which perhaps the director of the Observatory would have hesitated to come to. I had always thought that by the terms of the law an astronomer at the Bureau of Longitude was appointed for life, but your decision has undeceived me. I have, therefore, Monsieur le Ministre, to request you to appoint a day on which I shall have to quit an establishment which I have been inhabiting now for near half a century. That establishment, thanks to the protection given to it by the Governments which have succeeded each other in France for the last forty years—thanks, above all, I may be allowed to say, to the kindness of the Legislative Assemblies in regard to me—has risen from its ruins and its insignificance, and can now be offered to strangers as a model. It is not without a profound sentiment of grief that I shall separate from so many fine instruments, to the construction of which I have more or less contributed; it is not without lively apprehension that I shall behold the means of research created by me passing into malevolent or even hostile hands; but my conscience has spoken, and I am bound to obey its dictates. I am anxious that in this circumstance everything shall pass in the most open manner; and, in consequence, I inform you, Monsieur le Ministre, that I will address to all the great academies of Europe and America, for I have long had the honour of belonging to them, a circular to intimate my removal from an establishment with which my name had been in some sort identified, and which was for me a second country. I desire it to be known everywhere that the motives which have dictated my determination have nothing for which my children can ever blush. I owe these explanations above all to the first-rate savans who honour me with their friendship, such as Humboldt, Faraday, Brewster, Melvin, &c. I am anxious also that these illustrious personages shall not be uneasy concerning the great change which this determination of mine will produce in my existence. My health has without doubt been much impaired in the service of my country. A man cannot have passed a part of his life going from mountain-peak to mountain-peak, in the wildest districts of Spain, for the purpose of determining the precise figure of the earth; in the inhospitable regions of Africa comprised between Bougia and the capital of the Regency; in Algerine corsairs; in the prisons of Ma-orca, of Rosas, and Palamos, without profound traces being left behind. But I may remind my friends that a hand without vigour can still hold a pen, and that the half-blind old man will always find near him persons anxious to note down his words. Receive, Monsieur le Ministre, the assurance of my respect.

F. Arago.

On the same day M. Arago addressed a second letter to the Minister of Public Instruction, who has replied as follows:

Monsieur,—In excusing yourself on May 9, on the score of ill-health, for not attending with your colleagues of the Board of Longitude to take the oath to the Prince President and to the Constitution, you had authorised me to suppose that you would not decline an obligation imposed by the Constitution on all public functionaries. Your second letter, which bears the same date, but which I received at a later hour, does not allow me to entertain that hope. Without stopping to remark on the change of language, which it is impossible not to be struck with, and on the terms, so little guarded, which I was surprised to meet with on this occasion from your pen, I considered it my duty to take the orders of the Prince before I accepted your resignation. The President of the Republic has authorised me to admit an exception in favour of a savant whose works have thrown lustre on France, and whose existence his Government would regret to embitter. The publicity given to your letters will not change in any respect the resolution which I consider it an honour to transmit to you. Receive, Monsieur, the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

H. Fortoul.

M. Arago (of whom we give a characteristic Portrait, from a daguerréotype by Claudet) is now in his 67th year, and has been a distinguished member of the Institute since 1810. A brief memoir of his eventful life has already appeared in the Illustrated London News, No. 68.

M. ARAGO.—FROM A DAGUERREOTYPE BY CLAUDET

FIRE IN PORTSMOUTH DOCKYARD.

At about eight o'clock on Monday morning a fire was discovered in one of the departments of Portsmouth Dockyard, which, but for the immense exertions promptly made to extinguish it, might have resulted in the destruction of an incalculable amount of national property, and crippled for a long time the efficiency of Portsmouth as a naval dépôt.

The scene of the catastrophe was the Tarring-house, situated nearly in the centre of the yard: it is three stories high, and of considerable length, running in a line from the Rope-house, from which it is separated by a road, which was nearly blocked up with rope-bins, plank, wood, coal, and other combustibles. On the other side of the Tar-house are the storekeepers' and builders' offices. The lower end of the Tarring-house is used for tarring single yarn. There are two coppers, each containing about ten gallons of tar: through this tar, when hot, the yarn passes, and a small steam-engine winds up the yarn on its proper reel. The fire was lighted under the coppers as usual, and soon after the flames burst out with terrific violence, and that compartment of the building was shortly in flames.

Four ropemakers, a boy, and one stoker were in the Tarring-house at the time: they instantly rushed out and gave an alarm; the fire-bell was rung, the police were called, the engines manned and run up to the scene of the disaster: and within three minutes after the alarm was given one of the ropemakers' four engines (which was the first at the fire) was got into play. About forty engines altogether were soon at work, and, there being a good supply of water and thousands of hands, within the hour (from eight to nine) the flames were extinguished and the damage ascertained. Nothing could exceed the praiseworthy exertions of all the parties engaged in the work: every officer and man was at his post, and plied the means at his command with indescribable vigour, and thus has been saved a most important section, if not the greater portion, of the Dockyard.

The building containing the offices before enumerated is about 40 feet high, and as many in width, the partitions being of brick, with iron bars to the windows. In this building at the time of the fire were about 1500 tons of tarred yarn, 14 or 15 cwt of yarn in the Tarring house (the seat of the fire), which was destroyed; and in an adjoining store of the same edifice were several tarbarrels, and three full coals, besides the stock in use at the time of the accident. Had this immense inflammable mass ignited, the Dockyard would, in all probability, have been one wide-spread scene of devastating flame, on one side of the Tarring-house being a long range of roperies, extending nearly the entire depth of the yard, with low wooden sheds within a dozen feet of the Tarring-house, timber in immense loads strewn about and stacked around, and on the other a long range of offices, police store, armoury, &c. The boilers in which the tar is heated are of copper, holding about five buckets each, and it was the newest of these vessels which burst. The part of the building in which they were is gutted, and the roof burnt through. The preservation of the other sections of the building seems truly providential. Admiral Sir Thomas Briggs, Commander-in-Chief, was among the first on the spot, and most prompt and energetic in giving the commands. Rear-Admiral Superintendent Prescott, who was confined to his bedroom by indisposition, has ordered a court of inquiry to investigate the cause of the disaster, and has issued a notice as a mark of his admiration of the good conduct of the officers, artificers, and labourers of the Dockyard.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1852.

THE bookselling trade, which Mr. Gladstone, in his able speech on the paper duty, well described as a trade "bristling with monopoly," has been heard, at its own request, before three distinguished umpires—the first of them a great lawyer, the second a distinguished clergyman, and the third a well-known banker and legislator, and the whole entrusted to highly eminent and successful authors. No tribunal could have been better chosen for the impartial consideration of the question which has long agitated the trade—a question, we would observe, the influence and effects of which are by no means confined to booksellers, but extend to the literature of the country, and to all who either live by or enjoy it.

The wholesale booksellers, who wished to establish a monopoly, and the retail booksellers, who wished for nothing but liberty to sell at what prices they pleased, the books for which they had paid to the producers the price demanded, were severally heard before Lord Campbell, Dr. Milman, and Mr. Grote; and, after due deliberation, the verdict of the distinguished umpires has been delivered. That verdict—calm, comprehensive, impartial, and strictly in accordance with reason and common-sense—has been given, as we from the first anticipated it would be, in favour of the principles of Free Trade. The high character of the two great publishers who promised that they would abide by the decision of the umpires, whether favourable or adverse, is such as to forbid the public to fear that they will any longer lend their countenance or support to the coercion of the retail trade by the means which Lord Campbell and his coadjutors have condemned; and their example will, we have no doubt, be of sufficient influence with the rest of the trade, not bound like themselves by any personal promises, to induce a general acquiescence. We hope that this will be the result, for the sake of so important a branch of the national industry as that of the production and distribution of books, and that the booksellers of all classes—wholesale and retail, producers and distributors—will, in the interest of trade, as well as in the higher interests of literature, cease the ignoble squabbles which have lately brought them so prominently before the public. It has long been evident to all clear-headed and clear-sighted observers among the public, and it has been, perhaps, more painfully evident to all those who, in the first instance, are the producers of books—the authors, without whose genius and industry no new books can be brought into existence—that the book trade, as carried on for the last half-century, has not been in accordance with the wants and with the spirit of the age. At a time when the number of readers increases enormously from year to year—when in the family of almost every working man in the great hives and centres of industry a book or periodical of some kind has become a necessary of life, and when hundreds of thousands of the population must either have cheap books or no books—it is obvious and palpable that the system of those booksellers which aimed at keeping books dear was a wrong one. Gradually that system was giving way, and its last support has been taken from it by the judicious as well as judicial sentence pronounced upon it at Strathedon House. We sincerely believe that no long period will elapse before the eminent publishers who most opposed to innovation upon the old traditionary and sluggish system which they inherited from their respectable predecessors, will admit that the new life infused into the trade by the decision of Lord Campbell and his co-umpires has been of more advantage to them than to any other parties in the late controversy. On some future occasion we propose to show what other evils and abuses still afflict the pursuits of literature, which publishers have it in their power to remedy. We shall then endeavour to show what powerful circumstances are still in existence to affect injuriously the prime agents of literature, the authors, and what injustice they suffer from the "bristling monopolies" to which Mr. Gladstone has so opportunely alluded, as well as from the State, which has hitherto in its corporate capacity indulged in a most unworthy, if not dangerous, hostility to them. In the meantime, we express what we believe to be the very general feeling of the public—and certainly of all who have studied the question has been so fully and ably argued, and that it found such competent judges to decide upon it as the biographer, the poet, and the historian whose verdict has just been delivered. Were it a question of trade alone, we should not, perhaps, have thought it worth while to allude thus particularly to it; but believing it to affect, with other subsidiary and relevant questions, the whole future position of literature and literary men, we have considered, and will again consider, in no higher grounds than the commercial ones involved in the late dispute.

EMIGRATION.—MRS. CHISHOLM IN IRELAND.—From the Cork newspapers, it would appear that the "Exodus" from Ireland to America is likely to be diverted into a new and more profitable channel by the arrival there of Mrs. Chisholme the philanthropic lady whose benevolent exertions to increase and improve emigration to Australia, and to provide for the comfort and the treatment of the poorer classes of emigrants from England and Scotland, have been crowned with such remarkable success. Mrs. Chisholm's visit to Cork has indeed created quite a sensation in that city, where the principal inhabitants, including the Roman Catholic Bishop, Mr. Delaney, and the Protestant Archbishop, the Rev. Dr. Kyle, have united in testifying their respect for her. On Friday and Saturday she visited the workhouse, the gaols, and various industrial establishments for children of both sexes. On Monday evening a crowded soirée was given in her honour, at which the band of the 90th attended; and amongst those present were the members of several of the most influential families in the city and in the neighbourhood, who were anxious to pay a tribute of respect to a lady whose devotion to the cause of humanity has been proved by her sacrifice of personal comfort, and who has brought to that cause such rare talents and unceasing efforts. Since her arrival at Cork, Mrs. Chisholm has received letters from her husband, Captain Chisholm, dated Melbourne, January 13, announcing that quite a considerable amount had been sent home by persons who had emigrated, to assist their friends to go out to them. One letter, addressed to the Ear. of Shaftesbury, brought a remittance of £419 for the same purpose. It is stated, that amongst the Irish remittances is one of £130 from a settler in Australia to his friends in the county of Tyrone. The Cork Reporter remarks "This is only the commencement of the great results which we feel assured Mrs. Chisholm's system is destined to accomplish."

ELECTORAL FACTS.—This is the title of a little work of very great value, from the pen of Dr. Dod, the author of the "Parliamentary Companion," the "Peerage," &c., and was undertaken, as Mr. Dod sets forth in his preface, "to satisfy such inquiries as naturally arise on the eve of a general election, by presenting a compact portraiture of the constituencies." This task, difficult and troublesome as it must have been, has been accomplished with an ability of generalship and a completeness and finish of minute detail which have also would have in vain attempted, without the aid of long parliamentary experience and of the best opportunities of observation in poutical life, such as Mr. Dod has had. The "facts" presented run over the last twenty years, from 1832 to 1852, and comprising the following leading features; viz.—1. The Local Political History of every Constituency in the United Kingdom. 2. The Nature of the Franchise in each place, whether consisting of freemen or freeholders, payers of scot and lot, occupiers of £10 houses, &c., carefully recorded, and compared at various periods. 3. The Registered Electors contrasted, both as to extent and numbers, at present and in 1832. 4. The Electioneering Influence prevailing in each place fully detailed both as to the past and present. 5. The Property and Taxation of every Constituency recorded as an important element of Representation. 6. The premises, Trades, Professions and Occupations, stated for the use of those politicians who would enfranchise classes. 7. The Population under the New Census, recorded for the use of those who would regulate the Representation by numbers. 8. The noted Members, set forth as a series of electoral facts interesting to every class. 9. The Politics and Amount of Sale of the Newspapers in each place furnish a series of peculiarly novel facts by which to estimate its political condition. 10. The Polls for the last Twenty Years recorded, so as to enable every man to judge for himself with respect to the results of the impending election. The whole includes the cream of nearly one hundred volumes, and of more than twenty years' private Memoranda. It furnishes the ready means of solving doubts, settling controversies, instituting comparisons, or even making an occasional prophecy respecting the places returning members to Parliament.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

The Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the youthful members of the Royal family, after a very gay week—her Majesty having given a State ball on Wednesday night, and visited the Royal Italian Opera on Tuesday and Thursday evenings—left town yesterday (Friday) for the marine residence of the Court in the Isle of Wight.

The ordinary proceedings of Court life during the week are thus chronicled under official authority:—

On Saturday her Majesty held a Privy Council at Buckingham Palace, at which the Queen having been pleased to appoint John Earl of Carnarvon to be Lord-Lieutenant of the county of Carnarvon, he his Lordship took the customary oaths. The Right Hon. Lord Nass, Chief Secretary for Ireland, was, by command of the Queen, sworn of her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, and took his place at the board. After the Council her Majesty gave audiences to Mr. Secretary Walpole, the Right Hon. C. J. Herries, the Lord President, Sir John Pakington, the Lord Chamberlain, and Lord John Manners. In the evening the Court honoured the Princess' Theatre with their presence.

On Sunday, her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, attended divine service in the private chapel of Buckingham Palace. The ladies and gentlemen in waiting and the domestic household were also present.

On Monday her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert went, at half-past nine o'clock, to Marlborough House, Pall-Mall, attended by the Hon. Mary Seymour, Lord Charles Fitzroy, and Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. A. Gordon. The Queen and Prince inspected the Exhibition of the Department of Practical Art and School of Design, and also viewed the Vernon Gallery. The Duchess d'Orleans visited her Majesty in the afternoon. In the evening her Majesty had a dinner party, at which Lieutenant-General Sir Charles Napier and Lady Napier were among the guests.

On Tuesday afternoon the Queen and the Prince took a drive in an open carriage and four. In the evening her Majesty visited the Royal Italian Opera.

On Wednesday morning her Majesty and his Royal Highness honoured the gardens of the Royal Botanic Society, in the Regent's-park, with a visit. The Countess de Neuilly and the Duke and Duchess de Nemours paid a visit to her Majesty on Wednesday afternoon. In the evening her Majesty gave a State ball.

On Thursday the Queen and the Prince Consort, accompanied by her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, honoured the Royal Italian Opera with their presence.

THE QUEEN'S BALL.

The Queen gave a State ball on Wednesday evening, at Buckingham Palace. The attendance was unusually numerous, the invitations having exceeded two thousand, and comprising the Royal family, the diplomatic corps and foreigners of distinction, the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal household, and all the principal members of the Administration, with their wives and daughters, and a large party of the nobility and gentry.

The Queen and Prince Albert entered the state rooms at a quarter before ten o'clock, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge, the Princess Mary, and the Duke of Cambridge.

Her Majesty wore a dress of Indian muslin, embroidered in silver, from Paris, over a petticoat of watered apple-green silk, ornamented with green and silver ribbons and silver blonde. Her Majesty's head-dress was formed of diamonds and feathers.

A quadrille was formed, the "Prince Rupert" (Julienne), and her Majesty opened the ball with his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the opposite couple being his Royal Highness Prince Albert and her Royal Highness the Princess Mary.

The throne-room was appropriated to dancing, in addition to the Ball-room; and in it was erected a haut pas for her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

At the usual hour her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert were conducted to supper in the State dining-room by the Lord Steward, accompanied by the Royal circle.

His Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar arrived in town on Tuesday, from Germany.

His Excellency the French Ambassador and the Countess Walewski gave a magnificent entertainment to their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary, on Thursday evening, at the residence of the French Embassy, in Grosvenor-square. After the banquet a dramatic representation took place in the drawing-room, at which the artistes of the French plays assisted. A large party of the aristocracy were present.

The Countess of Malmesbury has issued cards for an assembly at the official residence of the Foreign Secretary, in Downing-street, on Wednesday, the 26th instant.

ALMACK'S.—The first of these fashionable réunions for the present season is fixed to take place on Thursday, the 10th of June.

CALEDONIAN BALL.—Her Majesty the Queen has, through the Lord Chamberlain, expressed her gracious approval of the 14th of June for the Caledonian Ball. The ladies patronesses already exceed fifty influential members of haut ton, and more additions to daily expected.

EXHIBITION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF PRACTICAL ART, MARLBOROUGH HOUSE.

The first exhibition of the Department of Practical Art was opened to the public on Tuesday last, at Marlborough House. It was visited by the Queen and Prince Albert on the previous day, when both those illustrious personages expressed great interest in the purposes of the institution, and her Majesty gave practical evidence of that kind feeling by sending in, after her return to Buckingham Palace, some remarkably fine specimens of lace from the Royal wardrobe—an article in which she has a renowned collection to be deficient. Whilst such generous sympathies engage the highest in the land in the cause of industry and art, we need have no fear for the future, which can only be one of progress and ameliorated position for our working classes.

A novel and important feature in the collection consisted in a number of articles purchased at the late Great Exhibition, out of a grant of £5000 from the Board of Trade, with the view of founding a Museum of Manufacturing Art. The selection of articles was entrusted to Mr. H. Cole, C.B., Mr. Owen Jones, and Mr. R. Redgrave; and of the above sum, £4217 1s. 9d. has only been expended, distributed as follows:—British side, £3661 1s. 9d.: the East India Company's department, £1376 1s.; Foreign side, £2075 9s. Amongst the articles are many interesting specimens of textile and ceramic manufactures, as well as works in the precious metals, which, however, had been already familiarised to the eye of the frequenter of the Crystal Palace.

In the "Department of Practical Art," that is, of the departments supplying the place of the Government Schools of Design, the display was more restricted than in former years, the privilege of exhibiting being limited to articles to which prizes had been awarded in the respective schools

The number of schools which have contributed to the exhibition is 23. The prizes awarded to each are as follows:—Belfast, 18; Birmingham, 8; Cork, 5; Coventry, 6; Dublin, 12; Glasgow, 21; Hanley, 18; Huddersfield, 3; Leeds, 4; Manchester, 29; Macclesfield, 3; Metropolis (male), 84; Metropolis (female), 17; Newcastle, 5; Norwich, 3; Paisley, 12; Sheffield, 13; Spitalfields, 8; Stoke, 9; Stourbridge, 2; Worcester, 7; York, 7. In the metropolitan display there appeared to be a greater degree of ability displayed by the females than by the males; many of the best drawn specimens are to be found among the productions of the female schools. We were glad to notice also some very clean and well-executed drawings and engravings on wood by the female pupils. This is an art to which, in the existing scarcity of means of industrial employment for females, their attention may well and profitably be directed. The metropolitan school of modelling, in plaster, which, as a whole, shows an improvement over the exhibition of last year in almost all the departments of instruction. Many of the series of drawings and paintings illustrative of the course of education followed in the schools are the productions of the school, and are exceedingly creditable. From Manchester and Glasgow some fair specimens of designs of cotton goods and printed shawls and groups of flowers are sent. The Sheffield school furnishes some good drawings for screws and metal-work, and some plaister models of friezes. The Birmingham school contributes one or two tolerably good specimens of modelling, particularly one of a child's head, but no specimens of ornament. Belfast sends a few creditable designs for cambric handkerchiefs and muslins, and Dublin some adapted for the poplin trade, as well as a few casts. A few good designs for silk are sent from Spitalfields, and a very good design, in six colours, for a Brussels carpet and rug.

AUSTRALIA AND THE YORKSHIRE MANUFACTURERS.—The Earl of Derby, on Wednesday, received at his official residence, Downing-street, a deputation appointed by the manufacturers of the West Riding, to urge upon the Government the necessity of immediate sending out an adequate supply of labour to Australia. The deputation was introduced by Mr. Wilson Patten, Bart., M.P., and Mr. Denison, M.P. Several members of the deputation having addressed his Lordship, the Earl of Derby, in the course of his reply, said the Government had £170,000 at their disposal for this purpose, which they intend to appropriate in sending out eight ships monthly for the next seven months. Assuming that each vessel would take 300, this would be 2400 a month, or 4800 in time for the next clipping. It would be impossible to get shipping to carry the numbers which had been mentioned. The return freights would be small, and would not pay: even lately an advance of 30 per cent. had taken place on fre ghts to Australia. They must endeavour to send out an adequate supply of women. It will not do (he marked his Lordship) to allow the sexes to go unmatched. After promising that the serious attention of the Government should directed to the matter, his Lordship concluded.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

(SECOND NOTICE.)

LESLIE is one of the Royal Academy who have only produced a single work for the present exhibition, and that is not one of very high pretensions. The subject is "Juliet" in the sleeping-draught scene, where she hesitates as to taking the friar's prescription. But it totally fails of the romantic character of that exciting incident. Poor Juliet is seated resting her elbows upon a table, looking with some misgivings at a phial which she holds in her hand, but which, for all her expression tells us, might be nothing more than the usual "draught at bed-time," from the village apothecary's. The dreadful phantasies which Shakspeare's heroine conjures up in this most trying scene, demand more of the features and of the eye than is here attempted

Close to Mr. Leslie's heroine is a portrait of Mrs. Coventry K. Patmore, by J. E. Millais, one of the champions of Pre-Raffaelitism, whose "Ophelia" and "Huguenot" we have already spoken of. The picture is a very small one; but, in treatment, is of that strongly-marked character, that once it catches your eye it will take no denial. The sitter looks you very determinedly in the face, whilst her hands are engaged putting together a small nosegay: the dress is black, with a red ribbon tied in a bow across the neck: the background a dark blue. Thus everything is done to throw out the face, and, barring the red ribbon, in a manner unobjectionable.

Pursuing our observations upon the workers in this school, we find our admiration for their earnestness of intention frequently checked by the obvious absurdity or sickly affectation of the conceit. Of the absurd partakes Mr. H. Hunt's "Hireling Shepherd" (532). Surely never were seen shepherd or shepherdess with such fiery red skin or such wiry hair. C. H. Lear's "A Glimpse of the Furies" (184), is simply ridiculous. Sickly, and at the same time absurd, is Collins' "Female Devotee" (347), distinguished by the lines from Keble's "Lyra Innocentium," beginning—

> So keep then by calm prayer and searching thought
> Thy chrisom pure, &c.

We have here a very commonplace face earnestly looking down at the owner's two common-looking hands, which are endeavouring to hook on the white "garb of purity." It is all cold pretence, all "much ado about nothing" on canvas. Has some artist's representation of "The Devout Childhood of Saint Elizabeth of Hungary" (1091) is a still more disagreeable affair, on account of the sickly sentimentality with which it is imbued. The quoted extract from "Butler's Lives of the Saints" tells us how, "If she found the door of the chapel in the palace shut, not to lose her labour, she knelt down at the threshold, and always put up her petition to the throne of God:" and there she kneels, in a very fine blue taffeta dress, of quaint construction, with her commonplace face resting against the oak door as she tries to peep through a crevice; but whether at a supper party or a religious ceremony, there is nothing in the character or expression of her countenance to indicate. The grass-plat, the gravel walk, and two rose trees are mere efforts of copyism, worthy of a child. As for Mr. Collins' "May in the Regent's Park" (55), the absurdity of the production is the more obvious from its being so misplaced—a tea-tray, not a picture-frame, was its appropriate vehicle.

After what we said in our first notices on the subject of the Pre-Raffaelite school, we think it the more incumbent upon us to drawn the line as distinctly as we can, with any regard to brevity, between what we consider to be the strong and what the weak points of this new school of art, lest we should be suspected of going the "whole hog" with them; and we need hardly suggest that there is a very great difference between discovering the promise of effective results from an attempt at embodying intense feeling with a bold and decided style of colouring, and approving of every latitude to which they may be carried, and of every conceit upon which they may be applied.

F. M. Brown, in No. 463, "Jesus washing Peter's feet," has a subject worthy of the noblest efforts of genius, and the fullest development of the resources of art. The study is not without merit, the two principal figures occupying a prominent position in the foreground, whilst little more than the heads and shoulders of the other apostles are seen as looking on from the opposite side of the table. The expression of the faces is intelligent, and well in keeping with the incident taking place before them; combining earnest admiration of the great lesson of humility thus shown them with a deep feeling of veneration for their divine leader. That of the Christ, on the other hand, exhibits too much of the weakness and dejection as of the man—too little of the dignity of his divine nature triumphing over the vanities and sorrows of his mundane condition; and thus has been lost the noblest and most inspiring feature the subject was capable of. The colouring is the worst part of the work—crude, extravagant, startling the eye with harsh contrasts, uncalled-for and unwelcome. The flesh tints are painfully livid, such as might be produced upon the skin by a violent nosebleeding in a raw November morning. In this work, therefore, though evidencing much good intention, Mr. Brown has failed, partly for want of considering the highest poetry of his subject, and partly through unexperienced use of the powerful pigments which he has so lavishly employed. But what are we to say of his "Pretty Baa-lambs" (1281), in the Octagon Room? Only that it is difficult to conceive that such a fantastic and puerile production could have come from the same hand as the larger work we have just been criticising. We have here a very long lady standing bolt upright with an ugly baby in very long clothes on her left arm, her right pointing out as straight as a fivepenny "dip" down towards a playful baa-lamb standing at her feet. Other baa-lambs are capering and frisking about the field with extraordinary vivaciousness; and a red-faced girl is gathering herbage into a basket wherewith to feed them, as if they would not much prefer nibbling it for themselves. This is an effort worthy of the nursery, as Mr. Collins' "May—Regent's Park" is of the pantry.

C. Thomas's "Laura in Avignon" (448) is of the new experimental school, in its most pedantic mood.

> The sage Sennuccio, as he walked of late
> Beyond the city, met my sainted love—
> Passed and saluted her with reverent state,
> As noble hearts their admiration prove,
> While she, with holy book, calm thoughts of good,
> Guided unconscious of all outward show
> In the regality of womanhood,
> The light of virtue beaming from her brow.
> A concourse lounging in the public way,
> With loud mirth, insulted in the conceit,
> Expectant sought regard from her sweet face.
> "Thou fool!" Sennuccio cried; which made some stay,
> Who laughed but centred their pride by self-cheat.
> So blind is folly to most holy grace.

The scene might be made a very striking one, particularly if the Master Sennuccio had a cane in his hand; but the use-fixation of such celestial abstractions as the "sage" and the "sainted" Laura with anything breathing in this lower world is an incongruity which no effort of art can reconcile. People stare at the strange figures, and wonder what they mean; and many who do not read the quotation to the end, are fain to imagine that the little costermonger on the donkey is laughing at the queer-looking "sage," instead of the victim of his rebuke. We hope we shall have less of this sort of mummery in future. Let us, by all means, revive the strong points of early art; but, in reviving, free them from the gloom of the cloister, in which they were for many ages confined, to their great detriment and the world's loss. Let Mr. Collins send his "St. Elisabeth of Hungary" and his Lady with the chrisom pure" to a nunnery; but let us have no more of such "Laura of Avignons" after them, and then let both set about applying their talents to something more healthy, something more real, for next year. There are plenty of subjects, speaking to the heart of great truths patent to the world, or in the course of development, if artists would only seek for them.

Reserving our notice of the various contributions in the landscape style, a department in which the Exhibition is unusually well supplied, to a future occasion, we must say a few words about Creswick's, "The sunset Hour" (111), which we engrave. Charming as all this artist's landscapes are for their homely sentiment and cool transparency of atmosphere, the one before us is especially to our taste, being precisely such a scene the eye has lingered upon in many a rural ramble, watching with a sort of half regret the onward progress of the relentless sun, whose truant rays are consigning to darkness one after the other the nicer details of the rustic panorama. The hard blue clouds in the distance are lit up with momentary effulgence by day's closing effort; and the calm moon, as yet young, begins already to preside for a brief space over the scene. The calming is singularly chaste and effective.

The Engraving which we present of O'Neill's "Scene from Hamlet," will, on inspection, fully justify the encomiums which we passed upon that picture in our last. The arrangement of the group is simple and unaffected, yet managed with considerable skill; for the figure of the heroine, notwithstanding it is in a kneeling posture, commands attention as the principal object in the group. The scene is that in which, in the presence of the King, Queen, and Laertes, the bereaved Ophelia distributes her store of herbs and flowers among them. The picture is ver expressive, and in nice keeping throughout.

RAILWAYS IN SPAIN.—COMMENCEMENT OF THE LINE FROM SANTANDER TO ALAR DEL REY.

RAILWAYS IN SPAIN.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE LINE OF ISABEL II., FROM SANTANDER TO ALAR DEL REY.

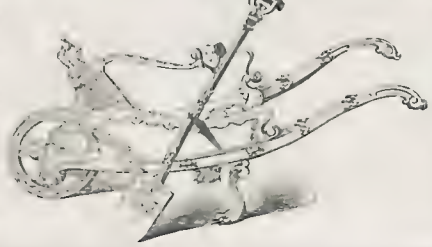
THE Railway System has been sagaciously perceived as the means for restoring Spain to that proud position she so long held amidst the states of Europe; and we far mistake if a perfect internal communication by means of railways, and by which her immense wealth in minerals, copper, lead, iron, coal, corn, cattle, and fruit may be made to the greatest extent available, prove not a source of more real greatness than foreign conquest or armed armadas could afford. Some idea may be formed by our readers of the necessity of the present, and we may say only important railway project in Spain, from the fact that the principal port of Northern Spain is Santander, and that next to the mother is Alar, the road which the two most occupy. The average amount of tonnage annually passing through the port is three hundred tons, nearly half of which is exported four, foreign and coastwise. The dues upon the present road between the port and Alar is £17,000 per annum. The tonnage will rapidly increase when a more perfect mode of internal transit is obtained. Business, art, and pleasure will likewise have numerous votaries passing to their different resorts through Spain's range and down partatively speaking, a short country, when the almost insurmountable difficulties of land travelling act no longer as a preventive. When the railway line is complete from Madrid to Santander, and continued to London by steamers, the two capitals, instead of being ten days asunder, will be but four.

The inaugural ceremony, which our Artist has here pictured, took place on a piece of ground through which the two passes about a mile to the south of Santander on the 3d instant, when the first turf was cut by the Sovereign; but previous to a detailed account of the proceedings it may be well to say a little of Santander, the maritime capital of Northern Spain, and of the province which bears it name. It is situated on a long, narrow, and lofty peninsula, which extends between Biscay and the inlet which forms the bay. The principal and most important part of the town is placed along the edge of its southern margin, although no inconsiderable part of it is scattered over the heights and hills by which it is intersected. A noble mole or quay, was some years ago constructed, which is more than a quarter of a mile in length.

On the opposite side of the bay are the villages of Astillero, Maliano, Muriedas, and Arenas. These are generally situated on a gentle slope at the head of a deep indentation of the bay, and are partly nestled amongst poplars, vines, and firs, and is surrounded by undulating grounds. The entrance to Santander from the Bay of Biscay is indicated by a [illegible] which was erected in 1839, the surrounding machicoulis and embracing opposite being the work of Ferdinand. It stands on a lofty and precipitous ridge of white limestone, against the base of which the surf of the Atlantic chafes incessantly.

An official announcement appeared in the La Esperanza Monitor, stating that the Queen would arrive on Sunday, and the requisite arrangements were made. Programmes were also issued of the order of procession and of road to receive him, and likewise the bodies of which it should be composed.

The morning of the 3d was gloomy, but as the day advanced the weather brightened. A few minutes after twelve an aviso courier announced that the King was approaching the town on the Burgos road, having taken that city in his route, and slept the preceding night at Castanedo. He occupied an open carriage drawn by six horses, and was accompanied by the Minister of Progress, Don Mariano Miguel Reinoso, the Mayordomo Mayor, and the Duke of Conquesta, escorted by about thirty lancers. In passing along the road he was warmly cheered by the populace, which he acknowledged by standing uncovered, and repeatedly bowing. The King, we should say, may be from twenty-five to twenty-eight years of age, has a fair complexion, oval face with regular features, light hair and moustache, a well-formed head, and wears a pleasing and happy expression of countenance. On reaching the triumphal arch at the Octroi of La Calle de Cervera, he was met by the magistrates of the city, Vice Consuls, nobility, authorities, and officers of the fleet and army, by whom he was escorted down the Alameda, which was opened for carriages upon this especial occasion; along La Calle Burgos, La Calle de Atarazanas, under another fine triumphal arch, and down the Muelle to the Custom-house, which had been sumptuously fitted up for his reception.



At night the city was illuminated, both by coloured lamps and numerous lustres hung from the balconies; tasteful and fanciful designs were exhibited in front of the Chamber of Commerce, Circulo Recreo, La Casa Consistorial, Theatre, &c. From the number of windows and height of the houses, the illumination had an excellent effect. There was also a good display of fireworks in the Plaza de Carlos, and at an early hour all retired to their homes.

The morning of the 3d at length arrived. It having been arranged that the King should proceed by water to the Cajo, the ground upon which the inaugural ceremony was to take place, the health boat of the Customs had been converted into a beautiful barge; over the stern sheets a handsome canopy of crimson and white satin damask had been raised; it hung in rich festoons, and was surmounted by the Queen's crown; the stern-boom were covered with crimson velvet; the boat was pulled by fourteen oars. Immediately over the space of embarkation a canopy was thrown, from columns erected in a couple of lanchas, the columns were covered with white linen, and entwined by spiral wreaths of bay and crimson cloth, and from the arches also hung festoons of bay and flowers.

The embarkation was a most imposing ceremony, as there were 110 boats and barges, all gaily decorated with flags and streamers, many of them pulled by young gentlemen of the town of handsome sailors dresses; a very fair sprinkling of raven tresses and bright eyes gleaming from beneath black mantillas contributing their quota to the gaiety of the scene. As the royal barge approached the landing-stage, a [illegible] was erected for the occasion, forming the commencement of the [illegible] Mr Mould, the engineer; Mr Arnold, the [illegible] engineer; Mr Brassey, Mr Crampton, &c., and were followed by the [illegible] field which the two intersects, and where the ceremony of cutting the first turf was to be performed. The barges and boats were placed in order, and as a procession were followed by the boats and steamers. The spade was presented to Mr Mould by the Minister of Interior, Don Manuel Miguel Reinoso, who presented it to the King, who took a turf out of the ground very skilfully, threw it into the barrow, which he wheeled a few yards, and then upset and replaced it. The Minister then read a loyal address.

In order to give the Queen a more clear idea of railway operations, Mr. Mould had caused a piece of way to be laid, and upon it was placed an earth-waggon. When it was ready to start, the [illegible] gave it his benediction. It was then run down the incline, and, on reaching the end threw out its contents by its own impetus on [illegible] for the benefit of our English readers and testimony caused [illegible] Gold and silver commemorative and documents descriptive of the undertaking [illegible] were [illegible] to the cavity of a stone intended to be the foundation [illegible] Santander station, and were encased by the Bishop. Some other ceremonies took place at Alar, and the party returned temporarily for the purpose, and thus terminated the business proceeding.

The King then adjourned to a pavilion at some distance, where he partook of refreshment; and whereto the commissioner, contractor, engineers, &c., were presented to him.

A most superb tent had been constructed on the field, in which a cold collation was laid out. Over the tents floated the Royal standard of Spain, and a banner with the inscription "Isabel II;" also a flag of the provinces of Santander. The entertainment was of the most elegant description, and under the auspices of the Baboo. There were present the gentlemen of the Railway Commission, the contractor, Spanish and English Engineers, as well as many other distinguished guests. Previous to leaving the ground his Majesty entered the tent, passed round the different tables, and seemed much delighted at the scene before him.

On the evening of the 4th a dinner was given by the Railway Commission in the Casa de la Comision Concesionaria del Ferro carril, of which about fifty gentlemen partook. The chair was occupied by the Minister of Progress, Don M. M. Reinoso. In the course of the entertainment a number of loyal, patriotic, and other toasts were drunk, such as the "Queen of Spain, the "Prince of the Asturias," "King of Spain," "Queen Victoria," "Success to the Railway," "The Contractor," the "English and Spanish Engineers," &c. The dinner was of the most récherché description, the wines excellent, and the whole passed off with the utmost enthusiasm.

Our Engraving illustrative of the ceremony is from a sketch by Mr. J. H. Wallace, who is connected with the railway proceedings.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

The command of the Channel fleet has been conferred upon Admiral Corry, late Admiralty Superintendent of mail packets at Southampton, vice Commodore Martin.

On Saturday last, the members of the Senior United Service Club gave a magnificent entertainment to Admiral Sir William Parker, at the London Tavern, on the occasion of his return to England from the Mediterranean. Lord Saltoun took the chair, and was supported by the most distinguished officers of both services.

The Dockyard Battalions in Woolwich commenced their drills on Monday evening, the following orders having been issued for their guidance:—

"BARRACK ORDERS.—Adjutant's Office, May 12.—The drills for the season will commence on Monday evening next, at half-past 6 o'clock, with the Artillery and 1st company of the Boat Battalion. The Infantry and 2d company Boat Battalion on Tuesday evening; and the Artillery to have their waist-belts without bayonets. The Boat Brigade waist-belts and swords. The Infantry with carabines. Dress—blue cloth with forage-caps —By order of the Colonel Commandant."

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.—By the return of the Basilisk and Desperate steamers, letters have been received from the Arctic squadron, under Sir Edward Belcher, which has lately sailed to renew the search for Sir J. Franklin. They record a succession of favourable circumstances, with the exception of a gale of wind, which for a time dispersed the squadron, and occasioned some injury to the North Star, unhappily washing away one of her best boats. The squadron left the squadron on May 8th, in lat. 60.10, long. 23.30 W., all well and in high spirits. The Admiralty instructions to Sir Edward Belcher point out in lengthened detail the general course of proceeding which that officer is to adopt in his perilous enterprise; and in order to guard against the expedition falling into the same danger as that of Sir J. Franklin, it is laid down in conclusion, as a special instruction to the gallant officer, that the several ships under his orders shall each be on its way home, and to the eastward of Barrow Strait, whenever their stock of provisions shall have been reduced to twelve months' full allowance.

NEWS FROM CHINA RELATIVE TO SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.—The following extract of a letter dated Hong-Kong, March 28, is not devoid of interest:—"There have been here no less than 37 whalers from the Arctic Seas. It may interest you to know, that they almost all believe that Sir John Franklin is safe, and that he has got through the ice barrier into inner waters, where he will not be reached until a mild season arrives, which they say the present will be. Most of them have now departed. They say Franklin will not suffer for want of food. They give strange accounts of the Esquimaux vibrating from the Asiatic to the American continent and back again, carrying their boats, made of skins and whalebone, over the ice, and launching them when they meet with open water. They all confirm the fact that the whale found in the Behring's Straits and in Baffin's Bay are the same species, proving the existence of a passage; for a whale of the Arctic species, they say, has never been seen to the south of 73 deg. of latitude, so they cannot have doubled either of the Capes (of Good Hope or Cape Horn), and the whale is under the necessity of making his presence known by coming to the surface to blow."

ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL.—On Tuesday the annual general meeting of the subscribers to this institution took place at Wilds's Rooms, King-street, St. James's; Vice-Admiral Bowles, the patron, in the chair. The report of the council of administration stated that last year the average number of pupils was 155; and the present number was 176, of whom 14 were the sons of civilians, paying £50 per annum, and the remainder were the sons of naval and marine officers, of whom 42 pay the remunerating charge of £31; 95 are admitted at £25 per annum, 13 on still lower terms, and 14 gratuitously. The statement of accounts showed that after paying the balance of the "Act of Parliament Account," amounting to £241 2s. 7d., and other extra expenses not usually included in the annual outlay, there was a balance at the end of last year of £419 8s., from which £100 had since been invested in Consols. The total amount of the invested capital at the end of the year 1851 (which showed an increase of £123 15s 8d. over that of the previous year) was £6867 10s 0d.

THE ROYAL NAVAL FEMALE SCHOOL.—The twelfth annual meeting of this institution was held on Saturday last, at Willis's Rooms, Earl Mauvers in the chair. From the report, which was read by the hon. secretary, the Hon. Captain Maude, it appeared that there are at present 83 pupils in the establishment some of them paid for by their parents others only partly paid for, and others again wholly provided for out of the funds of the school. The accounts rendered showed a balance of £273 on the income of the last nine months, which was £1814 16s. 8d. The funded property of the institution amounts to £7000.

SANDHURST MILITARY COLLEGE.—The usual half-yearly public examination of the officers and gent emen cadets undergoing study in this institution took place on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, the 10th, 11th, and 12th inst., before a collegiate board, at which were present Lieutenant-General Sir George Scovell, K.C.B., the governor; Major-General Thomas W. Taylor, C.B., the lieutenant-governor; Major-General George A. Wetherall, C.B. and K.H., the deputy-adjutant-general of the forces; and Lieutenant-Colonel George W. Prosser, the major and superintendent of studies. At the close of the examinations the following officers were present with the usual certificates of qualification:—Capt. J. Montrasor, 52d Foot; Capt W. G Dawkin, Coldstream Guards; Capt. S. Darling, 9th Foot; Capt. W. T. L Patterson, 91st Foot. In consequence of the superior talents and acquirements displayed by Capt. Patterson in the higher branches of mathematical science, a special honorary addition was made to his certificate; and the high qualifications of Capts Montrosor, Dawkins, and Patterson in French and German, and of Capt. Darling in French were also particularly noticed on their respective certificates. Several gentlemen cadets, who had completed their qualifications for commissions, were recommended to his Grace the Commander-in-Chief for appointment to Ensignces in the Line without purchase.

DEPARTURE OF THE "CHUSAN."—This beautiful screw steam-ship, belonging to the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, left the docks at Southampton, on Saturday afternoon last, on her first voyage to the Cape of Good Hope, Port Phi'ip, and Sydney, under the command of Captain Downs. She took only a number of passengers, the bulk of her cargo consisted of coals and a good cargo. She went off in gallant style, and under ordinary circumstances there is no doubt but that she will make a rapid and successful passage. A few of the directors, with several officers and gentlemen connected with the prosperity of the Australian colonies, assembled on board at Southampton, and accompanied the ship on her first voyage as far as Calshot Castle. An elegant déjeuner was served, during which speeches were made in a jocular and humorous character, and, in proposing "A prosperous voyage to the Chusan," Earl Talbot took occasion to advert to the difficulties with which the communication by steam to Australia had been attended, and to the public-spirited manner in the services of his friends, of Mr de Salis and Mr. Logan, in consummating a measure so important to those colonies. The ship is a new vessel, of nearly 900 tons, and is built upon the propeller principle.

The British ship Duke, for Liverpool, was lost on the 14th of April, on the west end of the Grand Bahamas. She had 3912 bales of cotton on board, about 2000 of which had been saved. A British ship from Jamaica, for London or Liverpool, was also ashore near the same place.

When the unfortunate Birkenhead left Portsmouth a large quantity of wines were shipped on board of her. These wines were duly insured as far as the Cape of Good Hope; but on only a portion was there a claim. Sixteen of the remainder being lost in the vessel, it is said that the underwriters at L oyd's have refused to pay the amount, stating, as their reasons for so doing, that the voyage was completed on the arrival of the vessel either in Table Bay or Simon's Bay, and that there was no clause in the policy by which the Birkenhead was allowed to proceed on a fresh trip, by which an additional risk might be incurred.

On the evening of the 21st of April, the ship Josepha, which sailed from Bristol on the 18th of March, bound for Boston, under the charge of Capt. Cawson, was wrecked in Massachusetts Bay, when fifteen lives were lost. Two of the crew, with five wrecked ashore on some pieces of spars, were the only persons saved. The unfortunate persons were observed by the people on shore clinging to the wreck, and signalling for assistance; but, owing to a tremendous sea running at the time, and it a night being dark and foggy, no assistance could be rendered. Two boatmen, in attempting to gain the wreck, perished by the capsizing of their boat.

The brig Victor Emanuel, which arrived a few days ago at Whitehaven, from Patagonia, with a large cargo of guano, brought home a large leonine seal. This monster of the deep was captured on an island off the Patagonian coast on the 18th of November last, while in a state of sleep. The seal must form no mean estimate of the courage of the seaman who ventured single-handed to attack so formidable an enemy, when he is informed that the monster was upwards of 19 feet in length, and is supposed to have weighed about two tons and a half.

Mr. H. B. Farnall, one of the poor-law inspectors, stated at a special meeting of the Preston board of guardians that in the Preston Union the decrease of pauperism had been as follows:—In 1848 there were 11,538 paupers on the books; in 1849, 11,102; in 1850, 4800; in 1851, 4031; in 1852, 3891; and pauperism (said he) is at this moment decreasing within the Preston Union.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE BILL.

Lord LYNDHURST wished to know, from his noble and learned friend opposite, what progress the committee on the Common LAW Procedure Bill had made?

Lord CAMPBELL was glad that the question had been put to him, because he had heard it hinted that the bill was to be abandoned for the present session, which he should look upon as a great calamity. The bill was the result of the labours of some of the greatest men in the land, and entitled themselves to the amendment of the law. The operations of the committee had been delayed in consequence of the illness of the late Lord Chancellor, Lord Truro; but the committee would meet to-day at two o'clock, when they would certainly proceed with the bill, and be actively employed in considering and amending it. (Hear, hear.)

BRITISH SUBJECTS ABROAD.

The Duke of ARGYLL called attention to the case of an English-man named Murray, who was said to have been imprisoned in Rome for several years without a trial, and to be at the present moment under sentence of death, and requested that some further information might be given on the subject.

The Earl of MALMESBURY said his attention had been called to the subject, and he had written to our Consul respecting the charge against Mr. Murray, being that he had been associated with banditti; but, owing to our defective diplomatic relations with the Court of Rome, great difficulty had been experienced in gaining the requisite information. The Government was still making inquiry into the case.

In reply to further questions, the Earl of MALMESBURY stated that the correspondence between this country and the Austrian Government, with respect to the expulsion of Protestant missionaries from that country, would be laid upon the table of the House as soon as it should be completed

A desultory conversation arose, in the course of which

Lord CAMPBELL said—My Lords, I rejoice exceedingly to hear the noble Earl opposite complaining of the vague and irregular conduct of our diplomatic relations with the Court of Rome. Great disasters have accrued from that state of things, and I hope that the noble Earl's statement this evening will lead to its amendment. I can take upon myself, from my own personal knowledge, to state that our Consul at Rome, Mr. Freeborn, is a gentleman of great intelligence and respectability. I can also take upon myself to state that Mr. Petre, the attaché to our mission at Florence, is likewise a most intelligent and honourable man. But neither of these gentlemen has that weight at the Court of Rome which ought to belong to the legitimate organs of the great country. (Hear, hear.) Therefore it is, my Lords, that the Court of Rome is abused as to the state of public opinion in this country; and to that circumstance we may ascribe the many disasters which have had to be deplored. I believe that the Court of Rome is not indisposed to hear the truth; I believe that even in the highest quarters there is a desire to be well informed as to the state of public opinion among us. I trust the noble Earl's statement this evening will lead to its amendment. I can take upon myself, from my own personal knowledge, to state that our Consul at Rome, Mr. Freeborn, is a gentleman of great intelligence and respectability. I can also take upon myself to state that Mr. Petre, the attaché to our mission at Florence, is likewise a most intelligent and honourable man. But neither of these gentlemen has that weight at the Court of Rome which ought to belong to the legitimate organs of the great country. (Hear, hear.) Therefore it is, my Lords, that the Court of Rome is abused as to the state of public opinion in this country; and to that circumstance we may ascribe the many disasters which have had to be deplored. I believe that even in

Mr. B. Osborne said he could not understand how any one could oppose this bill who wished to put an end to bribery and intimidation.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he was favourable to the principle of the bill, and he hoped therefore there might be no division on the second reading.

The bill was read a second time.

MAYNOOTH.

Mr. Newdegate postponed until the 16th of June the adjourned debate on the grant to Maynooth.

Mr. Cardwell said that at such a period of the session the inquiry, if agreed to, could not be entered upon, and he appealed to the hon. gentleman to say at once what was meant to be done with respect to it?

Mr. Newdegate said he had selected the earliest day in the order book, as Government had declined to give him a day.

Lord J. Russell said it was a mockery to postpone the motion until the 16th of June, at which period it would be quite impossible to carry out the object of the motion.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said it was not the intention of the Government to withdraw the grant to Maynooth; and in agreeing to the inquiry proposed by the hon. member for Warwickshire, it was upon grounds not at all in accordance with the grounds upon which that hon. gentleman had rested his motion

Mr. B. Osborne, amidst loud cries of dissent, suggested that the debate be resumed on Wednesday next, the Derby day.

Mr. Anstey moved the adjournment of the debate until Wednesday next.

Mr. Newdegate declined to accede to the proposition.

While the hon. gentleman was still speaking, the hand of the clock pointed to six, and the Speaker immediately left the chair.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

NEW WRIT.

A new writ was ordered to issue for Sandwich, in the room of Mr. C. W. Grenfell, who had accepted the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds.

GOLD DISCOVERIES.

Mr. Gladstone asked whether the attention of her Majesty's Government had been drawn to the reports of the discovery of gold in large quantities in Queen Charlotte's Island, and of the departure of considerable numbers of persons from California for that island; whether any measures have been or are to be taken for the maintenance of order, and for securing the authority of the Crown in the island; and also if it was the intention of Government to order a survey of the island?

Sir John Pakington said he had received a report from the Governor of Vancouver's Island, giving an account of the discovery of gold to a considerable extent in Queen Charlotte's Island. The report also informed him that some American ships from California had proceeded thither, and more American vessels were expected: and in consequence of that information Government had given directions for sending additional naval assistance to preserve order under these extraordinary circumstances. (Hear, hear.) He could not be expected to state now what measures would be eventually taken by the Government with reference to those discoveries; while, as to the third question, he could only state that no survey had been ordered.

THE AMALGAMATED ENGINEERS AND THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.

In answer to Mr. Forster, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that the report was unfounded, that he had received a deputation from the Amalgamated Engineers He had received a deputation from the United Trades of London, who had waited on him, and made certain representations, to which he listened with much attention. He denied that he or any gentleman connected with the Government had expressed any opinion whatever upon the conduct of either the employers or the employed.

THE REV. MR. BENNETT.

Lord Castlereagh gave notice of his intention to ask Mr. Walpole on Monday a question in respect to the recent appointment to the living of Frome.

In reply to Mr. Anstey, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, in references to what had fallen from him on a former occasion, that he was not aware of having used the expression "improper institution." What he intended to say was, that a parishioner of Frome who complained of a person who was alleged to have committed a serious breach of discipline and doctrine being instituted to the vicarage of Frome, might obtain redress by appeal, the interposition of the Bishop of the diocese or of the Bishop of any diocese in which the accused had held preferment. By these methods the parishioners of Frome might obtain redress. Her Majesty's Government had such confidence in the Bishops of the Church, that they did not contemplate any such contingency as prelate refusing redress to the parishioners.

In reply to another question the Chancellor of the Exchequer had no hesitation in saying that the Government did consult the law officers of the Crown as to the irregularity of the institution, and they gave their opinion on that irregularity.

Mr. Bowman.—Had the right hon gentleman any objection to lay that opinion before the House?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer had, certainly, a great objection to doing so. (Hear, hear.)

Sir B. Hall gave notice, that, when this subject was formally brought before the House, he would call attention to the state of the diocesan church of Wells.

MILITIA BILL.

The House then went into committee on this bill, commencing with clause 17. The remaining clauses were agreed to, with the exception of the 26th and 28th, which were postponed.

The Chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.—Adjourned.

ELECTION INTELLIGENCE.

The following members have been returned within the last few days to serve in the present Parliament: For Carmarthenshire: David Jones, of Pantglas, in the said county, Esq., in the room of the Hon. George Rice Trevor, now Lord Dynevor, called up to the House of Peers. For Perth: the Hon. Arthur Fitzgerald Kinnaird, Hyde-park-gardens, London, in the room of the Right Hon. Fox Maule, now Lord Panmure, called up to the House of Peers.

The Liberal Party.—It is rumoured that in any future arrangement of a Liberal Ministry, it is possible Lord John Russell might feel inclined to go to the Upper House, to take the lead there, in place of Lord Lansdowne; leaving the onerous post of chief in the Commons to some other Reformer in whom the Crown, the country, and the House might have confidence. Daily News.

Printers' Dramatic Society.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert, the patron of the society, has, with his usual beneficence, sent to its secretary the sum of one hundred guineas, on behalf of the performance which passed off with such eclat on the last inst. at the St. James's Theatre, in aid of the funds of the Printers' Pension Society and the Almshouse Endowment Fund.

Testimonial.—A splendid service of plate, intended for presentation to James Wheeler, Esq., by the Committee of Caledonian Preference Shareholders and upwards of 200 proprietors, is now to be seen at the establishment of Messrs Smith, Nicholson, and Co., 12 Dean-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields.

By a Parliamentary return just printed, it appears that from 1847 to 1851 inclusive the number of emigrant vessels that sailed from ports in the United Kingdom was 1979, of which 262 were chartered by the Colonial Land and Emigration Commissioners, of which latter there was only one wreck. The percentage of loss was 396, or 1 in 252 Of ships despatched from ports under the superintendence of Government emigration offices, there were 30 wrecks, and the percentage of loss was 505, or 1 in 199 There were 913 despatched from ports not under the superintendence of Government emigration offices, of which there were 13 wrecks, and the loss was 1 42 percentage, or 1 in 70. In the 7120 ships which sailed in the five years there were 1,494,044 passengers The number of lives lost by shipwreck was 1043. The percentage of loss was 069, or 1 in 1432 No lives were lost by the ships chartered by the Emigration Commissioners

On Wednesday, shortly after ten o'clock, the inhabitants of Peckham and the Old Kent-road were suddenly thrown into a state of great consternation, in consequence of a loud explosion, which was found to have taken place at the South London Gas-works, situated at the side of the Surrey Canal, near the bridge, which resulted in the destruction of considerable property and fearful injury to several men, three of whom are so shockingly burnt by the fire that their lives at present are despaired of. The accident was occasioned by the gas which escaped from a valve having communicated with a light which had been accidentally left in a corner of the building.

The North London division of the enrolled out-pensioners were called up for a week's drill on Monday last, in the Regent's Park, at the rate of four hours a day When they have completed the week, they will muster, along with the other divisions, at Chelsea Hospital, for the usual half-yearly muster and summer's field exercise.

It appears from the accounts received from St. John's by the America steamer, that the vessels gave prevalent reports the early part of April had produced the most disastrous results to the vessels engaged in the seal fishery. It is stated that a large number of vessels had been totally lost, and about 50 more, the surveyors estimate, at £1000 each, leaving a state of great destitution and suffering on different parts of the coasts of Newfoundland and adjacent shores. Immediate measures were, however, taken for their relief.

Hospital for Diseases of the Skin.—On Thursday evening the annual festival of this hospital was celebrated by a dinner at the London Tavern; the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor in the chair. The chairman made a liberal appeal in behalf of the charity, which it was stated had had, during the past year, 9024 patients, of whom 8809 were cured and 3855 relieved. The subscriptions of the evening amounted to upwards of £1400.

Newsvendors' Benevolent Institution.—On Thursday evening the annual meeting of this society was held at Anderton's Hotel, 3 Fleet-street, Esq., in the chair. The report stated that the funds were in a very flourishing condition, not a single application, either for a pension or temporary assistance, having been made during the past year. The funded property now amounted to £1370, in addition to a cash balance of £9 9s. The report was adopted, and other formal resolutions passed.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Peace Society.—The 37th annual meeting of the members of the Peace Society was held on Tuesday evening at Finsbury Chapel; Mr C. Hindley, M.P., in the chair. In the course of the proceedings the steps which the society had taken to oppose the Militia Bill were detailed. It was stated that upwards of 1300 petitions had been presented, and a majority of 16 to 1 against the second reading was a proof of homage to public opinion, for not twenty were at first prepared to vote against the bill. The receipts for the year were £2276; the expenditure, £1950. A series of resolutions were carried Sailors' Orphan Girls' School and Home.—On Monday the first annual meeting of this society, founded by the recent amalgamation of the Sailors' Orphan Girls' Episcopal School and Asylum and the Sailors' Female Orphan Home (both of which were established in 1849), was held at the Hanover-square Rooms, the Duke of Manchester in the chair. The report stated that, prior to the amalgamation of the two charities, one child had been received into the school and two into the home whose parents had perished in the Amazon. One of the parties admitted to the asylum was a child, named Sarah Dees, whose father had perished in the Amazon, whose mother was in a delicate state of health, and whose brother, a young seaman, was dangerously wounded in the action before Lagos. The balance from the joint societies, now standing to the credit of the new society, was £430. It was stated that the committee had that morning received an application for the admission into the institution of Jane Gerrard, one of six children whose father perished in the Birkenhead, and whose mother's health was such as to prevent her labouring for their support. Resolutions were passed in furtherance of the objects.

British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society.—The annual meeting of the members and friends of this society took place at Crosby-hall, Bishopsgate-street Within, on Monday evening; Mr. G. W. Alexander in the chair. The report, which was adopted, stated that the committee could not report any special advantages gained by the Anti-Slavery cause during the past year. A resolution, deploring the progress of the slave power in the United States, and expressing unabated confidence in the triumphs of the anti-slavery cause aided by the exertions of their fellow-labourers of this society in America, was unanimously agreed to.

Lamb and Flag Ragged Schools.—The seventh annual meeting of these schools, very numerously attended by the inhabitants of Clerkenwell, and presided over by the Right Hon. the Earl Walderave, took place on Wednesday evening in the parochial school-rooms of Clerkenwell, in Jewin-street. From the report it appeared that the increase among the female scholars has been so great during the past year that additional accommodation has been found necessary. The expenditure consequent upon this enlargement of the premises amounts to about £700, of which only £30 has been raised up to the present time. The financial accounts are not in a very prosperous state.

Shipbrokers' Benevolent Society.—A public meeting to promote the establishment of a benevolent society for shipbrokers, ship and custom-house agents, was held on Wednesday, at the London Tavern; Mr. Masterman, M.P., in the chair. Resolutions were passed in furtherance of the object of the meeting. £350 has already been realised in donations and annual subscriptions

Royal Orthopædic Hospital.—On Wednesday evening the thirteenth anniversary of this institution was held at the Albion Hotel, Aldersgate-street, the Earl of Shaftesbury presiding. The subscriptions announced during the evening amounted to upwards of £1300, including a legacy of £500 from Mr. Mackenzie, a late governor.

Royal Geographical Society.—At the recent meeting of this society—Sir Roderick Murchison, the president, in the chair—the papers read were—Capt. W. Allen, R.N., "Observations taken with the aneroid in Syria and Palestine; John Crawford, Esq., F.R.S., "Sketch of the geography of Borneo;" Lieut. Leycester, R.N., "On the volcanic group of Mi ō."

Royal Freemasons' School for Female Children.—The anniversary of this most excellent institution was held on Wednesday evening at the Freemasons'-hall, under the presidency of the Right Hon. the Earl of Zetland, the Grand Master of the Masonic body. Nearly 400 members of the craft sat down to dinner. In the course of the evening the children went in procession round the room The amount subscribed in the room was £1000.

Royal Society of St. Anne's.—On Wednesday the annual examination of girls formerly belonging to this institution was held at the asylum, Brixton Hill, under the presidency of His Grace the Bishop of Norwich. There was a numerous and fashionable company present on this occasion. After an address from the Right Rev. Prelate, the list of reports were gone through, his Grace presenting each girl, as her name was read, with the prize which her good conduct had merited, after which the proceedings were closed with prayer, and a hymn sung by the girls.

Pharmaceutical Society.—The members of the Pharmaceutical Society held their second conversazione for the season on Wednesday evening, at their rooms, in Bloomsbury-square, which was very full towards evening. A collection of novel and interesting articles connected with chemical science was exhibited. The object of greatest attraction among the younger pharmacists appeared to be "the Mackenzie triturator," which is described to be a machine intended to perform the heavy pestle and mortar and other mixing operations involved in the manufacture of printer's ink, ointments, and for the several processes of frictional mixing with which the druggist's apprentice is so familiar. The triturating action is performed by a pestle with an ingeniously arranged differential motion, which gives it most effective rubbing action.

The Royal Botanic Society's Fete.—The first fête of the season took place on Wednesday, at the grounds of the society in the Regent's-park. Princess Helena and Prince Albert, with a group of the younger members of the Royal family, were amongst the earliest visitors. There was a large attendance of fashionables to witness the collection of plants and flowers, which were of the usual choice and brilliant character. A large number of prizes were allotted.

Metropolis Water Supply Committee.—On Tuesday the committee came to the following resolution:—"The committee have heard enough to convince them that, for the purpose of affording a supply of pure and wholesome water to the northern and eastern districts of the metropolis, recourse must be had to the river Lee and its tributaries in the neighbourhood of Hertford and Ware. The committee are therefore dissatisfied with all the four bills before them, and are disposed to stop at the present stage of their proceedings, in the hope that the parties interested in the various schemes might come to some fair arrangement among themselves by which a proper supply of water might be secured to those populous districts of the metropolis"

On Tuesday night, between nine and ten o'clock, the premises belonging to Mr. R. Hunt, hop-vender, at Bermondsey-wall, were destroyed by a tremendous fire, which broke out in a part of the building. The loss sustained may be said to amount to £20,000. The place, however, was insured. Several of the adjoining houses, belonging to Mr. J. Brindley, slate-merchant; Messrs. W. and J. Harwood, boat-builders; Mr. T. Crisp, shipwright; Mr. Seymour, sail maker; Mr Thomas Fox, private; Mr. Thomas Burton, granary-keeper, were also more or less burnt. They were, however, all insured. Three vessels that were lying in the river near the scene of conflagration were much damaged by water. The cause of the accident is unknown

Births and Deaths.—The births registered in the metropolis for the week ending Saturday, May 15, were—males, 712; females, 681; total, 1393. The deaths during the same period were—males, 529; females, 541: total, 1070. The mortality of the metropolis exhibits in this return a considerable increase on that of the preceding week, when the deaths fell to 972. Compared with the facts of the previous week, the present return discovers an increase in deaths caused by epidemics from 193 to 234, while in those from diseases of the resp iratory organs the numbers are almost identical. There is an increase from 130 to 142 in deaths by phthisis. Diseases in the hand, foot, and mouth in the two weeks from 37 to 45; those of the digestive organs from 60 to 74. Amongst the epidemics, the typhus diseases are chiefly from the smallpox, and in the next place from scarlatina. The former malady was fatal last week to 26 persons, under 8 adults, altogether 45 persons; the latter to 44. In only 4 cases of smallpox in 17 stated that vaccination had been performed, apparently with effect, and in three the ages are as follow:—5, 18, 28, and 41 years. Zymotics, to the aggregate, produce at present considerably more than the average mortality of the season.

Meteorological Observations.—At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean reading of the barometer in the week was 29 728 in. The mean temperature of the week was 52·7 deg., which is 0·2 deg. below the average of corresponding weeks in ten years. The air was warmest on Sunday (the 9th), when the highest temperature was 73 2 deg, and the mean was 56·3 deg., or 3 7 deg. above the average. On Tuesday, the coldest in the week, the highest was 52·5 deg., and the mean 46 4 deg., or 5 4 deg. below the average. The wind blew from the south-west. On Tuesday and Wednesday the rain in inches was 0.10 and 0 14; the sum of the week was 0 30 in.

"MOUNT ETNA" AT THE SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

On Monday this very popular resort was opened for the season, with several improvements; the great novelty being a pictorial model of Mount Etna, and the Caves of Vulcan and the Cyclops, painted by Messrs. Danson and Sons, who, by aid of fine perspective, have given to the picture surprising extent. The bold and rugged foreground is occupied by the Caves, which stand out with stereoscopic effect; whilst in the distance is the snow-capped volcano, with its triple region of cultivated, wildly luxuriant, and desert nature; its mimic forests and villages, and rugged crater, the latter slumbering but to be awakened at evening By aid of the clever pyrotechnists of the establishment, at nightfall, the forges of the Cyclops are lighted, and the caverns re-echo with their blows, and colored fires issue from the caverns' months, Vulcan superintending the work. The Eruption follows; and a pleasing classic tableau on the lake closes the exhibition. The picture is painted with all the fine effects of distance, in which the Messrs. Danson are pre-eminently successful; and the Eruption, as a spectacle, is very ably managed throughout. By the way, a pyrotechnic model of Etna was exhibited some ninety years since, for the amusement of our ancestors, at Ranelagh.

Among the other novelties are some interesting additions to the menagerie; and during the intervals of the concert the elephants get up an interlude of fantastic tricks.

ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB.

THE Grand Challenge Cup Race, the very ne plus ultrà of yachting contests, took place on Friday, the 14th inst. The Ruby steamer had been chartered by the club, for the accommodation of members and their friends. Besides the Ruby, the Dryad and Waterman No. 3 accompanied the race, with very respectable parties on board; and there were several schooners and cutters of Royal Clubs under way for the same purpose.

The prize was for the Grand Challenge Cup, or piece of plate, given for competition amongst all Royal Clubs, and the course extended from Erith to the Nore Light and back.

The following were found at their stations:—

Stn.	Name.	Tons.	Port.	Distinguishing Flag.
1	Mouse	15	London ..	Red, with mouse in centre
2	Volante ..	48	Ditto	White flag
3	Pauline ..	38	Ipswich ..	Blue square flag
4	Cygnet	35	Southampton	Blue ground, ram's head yellow
5	Musquito ..	50	London ..	Blue pierced white, red Maltese cross
6	War-Hawk ..	66	Teignmouth	Blue flag, gold hawk

Half-minute time per ton for difference of tonnage.

Of the above, the Volante and the Musquito were the favourites. The former was the holder of the cup, and the winner of it last year; but, as the Musquito and Cygnet had also been victorious competitors for it since it was first presented for competition in 1849, either would be entitled to its permanent possession in the event of again winning, as it was not necessary, according to the stipulations, that the same yacht should win two successive years. All preliminaries having been adjusted, the start was made at 11h. 50 min. 30 sec. It was not so good as might have been wished, but, with a fair wind, and plenty of it, they spanked on, with a reef on the mainsail, and a jib-headed topsail, at an amazing pace. The Mouse was early distanced, and the other vessels rounded the Nore Light in the following order:—

The War-Hawk	.. ..	..	2h. 8 min. 35 sec.
Musquito	.. ..	..	2h. 8 min. 50 sec.
Volante	.. ..	..	2h. 9 min. 37 sec.
Pauline	.. ..	..	2h. 18 min. 14 s
Cygnet	.. ..	..	2h. 20 min. 5 sec.

Now should have come the great treat of the day. The coming own had done nothing more than to show that the boats could run or reach; the beating up with the tide, wanting something like an hour or more to flood, was the thing to test their capabilities. Everybody was anxious to see what they could do to windward; and while the greatest anxiety on this score prevailed, an accident, which considerably lessened the pleasure of the day occurred. The War-Hawk was in the act of rounding, and while doing so the Mosquito came inside to windward of her, and evidently with the intention of going about between her rival and the light boat, which she rounded; but finding it impossible, from the strong set of the lee tide, to clear the latter, attempted to bear up under the stern of the War-Hawk, and in doing so carried away her own bowsprit, which broke short off at the stem, by fouling the War-Hawk's main-sheet. Thus were the hopes of the Musquito party entirely destroyed, while the beautiful craft herself, driven by the tide and wind, floated a mile below the light ship while her crew were engaged in rigging another bowsprit, and an interval of 28 minutes elapsed before she could make any endeavour to retrieve her position, with a mile of lee way and the time we have mentioned to make up. Immediately after the turn the Volante held a much better wind than the War-Hawk, and not only fore-reached her, but after going about came out a quarter of a mile ahead and well to windward—a position she maintained and improved to the end. In Sea Reach the pretty Cygnet weathered the War-Hawk, and became second, in which way the race finished, with the following time, the Pauline having unfortunately gone aground at Chapman Head —

Volante	..	..	..	6 h. 47 min 21 sec.
Cygnet	..	..	..	7 h. 9 min. 30 sec.
War-Hawk	..	..	..	7 h. 16 min 7 sec.

The prize was then presented by Mr. Green, who officiated for Lord Alfred Paget.

THE GENERAL SCREW STEAM-SHIP COMPANY.

On Saturday the Chairman and Directors of the Screw Steam-ship Company made an experimental trip down the Thames, in their newly-launched vessel, the Queen of the South, to which a large and distinguished party were invited. The new steam-ship had, early in the morning, steamed slowly down the river to Gravesend, but a river steamer had been hired to convey the visitors on board, and remained at Blackwall for that purpose till nearly twelve o'clock, when she proceeded with her freight towards Gravesend, steaming round the Queen of the South, in order that the company might have a full opportunity of viewing her graceful and elegant mould and noble proportions. The visitors then went on board, and while the splendid steam-ship was running down to the Nore found ample occupation and amusement in examining her internal arrangements and decorations. The Queen of the South is built of iron, with water-tight compartments, by the eminent builders, Messrs. Mare, under the superintendence, and from the designs of, Mr. Waterman, jun.

This noble vessel, constructed from the terms of her contract to carry 26 32-pounders and 2 large pivot guns, is of 1777 tons burthen, and measures 240 feet from stem to stern, 39 feet beam, 25 feet in depth of hold, and is furnished with engines 300-horse power for driving her auxiliary screw. The engines—built by Messrs. Mandslay—are inclined cylinder direct action, the screw working with the same number of revolutions as the engine, viz 60 per minute. The floats are 15 feet diameter, with 17 feet pitch, and the steam is supplied by four boilers, which can be worked together or separately. The blades of the screw feather, and can, when required, be thrown on a line with the keel, so as not to impede the sailing of the ship. The accommodation for passengers is of the most extensive and superior character. There is a magnificent saloon on the upper deck, and below the berths are arranged fore and aft along nearly the entire length of the ship, to the number of 130. The fittings up, the berths, arrangement for ventilation, &c., are all upon the most luxurious and complete scale, and every refinement that can minister to the comfort and convenience of the passengers, including one of Collard's pianofortes, has been provided by the liberality and forethought of the directors. Her cost is about £70,000. Her speed, as tested by the measured mile in Long Reach, is equal to 10½ knots an hour.

Among the company on board the Queen of the South were Earl Grey, the Earl of Verulam, Lord Dundonald, Lord de Roe, Lord Jocelyn, Baron Moncorvo, his Excellency the Neapolitan Ambassador (Prince Carini), Delevere Effendi, M. Mussurus, Lord Exmouth, Hon. F. Egerton, Mr. Zohrab (the Turkish Consul), the Hon. and Rev. C. Grimston, Hon. C. F. Scott, M.P., Admiral Sir George Sartorius, the Right Hon. Sir C. Wood, M.P., Hon. H. Corrie, R.N., &c., amounting to about 120 guests.

The vessel having steamed down to the Mouse Light, below the Nore, returned to Gravesend Reach, where she anchored, and the company then sat down to an elegant luncheon, provided by Roberts, of the Artichoke Tavern, Blackwall.

THE COLLIERY EXPLOSION NEAR ABERDARE.

In our Journal of last week we recorded this lamentable catastrophe. We have since learnt that the explosion was not to any extent so great as might be supposed from the immense loss of life, and the deaths were occasioned more by "choke" or after-damp than from the fire-damp. It is said that a mineral surveyor of considerable eminence inspected this colliery on behalf of the landlord as recently as the Thursday preceding the accident, and he was much pleased with the manner in which the colliery was managed, and especially in respect to the ventilation. His evidence will be taken at the inquest now pending. It is a singular fact that so recently as Wednesday morning, in going down the pit and to the end of the level heading, one of the horses was found quite well and uninjured, and it is probable that had the unfortunate men and boys remained where they were at work, instead of rushing out into the danger, where they fell over each other and were suffocated by the choke or after-damp, most of them would have escaped.

Our Artists have engraved the Duffryn Middle Pit, which is situated about three miles below Aberdare, in the Taff Valley. These works, as well as some others in the same valley, are the property of Mr. Powell, of Newport: from them is procured the steam coal, Duffryn steam coal, remarkable for its calorifiant power and comparative absence of smoke, giving it a peculiar fitness for steam purposes. To meet the extraordinary demand for this coal, the works have been prosecuted with unusual diligence: large numbers of men have been incessantly employed by day and night, exposing, in the progress of their work, extensive surfaces of coal, of course increasing proportionally the usual sources of danger. To obviate this, in addition to the ordinary means of ventilating the collieries, by withdrawing the vitiated air with a steam-pump, the new method introduced by Mr. G. Gurney is employed, by which mode steam is injected into the flue, driving out the air above it by ascent, and thus impelling pit seems. In this case, to have rendered useless all precautions. An immense volume of carburetted hydrogen was thus disengaged in most dangerous proximity to the fire, so that the explosion had taken place before a man below was aware of the presence of the destroyer. In the absence of proof, imputations of culpable carelessness on the part of the victims of the explosion have been somewhat rashly made, opposed as they are to the opinions of those on the spot capable of judging. Of Mr. Powell, the proprietor, it is simply justice to say that he appears to have disregarded any outlay that contributed to the safety of the works. The remains of the pit has long been under the control of one of the most experienced and careful men that could be found in the north of England collieries; and on the entire confidence reposed in him, no stronger proof could be found than that the survivors and the relatives of those who have suffered profess themselves as willing as ever to entrust their lives to his care. If in the inquiry it shall be proved that science has placed at our disposal any precautionary measure which the management had failed to adopt, it cannot be denied that heavy censure will rest with them. In the meantime we only record the result of our own inquiries, in stating that the general opinion of practical and scientific men on the spot prior to the accident, seemed to be that if there was a safe colliery in the valley, it was the Middle Duffryn Pit.

THE CONTROVERSIES OF THE BOOKSELLING TRADE.

A meeting was again held at Stratheden House, on Monday, at which deputations from the Booksellers' Association, and from the cheap retail sellers, were present. After going through the same arguments as before published, Lord Campbell said that he and his colleagues, the Dean of St. Paul's and Mr. Grote, would be ready to express their opinion on the evidence on Wednesday.

Accordingly the deputations were in attendance on Wednesday at Stratheden House, when his Lordship delivered the opinions of a majority upon the question submitted to them. Having reviewed the arguments urged on both sides, and applauded the fairness with which the controversy had been conducted, his Lordship said that they were unanimously of opinion that the regulations under which the bookselling trade was carried on were not unreasonable and inexpedient. Lord Campbell then wound up an elaborate statement as follows:—"One gentleman who addressed us asked us, in case we should condemn the existing regulations, to frame new ones under which the whole bookselling trade should be conducted. This we must wholly decline, as being beyond our undertaking and beyond the powers conferred upon us. Perhaps the bookselling regulations of any sort. Let there be flourishing without any special regulations of any sort. Let there be entire freedom in the transactions between the publishers and the retail booksellers, the publishers asking prices and making or refusing abatements as they please. Let them deal with every one (although untrickered) who brings money in his purse, or whose responsibility is undoubted; taking care not to encourage the long and renewed credits which are said, under the existing system, to have produced so much mischief. The publishers are not bound to trust any one whom they believe to be sacrificing his wares by reckless underselling, or to be carrying on business without a profit sufficient for maintaining solvency. But let them not require any pledge from the retail dealer to whom they sell their books as to the price which he shall demand in reselling them. Thus, freedom of action, we hope, may lead to harmony and prosperity. We feel the most sincere respect and regard for the highly intellectual and honourable body of men who are engaged in the bookselling trade. As authors, we are deeply indebted to them for their valuable services, and we shall be amply rewarded for our labour and anxiety in this inquiry, if we can contribute in any degree to their permanent welfare, upon which we are convinced that the cause of literature in this country must essentially depend."

MADAME SAQUI.—A biographical notice in the Patrie on Madame Saqui, who, at the age of 76 years, is now dancing on the tight rope at the Hippodrome, states some curious facts to account for her being compelled at so advanced a period of life to continue a fatiguing and hazardous performance. It appears that Madame Saqui at acquired a handsome fortune many years ago, and had resolved to retire, when her brother, who was the manager of the Royal theatre, was on the point of becoming bankrupt with debts amounting to 40,000f.; and to save his credit, Madame Saqui paid the whole amount, and reduced herself to poverty. Since that time she has never been enabled to accumulate sufficient wealth to retire, and latterly resolved to go to the Patrie, she met with a terrible misfortune. She was returning from Spain with about 30,000f., the profit of great exertions, when she was stopped by bandittiand robbed of the whole of her money. In her youth she was patronised by the Emperor Napoleon, who frequently made her presents; and on one occasion, when much in want of money to meet her engagements, she applied to the Emperor for a large sum of 10,000f., and he sent it to her immediately.

GOVERNMENT SCHOOL OF MINES.—The first examination for the scholarships in this institution, recently founded by his R yal Highness Prince Albert on behalf of the Prince of Wales, and called "the Duke of Cornwall's Scholarships," was brought to a conclusion on Saturday last, after a most severe examination. Mr. Henry Lord Blandford, being at the head of the list, obtained the scholarship (£30 per annum for two years); and Mr. Robert Hunt the second scholarship, for one year.

THE JERSEY ESTATE.—This long-litigated case has been this week set asi by the Court of Chancery. The property connected with the estate lies, we believe principally in the county of Suffolk, and at the recent dematerialised at seven millions, but only one-half of that amount has been divided in the late decision. One of the fortunate claimants is a journeyman painter named Langham, is this capacity of Mr. Howard, of Maldeg. By the recent decision we understand that the property is divided into seven portions, and that Langham's share will be £500,000!

Mr. Cobden, M.P., has been unable to attend his duties in Parliament during the past week, in consequence of the death of his father-in-law.

MUSIC.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat, and his symphony in A, No. 7, constituted the orchestral attractions of the fifth programme. Mdlle. Clauss was enthusiastically applauded in the concerto, the conception so colossal that it requires the hands almost of a giant duly to develop its massive proportions. Her reading was pure, intelligent, and unaffected, and not less large, manly, and vigorous as that of her great masculine rivals of pianoforte fame, and as might have been reasonably expected from such a youthful performer as Mdlle. Clauss. The vocal pieces were Handel's "Let the bright Seraphim," given by Miss Williams, sleepless were Handel's "Let the bright Seraphim," given by Miss Williams, unexceptionably the finest bit of singing during the evening; Gumbert's love-song or serenade, 'Mein Herz das ist," sung by Herr Reichardt; and "Jessonda," rendered by Spohr's air, "Der Tag reget," sung by Herr Standigl; and Auber's "Masaniello." The second part of the scheme was confined to Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," the soli by Miss Williams, Herrn Reichart and Standigl; and advantage was taken of the engagement of a chorus to give a concerted piece, but very imperfectly. Cherubini's magnificent opera, "Les Deux Journées," a work that we have long since suggested as worthy of being mounted at the Royal Italian Opera. The extraordinary facility is too limited to supply adequate performances of great choral and operatic productions. The treats of the evening were, therefore, the three instrumental items indicated above, the interpretation of which, under Costa's bâton, was, as usual, inimitable. The sixth concert will be on the 31st inst.

MADAME PLEYEL'S CONCERT.

The triumphs of Madame Pleyel at the concerts of the New Philharmonic Society and of the Musical Union, and at Dublin, were completed at her morning concert at the Hanover-square Rooms, on Thursday, in presence of a large and fashionable audience. Besides nearly all the musical celebrities, native and foreign, of the metropolis. It might have been called a Congress of Pianists, such was the number assembled to listen to their Queen of executants, who performed Beethoven's concerto in C minor in the first part, and Mendelssohn's concerto in G minor in the second part, besides Liszt's railroad express of digital difficulties and curious compound of passage eccentricities in his arrangement of the subjects of the leading scenes from Meyerbeer's "Robert," and his charming piece from "Les Soirées Musicales" of Rossini. In the two concertos, particularly in the Beethoven work, the orchestral accompaniments were finely executed, but the pianoforte part, the intellectual interpretation suffered severely in the C minor. In the Mendelssohnian production, the tutto were better done; but still not sufficiently precise for such an accomplished player as Pleyel. Her execution, however, could not be frustrated by any conductor's incompetency, and her vast and unapproachable powers of execution—her mental, refined, and poetic gifts—her wondrous aggregate of the highest merits, constitute the grand pianoforte of the day. The wood forth more triumphantly, The delicacy and elasticity of touch in the slow movement in the G minor, and the prodigious pace at which the finale was taken, will not easily be forgotten by Thursday's excited listeners: it was the concert readiness and solidity, but it was the unfailing tinging of the instrument in her hands, the mind and heart was the unfailing tinging of the instrument in her hands, the mind and heart seemed to be at her finger's ends. Her speciality is wide and comprehensive in the most classic and elevated style, and not the trivial bagatelle of the salon, she is eq ally distinguished. Such nerve and vigour, combined with ease and elegance, has never been associated in the attributes of any other player.

Mdlle. Jetty de Treffz. Miss Lindley, Mdme. Féron, and Herr Standigl sustained the vocal elsewhings of the programme. A clever but discursive overture by Mr. Frank Mori, "Fridolin," was performed; but the want of rehearsals was the general defect of the concert, the interest in which was, of course, centered in Madame Pleyel's performances.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.

This has been a stirring week for musical critics, who have been called upon daily to attend divers grand morning and evening concerts, classic meetings, matinées, and soirées musicales, sometimes two and three entertainments of a morning, and in the same day.——On Monday Madame Pauline presented coming off in the same day.——On Monday Madame Pauline presented coming off in the same day.——On Monday Madame Pauline presented coming off

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

It is stated that her Majesty, at the recommendation of her Ministers, is about to confer the honour of a baronetcy on Lord Boyle, late Justice General and President of the Court of Session, as a reward for his long and valuable services on the bench of Scotland. On Sunday morning, as Edward Fuller, aged fifty, night watchman at Mr. Bovill's corn stores, Milford lane, Strand, was crossing the barges in front of his master's premises, to go on board a steam-boat from Temple pier, he missed his footing and was drowned.

Mr. James Holder, brother of the late Mr. Fielden, M.P., was found dead in his bed on Sunday night, by his wife, soon after he had left her for the purpose of retiring to rest. The cause of his sudden death was disease of the heart.

During Monday night, the shop of Mr. Howard, jeweller, Market-street, Manchester, was entered, and prop rty worth £500, including 13 gold watches, 19 gold watches, and a quantity of gold jewellery, made, &c., was taken away. The thief had entered himself in the cellar, and had cut a hole through the floor of the shop. He is now in custody, but the property has not yet been recovered.

L'Independance Belge says that a medical gentleman of the name of Williams has discovered that the fatal consequences of pleuro-pneumonia, the disease which has proved so fatal to cattle both on the Continent and in this country, can be entirely prevented. It appears that Mr. Williams has been pursued upon a large number of animals, and for a considerable time, with complete success. A commission has been issued by the Belgian Government to inquire into the subject, and a similar course is about to be adopted by the Government of Holland.

During the past week, thousands of fresh-water fish have been poisoned in the river Colne, at Colchester, an immense tank of gas tar having been emptied into the river from the premises of the old gas-works.

The Cheltenham Examiner states:—"As a proof of the healthy state of affairs under Free Trade, we may mention that at the present moment there is not a single able-bodied pauper, male or female, in the Cheltenham workhouse, although the union comprises Cheltenham, with its 40,000 inhabitants and 13 agricultural parishes. The master of the workhouse has for some time been obliged to waste the fire ordinarily used for cooking the pauper's dinners, such dinners not being now required. The wards in the house and grounds, and which work, under the old system of Protection, was invariably done by the able-bodied paupers."

Mr. Charles Coakk, of the London Coffee-house, St. John's-lane, Liverpool, died on the morning of the last week. In the rush to get to the train, after the races at Chester, on the Wednesday, he was thrown across the rail. He instantly threw himself on his back, and the moving train passed over him without causing the slightest injury.

Among the latest discoveries at Nineveh, one coffin found contained the body of a lady of the Royal house; many of her garments were entire, also the gold studs and hieroglyphics. The most singular piece of dress however, was a mask of thin gold pressed upon the face, so as to assume and retain the features of the deceased.

The Echo Saumarois, a French paper, of the 14th, says:—"A balloon fell yesterday, about four in the afternoon, in the commune of Neuilé, near Saumur. No one can say whence it came, nor tell anything about it. It is about 36 feet in diameter, and the green and yellow silk of which it is made is of English manufacture. There was no car attached to it, but merely a basket, on which were found half a roll, some pieces of cord, and some small rools."

On Tuesday morning, shortly after seven o'clock, one of the Grenadier Guards, on duty at the Horse Guards, was found, shortly after he was relieved from his post as sentry, with his throat cut and quite dead, in the black hole of the guard-house, where he had gone to take a short sleep.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

To say that the great Epsom festival commences on Tuesday is to say that the turf calendar is in all other respects "blank" for the week. Mr. Dorling's bill of fare is a bumper, and the Derby one of the most exciting and mysterious ever known. The present calculation is, that five or six and twenty will be found at the post. The aquatic fixtures are confined to the great match on Monday for the championship of the Thames, and the London Yacht Club match on Saturday. There will be cricket matches of some extent at Lord's, and at Prince's Park, Liverpool, on Monday, and at Broughton, near Manchester, on Tuesday.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—Hobble Noble, who, when we last quoted him, was almost out of the betting, came into immense favor to-day, and closed first favourite by two points. Alderan, Clavarhouse, Alfred the Great, Kingston, Augur, and King of Trumps were also in force at improved quotations. On the other hand, Harbinger gave way a point or two on the previous market, and Stockwell was friendless. The following were the averages:—

Cole, of Chelsea, for the championship of the Thames and £400, will come off on Monday next, from Putney to Mortlake with most are in capital condition, and a first-rate contest is expected. Coombes is slightly the favourite. The Lalla Rookh has been chartered to accompany the match for the benefit of the losing man, and for the use of the umpires and reteree.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

One or two rather important features—the result of a superabundance of capital and of the prospect of large additional supplies of gold being received here from Australia during the winter months—have presented themselves this week. The first to which we may particularly allude is an official notice, to the effect that the next issue of Exchequer Bills will be at the rate of only 1½d. per diem, or £1 18s. 6½d. per annum. The interest now paying on those securities is 1½d. per day, or £2 5s. 7½d. per annum. Hence it will be perceived that the present Chancellor of the Exchequer has determined to pursue a medium, consequently a moderate, policy as to loans, at being pretty generally understood that his predecessor in office had contemplated making a reduction in the rate to 1d. per day, or £1 10s. 5d. per annum. Almost immediately following this announcement, we have to state that the East India Company have given notice that the present rate of interest on their bonds (£3 per cent.) will, on and after the 31st of May, 1853, be reduced to £2 10s. per cent. Although we are of opinion that the premium on both the above-named securities will be fairly supported in the long run, some parties contend that large additional quantities of Consols will be taken off the market hence the latter has risen very steadily this week, and prices have advanced about one-quarter per cent. On Monday there were sellers of the Three per Cents at 99¾ for Money. No particular change to k place in the position of the money market during the early part of Wednesday; but on Thursday the Three per Cents reached par, the quotations for them having been 99⅞, 100, 99⅞. Bank Stock was marked 220½, 220, and 221. The Three per Cents Reduced were steady, at 99¾ to 99; the New Three per Cents, ditto, ditto, ditto, were at 111⅛. Exchequer Bills were tolerably firm; those for March were marked 71s. to 74s.; and for June, 64s. to 67s premium. At the quotations given above a very moderate business has been transacted.

Notwithstanding that it is asserted that Messrs. Baring will make advances for the payment of the Mexican dividends, that stock has ruled excessively heavy. Since this time they were down as low as 31, but they have since recovered to 32 for the Five per Cents. Most of the Northern Bonds have kept up tolerably well, but Spanish and South American securities have commanded very little attention. On Tuesday Brazilian Five per Cents were marked 98¾; Buenos Ayres Six per Cents, 73¾; Grenada Deferred, 4¾; Mexican Three per Cents, 23¾; Peruvian Six per Cents, 102; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 103; Sardinian Five per Cents, 97 to ¾; Spanish Committee's Bonds, 24; Venezuela Three-and a Half per Cents, 41 to 40¾; and Ditto Deferred, 14¾. Occasional sales have been effected in Belgian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, at 93¾; Ecuador, 4¾; Danish Five per Cents, 104¾; Spanish Old Three per Cents, 46¾ to 47; and Spanish New Three per Cents, Deferred, 20¾; Canada 5 per Cent. Bonds have been quoted at 113⅝ to ¾; and City Navigation, 3¾ per cent. Bonds, Very few Railway Shares have changed hands.

We have again to notice a further increase in the demand for Bank shares. British North American have risen £1, and Colonial £1 5s. Australasia have touched 88, British North American 86, Colonial, 144; London and Westminster, 25; London Joint Stock, 18⅝; London and Westminster, 29¾; Oriental Bank Corporation, 36, Provincial Bank of Ireland, 46; South Australia, 25; and Union of London, 16.

Steamboat shares have slightly advanced. Peninsular and Oriental, 83; Ditto, New, 34⅝; Royal Mail, 77; and General Steam, 2¾.

Money for all commercial purposes has been in great request this week. Bankers generally having made liberal advances upon produce, the colonial markets have ruled active, and prices have continued to improve. Our letters from the manufacturing districts are very satisfactory.

The dealings in the Railway Share Market owing chiefly to the comparative falling off in the traffic receipts have been by no means large. Holders of most shares, however, have not exhib ted much anxiety to realise; hence the fall in the quota tions has not been of much moment. Annexed are the closing quotations on Thursday

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—During the present week very moderate supplies of English wheat have arrived up to our market constantly, and by land carriage; hence the show of samples of both new and fresh has been fair for the season. Notwithstanding that no somewhat large quantities of foreign flour have been brought forward the demand for all kinds of wheat of home produce has ruled at advanced full prices. The foreign wheats have sold at rates quotations within the value of home and in many parcels has been supplied. In barley comparatively little business has been transacted, with fair grinding qualities at full a shade lower. No change in malt. Oats, beans, and peas have changed hands steadily, at full currencies. Indian corn much neglected, but in full average has been done during the four, the prices of which are rather inclined to decline from.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 37s to 42s, ditto, white, 39s to 44s, Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 36s to 40s, ditto, white, 40s to 44s, rye, 24s to 26s, grinding barley, 22s to 25s; distilling ditto, 26s to 28s, malting ditto 28s to 34s, Norfolk and Lincoln malt 52s to 56s; brown ditto, 46s to 52s, Kingston and Ware, 54s to 60s, Chevalier ditto 56s to 62s, Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 16s to 18s, potato ditto 19s to 20s, Lough, and York ditto, 18s to 21s, Scotch ditto, 20s to 24s, York beans new, 30s to 34s, old, 34s to 36s, grey peas 32s to 34s, maple 32s to 37s, white 31s to 34s, boilers, 34s to 36s per quarter. Town-made flour 36s to 40s, Suffolk, 27s to 32s, Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, 30s to 34s per 280 lb. Foreign.—American flour 20s to 24s per barrel. Dutch 28s to 30s per sack.

The Seed Trade.—Linseed inclined to steadier at 48s to 49s, and Bombay, 45s 6d to 46s per quarter. Several parcels of Mediterranean have changed hands at 46s. Rapeseed, 42l to 42l per last of 10 quarters. Linseed cakes English, 6l 5s to 6l 10s; foreign, 5l 15s to 6l 5s per ton. Rape cake 4l 10s to 4l 15s per ton. Canary, 50s to 52s per quarter. English clover seed, red, 60s to 68s, white, 80s to 95s; Foreign, red, 42s to 48s, white 60s to 64s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 6½d to 7d; of household ditto, 5d to 6d per 4-lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 41s 3d; barley, 28s 3d; oats, 18s 10d; rye, 30s 0d; beans, 31s 0d; peas, 32s 2d.

The Corn Trade during the week.—Wheat, 40s 1½d; barley, 28s 6d; oats, 19s 7d; rye, 31s 7d; beans, 30s 3d; peas, 32s 9d

Imports.—Wheat, 1s; barley, 1s; oats, 1s; rye, 1s; beans, 1s; peas, 1s

Tea.—Several public sales have taken place this week, and at which a fair amount of business has been transacted at about last week's prices. Privately, common congou is selling at from 9½d to 10½d per lb. Advices from China to the late date from Canton of March last were 25,500 chests, against 37,500 chests for corresponding period in 1851.

Sugar.—The demand continues exceedingly heavy, for the former week's prices are fully supported. On Saturday last having amounted to 15,903 bags, against 14,982,360 do. last season.

Coffee.—Fine Mocha continues to command rather more attention, at an advance of 2d per cwt. Plantation sorts have been pushed at the 2d per cwt. Foreign coffees rather lower.

Rice.—Prices remain in a very inactive state, and late figures are barely supported Provisions.—The best Irish butter is in moderate request at full prices, but other kinds are very dull. Carlow, Kerry, and Limerick, 76s to 78s per cwt.; Cork, 74s to 76s, and Limerick, from May to December, 68s per cwt. English butter is again lower. Fine weekly Dorset, 72s to 80s per cwt.; Devon, 64s to 68s per cwt. The bacon trade is less active. For immediate delivery, 52s has been paid for Waterford singsides, and 54s for the end of the month. Barrel beef and pork, as we quote, are quite as dear. Hams, 60s to 70s per cwt.

Tallow.—Our market continues steady, at extreme quotations. P Y C on the spot is selling at 39s 3d to 37s; and for forward delivery, 37s 9d to 38s per cwt., down tallow, 35s 9d to 36s per cwt., no cash

Oils.—Linseed is tolerably firm, both for home use and for export. Prices generally are well supported. Linseed, £ 27 to £27 10s per tun.

Spirits.—In rum a moderate business has been done at full prices. In brandy, 1s 3d to 1s 3½d per gallon for fine marks, and some sales have been effected in low to middling qualities. East India, ditto, at 1s 2d per gallon. Brandy remains but little variety between 4 and 5 years old, at 9s 3d to 9s 6d per gallon. In geneva the demand is very limited, and prices are barely supported. Hollands are selling at 1s 2d per gallon.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £3 10s to £4 10s; clover ditto, £3 15s to £4 17s; and straw, £1 5s to £1 15s per load.

Hops.—Owing to the firmness on the part of factors, all kinds of hops move off slowly, but we have no actual fall to notice in prices.

Wool.—The colonials sales have commenced, with a large attendance of both home and foreign buyers. The whole of the parcels are yet offered have changed hands at an advance in the quotations of fully 1d per lb In the private market very little is doing, although the total quantity for sale is only about 25,000 bales

Potatoes.—Supplies are becoming scarce and fine York Regents are sold at from 90s to 100s per ton. Other kinds, 60s to 80s per ton.

Smithfield.—Inferior cattle have sold readily, and prices have had an upward tendency from 2s to 3s per 8 lbs. Prime Scots, Devons, and Herefords, 3s to 3s 4d; ditto, 2s 2d to 2s 6d; prime calves, 3s 6d per 8 lbs; and prime sheep, 3s 4d to 3s 8d per 8 lbs.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—These markets have been firm for each kind of meat, at the full quotations.

Best, from 2s 8d to 3s 0d; mutton, 2s 4d to 3s 4d; lamb, 4s to 5s 6d; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 4d; pork, 3s 4d to 4s 0d per 8 lb, by the carcase.

(Opinions of the Press.)

"The celebrity of the Great Exhibition of 1851 seems to demand an illustration of this high character, in order to prolong the remembrance of its glories: and the reputations of the artists engaged are a guarantee for the fidelity of the representations."—Morning Herald.
"A very beautiful work; one likely to preserve the distinguishing features of that Exhibition in Hyde Park, of which art alone will enable future generations to obtain an adequate representation of its beauty and resources.... We cannot imagine a work of greater interest than this in every respect, whether as a faithful representation of a noble scheme—living in the memories of the present, and preserved to all time in these comprehensive and minute illustrations."—Illustrated London News.

CORK HATS.—The manufacture of these Hats was so defective last season on the part of most houses, as to lead to the impression that the Cork Hat was a failure. The great improvements that has been effected since the introduction of silk hats, whilst the material difficulty of increasing the size of a new machine, still deters others of acknowledged reputation from attempting to produce them. It is, however, now indisputable, that cork, simply on its elasticity, does form the best material for Hats, being made from its roughness, and the only elastic and cool foundation for the head to stand upon in any climate. The public are cautioned to purchase these Hats only of experienced makers. Exhibited at the Great Exhibition, Class 25, No 195.
CORK HATS.—Classes 28, No. 125; and 6, No. 58.—These Hats shown in the above Classes at the Great Exhibition, by Messrs GAMMES, SANDERS, and NICOL, and which have been pronounced by the Jurors to combine the lightness, lightness, and general comfort to the wearer, may be obtained, wholesale or retail, of the manufacturers, at 23, Burdett-street, Cornhill, at their Branch Establishment, No. 111, Strand; and at all the principal towns in the United Kingdom. MINISTERIAL RECANTATIONS.

THE operation popularly known as that of "eating one's words" is no doubt an exceedingly disagreeable one. No one either in public or in private life likes to perform it. When a man is most inconsistent with his former self, his words, his gestures, his whole bearing are all so contrived as to impress upon careless and uninterested spectators the belief that he is not eating his words at all, but that he is steadily pursuing the course of policy or of conduct which he had previously traced out for himself. There is in society a very general tendency not to bear too hard upon such unhappy victims of necessity. Allowances are made for the bitternesses of the operation; wry faces are forgiven; and delays and postponements of the final gulp are regarded as natural and excusable. Even those who are interested that the deed should be done, are willing to humour a little attempted mystification upon the subject, and to allow the victim all the butter and honey that he can lay upon the large bolus which fate and justice have ordained him to swallow, so as to make its deglutition as easy and as palatable as possible. The sympathies of our human nature are so kindly, and every man is at heart so conscious of his own liability to error, that he who openly and frankly avows that he has been wrong, generally disarms hostility, and is permitted to eat his words without any vindictive condemnation, except from the unfeeling and the depraved. In public even more than in private life, we witness these results. There only needs a conviction in the minds of the great mass of the people that "the eaters of words" are honest in their change of opinion, to assure them a ready forgiveness. To eat one's words is, after all, nothing but another phrase for the renunciation of error; and he who solemnly and sincerely abandons a wrong course of argument, or of action, and repents at the same time that ever he was guilty of it, is entitled to something more than gratitude;—he demands, and will receive, respect. It is wilful and interested persistency in error that is wicked, not the recantation of it. The wry faces, the frequent postponements, and the thin transparent disguises, are but the forced tributes which we pay to our inexorable self-esteem; or they are the bandages with which we bind the wounds of our bleeding vanity. They are permitted, because they are natural; and though they may occasionally excite amusement, they never provoke hostility.

The Earl of Derby, and the principal members of his Administration, are at this time in this unenviable but not disgraceful predicament. The truth, to which they were long blind, is now evident; and they severally see it with more or less of distinctness. A new light dawned upon them as soon as they were compelled by the responsibilities of office to investigate facts for the sake of truth, and not for the sake of a dexterous and interested logomachy with their opponents. The proper government of Great Britain is so solemn and weighty a business, the interests of the nation are so varied and so complicated, and the system of "compromises" where they conflict is so obviously prudent and wise, that, however irrationally men may act and speak when in opposition, they are forced to listen to reason, when they have thrust or insinuated themselves into the cares and responsibilities of office. The possession of power restrains the discursive, and sobers the excited. The mountebank of opposition often becomes a steady man of business when he has attained the position which he sought; and those who have to deal with important facts, as the Ministers of a great nation must always do, learn to give them their due importance, and are compelled to recognise them at any expense, even at that of their own consistency. Mr. Disraeli as Chancellor of the Exchequer, is already a very different person from Mr. Disraeli the leader of the Opposition: the one might say what he pleased, the other must do what is right. In his case, the process of word-eating has been somewhat expeditiously gone through; and there is scarcely a Free-trader in the country, who is not fully conscious, that, whatever the views of that eminent person may have formerly been on the subject of the commercial system of Sir Robert Peel, and especially of the tax upon bread, his views are now in accordance with those of the man whom he once so bitterly condemned. Mr. Disraeli dreams of nothing so wild and so insane as any attempt to restore that system of Protection, which is as defunct as Queen Anne, or the Heptarchy. He may have once done so, but the day has past. He has awakened to the stern realities of life and power, and the downfal of the Russell Administration has converted him into a Free-trader. He has said so with sufficient plainness to satisfy most men; and if his speech on the introduction of the Budget did not express his recantation in set terms, it left no room for any reasonable doubt that he was no longer a Protectionist in the same sense as before. If he have yet anything more to eat, he will eat it in due time, either with or without the wry face, and either with or without the sweetening or the condiment that is to disguise it.

On Monday night the Earl of Derby performed a similar feat. His Lordship has at length felt himself bound to immolate his past speeches on the shrine of his present convictions. The Duke of Newcastle having made a most able and complete recapitulation of the benefits this country had reaped from the wise commercial policy pursued by Sir Robert Peel, and to which Lord Derby, in every case except the repeal of the Corn Laws, was a consenting, if not a willing, party; and Lord Granville having followed up that statement by a direct appeal to the Premier to declare whether he still thought a recurrence to a duty on corn to be necessary, the great Earl of Derby opened his mouth and fairly bolted most of the recorded words of the great Lord Stanley. His Lordship had endeavoured, on one or two former occasions, to perform this inevitable but disagreeable duty, but never thoroughly succeeded until Lord Granville so kindly gave him the opportunity. His words are already historical :—

> The noble Earl (said he) is quite wrong in supposing that the imposition of a duty on corn was in my opinion a matter of necessity. I stated that I did conceive, that for the purpose at once of relieving the suffering agricultural classes, and also for the purpose of improving the revenue, which might thereby enable us to take off other taxes without injury to the consumer—I distinctly stated that it was my opinion that an import on corn was desirable; and I also stated, that, whether relief should be granted by an impost of a duty on foreign corn, was a matter which should rest upon the judgment of the constituencies, and was in no case a matter of necessity, but that it was in my opinion a desirable mode of affording relief to a suffering class. I hold that opinion still; but I state again that that is a question which must be left to the constituencies of the country; and, moreover, I do not give any pledge to the noble Earl opposite. I will further state that my opinion is, from what I have since heard and learned, that there certainly will not be in favour of a remposition of a duty on corn that extensive majority without which I stated to the House it would not be desirable to impose it.

It may be asked, what more can be expected from a man in Lord Derby's position than such an avowal as this—candid enough, considering his past career, to satisfy the most ardent Free-trader? But much more is expected, not simply for the sake of Lord Derby, but for that of public morality. It is not enough that he and Mr. Disraeli should do themselves and the country the justice to admit that they were formerly in error. Such an admission is satisfactory; but far more is required from men in the high position of statesmen, and leaders of the Senate of this country. When Sir Robert Peel, acting under the strong compulsion of imperative duty, found that he could no longer maintain the opinions he had formerly expressed on the subject of a duty on corn, he acted a manly part. He did not consider himself an indispensable and inevitable Minister. He did not retain power to carry out a policy which he had once disapproved, but with a proper sense of his own dignity and duty he resigned office. In his memorable letter to the Queen, dated the 6th of December, 1845, before the Corn Laws were repealed, but after he had become convinced that it was impossible to continue them, he left it to Lord John Russell to form a Ministry if he could; and promised, in his capacity of a private member of Parliament, to act in accordance with the new views of policy and of justice which had taken possession of his mind.

If Lord Derby would imitate that high example, he might, if power were his object, more honourably attain and more certainly preserve it than he can now hope to do; and if "a fair page in his country's history" was to him a reward, as it was to Sir Robert Peel, he might, in like manner, be assured of it by a display of that chivalry which was formerly his boast, and by a manly abnegation as well as recantation. Though Sir Robert Peel was afterwards the Minister who repealed the Corn Laws, it should never be forgotten that when he changed his opinions he resigned, and that he only consented to resume office, on the demand of the Queen, after an unsuccessful attempt on the part of his parliamentary opponent to form an Administration. Three weeks ago, before Lord Derby had announced that he no longer thought it "necessary" to restore the Protection system, we expressed the public opinion of his conduct in retaining office in defiance of his growing convictions, and those of his subordinates, in favour of a contrary system. What has since occurred has but added to the force of the remarks we then made.

It may be matter for rejoicing that Lord Derby and his colleagues have not proved obstinate in shutting their eyes against the truths which are patent to all the rest of the world; but it is still more clearly a matter of duty in them to retire, and leave to others the attempt to govern the country. They are not the Ministers of necessity, as Sir Robert Peel was; and at least there can be no proof that such is the fact until they shall do as Sir Robert Peel did, and give her Majesty the option of choosing her advisers from the ranks of men who have not eaten their words, and who are not justly open to the reproach of loving power more ardently than they love principle. Lord Derby destroys the unity of the country in its public men—one of the very worst evils that it possible to befall a nation. It is not by changing his opinion that he does this—for Sir Robert Peel changed his opinion and made his name immortal—but by holding to office for the sake of office, and by setting at nought the great principles of political morality that in a country and in an age like this ought to be pure and beyond reproach. Even Sir Robert Peel, who resigned office, inflicted a wound on the character of the statesmanship of party, if so, what would will be inflicted on it by Lord Derby, who changes, but who does not resign, and who either cannot or will not see what is justly expected of him?

THE ESCAPE OF THOMAS F. MEAGHER.—The Dublin Nation of last Saturday confirms the account of the escape of Meagher, and contains the following letter from him to Mr. Duffy, the editor of that paper, written just previous to his throwing up his ticket for the purpose of attempting to escape :—

"Lake Sorrell, Van Diemen's Land, Dec. 27, 1851. My dear Duffy,—In great haste I have sat down to tell you that I am determined to withdraw my parole—throw up my 'ticket of leave'—and afterwards attempt my escape. . . . . I seek some land in which a useful and honourable career will be open to me, and where, free from the galling restrictions which beset and hamper me at every step, and the yet more galling indignities which intrude themselves even into the sanctuary of my humble home, I may find generous and creditable employment for whatever energies I possess through the goodness of God. With fervent hope that, with his aid and blessing, I shall have the delight of writing my next letter to you under the shadow and protection of the flag of Washington, and with fondest remembrances to Maurice Leyne, and all my other dear and devoted friends, believe me, my dear Duffy, ever to remain, whatever be my fate, your faithful and affectionate friend,

"THOMAS F. MEAGHER."

THE TRIENNIAL EXILES OF 1848.—The Galway Vindicator publishes a letter from one of the misguided persons who figured in the year of turbulence, 1848. The writer is Mr. William F. Dowling, a young artist, who resided in London, and took an active part in Chartist proceedings in 1848. He was transported to Van Diemen's Land, under the act which prohibited open and advised speaking. Of his companions in exile he says :—"Cuffy is working at his trade, until lately, was not very brisk; the complete stagnation which exists in the neighbouring continent has made every trade good now; he is much respected as a sober and industrious man. Fay has always been in constant employment, and he is considered the best workman in the colony. Leary has opened a shop in Launceston, his wife and five children have come to him, and he is in a fair way of reaping a fortune, having a great number of men employed, and, particularly since the gold discoveries, has received more orders than he can procure men to execute. Ritchie has not been very fortunate, but is now in employment. With respect to the country Chartists, none of them have been able to get employment at their trades, there being no factories of any consequence in the colony; they are, however, employed as labourers, such as gardeners, &c. Smith O'Brien, since his acceptance of a ticket of leave, has lived in great privacy and retirement in the Vale of Avoca, having, in order to employ his highly cultivated mind, condescended to become tutor to the young son of an eminent Irish physician who resides in that retired place. His constant and dignified demeanour has procured him the respect of all, even of those most opposed to him in principles and politics. He is now, I am informed, in very bad health; so much so, that he has been obliged to give up the employment he had accepted, and has got permission to reside in a different locality. Mitchel has been joined by his wife and family; and with such a family, and with the society of his old and excellent friend, Mr. John Martin, he must be as happy as it is possible for an exiled rebel to be. O'Meagher still resides in his solitary domicile at Black Marsh, where the shadow and protection of the flag of Washington, and with fondest remembrances to Maurice Leyne, and all my other dear and devoted friends, believe me, my dear Duffy, ever to remain, whatever be my fate, your faithful and affectionate friend,

"T. F. MEAGHER."

THE PERPETU

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The accounts this week from Paris are unusually barren of interest. The provincial journals are filled with resignations of official persons who refuse to take the oath of allegiance.

The following letter on the subject has been addressed by General Bedeau from his place of exile to the Minister of War:—

Mons, May 15, 1852.

Monsieur le Ministre,—An order fixes the time within which the oath imposed on soldiers will be taken. Placed out of the pale of the law since the 2d of December, I might abstain from replying to that prescription; but I do not wish that my silence should be falsely interpreted. My acts have always had for principle and object the respect and the defence of the laws. I was for that sole cause arrested, imprisoned, and violently proscribed. Injustice and persecution do not change honest convictions. I refuse the oath.

BEDEAU.

The sale of the late Marshal Soult's picture gallery has produced 1,477,800f., or £59,112 sterling. Among the persons who purchased the principal pictures of the Spanish masters are the Duke of Galiera, Count Pozzo di Borgo, the Marquis of Hertford, Count Duchatel, Baron Double, Messrs. Townend, Osborn, De Bruni, Roux, Mundler, Calio, for the Museum of Montpelier, &c. The "Assumption of the Virgin," the master piece of Murillo (8 feet 5 inches in height, by 6 feet in width), was bought for the Gallery of the Louvre, at Paris, for the enormous sum of 223,440 sterling. This almost divine picture represents the Virgin in the act of being carried up to heaven. Her golden hair floats on her shoulders, and her white robe gently swells in the breeze, a mantle of blue at the same time falling from her shoulders. Groups of angels and cherubim of extraordinary beauty sport around her in the most ardient admiration, those below throwing flowers closely together, while those above open their ranks, as if not in any way to conceal the glory shed around the ascending Virgin. All the writers on the Spanish school of painting agree in declaring that this picture is the chef-d'œuvre of Murillo; and never, perhaps, did claring two to be the chef-d'œuvre of Murillo; and never, perhaps, did that great master attain to such sublimity of expression and such magnificent colouring. The bidding fully responded to the high character of this great work.

The "Unutterable Anguish," or "Via de los Dolores," as it has been also called in Spain, considered the masterpiece of Morales, surnamed "El Divino," was also exposed of at the sale. At the foot of the cross from which the lifeless body of the Saviour has just been taken down, the Virgin, overcome with grief, is represented in an attitude which the bold stained head of her son, while, at the same time, the beloved disciple, in attitude of despair and with his hands clasped, looks at the features of Jesus Christ. St John and Mary Magdalen regard with the deepest attention the massive body of their Divine Master. The Virgin is represented in the magnificent body of her Divine Master. The Virgin is represented in the magnificent body of her head, while a white veil is thrown mantle, which covers part of her head, while a white veil is thrown and is crossed on her bosom. Mary Magdalen holds a handkerchief between her clasped hands, and her golden hair falls in thick tresses on her shoulders. It is impossible to describe the sentiment of religious fervour which pervades that pathetic scene. Morales seems to have transfused into the execution of this great work the deep religious feeling by which it is known the greater part of his life was governed. The drawing is remarkable for correctness of design, and the colouring is drawing is remarkable for correctness of design, and the colouring is also true to nature. The first bidding was 20,000f., and was successfully knocked down for 24,000f (£960) to Mr. Townend, the price being considered much below the value of the work.

Rumours respecting the fusion of the elder and junior branches of the ex-Royal family have been revived this week. The Assemblée Nationale affirms that the fusion will be soon, if it is not already, an accomplished fact, and the Pays intimates that the fusion, if effected, with a view to a restoration of the Monarchy, will be met by the country.

In Switzerland and Wurtemberg all is quiet. Elections have been closed by order of the Prefect, persons frequenting those houses being inimical to the public peace.

Incendiarism continues to prevail in several of the departments.

Another political prisoner, named Malhurin Dauthier, has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment and 100f. fine for using language inciting to the Prince President.

PIEDMONT.

A Ministerial crisis in this little constitutional kingdom has just been brought to a close, and it will be seen that the majority of the enlightened Cabinet who have hitherto conducted the affairs of Piedmont, have been reinstalled in office.

In the date the 22nd inst, from Turin, we learn that MM. d'Azeglio, Paleocapa, and Pernati have resumed their respective portfolios of Foreign Affairs, Public Works, and Interior, that M. Buncompagni has accepted the department of Justice vacated by M. Galvagno, and M. Cibrario has been named Minister of Finance in lieu of M. Lavoni. The department of Public Instruction, hitherto held by M. Farini, is provisionally entrusted to Buncompagni. M. Lamarmora retains the department of War, to which that of Marine is added. In the sitting of the 21st of the Chamber of Deputies, MM. Cavour and Farini, the late Ministers, took their seats on the benches of the right.

UNITED STATES.

The advices from New York are to the 11th inst., but they contain no intelligence of interest from Congress. The Senate had again postponed the discussion on the Cuban steamers, but there was an intimation that the personal relations always existing between them, but which the unfortunate conduct of the diplomatic relations of the United States by the Secretary of State—especially as regards Austria, and himself as her high representative—had not been of a character to commend itself to his Imperial Majesty, and was wanting in the attributes of mutuality and comity which had always heretofore marked the relations between the two governments. It adds that Mr Belmont, Ambassador to Austria, would be recalled, of course on request, from Constantinople, and that all communications as the Austrian Government might have to make. The reply was by the United States acting Secretary of State. It acknowledges the receipt of the Chevalier Hulsemann's letter, and merely says that such communications as the Austrian Government may transmit may be relied upon to make through Mr Belmont, and will be respectfully received.

Mr Henry Clay still survived, but his strength was gradually declining.

Destructive fires had occurred at Cleveland, Boston, Providence, Baltimore, and New York in the latter five lives were lost.

An Anti-Slavery Convention has been held in Cincinnati, at which resolutions were passed that under no circumstances whatever can any true-hearted abolitionist vote for or countenance at any compromise involving the slightest concession to any pro-slavery requisition.

The Louisiana Legislature had passed a law prohibiting the emancipation of slaves in that State, except on condition of their being sent out of the United States. A bill recently reported in the Maryland Legislature has a similar purport. A very stringent bill against free negroes has been reported in the Virginia Legislature, the enforcement of which will drive them out of the State.

Orson Hyde and Mr Rockwell, both Mormons, have been excommunicated by President Fillmore to take the places of two of the judges who suddenly withdrew from Utah some time ago.

The second National Convention of the Roman Catholic Church of the United States was sitting at Baltimore on the 9th. The prelates formed in procession, wearing full pontificals, and walked from the archiepiscopal residence to the cathedral, preceding and the square, to the front of the latter, and thence into the nave of the church, passing up the broad aisle to the grand altar, and chanting appropriate services for the occasion. The procession was headed by a magnificent gilt crucifix, followed by acolytes bearing lighted candles, the master of ceremonies and assistants, chanters, theologians—one for each bishop—followed by the archbishops and bishops, taking their rank according to priority of consecration, all arrayed in the most magnificent manner. When were over the bishops and priests arrayed in their canonicals, seated at the altar. Each bishop was attended by a page. After all the prelates had taken their places, the Council was opened in a solemn manner by Archbishop Kenrick, of Baltimore, who addressed the bishops present in the following words:—

After other appointed ceremonies, and the reading of the decrees of the Council of Trent, touching the profession of faith and residence, a grand high mass was performed. A sermon was then delivered by Archbishop Hughes, at the conclusion of which the procession was reformed.

The Ocean Queen had arrived on the 14th inst, at New York after a passage of 13 days, 4½ hours.

The Emperor Soulouque was crowned on the 18th of April.

WEST INDIES.

There are advices from Jamaica this week to the 29th April, the depressed condition of the island still forming the prominent and almost only topic of discussion, whether in the newspapers or at public meetings. In the parish of St. George, the black and coloured inhabitants had assembled, and agreed to an address to the British people, in which they set forth in vivid colours the distressful condition of the country throughout the whole island, and energetically appeal to their fellow-subjects in Great Britain to render them assistance in their hour of need. Worthy-park estate, in the parish of St. John, had been given up, and the overseer, bookkeeper, and labourers declared that their services would be no longer required, as the proprietor had no means to pay them. They had been, however, permitted to locate on the property. This was an estate that used formerly to export a large quantity of sugar.

The small-pox was spreading in the island. In the parish of St. Anne, where it had only been prevalent one or two weeks, there were upwards of 4000 cases. The great destitution which existed fostered the progress of the disease; in many instances poor persons have died for want of assistance and medical care. In Kingston there were several cases.

From British Guiana there are accounts to the 28th ult. The Court of Policy had adjourned to the 28th of April, when the bill for a reform of the Constitution was to be proceeded with, and would in all probability be passed. In this bill the qualifications for members of the Court of Policy is to be based upon the possession of real property to the value of 1440 dollars per annum, or the ownership of 100 acres of land in actual cultivation. Another arrival of 300 Coolies had taken place from the East Indies, and had been distributed on several estates in the county of Berbice. A proclamation of the Governor of Demerara, dated the 21st of April, fixes the rates of bounty to be allowed for the introduction of immigrants as follows: Madeira, Azores, Western, Canary, and Cape de Verde Islands, Curaçoa, and the Spanish Main, 70 dols. per head; from the Mediterranean Levant, and British North America, 90 dols.; China, and any ports east of Point de Galle, Ceylon, 120 dols.

The Legislature of Barbadoes had been opened on the 28th ult., with a speech from Lieutenant-Governor Hamilton, which, in reverting to the commercial and agricultural prospects of the colony, adverted to the benefits derived from the erection of the new lighthouse, the state of the public roads, and the advantages enjoyed from an inland postal communication.

Advices from Equador and Peru mention the almost certain success of the Flores expedition against the former State.

THE VOYAGE OF THE "GREAT BRITAIN."

The principle of motive power by means of the screw in steam navigation has achieved a great success in the voyage just made to New York from Liverpool by the Great Britain. This majestic vessel left the Mersey on the 1st inst., and, notwithstanding very unfavourable weather, which rendered her sails nearly useless, she accomplished the voyage in 13 days 21 hours. On the 14th she ran a distance of 364 miles in 24 hours—a speed hitherto unattained by screw steamers. As the subject excites much attention at the present moment, we annex the log

May 1.—At 6.10 A.M. left Woolwich Docks, at 10.45 stopped to put owners, friends, and pilot on board steam-tug; at 4 P.M. passed the Nore Light-vessel; at 5.30 passed Argo and ship Hunter. Fine, pleasant weather, sails of no use.

May 2.—Wind northerly, lat. 51 25, long. 2 20, distance run 180 miles. Light, baffling winds throughout, sails of little service.

May 3.—Wind S.W. to N.E., lat. 51 17, long. 45 3', 233 miles. Light winds, and calms throughout.

May 4.—Wind N.E. to S.S.W., lat. 50 45, long. 22 17, 253 miles. Most part light winds and fine weather.

May 5.—Wind S.S.W. to W.S.W., lat. 50 12, long. 27 53, 216 miles. Strong breeze, under reefed topsails and jib.

May 6.—Wind W.S.W. to W., lat. 50 5, long. 32 25, 176 miles. First part strong gales, latter part strong breezes and high seas.

May 7.—Wind W. to S.W. by W., lat. 47 48, long. 37 19, 191 miles. Moderate gales and squally, latter part strong gales.

May 8.—Wind W.N.W., lat. 46 53, long. 46 55, 159 miles. Fresh gales and heavy squalls, very high seas.

May 9.—Wind N.W. to N.N.W., lat. 45 09, long. 45 38, 251 miles. Strong winds and decreasing.

May 10.—Wind S.W. to S.W. by W., lat. 45 21, long. 51 29, 248 miles. Strong winds and hazy; drizzling rain.

May 11.—S.W. by W. to N.W., lat. 44 06, long. 57 04, 260 miles. Strong winds and hazy.

May 12.—Wind N.W. by W., lat. 42 33, long. 62 55, 301 miles. Calm and clear; ends moderate, with rain.

May 13.—Wind S. to E., lat. 41 08, long. 68 27, 264 miles. Fresh breezes and gloomy, with fogs; at 3.45 took pilot on board.

May 14.—Wind W. to N., lat. 40 28, long. 74 02, 256 miles. Strong winds from northward; passed Sandy Hook at 10 50 A.M., making the passage in 13 days 5½ hours.

The passengers, before quitting the ship, presented the following address to the captain:—

On board steam-ship Great Britain, New York Harbour, May 14, 1852.

We, the undersigned passengers on board the Great Britain screw steam-ship, beg to offer our sincere congratulations upon the very successful conclusion of the voyage which you have performed in this steam-ship as far, and, through you, to the spirited proprietors, we desire to tell every person in the Kingdom one of the first or America.

Of the performances of the vessel we feel that we cannot speak too highly. They have been such as we believe must call forth all fair party from the big est naval authorities both of England and America, and that the present mode of transit, a distance of some hundred years in almost perpetual of disaster, and the most emphatic manner.

We also take much pleasure in bearing testimony to your unceasing vigilance and ability in the command of your noble ship, and to the very satisfactory conduct of your officers and crew throughout our passage.

To Captain B. R. Mathews. (Signed by the whole of the passengers.)

THE MAYNOOTH GRANT.—On Wednesday it was stated in a Parliamentary paper, that up to the 31st inst. there had been 85 petitions presented to the House of Commons for the repeal of the Maynooth Grant Act, containing 3,000,000 signatures, and 10 others up to the 1st. Mrs. Hibbert of Norwich, near Exeter, has a garden running from the house to the river. Her daughter, who is the only child and heiress to £5000 a-year, was in the habit of walking in the garden every morning before breakfast, and on the 30th ult. she went out as usual, but, not returning at the usual time, search was made, and she was found lying on the bank of the river quite dead. She had fallen into the water, and was drowned. Her mother, who is a widow, is left entirely alone in the world.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT THE LONDESBOROUGH MILLS.—On Monday night a fire broke out in the extensive oil and cotton mills belonging to Messrs. Atkinson and Co., at Londesborough, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, by which property to the amount of £20,000 was destroyed. The flames were first discovered in the lofty chimney-shaft, which was 120 feet high, and in a few minutes the whole of the extensive premises were in a blaze. The workmen employed in the mills were all at their dinner, and had left the premises a few minutes before the fire was discovered, so that no lives were lost. The engine and hose were soon on the spot, but the supply of water being at a low ebb, the engine was unable to throw a sufficient quantity to be of much use, and the whole of the buildings were consumed.

PROPOSED NEW ORDER OF MINISTERS.—Archdeacon Hale, in his charge to the clergy on Monday, declared his conviction that the time was come for the restoration of another order of ministers, in the form of the deaconate, which, although originally designed for a temporary purpose, was intended by the founders of the Church to be permanent. He urged the revival of the ancient order, as being the best means of bringing the Church into contact with the young and the poor, and as calculated to increase the efficiency of the parochial clergy. The archdeacon's proposal was received with loud cheers by the assembled clergy, and it is said that the matter will be brought before Convocation.

MONEY-ORDER ADVICES.—In order to prevent delay in the payment of money orders, in consequence of the failure of money-order advices reaching postmasters in due course, the Postmaster-General has given orders to every postmaster, who does not obtain advices as soon as he expects, to write immediately to the office from which the order was sent, in order that proper notice may be given of the neglect, and that the error may be rectified as promptly as possible.

DEATH OF THE HON. J. NS TALBOT, Q.C.—On the assembly of the counties on the Watford Water Bench on Wednesday morning, at the House of Correction, Mr. Serjeant Wrangham, in a very affecting address, stated that he was unable to proceed with the business in consequence of the death of his brother-in-law, the Hon. John Talbot, Q.C., who was also engaged. He further stated that the melancholy event occurred on the previous night at Brighton. The information was received with deep regret by the bar and the hon. members present, and the committee almost immediately afterwards broke up.

A

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT OSBORNE.

The week just closed has been passed by the Queen and the Prince Consort in domestic retirement, at Osborne. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent and her Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge have alone shared the Royal hospitality.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived at Osborne on Saturday afternoon, and remained until Wednesday.

On Monday, at an early hour, the band of the Royal Marines attended at Osborne and performed a matinade in honour of her Majesty's birthday. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge arrived on a visit to the Queen and the Prince on Monday afternoon. The Tyrolese singers arrived from London, and had the honour of singing before her Majesty and the Royal family both in the morning and in the afternoon.

On Tuesday, it being the birthday of her Royal Highness the Princess Helena, the band of the Royal Marines attended and played in front of Osborne.

On Wednesday their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Kent and the Duke of Cambridge took leave of her Majesty and the Prince, and returned to London.

The Court returned to Buckingham Palace yesterday (Friday) from the Isle of Wight.

There will be a grand concert at Buckingham Palace on Friday, the 4th of June. On Monday, the 7th proximo, the Court will proceed to Windsor Castle for the Ascot race week. Her Majesty will honour the course with her presence on Tuesday and Thursday, the 8th and 10th proximo.

Her Majesty has signified her intention of giving another State ball on Tuesday, the 16th of June.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent returned to her residence, Clarence-house, St. James's, shortly before three o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, from Osborne, Isle of Wight. Her Royal Highness travelled from Southampton by the London and South-Western Railway to the Waterloo terminus, and was attended to by Lady Hardy and Sir George Grower.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Montpensier, accompanied by a numerous retinue, have arrived at Claremont, on a visit to the ex-Queen Marie Amélie, from Spain. The ex-Queen was at Dover to meet the Duke and Duchess.

His Excellency the French Ambassador and the Countess Walewski entertained a distinguished party at dinner on Monday evening, at the residence of the Embassy in Grosvenor-square.

His Excellency Count de Colloredo Wallsee, who has been appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court from the Emperor of Austria, is the son of the Count of Bohemia, and is shortly expected in England to assume his duties as the Imperial Minister.

The Duke and Duchess of Northumberland gave a grand banquet, on Saturday evening, to a very large party of the aristocracy. The Duchess, at a later period of the evening, threw open a portion of the splendid suite of apartments at Northumberland-house to the fashionable company and leading aristocracy. The Duke of Wellington honoured the Duchess with his company.

The Countess of Malmesbury had a brilliant reception on Wednesday evening, at the official residence of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in Downing-street.

The Countess Dowager of Erroll has arrived at her residence in St. James's Palace. Lady Isabella Countess of Errol remains on a visit with the Duchess of Inverness, at Kensington Palace.

Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston entertained a distinguished party at dinner on Saturday evening, at their mansion in Carlton Gardens. The noble Viscountess had afterwards a "reception" at which all the rank and fashion of the metropolis were assembled. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge paid marked respect to her Ladyship on this occasion.

Brownlow Hall, the princely mansion of the Earl and Countess of Ellesmere, was again the scene of brilliant festivities on Monday night, the occasion being a grand ball given by Lady Charlotte Duncombe, at whose disposal the house had been placed by her Lady Ellesmere's noble relative. The invitations to the ball had been issued by Earl and Countess Amherst, the parents of the attractive young lady, and upwards of a thousand members of the aristocracy and fashionable world attended to pay their respects to her Ladyship.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—The marriage of the Lady Adeline Peyronnet, daughter of the late Earl of Caledonia, with Lister Kay, eldest son of Sir John Lister Kay, Bart., of Denby grange, Yorkshire, took place on Tuesday last, at St. George's Church, Hanover-square, in the presence of a few friends, at the request of the bride's relatives. The ceremony was performed by the Lord Bishop of Worcester, assisted by the Rev. H. Howarth, rector of St George's. After the marriage, the Countess of Cottenham gave a breakfast, at her mansion in Park-lane. Covers were laid for sixty, the guests being composed of the immediate relatives of the two families.

KNOLE PARK.—On Monday last, the infant son of Mr. Hastings Russell, M.P., and Lady Isabella Hastings, was baptized in the private chapel at Knole, near Sevenoaks, the seat of the Earl and Countess Amherst. There were present at the interesting ceremony the Earl and Countess Amherst, the Earl and Countess Delaware, the Marchioness of Salisbury, Lady Wilbraham Bootle,

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

The grand military fêtes at Paris have had results upon public opinion very different from those which their founders and concoctors seem to have anticipated. The Parisian shopkeepers and hotelkeepers are the parties who have been best satisfied, but the mass of the intellect of France, that opposes to the present ruthless despotism the inertia of its passive resistance, has also had some reason to rejoice at the apathy of the soldiery, and the consequent non-proclamation of the Empire. Louis Napoleon ... of the army, and ... that it would ... very prudently resolved to keep quiet. But the Count de Chambord, as prudently took advantage of the circumstance, and of the concurrent refusal of many of the most distinguished and most able Frenchmen to take the oath of fidelity to the Dictator, ... to issue a manifesto to the rapidly-increasing number of his adherents, and to prescribe the course of policy which he and they should pursue. To take no oaths, but to mix with the people; to interest themselves in local and municipal affairs, and to support the present Government against anarchy—but against anarchy alone—is the advice which the heir of the Bourbons has tendered. The consequences has been a change in the tactics of the President. Hitherto it was the Republicans, moderate and ... that were the Orleanists, had to bear the brunt of the Louis Napoleon ... the family of Louis Philippe were robbed, it was the republicans who were shipped to Lambessa and Cayenne, it was their newspapers that were suppressed, and it was they who were hunted into prison or into exile. The letter of the Count de Chambord has directed the stream of vengeance into a fresh channel, and the turn of the Legitimists has arrived. One of the chief promises made by the present Ministry to reconcile the country to its existence, and to atone for its possession of power as a Protectionist Government when it had made up its mind to abandon Protection, was, that it would devote itself to the consideration of practical and useful measures. Lord Derby laid much stress on this point in his first speech as Prime Minister, and promised that in the present session of Parliament he and his colleagues would "avoid unnecessary party questions, and apply themselves to three great measures," which the country had so long sought—measures of legal and social reform." It seems, however, that the promise is not to be binding. Not one of the promised measures, unless the disfranchisement of St. Alban's and the passing of a Militia Bill can be considered of the number, has become or is likely to become law under his Lordship's auspices. Chancery Reform—the glorious boon of the many which the country was led to expect, and which of ... would ... the ... to the Administration a ... which ... to the lot of modern statesmanship to deserve—has already been left to its fate amid the random chances of political warfare. The bill for the enfranchisement of copyholds threatens to be delayed in the same manner, not only without an effort on the part of the Ministers to save it, but with a positive obstruction from the Lord Chancellor. If the Ministers and the highest legal functionaries of the realm objected to the principle of the bill, of which the second reading was moved on Tuesday night by Lord Cranworth, the country might forgive them for throwing impediments in its way; but this is not the case. ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

(THIRD NOTICE.)

J. WINTERHALTER has a picture of considerable dimensions, occupying a prominent position in the middle room—"Florinde" (383)—which, though undoubtedly exhibiting great artistic power, both in regard to composition and most brilliant colouring, still does not please us. The subject—a lady, by her nymphs, all more or less en déshabille, and preparing for a bath in the lake, on the edge of which they are assembled. The attitudes are all very carefully studied, for variety and individual effect; but the misfortune is, that the evidence of all this study is too apparent. The flesh, moreover, though very delicate, is not true, either in texture or colour, to nature, having something of the appearance of wax-work; and the anatomy of many of the figures, particularly that of the female on the right hand, with her back turned, is not correct. The faces are undoubted by beautiful, selected from the best models and improved upon; but the arbitr ary side-lights, under the influence of which they are viewed, give them a stagey appearance, which, heightened by meretricious colouring in the drapery, destroys the romantic charm which the incident, in truly poetical hands, was capable of. This picture, therefore, attractive and dazzling as it is in many respects, is not one which we can accept as an example for imitation.

"The May Queen preparing for the Dance" (370), by F. W. Poole, is a charming little morceau, fresh and healthy in the flesh tints, and naïve in character. This little village belle, though she occupies but a small nook on the walls, and is surrounded by many beauties of larger pretension, must not be passed by without a smile of recognition. The same artist has another work of some pretension, "Martin Luther singing to her father, Pericles" (411), which possesses considerable merit.

Amongst the most successful pieces of colouring, occupying a middle station between the highly-wrought productions of the Pre-Raphaelite school and the more sober and attuned style of the later Italian schools, we may point to a small picture by J. Reed (435), entitled "an attempt at Venetian harmony," and so entitled probably as much in reference to the colouring as the subject, which is that of a group of cavaliers and ladies "setting in" for amateur concert in the balcony of a mansion in Venice. One gentleman plays upon a guitar, whilst the others join in harmony with his strains. A spirit of intelligence and animation pervades the various characters in the group, who, however, preserve the dignity observable in the works of the Venetian school. The colouring is rich and sound in tone.

J. C. Horsley has two clever little pieces in the genre style, of which we like best the madrigal, "Keep your time" (237). This is a family group of mixed ages, industriously performing a madrigal. "Keep your time!" exclaims a middle-aged gentleman to a young pair, who seem to have forgotten time in mutual vows of eternal devotion. Everything about this picture is in very perfect keeping, and nicely finished. The other piece, "Master Slender" (220) where he excuses himself from dining—"I am not a hungry," is upon a more ambitious and difficult subject, and the artist may be excused if he does not fulfil the anticipations of all Shakspearean critics.

"Undine" (225), by T. Sampson; a very pretty little picture. The face is beautiful, and the golden hair more soft and sunny than ever fell to the lot of mere mortal. The dress is of a rich blue brocaded silk, which might have been rendered even more water-like than it is; and so have justified the passage—"at first they imagined it to be a spouting fountain,"

Lance has one of those gorgeous fruit-pieces (227) in which he has so often excelled—

> The marshall'd feast,
> Served up in hall with sewers and seneschals.

The service of gold and silver plate are of regal splendour, and the seneschal the very high-priest of a dessert-service. At the same time, we must say, that for many of the ingredients—the pine apple, to wit—we fancy we have seen them before.

"The Castle of Ischia" (213), by G. Jones, is a very spirited representation of one of the most dashing subjects amongst the modern arms. The figure of Sir Charles Napier, surrounded by his staff, is truly characteristic, and the portrait excellent as a likeness. In the disposition of the troops the artist has shown a good deal of the panoramic character of the event, supplied by the distinguished General just named. Prominent in action are the brave 22d, in line, firing upon the enemy, who have their position in the dry bed of the river; to their right the artillery, who have effected a breach in the wall of the Bulwarks, or hunting-ground; and the 12th and 28th, the 1st Grenadiers, the Schnde Horse, and 8th Bengal Cavalry are coming into action. The Beloochi army, amounting to 35,000 men, extends in enormous masses in front of the British line. In the centre is Major M'Murdo, fighting with Jemadar Mahomed Khan he killed. This picture will be viewed with great interest by all who watch the history of our arms in India.

We turn now to examine a few of the contributions in the Landscape Department, which we feel we have too long neglected; and amongst which one specimen of remarkable excellence claims—

Roberts has a view of Venice (34), broad, comprehensive, and real in aspect, with a brilliancy of touch for which this admirable artist is unrivalled. Hs Antwerp (69) is very different in character, but remarkable in its way for delicate handling, more especially in the architectural details. But the greatest triumph of the artist is that achieved in his "Interior of the Cathedral of St. Stephen's, Vienna" (371)—a most ingenious composition. The picture is long and narrow in form, and the view is circumscribed by a low wide arch stretching across the upper part of the canvas. The effect which might naturally be expected to attend such an arrangement would be that of depression; but so skilfully has the artist combated this natural tendency of his materials, that the very reverse is the actual result. As it is, the arch serves as a sort of frame for the rest of the picture—a wide and splendid cathedral interior, with the high altar in the extreme distance, and the various chapels, with their gorgeous artistic decorations, filling the perspective on either side. The view is most interesting, particularly as regards the light diffused over the spacious pavement is precisely that which would fall from the clerestory of a grand Gothic cathedral; and the eye, instinctively aspiring upwards, almost pictures to the mind the vast vaulted area of the transept, for the roof is shut out from view. The other side, under side arches, are glimpses of the approaches from the exterior, and the external air, which, whilst they contrast with the dim religious light within, confirm the truthfulness of the general design.

Stanfield has two pictures, each different from the others in character. In the "Bay of Baiæ, from Lake Averno" (48), we have a classic spot, full of poetic interest, treated with kindred classic feeling. The stagnant and pestiferous lake now occupies the site of the proud city of villas, and a thin mist hangs about the desolate but still beautiful spot. In the "Port of La Rochelle" (120) we have the more vigorous handling which tells of healthy, active life. A light breeze agitates the water in the mouth of the old historic harbour, before which the various craft scud and bend, producing an animated scene, endued with the atmosphere of reality. The "View of Capri, in the Gulf of Salerno," takes a medium place between the two others—a warmer region than the last, and without the abstract associations of the first.

E. W. Cooke presents us with two "Views in Venice" (405 and 526)—one of them introducing the Doge's palace, of course, in both of which we admire his masterly outline and richness of detail, but without the tone and colour accomplished by Stanfield's magical atmospheres. Anthony has a very fine study of "Beech Trees and Fern" (107), in which the various hues, "russet, and scarlet, and yellow," of forest scenery towards autumn are harmoniously combined, and in which we also admire the skilful manner in which he pierces the thickest foliage with occasional glimpses of the sky. The scene is one of genuine nature; but why always the circular frame by which Mr. Anthony appears to have such a fondness? This shape is allowable occasionally as the conception when the subject suits, but should not be adopted as the rule, and is especially objectionable in places of large dimensions, like the present, being utterly destructive of breadth and simplicity of effect.

Cooper and Lee have some beautiful works, some joints and others sole productions; but we must defer notice of them, as well as some by Linnell and others in this line, till a future notice.

THE GREAT EXHIBITION.—The Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 have presented their first report to the Home Secretary. The balance in hand, on the 29th of February, invested in Exchequer bills, and to the credit of the Commissioners at the Bank of England and the bank of Messrs. Coutts, amounted to £213,305, but there are expenses to be paid out of it. They are unable to say what the actual surplus of the Exhibition funds will be after all liabilities have been discharged, and the accounts finally wound up, but they have no reason to suppose that the net surplus will be less than the sum estimated by them in their report to her Majesty of the 6th of November last, viz. £150,000.

THE OXFORD UNIVERSITY COMMISSION.

The report of her Majesty's Commissioners appointed to inquire into the state, discipline, studies, and revenues of the University and Colleges of Oxford, has been printed this week, by order of the House of Commons. The report, with the evidence and appendix, extends over an enormous blue book of 367 folio pages. After reporting in detail upon all the subjects embraced in the inquiry, the Commissioners recommend in reference to—

THE STATE AND DISCIPLINE OF THE UNIVERSITY.—That the Caroline Cycle for the election of proctors should be abandoned. These functionaries are, for the future, to be elected by congregation, and to hold office for two years, one acting one year, and the limitation as to eligibility is to cease. It is proposed that proctors shall be re-eligible, and that the office shall lose its privileges in the appointment of examiners, select preacher-, and certain professors, as well as in adjudging prizes. As regards residence, the report recommends, but suggests that the distinction between noblemen, gentlemen commoners, and commoners be abolished. Certain sumptuary laws as to the recovery of debts and delivery of bills are recommended—the Vice-Chancellor's Court taking the form of County Courts. The Commissioners further propose that new halls be founded, and that unattached members of the University be allowed to reside, under proper precautions, in lodgings, without connexion with any college. Oaths to observe the existing statutes and to perform academical acts are to be absolute-y prohibited. Subscription to the Articles at matriculation is discontinued; and a "short form of prayer to be used in college chapels, after the example of chapels in bishops' palaces," is limited at. To require the students to be communicants is designated "a mischievous practice." The schemes already ventilated in Parliament and elsewhere for founding affiliated halls, for establishing Independent and more economical halls, and for sanctioning lodgings in connexion with colleges—are all dismissed in favour of the suggestion for licensing Independent lodgings for additional students unconnected with colleges.

THE STUDIES.—In reference to this subject the report recommends that a preliminary examination should take place before matriculation, and that, during the latter part of the academical course, students should be permitted to select their branches of study. A large development of the professional element is contemplated. Old professorships are to be amalgamated, or increased in number and value—new chairs are to be created—and more duties appressed. Where existing endowments are insufficient, certain professorships are to be placed in different colleges, and endowed with one, two, or more fel owships, the holders of which may, in some cases, be married. £500 per annum is suggested as the value of the higher appointments. These professors are to be divided into four groups, corresponding to a proposed diversation of the University studies—viz. A, Theology; B, Mental Philosophy, Philology, and Jurisprudence and History; D, Mathematical and Physical Science. The appointment of each new professors is to rest with the Crown—that of Margaret Professor and of Ireland Professor of Exegesis, as well as of those whose election is now in Convocation, being vested for the future in congregation. Sub-professors or lecturers are to be appointed in each department; and on the College tutors would devolve the sort of instruction which is now usually supplied by private tutors. The professors are also to receive fees.

THE REVENUES.—The third branch of the report is on the revenues of Oxford. An annual balance-sheet—a revision of fellowships—the application of University funds to University purposes—and the remission of stamp duties on matriculations, degrees, and certificates, as well as a relaxation of the Mortmain Act—comprise the subjects on which, under this head, advice is tendered by the Commission.

THE COLLEGES.—As with the University, so with the colleges—all oaths imposed by founders and by later statutes, and all oaths, declarations, and promises to observe statutes, or to maintain secrecy on college affairs, or not to originate nor consent to changes in statutes, are to be directly and positively prohibited. All fellowships, with certain exceptions as to New College and St. John's, are to be thrown open to all Bachelors of Arts. Some quirks of the Studentships of Christchurch are still to be limited to Westminster scholars. Restrictions as to the tenure of fellowships, and obligations to take holy orders, or to proceed to degrees in particular faculties, are to be abolished. Fellows are not to be allowed to marry, with the exception of the new University professorfellows. Fellowships, so far as may be practicable, are to have a maximum of £300, and a minimum of £100 each. Advowsons are to be abolished, and separate foundations in the same college to be united. In some of the larger and wealthier colleges, certain fellowships are to be appropriated to the new University professors—Brasenose professorships being elected by the several societies, but the fellowship following the professorship. On the revenues of Corpus it is proposed to quarter two such professors, and to endow them with three fellowships each; at Magdalen, six professorships are contemplated, by the suspension of twelve fellowships; at Merton, two professorships, by the suspension of six fellowships; at All Souls, four professorships, at the cost of four fellowships; and at Queen's and New College are each to maintain one professor. All scholarships —excepting those at Jesus, and certain appropriated school scholarships are to be thrown open to all the Queen's subjects under the age of nineteen, for whatever kith, kin, clime, colour, or place of education, and to be tenable for five years, and in no case to lead to a fellowship without renewed competition and examination. Heads of colleges may be chosen from the whole body of Masters of Arts, without any proviso that the new head shall be elected from the members (the particular society over which he is called upon to preside. A preference, however, is not always limited in the report in favour of the plan of appointing all heads of colleges directly by the Crown. Visitors of colleges are to visit, and heads of colleges to furnish annual reports to visitors, which, again, are to be transmitted to the Crown.

CHURCH ESTATES.

The Church Estates Commissioners have made their first general report, and it has been presented this week to both Houses of Parliament by command of her Majesty. It is as follows:

TO THE RIGHT HON. HER MAJESTY'S PRINCIPAL SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT, &c.

We, the Church Estates Commissioners, have the honour to make our first general report of our proceedings under the act passed in the seventh and eighth years of the reign of her Majesty, chapter 94, and intituled "An Act to facilitate the Management and Improvement of Episcopal and Capitular Estates in England."

Under this act any ecclesiastical corporation may, with the approval in writing of the Church Estates Commissioners (who shall pay due regard to the just and reasonable claims of the present holders of lands under lease, or otherwise, arising from the long-continued custom of renewal), sell to any lessee the interest of such corporation, and may enfranchise any copyhold lands, and may purchase the lessee's interest, or deal by way of exchange or otherwise, as may be agreed upon between the parties. Certain sub-lessees are to be considered as entitled to the privileges of lessees.

The act further provides, that the surplus moneys arising from transactions under this act shall be appropriated to the common fund of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England

The short time that has elapsed since the passing of the act has afforded little opportunity for acquainting the extent to which its powers are likely to be made avail able, but we see no reason to doubt that it will be found very useful to facilitate the settlement of the Church leasehold question to the satisfaction both of the lessors and lessees.

Proposals to sell reversions, or to purchase leasehold interests, have been submitted by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and by the Bishops of London and Norwich, the Dean and Chapter of Durham, and the Vicars Choral of Lichfield; and we have reason to believe that similar applications will shortly come before us from several other ecclesiastical corporations.

We have also received one proposal for the enfranchisement of five copyhold tenements under the see of Norwich.

No purchase or sale has yet been concluded, but the several transactions are progressing satisfactorily towards completion. We have the honour to be, your faithful and obedient servants,

CHICHESTER
HENRY GOULBURN.
JOHN GEORGE SHAW LEFEVRE.

5, Whitehall Place, March, 1852.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—The following preferments and appointments have recently been made:—Rectories: The Rev. Frederick Crossdale Johnson, to St. George Colegate, Norwich; the Rev W. H. Jones, to Llandio, Glamorgan; the Rev. T. Taylor, to Boscobel, Wiltshire. Vicarages: The Rev. Thomas Richardson, to Fishguard, Pembroke-hire; the Rev. C. R. Fox, to Gilmorton, Lincolnshire; the Rev. Thomas Sylvester, to Bunk npham; the Rev. F. B. Kling, to Burstwick, in the East Riding of Yorkshire; the Rev. C. D. Francis, to Tyseo, with Compton Wynyates annexed, near Shipston-on-Stour; the Rev. W. Dacre, to Irthington, Cumberland.

The western coast of Africa is erected into an episcopal see, embracing in its jurisdiction Sierra Leone, the Gold Coast, and the Gambia, which are all placed under the spiritual superintendence of the most Rev. Owen Emerie Vidal, D.D., of Sierra Leone, who will be the first Bishop.

TESTIMONIALS.—The following clergymen have recently received testimonials of esteem and affection:—The Rev. R. Lloyd, from the inhabitants of Christchurch, Hants, on his departure; the Rev. John Burn Austin, their late curate, from the parishioners of Wyke Regis; the Rev. A. Wilson, principal, from the masters and mistresses trained in the Westminster Institution; the Rev. W. Jardon, late incumbent, from the trustees and congregation of St. Ann's, Aigburth, near Liverpool; the Rev. John Davies, rector of St. Clement, Worcester, from the members of the St. Clement Benefit Society, Worcester; the Rev. John Hill, late Vice-Principal of St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, from a number of the members of that hall, his former pupils, and some private friends; the Rev. T. Harris, from the congregation of Kilvey; the Rev. H. Jones, from his parishioners.

On Sunday morning his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury delivered a sermon at the chapel of the Lock Hospital, in aid of the asylum attached to the institution. At the conclusion a collection was made amounting to £70 In the evening the Rev. Capel Molyneux, M.A., advocated the same benevolent cause, when a further collection was made, making an aggregate of £127.

SYDENHAM.—The foundation-stone of the new church near Forest-hill, Sydenham, was laid on Saturday afternoon last by the Earl of Dartmouth.

CHURCH BUILDING SOCIETY.—On Monday the Anniversary Meeting of the Incorporated Church Building Society was held at the Willis's-rooms, St. James's-street, Mal.; the Archbishop of Canterbury in the Chair. The report stated that a number of applications made to the society for aid, in the year ending 31st March, 1852, was 121. Grants were made in 103 cases, being for the erection of 38 additional churches, the rebuilding of 18, and the enlargement or alteration of 49 existing churches. The amount contributed from the society's funds towards these objects was £14,609; the works which had been reported as completed with aid from the society were 42 new churches, 7 churches rebuilt, and 39 enlarged or otherwise altered, including, in most cases, very extensive repairs. 26,143 additional seats were thus secured, including 23,534 set apart for the use of the poorer inhabitants. The amount contributed by the society in the course of the year on account of the grants claimed was £13,373; to which it must be added, that ten committee were, on the 31st December last, engaged for the further sum of £36,533, which sum was covered by the funds now in hand. The amount received by the society during the last year from its ordinary sources of income was £9157 18s. 8d., which included £ 798 8s. 7d. received under the Queen's letter issued last year. On the motion of the Duke of Buccleuch, seconded by the Bishop of Oxford the report was adopted.

CONSECRATION OF HOLY TRINITY CHURCH, WESTMINSTER (BY VAUXHALL BRIDGE).—The ceremony of consecrating this church, which has been erected solely at the expense of the Marquis of Bantinck took place on Tuesday, the Lord Bishop of London officiating, assisted by a large body of the clergy, among whom was noticed the Venerable Archdeacon Bentinck, and the other canons of Westminster, Dr. Wordsworth, Dr. Trere, Dr. Wanley, Rev. Mr. Repton, Rev. Sir William Cope, Rev. Mr. Jennings, Hon. and Rev. Lord John Thynne, Rev. Mr. William and Lady Face Wood, Miss Burdett Coutts, Lord Robert Grosvenor, M.P., and several members of the Bentinck family. The church has been built, as a ready stated, at the entire expense of the Rev. H. G. E. Bentinck, archdeacon and canon at Westminster, at a cost or about £ 2,000.

A contest took place last week in Brighton on the church-rate question. As the rate had been refused for eight years past, there seemed little prospect of one being carried this year. The rate, however, was carried by a majority of 1201 against 1347.

LAW AND POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

LUMLEY v. WAGNER AND GYE.—THE OPERA HOUSE.

In this case, as has already been noticed more than once, an injunction had been obtained by the plaintiff, Lumley, to prevent the defendant Mdlle. Wagner, the German opera singer, from performing at Her Majesty's Theatre, which belongs to the defendant Gye, in violation of an agreement which he (Lumley) had entered into with Mdlle. Wagner, and which bound that lady to perform only at Her Majesty's Theatre, in the Haymarket, during the present season. The case had been originally heard before the Vice-Chancellor Sir James Parker, and the injunction prayed for granted. Against this injunction the defendants had appealed to the Lord Chancellor, on the ground that the terms of the original contract had not been completely fulfilled by Mr. Lumley. The appeal was opened before the Lord Chancellor on Saturday last, and was resumed on Monday, on Wednesday, when, after a lengthened argument on both sides, his Lordship gave judgment, dismissing the appeal, and confirming the original injunction.

SUMMER CIRCUITS OF THE JUDGES.

On Thursday morning the Judges of the several Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer assembled, according to custom, in the Exchequer Chamber, for the purpose of arranging and determining the several circuits upon which they would proceed to hold the various sessions of Over and Terminer and General Gaol Delivery in and for the several counties of England and Wales, when the following arrangements were finally agreed to:—

NORTHERN.—The Right Hon. Lord Campbell and Mr. Justice Wightman.

HOME.—The Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Sir John Jervis, and Mr. Justice Maule.

MIDLAND.—The Lord Chief Baron, Sir Frederick Pollock, and Mr. Baron Parke.

NORFOLK.—Mr. Baron Alderson and Mr. Justice Coltman.

OXFORD.—Mr. Justice Crowsdell and Mr. Justice Williams.

WESTERN.—Mr. Baron Platt and Mr. Baron Martin.

NORTH WALES AND CHESTER.—Mr. Justice Erle and Mr. Justice Cresswell.

SOUTH WALES AND CHESTER.—Mr. Justice Crompton.

Mr. Justice Talfourd joins Mr. Justice Crompton at Chester.

ROTHSCHILD v. THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM-PACKET COMPANY.—In the Court of Exchequer, on Saturday last, a rule nisi obtained in this case was reversed by the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron. The action, which was tried some time since, was one respecting the gold dust robbery; the object being to recover £2,000 in the hands of the Bank of German books of gold dust, which were lost on their way from Southampton to London by the South-Western Railway. The verdict given on that occasion was in favour of the defendants, the Lord Chief Baron intimating that the Court was unanimous in their opinion, that the direction, which had been given to the jury at the trial in favour of the defendants, ought to have been in favour of the plaintiff.

In the Bail Court, on Tuesday, an action was brought before Mr. Justice Wightman, by a Mrs. Andrews, a milliner, residing at Mortimer-street, Cavendish-square, against a Mr. Richard Batley, a gentleman residing at Maida Vale, for an assault. It appeared that the plaintiff had married a young lady of the name of Forsyth, having also attended the ball, to her great attention of the defendant, who was present, and who subsequently became her accepted lover. The plaintiff having communicated the fact to the young gentleman's father, the defendant subsequently entered Mrs. Andrews's house, and assaulted her for interfering with and commanding the assault complained of. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff—damages, £5.

In the Westminster police-court on Wednesday, a lady, said to be the wife of a gentleman belonging to the Army and Navy Club, and late an officer of the Dragoon Guards, appeared, accompanied by her two children, before Mr. Arnold, in obedience to a request made by that magistrate, in consequence of a letter he had previously received, informing him that she was living in the neighbourhood of Brompton in a most deplorably destitute condition, without the necessary food or apparel. She gave the following extraordinary statement of her history and misfortunes:—She had been in early life married to a colonel in the army, from whom she had borne two children, who unhappily became fatherless about for years ago. Shortly afterwards she became acquainted with her present husband, and married him at Brompton Church, although he was a Roman Catholic. He was at that time a commission in the army, but shortly afterwards disposed of it, and she travelled with him for some months upon the Continent. In the early part of last year he returned through her to England, and desired her to proceed to Brompton, where he had engaged a furnished house for her occupation, with her plate and jewels, and was ultimately obliged to leave the house taken for her in consequence of being no longer able to pay the rent. Driven by dire necessity, she took a mean lodging in the same neighbourhood, and there dragged out a wretched existence while she and her children had any article remaining worth disposing of, and had now arrived at the last extremity, a houseless and penniless wanderer, and was rescued from the misery by the humanity of a poor carman and his wife, who afforded her part of their scanty fare, and whose size was permitted to lie down and take what repose she might after he went out to his labour in the morning. A poor person having told her that Mr. Arnold was the man to apply to for advice and assistance, she had early yesterday morning left her children with the carman's wife, and walked to Mr. Arnold's house, and on his inquiries, that her husband had written to her several times in terms of affection, and she was totally unable to account for his desertion of her. He was at present staying with his mother, who was averse to their union, and who had expressed her displeasure at the family solicitor having afforded her some assistance from the proceeds of their estate. Mr. Arnold inquired whether her husband had been made fully acquainted with her destitute condition? The lady replied that he had, but no notice had been taken of the matter. Mr. Arnold then wrote to the family solicitor, but he said he could not interfere. Mr. Arnold inquired the age of her husband. The lady replied that he was her junior by five years. She met never, by word or deed, given the slightest cause for his unkindness. The magistrate commiserated her unfortunate situation, and recommended her application to apply to the family solicitor. He then handed her a sovereign from the poor-box, and required her to look in again on Friday next. The lady curtsied and acknowledgments, and withdrew with her two children.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

THE ball given on the 23d, at the Ministere des Travaux Publiques, affords us an opportunity of describing to our readers the newest fashions for bals, which will, as usual, shine in London, Baden Baden, Vichy, and the Pyrenees. The return of the fashions worn during the Empire such as head-dresses à la Grecque, bringing to our recollection the bad taste of that period, had been for some time apprehended; but we are happy to learn that the flattery will not be entertained.

Bonnets are worn almost entirely covered with small flowers, such as polyanthus, roses pompons, &c. The fronts and crowns are literally covered with flowers without leaves—a branch on each side, and inside are bunches that are lengthened so as to come round the face. The bonnets this year are very much trimmed, the face seeming buried in a mass of flowers, ribbon, tulle, blonde, &c.

For half-dress, percales, book-muslins, and printed muslins are worn, with flounces or stripes; they resemble barège and mousseline de soie, and have the advantage of being light wear in very warm weather.

PROCESSION OF THE FORTS DE LA HALLE, AT PARIS, CARRYING THE BUST OF THE PRINCE PRESIDENT.

They are printed in different ways, so as to make up as "redingotes" for morning; the bodies being also printed for this make. "Albanaises" are likewise printed crosswise in various widths. All these dresses are made up full in the waist, and worn with long sashes; but they cannot be made up with tight bodies.

For the country we cannot say too much in favour of white muslins: they wash admirably. Bows of ribbon, tastefully placed, form an elegant dress. Dark ribbons completely change the appearance of the dress; with pink or blue petticoats the dress appears metamorphosed for travelling.

The number of flounces varies from three to seven; they are scolloped large, round or pointed. At present much trimming is worn, coloured or white: for example, a tulle dress, looped up with bows of pink, blue, or cherry colour, dark figured ribbon, or even Scotch plaid: this fashion we believe to be imported from England. Organdie is also worn with this same trimming. We have seen one with five flounces. A pink ribbon is drawn through the hem of each flounce, at the last making a bow, with long ends, which join the next flounce; bows of ribbon on the shoulders, with streamers, completing an elegant dress. On a petticoat of white taffetas are four skirts of tulle, also white, each looped up by blue ribbon, with nœuds contraries—of course, smaller as they reach the waist. Another dress in tulle: Four jupes, two pink and two white; the pink being the hem longer than the white; the hem to be eight centimetres in width. The body is bouillonné de rose et de blanc. The coiffure is of roses the same tint.

A new article for dress has appeared—la batiste de laine. It is plain et sec; particularly adapted for travelling. It is made à disposition, and wears extremely well.

Headdress is worn of natural flowers, velvet, ribbon, and lace; with a dress of worked muslin, two volans, pointed body, bows and streamers on shoulders. Berthe, two rows of lace on the chest; a bouquet of natural flowers, to match the coiffure. Bouquets are worn smaller than last year. A favourite capotte is made in vegetable straw, trimmed in cérise: inside, flowers of the same colour.

The mantelet is made up in taffetas, with rows of narrow velvet: volant of lace. Albanaise or Valencias, grey ground, red and cérise stripes.

Bonnets, straw and horsehair, of different patterns.

PROCESSION OF THE FORTS DE LA HALLE.

This pseudo-classic ceremony took place at Paris on the 16th inst., when the Busts of the President of the Republic intended for the Central Markets were carried in procession to the Church of St. Eustache. After the band advanced the Forts de la Halle, carrying a Bust of the President, and followed by 100 young girls, dressed in white robes, with blue scarfs, and crowns of white roses on their heads. Then came a number of other Busts. Next walked the Prefect of Police, the Mayor and Deputy Mayors of the arrondissement, the other civil authorities, and the officers of the Municipal and National Guards. Mass was subsequently celebrated, after which the Archbishop delivered a short address. The cortège then left the church, installed the busts in the different markets and, in the evening, the Dames de la Halle gave a ball in the Linen Hall.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

THE BORNESE PIRATES.

HEAD HUNTING NATIVE OF BORNEO.

We have been favoured by a Correspondent with the following narrative, with Sketches, of the Expedition of H.M.S. Cleopatra to Borneo; dated Singapore, March 16, 1852:—

In consequence of the Dolphin, a small trading schooner, having been attacked in Maludu Bay, on September 13th last, and her captain (Robertson), supercargo (Burns, a grandson of the famous poet), and five of her crew having been murdered by some pirates that were afterwards found to belong to Tunku, the Cleopatra was ordered to proceed there, in company with the Hon. Company's steamer Semiramis and Pluto, and obtain satisfaction from this lawless race. The particulars of the capture were as follows. The Dolphin, when off the entrance of Maludu Bay, on a trading voyage, was visited on the evening of September 11 by three small native prahus, who asked permission to trade; but being too late, were ordered to wait till the next morning and anchor at a respectable distance off the vessel, a strict watch being kept throughout the night to prevent surprise. In the morning one boat was allowed alongside, and three men came on board and brought pearls for barter, which were being looked at by Burns in the waist of the vessel, when another man brought up a roll of matting, which he laid hold of for the purpose of inspecting, when the man drew a sword that was secreted in the centre of it, and cut his neck severely. Robertson seeing this, ran forward for protection (not a single arm of any description being on deck), when a general attack was at once made, and the poor captain was speared to death at the bowsprit end, where he had run to ask for quarter. Five of his crew were also murdered; and most probably all would have been sacrificed, had not the remainder, who had run aloft, asked for quarter, with the understanding that they would navigate the vessel, on which condition they were spared. The pirates then took her to Labuk Bay, where she was boarded by the Chief of that place, Shereef Yassin, who, on recognising the vessel, captured her from the pirates, after having krised the greater part of them, and delivered her up to the Pluto, which was sent in search of the vessel the moment the news arrived at Labuan. The Chief and four of the pirates managed to escape, and made the best of their way, it is supposed, to Tunku, to which place they all belonged, and were about to take the vessel.

KINI BALU, AND ENTRANCE TO THE RIVER.

The Cleopatra sailed from Singapore on the 10th of January, and arrived at Labuan on the 20th, where she was joined by the Semiramis and Pluto, the latter vessel bringing Mr. St. John (the political agent for Borneo, in the absence of Sir James Brooke) and Captain Brooke from Sarawak, to accompany us on the expedition.

THE ATTACK.

We started again on the 27th, and proceeded alone to Gaya Bay (leaving the steamers behind to complete coaling) to pay a visit to the Chief at that place, Pangran Madond, for the purpose of cautioning him against assisting the Illanun pirates, which he had been in the habit of doing, particularly in selling them a boat in which they went pirating. To give this as much effect as possible, five boats (barge, pinnace, first and second cutter, and gig), proceeded up the river on the 31st to his residence at Mengatal, and on arriving were saluted with twenty-one guns from a battery o

THE FUNERAL AT SEA.

two guns (breech-loading pounders) one of which had no carriage, and was fired as it was lying down on the grass, and which was returned by the barge and pinnace. The endurance turned out satisfactorily, and the Pancras promised everything, and also to pay Mr. Meldrum (an English merchant residing there) a large sum for goods delivered to the Chief. We had an opportunity of seeing more one of the warlike trims from the interior, whose chief employment is head-hunting, dressed up in his best clothes. (See Sketch.)

The boat returned to the ship in the middle of the day. From the anchorage we had a fine view of the Kini Balu (13,698 feet), the highest mountain on the island, and the entrance to the river. (See Sketch.)

The Semiramis joined us at this place, and we proceeded to Maludu Bay, where we remained four days, until the Plato arrived. We all started together on the 7th February for Tanku. This took a week (although only 200 miles), on account of the coast being quite unexplored, and the sea filled with reefs in all directions. We anchored off the pirate settlement on the morning of the 15th, and immediately hoisted all the boats out, manned and armed them, and sent them, in company with those of the Semiramis and Plato, to ascend the river. Our force consisted of 250 men in fifteen boats, seven of which had guns; each of the commanders taking charge of their own men, and Captain Massie superintending the whole. Our plot, mistaking the river, ascended the wrong one, after having been obliged to haul all the boats over a bank across it, as the mouth was low water at the time. (See Sketch.) After trying two different branches, not at all agreeing with the description of the place, we returned in the afternoon. A large war-boat was seen in this river.

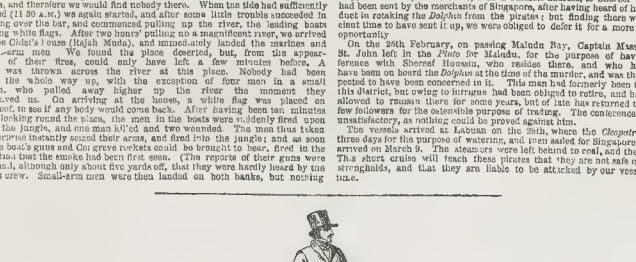
The next morning (the 16th) the boats were sent in the same order to another river, but, being low water, found it impossible to cross the bar; they therefore returned to their respective ships on the tide flowing. During this time four natives came down to the beach, and planted a white flag in the sand, with a goat fast to it. A boat was immediately sent, and found out that they were Malays, and that they had come down to present the goat, on account of our men not having destroyed their houses the day before, at the entrance of the first river. One man came on board in the boat, and we found out that the river the boats had attempted to enter in the morning was the right one, but that the fighting men were all away in their boats, and therefore we would find nobody there. When the tide had sufficiently flowed (11 30 A.M.) we again started, and after some little trouble succeeded in getting over the bar, and commenced pulling up the river, the leading boats having white flags. After two hours' pulling up a magnificent river, we arrived at the Chief's place (Rajah Mudu), and immediately landed the marines and small-arm men. We found the place deserted, but, from the appearance of their fires, could only have left a few minutes before. A line was thrown across the river at this place. Nobody had been seen the whole way up, with the exception of four men in a small canoe, who pulled away higher up the river the moment they perceived us. On arriving at the house, a white flag was placed on the roof, to see if any body would come back. After having been ten minutes here looking round the place, the men in the boats were suddenly fired upon from the jungle, and one man killed and two wounded. The men thus taken by surprise instantly seized their arms, and fired into the jungle; and as soon as the boat's guns and Congreve rockets could be brought to bear, fired in the direction that the smoke had been first seen. (The reports of their guns were so small, although only about five yards off, that they were hardly heard by the boat's crew. Small-arm men were then landed on both banks, but nothing more was seen of them. (See Sketch.) As it was then past three in the afternoon, the men were embarked, and returned down the river to the ships. The next evening the boats again left, and anchored inside the bar of the river, preparatory to starting by daybreak in the morning. The boats reached the Chief's house at 6 A.M., and the marines and small-arm men started to scour the country. A great number of houses were found further inland, and the land well cultivated with rice, sugar, fruit-trees, &c. The natives all left with their women and children before we came up to their houses. In retaliation for their having fired upon us the day before when a white flag was flying, about forty houses were burnt (including the Chief's), and the little property that we found in them destroyed, as well as cutting down their fruit-trees, &c. Nearly in the middle of the day, when this was going on, the natives again came down in the same spot (Chief's house) unperceived, and fired on the crews left in the boats, by which one man was killed and two wounded. Another man was killed about the same time by his musket going off by accident, the ball passing through his head. In the afternoon everybody was again embarked, and returned to the ships before sunset.

The inhabitants of this well-known pirate settlement were well prepared for us, as everything of any importance had been removed, and their guns buried. It is more probable, if they had not been away, they would have disputed our passage up, which they might easily have done, as the dense jungle grew close down to the banks. The whole of the pirates inhabit this place, having colonised it from Mandanao a great number of years past. Their depredations are invariably marked with singular cunning, barbarity, and recklessness, always murdering the crews of vessels they fall in with, with the exception of those they are enabled to sell for slaves.

Next morning, the 19th, after having committed the bodies of the two men who had been killed the day before to the deep, the vessels weighed and moved down off the entrance of the Sibali river, about eight miles distant from the other. Preparations were made for ascending this river; but finding the provisions were getting very low, and would only last to enable the vessels to reach Singapore, no more time could be spared to ascend the other rivers in the pirate district, and therefore left on the morning of the 21st. On our way back we intended to have stopped at Labuk Bay, in order to present a rifle, with a suitable address, to Shareef Yasin, that had been sent by the merchants of Singapore, after having heard of his good conduct in retaking the Dolphin from the pirates; but finding there was not sufficient time to have sent it up, we were obliged to defer it for a more convenient opportunity.

On the 26th February, on passing Maludu Bay, Captain Massie and Mr. St. John left in the Plato for Maludu, for the purpose of having a conference with Shareef Houssin, who resides there, and who happened to have been on board the Dolphin at the time of the murder, and was therefore suspected to have been concerned in it. This man had formerly been the Chief of this district, but owing to intrigue had been obliged to retire, and had not been allowed to remain there for some years, but of late has returned there with a few followers for the ostensible purpose of trading. The conference turned out unsatisfactory, as nothing could be proved against him.

The vessels arrived at Labuan on the 29th, where the Cleopatra remained three days for the purpose of watering, and then sailed for Singapore, where she arrived on March 9. The steamers were left behind to coal, and then followed. This short cruise will teach these pirates that they are not safe in their own strongholds, and that they are liable to be attacked by our vessels at any time.



THE CORBET TESTIMONIAL.

THE sporting community "round the Wrekin" have been lolding high revel this week in the ancient town of Shrewsbury, in honour of Mr. A. W. Corbet, of Sundorne Castle, the head of the elder branch of one of the oldest families in the Western and Midland Counties, and who have always been pre-eminent for their devotion to every description of rural pastime. The more immediate and continuous recipients of his hospitality have just entertained him at a magnificent dinner at the Raven Hotel, Shrewsbury, and presented him with a very graceful and elegant memorial of their respect. It is described in the local journals as consisting of an ebonised escritoire writing-table, with silver inkstand, a pair of branch candlesticks, and match box to suit. The table is of carved walnut, relieved by panels of ebony, and the top also of ebony, and with a deep broad rim of silver, on which is engraved, in old English characters—

"Presented to Lieut. WILLIAM CORBET, Esq., of Sundorne Castle, by his friends in Shrewsbury and its vicinity, as a token of their regard and esteem, May 17, 1852."

The carvings on the pedestals of the table are exceedingly appropriate and tasteful, and the greyhound upon which rests the Corbet escutcheon is finely executed. The inkstand, of silver, and weighing all about 110 ounces, is of the highest character of this description of art. On the top is the figure of a man holding a brace of greyhounds in the slips, and at each end a greyhound at rest. In front is seen a brace of dogs in pursuit of their game, and on the other side the same dogs standing tired and panting over the dead hare. The figures are all of frosted silver, and exceedingly life-like and natural. The taper-stand, weighs 53 ounces, and present "the chaste Diana" of the Greeks, the supreme protectress of hunting, with her bow and quiver, and a stag bounding before her. The several articles were furnished by Mr. Lewis Woolf, of Liverpool.

At the dinner (the Mayor of Shrewsbury in the chair) the elegant gifts we have enumerated were conveyed in a most eloquent and appropriate speech, by an eminent local surgeon, Mr. H. Keare, corner of the borough, who, embodying the predominant sentiments that characterised the presentation, gracefully adverted to the ancestral exploits of the ancient family in "the noble art of venery;" saying that the Corbet of the present day well sustained the fame of his lineage, not only as a sportsman, but as one whose special pride it was, within the time-honoured halls of Sundorne, "to exalt the humble, to comfort the lonely, to assist the needy, to console the afflicted, to be the minister of that beneficence which is proclaimed in the motto of his house—"Deus pascit corvos" (God feeds the ravens); and may God long soothe the Raven to continue his bounty, and to testify in good works to the mercies of the Omniscient."

TESTIMONIAL.—On Friday, the 21st ult., a number of the members of Christ College, Cambridge, presented to R. N. Philipps, Esq., LL.B., a handdouble-handed one, of elegant form, and ornamented with fruit and foliage in a rich style of chasing. The college arms are engraved on one side, and on the other is the following inscription:—"Vivo juris peritissimo, R. N. Philipps, LL.B., hoc quale cunque amoris et gratiarum monumentum D. J. plurimi quondam sodales Coll. Christi, Cant., hal. April., A.D. 1852."

CAPTAIN REED'S IMPROVEMENT IN SADDLES.

CAPTAIN REED has lately invented and patented certain improvements in the fastenings of the girths of saddles, which will doubtless prove of great practical value. By the simple arrangement represented in the accompanying Diagram, the rider is able to slacken or tighten the girths at pleasure, without having to dismount. The figure shows part of a saddle with Captain Reed's mechanical arrangement; M L, the girth and buckle; K, the strap fastened at J to a strong piece of ent, both ends of which are fastened to an axle (A), working freely in the supports B B B, and provided with the catch-pinion D: two catches (E and G) act on this pinion in contrary directions, so that by moving the handle F the girth can be tightened, and by pulling the other, G (kept down by piece of India-rubber, I), slackened. The whole of this simple arrangement is affixed to an iron plate (P), which by means of screw-holes and screws (C C C C) is itself fastened to the tree of the saddle.

It is needless to point out to amateurs of the chase and riders generally the convenience resulting from such an arrangement. It is not expensive, and does not in any way add to the size or outward form of the saddle-flap, the whole being sunk in the tree of the saddle, the two handles being the only portion protruding.

On Saturday last a boa constrictor, 17 feet in length, forming part of a collection of wild beasts which were being conveyed by the train from Havre to Paris for the purpose of being exhibited at the Hippodrome, escaped from the box in which it was confined, and wound its way up to the top of the train, where it promenaded for some time without being discovered. It afterwards announced its presence by suddenly thrusting its head up close to the engine-driver, to the great terror, as may be supposed, of that individual. The train was immediately stopped, and M. Hebert, who was placed in charge of these animals, with the assistance of two Africans by whom he was accompanied, with some difficulty re-captured the animal, which had coiled itself around the machinery of the locomotive, and ultimately secured it in a strong box.

ESTABLISHMENT OF CONTRACT MAIL PACKETS TO AUSTRALIA, VIÂ THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—The following notice has been issued from the General Post-Office: "On the evening of the 2d of June next, and on the evening of the 2d of every alternate month, mails will be made up in London for St. Vincent (Cape de Verde), the Cape of Good Hope, Western Australia, South Australia, Victoria (Port Phillip), Van Diemen's Land, and New South Wales, to be conveyed from Plymouth on the following day, by the packets of the Australian Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company, under contract with her Majesty's Government. All letters and newspapers for the Australian colonies above-mentioned will hereafter be forwarded by these packets, unless specially addressed to be otherwise sent. Letters and newspapers for the Cape of Good Hope will be forwarded by these packets, or by the packets of the General Screw Steam Shipping Company leaving Plymouth on the 18th of each month, according as such letters and papers may be posted in time for either line of packets. Letters for any of the British colonies will be liable to a postage of 1s. when not exceeding half an ounce in weight, letters of greater weight being charged in proportion according to the scale of weight for charging inland letters, which postage must be paid in advance. Newspapers will be conveyed free from charge. Letters for the Cape de Verde will be liable to a postage of 1s. 10d. when not exceeding half an ounce, &c.; and newspapers to a postage of 2d. each. The postage, whether for letters or newspapers, must be paid in advance. Those postmasters whose instructions direct them to send their letters for Plymouth by cross post will, of course, forward the correspondence intended for these mails in the same manner."

A fatal occurrence has just taken place at Pont-y-Twr, in the vicinity of Ogwen Lake, to a little boy, son of Mr. Charles Jones, master of a school established by him. Ogwen Lake being Permanent, at the above place. The child missed his footing, and fell down a precipice upwards of thirty feet high. He was killed on the spot. To add to the painfulness of this distressing calamity, another child of Mr. Jones died suddenly the same day.

HOBBIE NOBLE, THE FAVORITE FOR THE DERBY.

Hobbie Noble was an Englishman,
In Bewcastle Dale was bred and born.
Minstrelsy of the Border.

"What an odd name!" says some one not otherwise interested in the race. "Where do they get these quaint names for race-horses? Is Hobbie Noble English or Scotch—an invention of Mr. Merry, the owner, to come out of history?" The quotation above tells that there was once a "Hobbie Noble, an Englishman." Let us briefly relate his personal history.

Hulbert Noble was a gentleman—a younger son without heritage. He was a native of Bewcastle, in Cumberland; he lived and was hanged in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; the date of his birth being about this time three hundred years. Had he lived in the reign of Queen Victoria, he might have been an honourable gentleman—perhaps in the Guards, or attached to an embassy, or in Parliament. He would have gone to the Derby in a four-horse "drag." He might have been at this moment candidate for Cumberland or Carlisle. He might have issued an address in favour of Protection, perhaps of Free-trade. But living when he did, he became a freebooter, and an outlaw. He took refuge with the Armstrongs, Laird of Mangerton in Liddesdale, Scotland. Here, his brave, generous, and gentle nature gained him the esteem of men and women of every degree, though that esteem did not restrain some of the Armstrongs from betraying him into Lord Scrope's hands for a bribe.

From the Border ballads and the notes of historical editors, we obtain a glimmering of light to look into the darkness of three hundred or two hundred and seventy-five years ago. In this darkness we see lying in the prison of Newcastle-upon-Tyne one John Downie, a nephew of Armstrong of Mangerton, who had been taken prisoner in a Border foray. John Downie, from the place of his residence, was called Jock-o'-the-Side. We see him heavily fettered, condemned to die, and from his course of life sad to do so, as he readily acknowledges. However, he is resigned, because he has no hope of escape.

But some messenger has carried the news to his mother, Lady Downie of the Side: "her coats she has kilted up to her knee," and she runs over moors, scrambles over rocks, wades the river, and standing before her brother, Armstrong of Mangerton, weeps and wrings her hands for the peril of her son Jock. The Laird answers, and says, "Three men I'll send shall set him free." Two of them are his own sons; Noble is the other:—

O Hobbie Noble! thou one mann be:
Thy coat is blue, thou hast been true
Since Eng.and banished thee to me.

He directs them to go as "corn-dodgers" (travelling corn-dealers), but well armed under their disguise. The shoes of the horses have been taken off and reversed, to lead those who may follow their track in a wrong direction. Arrived at Cholesford, on the river Tyne, they cut down a young tree, having fifteen nags on each side, with which "to climb the wa' of Newcastle town." It is too short; they break open the gate, kill the porter, reach the jail, break the doors in flinders, find the prisoner loaded with fifteen stone of Spanish iron, whom, fettered as he is, the Laird's son Jock takes on his back and places him on a horse.

Arrived at Cholesford, on their return, the Tyne is swollen to a fearful flood, and an old man assures them it "will not ride." But they are pursued by the land-sergeant (an officer of justice) and twenty men. Wat, the Laird's second son, is faint-hearted; but brave Hobbie Noble and the other two will dare anything. They swim their horses to the other side; the land-sergeant, seeing their escape, assents to the loss of his prisoner, but is concerned about the fifteen stone of Spanish iron. He prays them to leave the fetters. Not likely—iron is scarce in Liddesdale.

"I wot well no'," quo' the Laird's son Jock,
"I'll keep them; shoon to my mare they'll be,
My guds bay mare, for I am sure,
Sae has bought them a' right dear frae thee."

And so they arrive safely and welcome at Mangerton in Liddesdale.

The Lord-Warden of the Marches, or his land-sergeant, is next seen in treaty with Sim o' the Mains (Simon Armstrong, relative of the Laird of Mangerton) and four other Armstrongs, to betray Noble into his hands. They invite him to join in a foray into the English side:—

At Kershope foot the tryst was set,
Kershope of the slye loe;
And Laurie was traitor Sim o' the Mains,
And with him a private compane.

Hobbie had been warned to beware of Simon Armstrong; but he was of a confiding disposition, and suspected nothing.

Those who read reports of agricultural societies may have read of Sir James Graham's success in draining a waste bog, out of which he has got crops of oats and potatoes of astonishing amount. On the edge of that bog Hobbie Noble slept in the shiel (shepherd's hut) on the first night of this foray, but was awakened by a dream, and was just in time to save himself from being taken asleep. He called up his "freres five" (companions), showed them the danger, but sought to inspirit them with a hope of mastery if they could keep by him and give battle boldly. The next minute he found himself betrayed. Yet he fought manfully, and would have "cleared Cosscouthart Green," so the ballads say, had his sword not broken. It broke, and he was taken, his five companions assisting to bind him with his own bow-string.

They conveyed him to Carlisle, and by the way mockingly asked if he knew the road, which he did as well as they, but said nothing. At Carlisle he was more kindly treated:—

They gave him a wheaten loaf to eat,
And after that a can of beer;
And tauy a' cried to him with one consent—
"Eat, brave Noble, and make good cheer."

Yet he was hanged next day. Before he died, he swore an oath that he had never anything of Lord Scrope's "that ate him either grass or corn." But seeing that nothing would avert his fate, he bade them beware of the traitor Mains, and said:—

I wad has betrayed nas lad alive
For a' the gud of Christentie.

Such was the life and death of the gentle Hulbert Noble, of Bewcastle Dale, whose story has been preserved in the oral traditions and rugged ballads of the Borders. The Laird of Mangerton, chief of the Armstrongs, chastised his treacherous kinsmen with vigour. Sim o' the Mains, being banished by his order, fell into the hands of the English, and was hanged, as a Scotch rever, at Carlisle, within two months of Hobbie Noble's death.

NEW MAIL PACKET ARRANGEMENT.—In August next the West India Mail Packet Company will, with the sanction of the Admiralty, run a mail steamer between Chagres and Savannah, in the United States, touching at Jamaica, Juagua, and Nassau. This steamer will leave Jamaica on the 22nd of every month, proceed to Juagua, Nassau, and Savannah, and then return by the same route and proceed to Chagres, which port she will reach on the 14th, and leave on the 16th of the month. By this arrangement Jamaica will have a direct mail communication with Chagres and the United States. The steamer between St. Thomas and Nassau will then cease running, as the Bahamas mails will be sent viâ Jamaica. The mails for Hayti Island will be sent at Juagua. The coaling stations for this steamer will be at Jamaica and Savannah. Juagua is a small island north of the windward passage at the eastern end of Cuba. The course of post to the Bahamas will be the same as at present, about eight weeks and a half.

At a meeting of noblemen and gentlemen interested in promoting a speedy communication between England and Ireland, held a few days ago in Palace Yard, Mr. Herbert, M.P., in the absence of Mr. G. W. Lang, Jun., in which he insisted on the possibility of constructing a steamer capable of attaining a speed of 25 miles an hour. He proposed that it should be 400 feet long by about 40 broad, and with a nominal power of 1600 horses; and he represented that such a vessel would make the voyage between Holyhead and Dublin in about two hours, while sea-sickness would be altogether avoided, in consequence of the absence of motion and any kind except horizontal. Mr. Lang, who was present, entered into various details, and offered, in reply to various questions, the most satisfactory explanations; and the meeting terminated in the appointment of a committee to devise the best means of carrying out the prop sed project.

The Himalaya, from Port Phillip, arrived on Tuesday in the Thames, with 27,000 ounces of gold, valued at upwards of £99,000. The date of sailing being the 1st of January, the advices by her have been long since anticipated.

The Opinione of Turin announces that the San Carlo steamer, on the Lago Maggiore, was suddenly discovered to be on fire, on the 18th inst., off Mogadino, on the Swiss bank. At about 11 P.M. the inhabitants of the town saw the steamer in a blaze. They immediately sent out boats to save the crew, who, unconscious of the danger, had already retired to rest. They were all saved, but the steamer was burnt down to the water's edge by 6 o'clock the next morning. The steamer Verbano has been put on the station in the room of the San Carlo.

Advices from Constantinople state that the Sultan had confirmed, on the 8th inst., Ismail Effendi's arrangement with the viceroy of Egypt on the Tanzimat question.

MUSIC.

CHOIR BENEVOLENT FUND.

This excellent institution was established last year, for the relief of widows and orphans of organists and lay clerks of cathedral and collegiate choirs. The second anniversary dinner took place on Tuesday, at the Freemasons' Tavern, the Marquis of Worcester in the chair, and Dean Ashpurnham, Earl Howe, one of the trustees, Sir George Clerk, M.P., the Rev. E. Repton, and Rev. Temple Frere, Canons of Westminster Abbey; R. Palmer, Esq., M.P., R. Kilsby Jones, Esq., Lincoln, trustee; the Rev. G. Townsend, Messrs. Bellamy, Hatherley, F. G. Curtis, Evans, Jackson, Bishop, T. Oliphant, Addison, Duff, &c. Amongst the professors were Dr. Elvey, organist of St. George's Chapel, Windsor; Mr. Turle, of Westminster Abbey; Mr. Goss, of St. Paul's Cathedral; Messrs. Lockey, Francis, Land, Shoubridge, Foster, M. Smith, J. and W. Coward, Martin, Machin, H. Barnby, Gray, and Messrs. J Mitchell, Madge, Palmer, Sheard, Knowles, Erdheweer, and Mavett, and four boys of the Chapel Royal, Master Chard. With the ten boys of the Chapel Royal and Westminster Abbey, a complete and effective choir was formed for the execution of a well-selected programme, comprising the two canons "Non Nobis Domine" and Dr. Cooke's "Amen," for grace; the National Anthem, after the toast of Church and Queen; John Barnett's charming madrigal for five voices (the parts being quadrupled), "Merry wake maidens, the morn;" R. S. J. Stevens' dignified glee, "The clouds capp'd towers," for six voices (doubled), so finely sung as to command an immediate encore; Dr. Aldrich's quaint round, "Hark! the bonny Christ Church bells," (sung by the boys, and re-demanded); Shilley's "Magic," excellently rendered by Francis, Land, Lockey, and Machin; Dr. Elvey's well-conceived prize glee, "The Orphan's Prayer," for four voices (quadruples); J. Benet's dainty madrigal, "All creatures now are merry-minded;" S. Webbe's glee, "To love I vow," for four voices, "over string;" Festa's epigrammatic madrigal, "Down in a flowry vale," in which the "Jewel Phyllis" lays down the cautious doctrine not to attempt a wooing with an empty purse; Sir H. R. Bishop's round, "Ye dusky hill face;" Beale's madrigal, "What, shepherd, ho!" S. Webbe's glee, "Thy voice, O harmony;" and, finally Sir H. R. Bishop's arrangement of Ravenscroft and Morley's madrigal, "Why is Sylvia?" In the faculty of singing at sight our vocalists are not approached, and certainly no singers of any other nation could have executed the above in the above scheme with such precision and accuracy as were displayed on this occasion, without a rehearsal. This, of course, with preparation, much might be gained in colouring and delivery, but the "fast express" system of music in London during the season renders this almost impossible. The financial interests of the new fund, we are glad to see, were also advanced by Mr George Gray, of the Chapel Royal, the secretary, who narrated the history of the institution and its rapid progress; he called upon the heads of the Church to support the fund, as one on calculated to ameliorate the misery of a forgotten class of men; and told, in simple and touching language, the story of one of the cathedral singers who was present at the first dinner, and was now no more, leaving a widow and three children with nothing to the world but an appeal to the Choir Benevolent Fund. Sir George Clerk, with his usual tact and good taste, in proposing the health of the noble chairman, pointed out the advantages in an artistic point of view of supporting the interest of a class of singers which was handed down the traditions of the noble ecclesiastical school of composition; and the Marquis of Westminster, in returning thanks, expressed his gratification at the formation of an institution calculated to promote the prosperity of our English professors, with whom he was delighted to claim personal acquaintance, and from whose exertions he and his house (the Beaufort's) had so often derived much pleasure. Her Majesty and Prince Albert are liberal patrons of the fund, have given a donation of £50; the Duke of Cambridge has sent £10, the Marquis of Worcester gave £25; Earl Howe, £20; Sir G. Clerk, £5; Mr. Lockey, five guineas; Mr. Elvey, £10; Mr. Hatherley, £5; and the secretary, subscriptions, sermons, &c., from the Bishop down to the choir boys, now exceed £800.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.

The Derby week has cause of no diminution in the number of musical entertainments. On Monday Mr. Allcroft made an experiment at the Lyceum Theatre of a morning monster concert, the statistics of which present an array of forty four pieces, executed by ten solo instrumentalists and a chorus of fifty. Madame Pleyel performed Dohler's "William Tell" fantasia, Thalberg's "Don Pasquale" serenade, and Liszt's "Rossinian Tarantella," Sivori, Bottesini, Case, and Richardson played violin, contrabasso, concertina, and flute solos, and Distin united with four sax-horns. The "Moon in Kelito," or "Zora," prayer, was sung by all the artistes, with the accompaniment of eight harps and the organ a percussion. Messrs. F. Mori and Schinon were the conductors. The vocalists were Mdlle. Favanti, who was much applauded in "Una voce" and "Non più mesta;" Mdlle. Jetty de Treffz, whose national Styrian air was her cheval de bataille; Madame E. Garcia, who shone in Rode's variations; Mrs. Sims Reeves, who was eloquent in a romance by Schira (a Spanish air); Miss Lyne, who sang an elegant ballad, the "Switzer's mountain lay," by Miss Ellen Glascock, the composer of the clever overture played at the Haymarket Theatre before the play, and a pretty song by Mr. T. Baker, the "Lone Lass of Lynn." Mr. Miss Poole, who pleased as she always does pleases, in the "Syren's gift," also by Mr. T. Baker, and the Misses M'Alpine (sisters two), Lowe, Loy, and Masdame F. Lablache, who did their mighty all in "Three fair," there were three "tender tenors," in Herr Reichart, Herr Brandt, and Mr. Sims Reeves; a new singer, in Signor Calcagno; and three basses, in Signor Madeni, Lablache, and Signor F. Lablache. Mr. Lucas, Alfred called to attract a London, it was clearly not his fault. —Herr Charles Oberthur, the very clever harp player, had an evening concert last Monday at the Hanover-square rooms, assisted by Madame Macfarren and Miss Dolby, Messrs. WHITSUNTIDE AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THE completion of the principal front of this truly national establishment, and its recent accession of antiquities from "the Buried City of the East," will, doubtless, prove a paramount attraction during the approaching holiday week. As aids to this intellectual curiosity, and calculated to gratify this thirst after knowledge of a higher class, we have engraved the accompanying representations—first, of the highly characteristic Sculpture of the Great Pediment of the Museum Buildings; next, of the massive and costly Enclosure, a fine work of its class; and next, a selection from the Antiquities which have very recently been received from the site of Nimroud, some of which have scarcely yet been exhibited to the public.

NIMROUD ANTIQUITIES.

IVORIES, BRONZES, AND POTTERY.

dint of the utmost perseverance, Mr. Layard succeeded in collecting all possible fragments and in transmitting them to the British Museum, where, by the ingenious process of immersion in boiling isinglass, the animal matter was restored to the mineral structure, and the ivory resumed its natural appearance and solidity. In proceeding to furnish a detailed description of these ivories, it is necessary to observe that our Illustrations, which are numbered consecutively from 1 to 15, are engraved of the size of the original sculptures.

Nos. 1 and 2 are fragments of two heads, which, by reference to No. 3, will easily be understood to have formed part of the decoration on the sides of a box. The hair and treatment of these fragments are so entirely Egyptian, that we have no hesitation in supposing them to have been imitated from some Egyptian works of art. The eyebrows and eyes in these heads are cut out with great precision, for the purpose of inserting some other material, to represent with greater effect those important features of the human countenance, and to enhance the value of the work. This practice was universal in Egypt, and numerous examples may be seen on the mummy-cases in the Egyptian rooms of the Museum. Besides these especial peculiarities of Egyptian origin, we may notice a very remarkable similarity in the position of the ear, which in these fragments, as well as in the sculptures of Egypt, is placed considerably higher than in the statues of Grecian and Roman workmanship, and higher likewise than it is found in the natives of either country, or in the human race generally. Hence, again, we argue that this peculiarity must have been imitated from a fashion or concept which originated in Egypt.

No. 3 is a flat piece of ivory, which formed one of the ends, or part of the side, of an ivory casket. We are led to this conclusion from some similar fragments in the collection being furnished, like this, with projections from the upper and lower margin, which projections we take to be the tenons for securing it to the top and bottom of the casket. In the example before us we have nearly the entire compartment containing the Egyptian mask, and below it a singular ornament, which is imitated from one found on ivory in the ancient tombs in the immediate neighbourhood of the great pyramid in Egypt.

No. 4 is another flat piece of ivory, which likewise formed one of the ends, or part of the side, of a casket. The most extraordinary feature of this fragment is, that it represents the Egyptian god Nilus in the attitude in which that divinity is usually sculptured upon the sides of the thrones of the Egyptian kings; that is to say, binding up the stem of some water-plant, and with one foot placed against a heart-shaped termination of a central stem or support of a horizontal line. In the work we are now examining the inferiority of the Assyrian sculptor in the knowledge of the proportions of the human figure is very palpable, for the heads are much too large for the bodies and limbs of the figures—a defect that is never found in Egyptian works of art.

No. 5 is likewise part of the side or end of a box. It represents two lions with human heads, in the position and wearing that peculiar covering for the fore-leg imitated from the lion in the throne of Athamsea IV., in the procession of Medinet Aboo and elsewhere. These figures are placed back to back, after the fashion of the bulls of the façade of the King's Court in the Palace of Khorsabad, and, like them, they are furnished with wings—in this respect differing from any of the human-headed lions of Egypt, which are never represented with wings.

Nos. 6, 7, 8, and 9. It is difficult to guess the purpose of these fragments. They represent gazelles or goats, and may have served for the handles of daggers or fly-flaps, such as we see in the hands of the attendants of the King in the sculptures from the walls of the palaces of Nimroud and Khorabad. These fragments are flat, and in this respect differ from

No. 10, which is part of a statue of a gazelle, in the round.

Nos. 11 and 12 are also flat, and may be part of a box.

No. 13. Two hands, which we presume to have belonged to a statue of a man in the attitude of respect, of which, probably, the robes were formed of some other material.

No. 14. A rosette ornament

No. 15. A carved ornament, resembling an architectural decoration of Greece, from the Treasury of Atrius, which may be seen in the Elgin Room of the British Museum.

No. 16 is a fragment, part also of a box, representing a figure and flowers of the lotus.

These interesting fragments go far towards establishing the hypothesis of the intimate connexion between the arts of Egypt and Assyria, of which so many curious illustrations have already been shown in "Nineveh and its Palaces."*

The examples which succeed are from some of the bronzes brought by our indefatigable countryman from Nimroud. In these remains we recognise fragments of that costly "pleasant furniture" of which there was such abundance in the palaces of Nineveh, as we read in the Book of the Prophet Nahum; and we are enabled to define each particular part with the same certainty that we could in a cabinet-maker's shop point out the back of a chair, the leg of a table, or the foot of a stool.

No. 1 of our illustration is part of the leg of a footstool, the points rested upon the ground

No. 2 is a grotesque head with human ears, and nose and mouth of some animal. This head formed the top or knob of some piece of furniture.

No. 3 is an ornament formed of thin bronze, and was part of the decoration of the leg of a chair or table.

No. 4 is an ornament near the termination of the leg of a chair or table, many examples of which may be seen in the great work published by the Government of France on the excavations at Khorsabad

No. 5 is part of the bronze ornament which covered the wooden bar which connected the legs of a stool or chair. This ornament is peculiarly Assyrian, and is frequently represented in the sculptures from the walls of the palaces of Nimroud, as may be seen in the British Museum

All these bronze casings for the wooden chair or table are throughout of an equal thickness, and are not, as has been supposed, of beaten work, but have been cast in a mould, and produced with that uniform thickness by a very ingenious process practised by our silversmiths at the present day. We gather this fact from a fragment of a head of a gazelle, in which still remains part of the core of the mould; but, as it would be impossible to make the process of casting clear to those who have not seen it practised without the aid of diagrams, we abstain from attempting to describe it.

The remaining illustrations we shall supply on the present occasion consist of pottery found in some tombs on the western face of the Mound of Nimroud, and to the south of the north-west palace. These tombs, Layard informs us, were five feet above the remains of a building, the walls of which had been covered with alabaster slabs.

No. 1 is a Vase, about one foot high; it is formed of ordinary clay, coated with a blue vitrified varnish, such as we find on Egyptian pottery and idols.

Nos 2 and 4, similar Vases, of somewhat different forms.

No. 5, Lamp, of ordinary baked clay, with elegant device, but apparently without any signification.

Nos. 3, 6, 7, 8, Lamps of ordinary baked clay, without either varnish or significative ornament.

SCULPTURE IN THE PEDIMENT OF THE BRITISH MUSEUM,
BY SIR RICHARD WESTMACOTT, R.A.

The subject of the composition is "The Progress of Civilisation." Commencing at the western angle a man is represented emerging from a rude savage state through the influence of religion. He is next personified as a hunter and a tiller of the earth, and labouring for his subsistence. Patriarchal simplicity then becomes invaded, and the worship of the true God defiled. Paganism prevails, and becomes diffused by means of the arts. The worship of the heavenly bodies and their supposed influence led the Egyptians, Chaldæans, and other nations to study astronomy, typified by the centre statues—the keystone to the composition. Civilisation is now presumed to have made considerable progress. Descending through the eastern angle of the Pediment is mathematics—in allusion to science being now pursued on known sound principles. The drama, poetry, and music balance the group of the Fine Arts on the eastern side; the whole composition terminating with natural history, in which such objects or specimens only are represented as could be made most effective in sculpture.

THE GATES OF THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

The enclosure of the principal front of the Museum is a fine specimen of iron-work, executed by Messrs. Walker, of York. The models were commenced by Lovati, an artist of considerable talent, who, however, died before he had made much progress; they were then taken up and completed by Mr. Thomas and by Messrs. Collmann and Davis. The piers of hammered iron; the remainder of the iron-work is cast from metal moulds, and was chiefly piece-moulded, in order to obtain relief. The carriage-gates are opened by a windlass, both sides simultaneously. Each half of these gates weighs upwards of five tons.

The height of the granite curb varies from 2 ft. 9 in. to 3 ft. 9 in.; the height of the ironwork is 9 feet up to the top rail; and the length of the whole palisade, from one extremity to the other, is about 800 feet. It is relieved in the spear tops and some other parts with gold. It is, we believe, intended that each of the principals shall be surmounted by an eagle. The total cost will be about £6700.

The inclosure, besides the metal-work, consists of four granite pedestals, one of which we have engraved. These pedestals are intended to receive sitting statues of Shakspeare, Bacon, Milton, and Newton, small sketches for which have been modelled by Sir Richard Westmacott.

ALLSOPP'S PALE ALE.—From the pure and wholesome nature of the ingredients employed, the moderate proportion of alcohol present, and the considerable quantity of aromatic anodyne bitter, derived from hops, contained in these beers, they tend to preserve the tone and vigour of the stomach, and conduce to the restoration of the health of that organ when in a state of weakness or debility. These bitter beers differ from all other preparations of malt in containing a smaller amount of extractive matter, thus being less viscid and saccharine, and causing hardly more decay of digestion; they resemble, indeed, from their lightness, a wine or small, rather than an ordinary fermented infusion; and it is very satisfactory to find that a beverage so much general consumption is entirely free from every kind of impurity.—Lancet.

THE ABERDARE COLLIERY.—GENERAL VIEW OF THE WORKS.

THE RECENT FATAL COLLIERY EXPLOSION NEAR ABERDARE

The investigation by the coroner at Aberdare into this melancholy catastrophe, by which sixty-five lives were lost, and which was noticed in our Numbers of the 15th and 22d inst. respectively, was concluded on Wednesday

The principal evidence adduced on Tuesday was that of Mr. J. K. Blackwell, the former Government Inspector of Mines in that district, and was of great value in reference to the causes, and their most probable remedy, of the disasters to which the collieries in that district are liable

Mr. Blackwell said, having been requested by the Secretary for the Home Department to attend this inquest on the sufferers by the late explosion, in conjunction with the present Government inspector, Mr. Mackworth, in consequence of my former connexion with the inquiries which have been instituted by the Government with regard to the ventilation of mines, I beg to remark that the Middle Duffryn pit and the adjoining collieries, in which so many fatal explosions have taken place, are working the same seam of coal, which is about six feet thick. This pit has been in work between one and two years, and was the scene of a previous explosion in December, 1850, by which eight lives were lost. By the present accident 65 men and boys have lost their lives, and many of the survivors have been severely injured. In this and the two adjoining collieries 174 lives have been lost in this and three other explosions which have occurred since the year 1845. These collieries are of considerable depth, and situate in what is technically termed "a maiden country." The Middle Duffryn pit is 165 yards in depth. It is the deepest of the three contiguous collieries namely, the Old Duffryn, the Lletty Shenkin, and the Middle Duffryn, where the explosions just referred to have taken place—and is also the deepest in work in the Aberdare valley. It is important to observe that to the "deep" of the colliery and on both sides of it there is an unbroken tract of coal measures of immense extent which have never been drained by any workings upon them of any portion of the firedamp, with which these measures are high y charged. The periods at which the explosions have taken place succeed closely in the Old Duffryn, Lletty Shenkin, and Middle Duffryn colliery are the period at which each of them successively was the deepest workings—the deepest excavation; worked winning in the Aberdare valley; and, therefore, the situation where the unliberated elastic gas, pervading these deep unbroken coal measures, was subjected to the greatest pressure and found the only channel for escape. Such circumstances demonstrate the necessity for the adoption of every known precaution against accident. The present workings in this colliery extend over a tract of about 35 acres, the whole of which has been partially, but not entirely, worked out during the above period, the pillars between the stalls not having been removed.

The recent explosion appears evidently to have originated from a violent and large discharge of fire-damp, which occurred coincidently with extensive falls of the roof of the seam near the deep extremity of No. 2 dip heading. The drifts proceeding on the half course to the dip at this point are those penetrating the farthest into the deep unworked coal measures by which the colliery is bounded. The breaking down of the roof has taken place to the largest extent at the mouth of the upper of these drifts. It appears to have followed the course of a slip along which the measures above the seam have fallen to the height of several yards, probably up to the 2-feet 6-inch seam of coal lying about seven yards above that which is worked. The falling of the roof, which occurred at the period of the explosion, appears to have been produced by violent pressure on the firedamp contained in the measures forming the roof. Naked lights are generally used in the pit, notwithstanding the hardly which exists of the occurrence of these sudden discharges of fire-damp, and the colliers working in this district of the pit now referred to, with these dangerous lights, have only been withdrawn from it in consequence of the dangers to which they are exposed from the falling of the roof until the roof could be secured with timber. The whole of the ingoing or returning air from this pit was conducted over the furnace, situate near the bottom of the upcast part of the shaft. The same causes which render the use of any naked light highly dangerous in coal-seams in the condition of that which is worked in this colliery, also render this mode of rarifying the outgoing or return air, by conducting it over a furnace, dangerous in the same degree. No practicable amount of ventilation will guard a pit in which the seam is in this condition from the consequences of these sudden large discharges. If the furnace be resorted to under such circumstances as the positive power in the ventilation, it should be fed by a split of pure air, connected to it direct from the bottom of the downcast shaft before any fire-damp can enter it. The general returns, into which it is possible that fire-damp may enter in such quantities as to render them explosive, should be conducted by what is technically termed a "dumb drift," at a sufficient height above the furnace drift to guard such an explosive current from the danger of ignition. The extreme or exploring drifts in this colliery, and the extreme workings, particularly those penetrating the deep coal, will always be liable to such sudden outbursts of fire-damps as those which have recently on two occasions overpowered the ventilation, and produced explosions. As soon as a sufficient quantity of coal has been removed to allow the pressure of this gas to break through the roof or floor, or to force a road through the coal itself; unless these drifts, that is, those parts of the levels and heading the farthest in progress, are kept considerably in advance of the working districts, so as to drain away this gas gradually, and thus relieve the pressure on it.

With respect to the remedies or means of prevention, Mr. Blackwell observed

The security of collieries from explosions will not result in all cases from a large ventilation. From the manner in which, as already described, it appears that fire-damp often exists in coal seams, and particularly in those coal-seams in their associated measures, viz. capable of the great sudden expansion of an elastic gas when the pressure on it is removed, it sometimes bursts into coal mines in quantities which form an explosive atmosphere air circulating in them cannot dilute below the explosive point, though that supply is large and amply sufficient under ordinary circumstances to render them safe. When a coal-seam is found to be in this state, although by a proper arrangement of the workings and of the air-ways the consequences of an explosion may be diminished and controlled, that occurrence can only be absolutely prevented by excluding the current of the mine from all contact with flame by the use of the Davy lamps, and by the employment of a furnace duly employed to rarify the ascending air in the upcast shaft, then by feeding that furnace with a part of the downcast air which has not circulated in the mines. These precautions were the more necessary in the Middle Duffryn pit to prevent the fatal consequences of an accident, because, although there are two shafts in this colliery, one only of them divided by a brattice is used in the ventilation. However, all these precautions may be frustrated by accident or neglect, it is necessary to consider how far the effects of an explosion, if it should take place, may be limited and controlled in its extent and consequences. This may be effected by arranging the workings of a colliery so as to divide those workings into different districts or panels, and so as to isolate each district and connect it with the main ingoing and outgoing air currents (technically the "intake" and "returns") at two points only. The result of such an arrangement will be, first, to limit the extent of an explosion, and, secondly, to confine the intake currents to as great a distance as possible from the shafts, and to prevent the circulation being destroyed by the effects of the blast, so that the survivors, after the explosion, may be able to reach the unvitiated ingoing air. To attain this object, the main passages of a coal mine, by which the currents of ingoing air are conducted to the workings where the men are employed, must be secured against the consequences of an explosion by substantial stopping or barriers throughout their entire extent, up to the points where those currents enter the workings, wherever, in the progress of the operations, openings have been formed between them and the parallel exhausted workings or the outgoing air channels. If in consequence of its being found necessary to divide these air currents (technically to "split" them) before they reach the extreme workings, that part of the current which is not thus abstracted, and must be conducted to a more distant point, may be conducted by means not liable like doors to immediate destruction by a shock.

In answer to the Coroner, Mr. Blackwell stated that the cause of the accident was a discharge of gas from the roof of the seam in the heading. It appeared to him to be a very violent discharge, and occurred in the most dangerous part of the pit. It was a possible and probable occurrence in such a seam of coal in a maiden country like this. The seams in this district were very fiery. In his former report he had denounced the use of brattice shafts, but he thought they could not always be avoided; but naked lights should never be used.

On Wednesday Mr. Mackworth, the present Government inspector, presented to the coroner a report which confirmed Mr. Blackwell's views, and stated that—

Notwithstanding Mr. Blackwell's warnings after the previous accident, during the seventeen months that have intervened the furnace and candles have been uniformly used, and the jumping shaft was shut off by a door from the ventilation, and a wooden "brattice" in the larger shaft converted the winding side into the downcast, and the other by the assistance of a furnace into the upcast. It is sacred to him, from the evidence, that the system of ventilation was insufficient for working such a fiery seam. He thought the proprietor was open to blame for not attending to the suggestions of Mr. Blackwell, though he was not censured to any great amount to speak of, because neglect is as reprehensible as criminal. He feared in most collieries there were not well organised and digested plans before commencing operations, and also that the proprietors did not employ proper practical, scientific, and well informed men to carry out those operations. He feared they trusted too much to the practical men alone, and despised the aid of science. There was one other thing he must remark—all the scientific men agreed in condemning the brattice shafts.

After two hours and a half's deliberation the jury returned the following verdict:—

In the case of Thomas Prichard, we find a verdict of "Accidental death," and we are of opinion that the Middle Duffryn pit was at the time in a good state of ventilation for ordinary purposes, but that a fall in No. 2 crossheading to the dip produced a large discharge of gas, that passed along the return air-course to the fine, there ignited, and caused the explosion which resulted in such a great loss of human life. We are also of opinion that there is no neglect or culpability attaching to any of the agents or men in their employ, notwithstanding we much regret that the recommendations of the jury and the suggestions of Mr. Blackwell in his report on the occasion of the last explosion had not been complied with; and we most seriously recommend that the proprietors be enjoined to adopt Mr. Backwell's plan of ventilation, especially the dumb drift.

The coroner asked what verdict would be returned in the case of Owen Evans, and the man who was supposed to have died from injuries occasioned by the fall of the ladder?

The foreman replied that they had fully considered these cases also, and that Owen Evans had been suffocated, with numerous others, by choke-damp, while they believed the other man to have been killed by the fall of the ladder.

The jury also added, in reply to the coroner, that they had no recommendation to make, or opinion to express, in regard to the deaths by suffocation.

FIRST REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS FOR THE EXHIBITION OF 1851, printed by W. Clowes and Sons.—This document has just been issued as the first instalment of the official record of the Great Exhibition. The report, preceded by the Royal Commission and the Charter of Incorporation, extends to some forty pages, but contains matter that has not already been published; but here the details are given with more exactitude, and the narrative is better arranged than elsewhere: it is throughout ably executed, and presents a popular as well as an official retrospect of the Exhibition, its antecedents and progressive results, which impress the reader with the vast multiplicity of the details of the great work, and the skill with which the gigantic plan has been wrought out. The report, however, occupies but a small portion of this popular "blue-book," for it is wrapped in its usual parliamentary mantle. Immediately following is the appendix of 42 heads, and upwards of 200 pages, closely packed with figures and date, returns and catalogues, estimates, decisions, minor reports, letters, &c., at which will yield much gratification to that class of readers who delight in the curiosities of the subject. Some of the statistics forcibly illustrate the difficulties which beset the great project in its early stages; and those of the subscription returns, especially show in what different degrees wants in localities contributed, and how costly it is to get up a movement in certain districts; besides a number of other facts and figures of interest, but which we have not space to particularise. We should mention that the document is illustrated by plans and diagrams. Altogether, this is the most exact record of the Exhibition yet issued.

THE COLLIERY EXPLOSION AT COPPULL.—The list of killed by this appalling casualty has been increased by the death of two sufferers more—namely, Robert Banks and Samuel Holcroft, making a total of 34. Another of the wounded will in all probability not survive, mortification having set in. Mr. Palmer, coroner, of Preston, opened the inquest pro formâ on Saturday last, in order that the bodies of the deceased might be interred.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.—The usual return relating to railway accidents for the half-year ending the 31st of December last, has been printed. The number of persons was 47,209,922. The number of persons killed was 112, and 261 injured. There were eight passengers killed and 215 injured, from causes beyond their own control; 9 passengers were killed and 14 injured owing to their own misconduct or want of caution; 59 servants of companies or of contractors were killed and 17 injured from causes beyond their own control; 32 servants of companies or of contractors were killed and 11 injured owing to their own misconduct or want of caution; 33 trespassers and other persons, neither passengers nor servants of the companies, were killed and 9 injured by crossing or walking on railways. There were no suicides. The length of railways open was 6,621 miles, 3,000 miles, and on the 31st of December last 6890 miles, being an increase during the half-year of 192 miles.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Right Hon. the Earl of Mansfield, K.T., has this year been appointed by her Majesty as Lord High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. By permission of the Duke of Hamilton, the apartments belonging to his Grace as Hereditary Keeper of Holyrood Palace have been fitted up as a residence for the representative of Royalty. The levee of the noble Earl at Holyrood last week, was attended by about 600 of the nobility, gentry, and clergy of Scotland.

It is understood that Colonel Outram will return to Bombay, and that the Court of Directors of the East India Company will address a recommendation to the Government of that presidency that he be restored to his employment at Baroda, from which he had been very unceremoniously dismissed; a proceeding that in substance will amount to a censure on Lord Falkland, the Governor of Bombay, and his council.

Kossuth's mother has arrived at Brussels, and is expected this week in London, on her way to join her son. She is accompanied by her two daughters, their husbands, and their nine children. The mother of Kossuth is of small stature, and about 70 years of age. She appears to enjoy good health. The two sisters, on the contrary, are tall, and one of them appears to be in ill health. These refugees were the subjects of a harassing persecution in the Austrian dominions, which the Government abandoned on condition that they should leave the Continent.

A lady, at present sojourning amongst the lakes of Westmoreland, anxious to ascend the mighty Skiddaw, but being unable to make the attempt either on foot or on horseback, adopted the expedient of having an arm-chair fitted up partly in the sedan fashion, and engaged six guides to escort her to the top—a mode of ascent probably unparalleled in the history of Skiddaw and its many thousand visitors. She accomplished the task, and descended in the same manner in perfect safety. The line occupied in the ascent and descent was about seven hours.

The County de Colloredo Waltsee, who has been appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court from the Emperor of Austria, in the room of the Count de Buol Schauenstein, is expected to arrive in England to assume his diplomatic functions; and the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury have issued directions for the respect usually shown to Ministers of the Court's diplomatic rank to be observed on his Excellency's arrival in this country.

During the storm which passed over the town of Ipswich last week, a young woman named Stevens, living with Mr. Carr, butcher, in Magdalen-street, was struck by the electric fluid. She had retired to rest, and noticed nothing during the storm beyond being greatly heated; but upon rising on the following morning she discovered that the whole of her hair on the left side, and part on the back, of the head had been burnt off by the lightning, the other portion being much singed.

The reclaiming of Morecambe Bay is at length about to be carried into effect. The right has been purchased from the Admiralty by Messrs Brogden and Co., and the undertaking will be carried out conjointly with the formation of the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway. The rivers Crake and Leven will be confined to a fixed channel, and the bay will no doubt be left in a great measure to silt up. This vast tract, which extends from Tridden Point (near to the Ulverstone Canal Foot) to Grenoside, comprises an area of about 145,000 acres.

As Mr. Ricardo, M.P., was riding along Rotten-row, on Tuesday evening week his horse stumbled at one of the numerous imperfect spots in the road, and slipped on his side. The hon. member lost his seat, and pitched heavily on his left shoulder. Several parties ran to his assistance, but he speedily recovered himself, and proceeded to his residence in Lowndes-square. Mr. Teevan, of Conduit-street, who was sent for, saw the hon. member a very short time after his arrival at home, and, on examination, discovered a dislocation of the shoulder, which he at once reduced. Mr. Ricardo is progressing favourably.

On Monday a parliamentary return was issued, from which it appears that, from the 1st September, 1850, to the 1st September, two thousand three hundred articles found in hackney carriages (cabs) by drivers, and deposited at the proper office, was 2182. The number claimed by the owners was 1154. No account was sent of the value of the articles found.

On the 1st September last the number of licenses of hackney carriages in the metropolis was 3448; the weekly duty in the year amounted to £3,1867. These hackney carriages are nearly all Cabs.

The Government bill which is just printed, by order of the House of Commons, authorises the completion of certain improvements in Pimlico and near Buckingham Palace. Among the improvements a new road is to be formed to communicate with the Victoria-road.

Bell's Life says that a member of one of the leading clubs in London, ans a master of foxhounds, will back a young lady, for from £2000 to £5000, to ride against any amateur lady in England, as follows:—to ride from Ampthill to Birmingham in twelve hours, using two horses: to ride four miles over Newmarket course; to a four mile steeplechase over Hertfordshire, or to hunt the Hur.ley foxhounds in October next, and to kill a fox with them.

A medical practitioner named Plowden, who eloped from Brighton a few weeks since, was arrested at New York on the 7th inst., at the instance of a Colonel Howard, also residing at Brighton, who preferred a charge against the doctor of having fraudulently obtained £2000 from him previous to his departure. The doctor, who asserted that the money had been lent to him by the colonel, was sent to goal.

A gentleman trolling last week in the Gareloch, Dumbartonshire, for trout, hooked a monster of the shark species, common in warm latitudes, but a stranger here. After a fearful struggle it was at length subdued, and was found to measure 7 feet 7 inches in length. The fish was immediately upon its capture six young ones launched themselves from the parent into the water.

The Kilkenny Moderator says that, on Friday week morning, between the hours of six and seven o'clock, a heavy shower, which lasted for upwards of twenty minutes, fell over that city and a considerable district adjoining. This rain proved, upon examination, to have been of almost an inky blackness, and the appearance of being impregnated with some foreign matter. In the last year of the cholera they were visited by a similar shower; and in the popular superstitions the appearance of that dreadful disease was largely attributed to the current rain.

Amongst the distinguished persons who have visited the Surrey Zoological Gardens within the last few days were his Excellency the Neapolitan Minister and the Princess Carini. Their Excellencies inspected and appeared much pleased with the panoramic view of Mount Etna.

The Courrier du Havre of the 19th states that the Fusori, Government cutter, has just captured and brought into Havre three English fishing-boats, which were dredging for oysters on French ground.

Dr. Petersen, the director of the observatory at Altona, announces his discovery of a small telescopic comet in the constellation Cephens on the 17th inst. At 12h. 43m. mean time its right ascension was 22 deg. 31m. 30s., and its north declination 71 deg. 13m. The hourly motion in right ascension is stated to be rather more than three seconds, diminishing, and the motion in declination in the same interval 9m. 22s. towards the north pole. Dr. Peterson is the discoverer of several other comets.

Among the passengers who went out in the Bentinck, which left Southampton last week with the Indian mail, was a party of coal-miners to work the coal-mines at Labuan, in Borneo.

At the ordinary meeting of the committee for the relief of destitution in the highlands and islands of Scotland, a number of communications were read tending to show that the necessity for assistance was of the most urgent nature—that the patient uncomplaining attitude of the people in the midst their of misery was most praiseworthy, and that there has been a complete abstinence from any act of outrage on their part. It was resolved, finally, to transmit the balance in hand to the most distressed districts, and to make a further appeal to the public, and to solicit the aid of benevolent ladies in organising a "fancy sale."

A parliamentary document, which has been printed, states that the increase of persons employed during the year 1851 in all the public offices was 732, of whom 647 were added to the Post office, and 71 to the convict establishment: the consequence of expense was £34,469. The dimension which was effected during the same period in the number of officials was 122, and in the expenditure the decrease amounts to £51,442.

The convention between her Majesty and the King of the Netherlands relative to the commercial intercourse between the Netherlands and the Ionian Islands, which was signed at London on the 14th of January, 1852, has been laid before both Houses of Parliament.

Rossi, the ex-Dictator of Rome, Ancona, Cypres, is at present staying at the Windsor Hotel, Southampton. He is about to take up his residence at Bury House, Marchwood, on the south side of Southampton Water, late the residence of Lady Mill.

Emigration from Woolwich is rapidly increasing, even among some of the tradesmen and mechanics employed under Government, to seek "golden treasures" at California. During the week a large number left their native shores for the land of gold.

The committee which has sat for some weeks on the water bills, owing mainly to the number of counsel engaged by the companies, has cost not less than £900 per diem, a sum which, no matter how bad the water may be, John Bull, in some form or other, will have to pay

A petition was recently presented to the House of Commons from William Redmond, for the amendment of a law to make Peers of the realm who may interfere with the election of members of Parliament liable to transportation for life.

During a strong gale from the north-east, a few nights ago, the Union, or Carnarvon, sailed with bricks, was wrecked off Penmon Point. Fortunately, the master and one man were drowned. A large schooner was discovered in the bay dismasted, and otherwise damaged. A tug-boat went to her assistance, and succeeded in towing her into a place of safety.

The New York Evening Post says of Feargus O'Connor, "This eccentric gentleman, whose arrival in tas Europa we have announced, has been reported in the English newspapers to be insane. We should think, from some of his early proceedings in this country, that the report is not far out of the way. He strolled into Stewart's store on Friday, as we are informed, and, chucking a handsome young woman among the purchasers under the chin, asked how she would like a moustache? He was ejected from the premises, and afterwards returned, but did not renew any of his wild tricks."

(a) P to K B 4 h would have been a still more troublesome move, as White's only safe reply appears to be P to K Kt 3d, which would have greatly weakened his position on the K's side. If, instead of playing his K Kt P, he ventured to attack the Black Queen by moving his Bishop to K Kt 5th, White must have won a piece; for, e.g.—

BLACK.	WHITE.
16. P to K B 4 h	B to K Kt 5th
17. P to K 5th	B takes P
	Any other move equally loses the Bishop.

18. P to K B 5th, &c.

(b) We should rather have taken with the Bishop, and retained the Knight.

(c) If he had now played P to Q R 3d, Mr. Schumoff would have experienced some anxiety, we suspect, for the extinction of his Bishop; for suppose—

BLACK.	WHITE.
20.	P to Q R 3d
21. R to Q B sq, or (A)	B to Q 2d
22. R to Q B 3d

If he play Q to her B 3d, White may respond with R to Q B sq, and win the exchange at least,

22.	P to Q Kt 4th
23. Q to Q B 2d

If he take the Q Kt P with his Bishop, White plays the Queen to her Kt 8d, giving check, and then captures the Bishop.

BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.
23.	P to Q B h	23. Q to Q B 3d	P to Q 7th
24. R to Q B 5th	P to Q 6th	And wins the Bishop.

(A) BLACK.	WHITE.
21. P to K B 5th	B to Q B sq
22. R to Q B 3d

If, instead of this, he ventures to take the Q Pawn with his Bi hop, White wins the Bishop at once by Q to her B 4th (ch) &c.

BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.
22.	B to Q 3d	24. P takes P	P to Q Kt 4th
23. P to K 6 h	P takes P	25. Q to her B 2d

If Q takes Q B P, White wins by Q to K B 5th, &c.

BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.
22.	Q to her Kt 3d (ch)	27. P to K 7th	R to K B 2d
23. K to R sq	Q takes B	And White must win.

(d) Q to her 5th would certainly have been better, because it would have compelled Black to remove his Rook out of play. As they have given, for White to march his own Rook into the adverse territory. Let us suppose, for example—

BLACK.	WHITE.
26.	Q to her 5 h
27. R to K Kt sq

This seems to be his best move. If R to Q Kt sq, or to Q R sq, White can take the Q Kt P; if R to K B sq, he can play R to Q B 7th, and if R to K sq, White will win by Q to K 8th, followed by R to Q B 8th.

27.	R to Q B 7th
And Rook must lose his Pawns.

CONDITIONS FOR ASSISTED EMIGRATION TO AUSTRALIA.

The restrictions which the Government Emigration Commissioners put upon the grant of free or assisted passages to Australia having formed the subject of several letters of remonstrance to the daily papers, the following explanation has been volunteered by the Commissioners on the subject:—

The most eligible class of emigrants are married agricultural labourers, shepherds, or herdsmen, and women of the working class; and these are taken up to the age of 45 (and 35, as stated by your correspondent), at £1 per head, between 45 and 50, at £5 per head, and between 50 and 60 (when they are comparatively useless to the colony), at £11 per head

The next best class are married mechanics and artisans, and these, with their wives, are taken up to 45, at £3; between 45 and 50, at £6; and between 50 and 60, at £14 The children of both these classes, under 14, pay 10s. a head.

But single men, if accompanying their parents, are required to pay £2 a head, and if not accompanying their parents, £3 a head; and of the latter very few are taken, both because they are the most likely at once to resort to the gold fields, and because there is already so great an excess of males in Australia, and the unrestricted emigration is so certain to add to that excess, that it becomes a matter of great importance to avoid as much as possible anything which would increase the disparity. Families with more than four children under 12 are also considered ineligible, both because a number of young children retard the engagements of the parents in the colony, and because their presence on shipboard tends to engender sickness and to increase mortality.

Having given this explanation, I have only to add that the funds by which emigration to Australia is carried on are furnished exclusively from the land revenue of the Australian colonies; that in the administration of those funds the Commissioners are, therefore, as trustees for the colonies, and are bound to prevent their perversion to purposes of relief in this country, instead of the supply of the most eligible class of emigrants for colonial purposes; that the rules which your correspondent's letter has been established with this object, and in accordance with the suggestions and instructions received from time to time from the official organs of the Government in the colonies; and that, by reports received from the colonies, those rules appear to have hitherto succeeded in effecting their object.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

S. WALCOTT, Secretary.

Colonial Land and Emigration Office, 8, Park-street, Westminster, May 24.

INDIAN MAIL SERVICE viâ THE CAPE.—A notice has been issued from the General Post Office, announcing that, on and after the 15th of June next, the mail packets of the General Screw Steam Shipping Company, conveying mails to the Cape of Good Hope, will call at Ascension, and will proceed from the Cape to Mauritius, Point de Galle (Ceylon), and Calcutta. All letters and newspapers for Ascension or for Mauritius will hereafter be forwarded by these packets, unless specially addressed to be otherwise sent; but letters for Ceylon or India intended to be sent by the route must be specially addressed "viâ the Cape of Good Hope." Letters for all these British possessions will be liable to the uniform rate of 1s. when not exceeding half an ounce in weight, 2s. when not exceeding one ounce, and so on in proportion, but newspapers will be conveyed free from charge. The postage chargeable upon letters for Ascension and Mauritius must be paid in advance, but letters for Ceylon and India forwarded by these packets may be posted unpaid.

From a report to the House of Commons, it appears that on the 1st of September last there were 6939 drivers of hackney carriages licensed, including 1061 proprietors. The amount received for the licenses, at 8s. each, was £15609 15s.

Professor Bache, superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, has communicated to the Secretary of the Treasury the magnetic variations at certain positions on the Pacific coast, which must prove interesting to the navigators. GOLD IN AUSTRALIA.

THE following is the interesting communication from an accredited Correspondent, to which we referred in our Journal of last week:—

SKETCHES IN THE DIGGINGS.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

Chepstow, Mount Emu, January, 6th, 1852.

As the gold mines of this colony (Port Phillip) are bidding fair to eclipse any that have yet been discovered, I have thought it likely that you would be pleased to receive some description of them, together with a few dottings of the scenes which I sketched on the spot. These mines have not been discovered rather more than three months. The presence of gold in the locality of the Pyrenees—a range of hills about thirty miles from the present diggings—had been ascertained about three years previously; why researches for gold for a considerable space of time before he was rewarded by finding any. After its discovery a few hundred people commenced working at it; but their profits were so small and their work so hard, that they soon became nearly abandoned. A rich lode, however, was at last discovered by following a mountain torrent far back into the mountains round Buninyong, and treating the ground upon its banks as they seemed to lie. The place where it was at last discovered so plentifully was termed "Golden Point." The forest here opens a little, and a steep, gravelly bank slopes down to this small stream. A dense crowd of lofty ranges rise all round this spot. The Golden Point itself, where all the mining at the digging is, does not cover an area of more than five or six acres; yet, within a month after the spot was discovered, 7000 people were at work upon it, wholesale employed; and, it is said, were raising £10,000 daily. Subsequent diggings in this district have far eclipsed this one; however; but, as there has been no spot, probably, in the annals of gold-seeking, where so large a number of people were at work in so small a space, and where the whole was, consequently, so completely under the eye at once, I shall confine any description I may give to these diggings, viz. the Ballarat diggings, near Buninyong. This Buninyong hill, which forms the centre of all the ranges that spread out for many miles on each side of it, is a dry volcanic hill, about 2000 feet above the level of the sea, covered to the top with heavy timber, and surrounded for many miles with a dense forest. Deep, rocky gullies branch out from it in various directions, and many of the principal streams which water Port Phillip take their rise in its ranges. At its base upon one side may be seen the picturesque falls of Lal Lal, over which, in winter, the swollen stream of the Moorabool precipitates itself. The height of these falls is about 250 feet, and the scenery which surrounds them is exceedingly beautiful.

The forest in the immediate neighbourhood of the mines is composed chiefly of the stringy bark, a species of eucalyptus, whose trunks frequently rise to the height of 80 or 90 feet before branching. Under the shelter of these forests, and formed principally of the bark from the trees, the miners erect their hastily-constructed tents, &c., into streets, passing roads in all directions for the passage of horses, carts, and passengers. Numerous stores, butchers' shops, blacksmiths, and all trades, are to be found on the ground, though the prices for merchandise are much of any higher than in Melbourne.

The scene at the Buninyong diggings was, at the time that I visited it, a most extraordinary one. The sight of such a vast number of people actively employed, all busily working for themself, and those carrying earth in its dishes to the water, wheeling it in barrows, carrying it on trucks or carting it—every individual member working with an energy which few but gold-diggers would exhibit—every one working for himself, and therefore doing his utmost; the confused roar of upwards of 500 cradles at work by the stream side; and the sight of the township, every spare foot between every hut or tent in which was a yawning pit, the whole covered over by the canopy of the lofty forest, formed a scene that can hardly be paralleled or described. In a most wretched-looking wigwam, formed chiefly of leaves and bark, I found her Majesty's representatives, Captain Dana, commandant of the black police, and Mr. Armstrong, the assistant Gold Commissioner. The latter gentleman, formerly a Port Phillip squatter, had emigrated to California, where, after three years successful digging, he knew he had returned amply remunerated for his exertion. His knowledge of the habits of regulating the diggings in California rendered his services opportune; and to the judicious appointment of him as Commissioner may be greatly attributed the system and regularity which prevails in the working of these mines.

In procuring the gold, a considerable quantity of earth is first dug in the pit, and thrown up on the bank. If the pit is a rich one, the digger will see and pick out the larger pieces of gold, called nuggets, as he proceeds; these vary in size from a pea to a nut; large and beautiful specimens being also occasionally found imbedded in pieces of quartz. When sufficient earth is raised, the whole of it is conveyed to the creek side; small quantities of this are at intervals put into the cradle, which is then gently rocked and supplied with water by the washer. The cradle is a box about four feet by two, and two feet deep; one corner of it is fitted up with a coarse sieve into which the earth is first put, and the coarse stones and gravel separated from the earth which passes through it; this earth, constantly moistened with water and rocked, dissolves, and the sediment poured off leaves at the bottom the particles of gold dust. The poorer diggers wash with a tin dish only, but of course take a much longer time in getting through the same quantity of earth.

Since making the above sketches, the new and still more wonderful locality of Mount Alexander, about forty miles beyond the Buninyong diggings, has become known. The wonders of these diggings is almost past belief. About six weeks they have been in existence. Nearly 30,000 people are at work at them, and I believe I am safe in saying that nearly the whole of this number have become more or less enriched by them. The escort vehicle from this place has more than once broken down under the weight of half tuns of gold, although it is notorious that only a small portion of what is found goes down by this conveyance. I will not add more for the present.

I remain, &c.,

EDWARD C. DUNN.

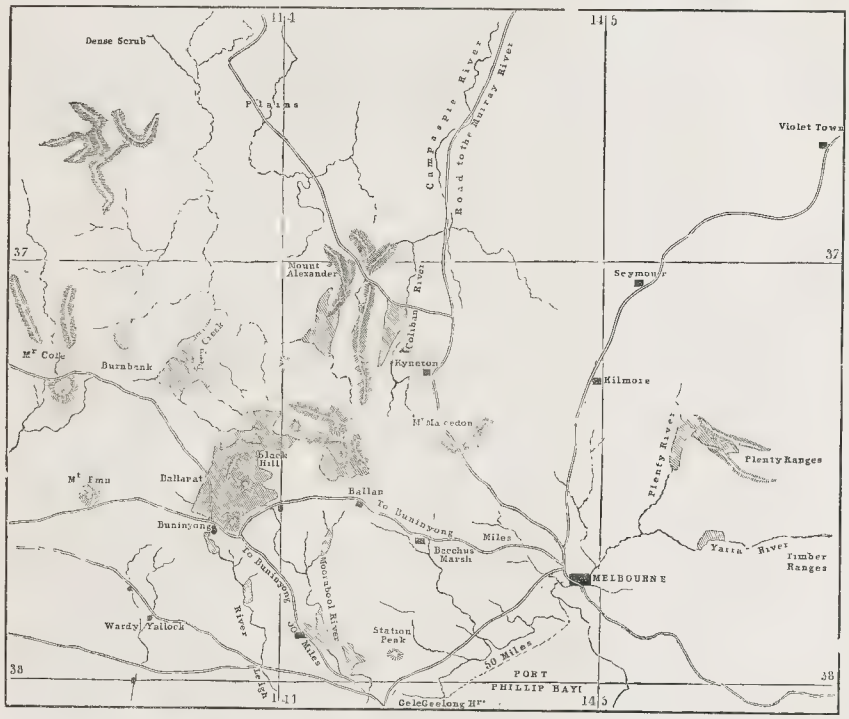
MAP OF THE DISTRICT.

We have been favoured by a Correspondent with the accompanying

GOLD IN AUSTRALIA.—PORT PHILLIP DISTRICT.

BUNINYONG HILL.

GOLD DIGGERS RESTING.



MAP OF THE PORT PHILLIP GOLD FIELDS.

valuable and original Map of the Gold Fields of Port Phillip, together with two letters, addressed to Messrs. Silva and Phillipps, London, from which the following are extracts:—

Geelong, Nov. 11, 1851.

I enclose a small Map of the district, to give you an idea of the localities where gold is found and is being worked: it is taken from a Government survey made last year, with the gold discoveries carefully marked down, and I can vouch for its accuracy and the correctness of the distances. Ballarat is near the township of Buniyong, within 58 miles of Geelong. The Mount Alexander diggings lie equidistant between Melbourne and Geelong. Besides these well-known diggings there are many parties working in secluded spots and doing well. The whole of the Buniyong district, and 60 miles to the northward, is completely auriferous.

Two young friends of mine, who were clerks in mercantile houses here, both left their situations and sloped for the diggings. After working unsuccessfully for a fortnight they came to the stratum wherein was a large pocket (as it is termed) of gold. This they dug out, washed, and then worked the remainder of the pit, and in less than another fortnight realised £400 each man. Another instance was a man named Kavenagh, whom I have often employed as a carrier up the country for Mr. Shepherd. He and his party came down a few weeks ago and sold their gold for £1366 10s. 6d., being the produce of six men's labour for three weeks. To these I can add a long catalogue of successful miners. On the other hand, the lot would be ten times longer of the men who have been unsuccessful, or who have had but indifferent luck.

I was with a party for a fortnight, and took my turn each day at the pick and shovel, and rocking the cradle, but without joke it is a most laborious occupation. We have to sink holes from fifteen to twenty-five feet in depth before we can get much gold, sometimes it has been obtained at four feet. At one locality, called Blackhill, we obtained it by washing the surface earth, but it was rather a dangerous operation; only imagine clambering a mountain very steep, and then bringing down sacks of earth on our shoulders to the creek for washing!

The miners will soon become dispersed now, and not again be collected in one hive as they have hitherto been.

I felt some degree of alarm at the outset when I saw our towns deserted—mechanics, labourers, clerks, and their masters all off to the gold fields; but I soon began to take a calm review of the whole affair, and see that it is producing good results to the community at large. Let shipbrokers know that if they put vessels for Geelong, say small barques or brigs, that they can be brought over the Bar, right up to the wharfs, if drawing no more than ten feet six inches. At good spring tides vessels of eleven feet and a half can come over the Bar.

We are very indignant at the delay in establishing steam communication. Perhaps, after all, the Yankee will get the start. The slavers thrown out of employment will be making a prize of a gold ship one of these days—one or two would pay.

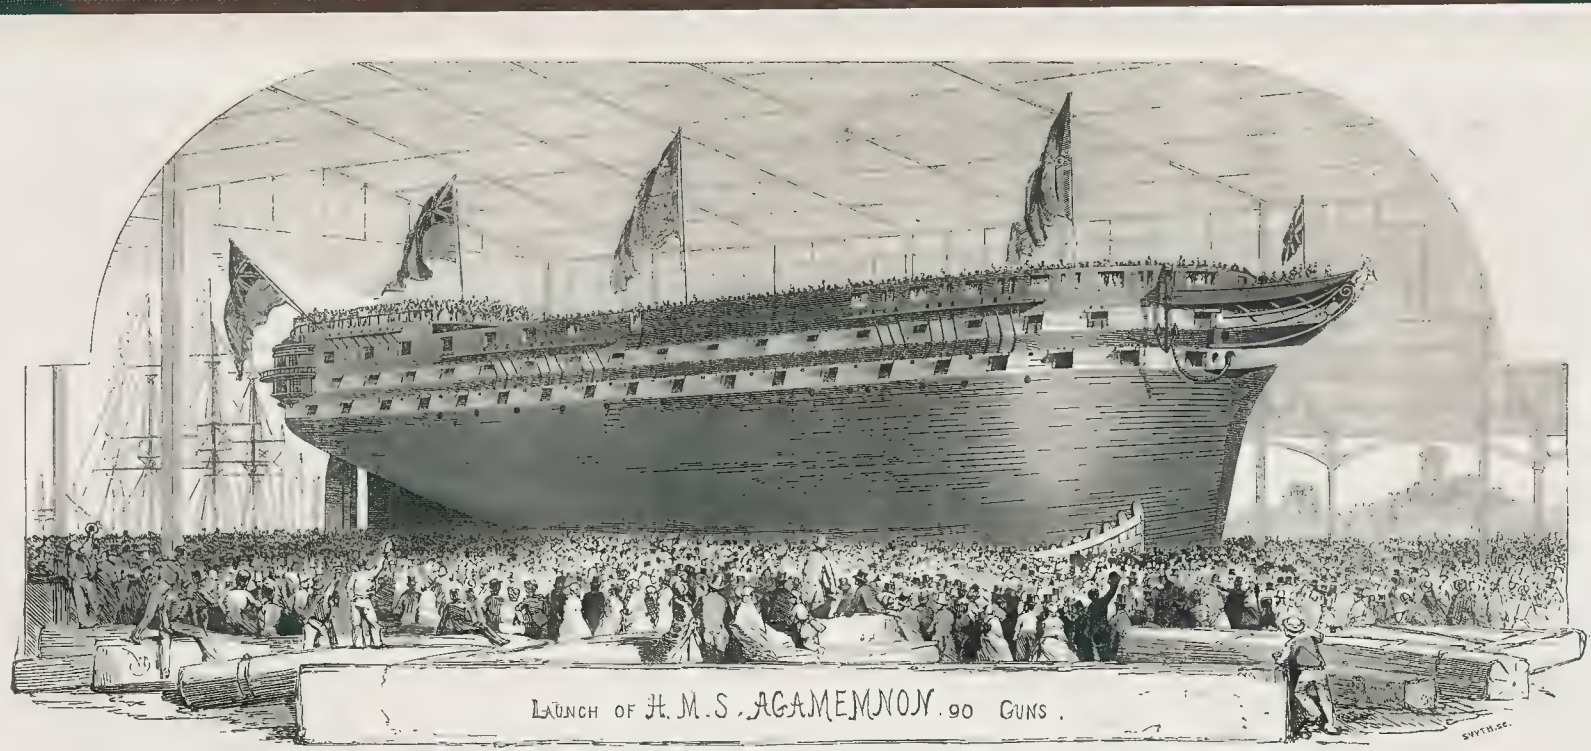
* * * *

Nothing will foster republicanism sooner than these golden successes. The Australian people will grow too independent for their rulers.

Yours, &c., E. J.

WASHING GOLD.

MODES OF CARRYING THE GOLD.



On Saturday afternoon the launch of the Agamemnon, line of battle screw steam-ship, 90 guns, and 600-horse power, took place with great ceremony at the Royal Dockyard Woolwich. Long before the time for letting the "ship loose," thousands of spectators took up their position in various parts of the interior of the Dockyard, while the river presented a most animated appearance. The Monarch, guard-ship, and all the Government steamers lying in the river abreast of Woolwich, were bedecked with colours, and almost every other vessel within sight of the Dockyard was similarly decorated. Thanks to the regulations of the Lords of the Admiralty, the officials of the Dockyard were forbidden erecting galleries round the "slip," and shutting out all view of the launch to the public, as on former occasions. The public had access to the open space in front, where they had an uninterrupted view of the whole preparations.

The Agamemnon was designed at the office of the Surveyor of the Navy (Sir Baldwin Walker), and is intended to possess the twofold advantage of being as perfectly equipped for a sailing-vessel as other men-of-war of her own class; while, at the same time, she will (unaided by sails) be an efficient screw-steamer, being supplied with engines of 600-horse power. With these two distinct locomotive properties, she will always be under command, independently of wind and weather. Her armament will be very formidable. She will mount 36 eight-inch guns on the gun-deck, 34 heavy 32-pounders on the main-deck, and 20 32-pounders on the quarter-deck and forecastle, and she will be manned with a crew of about 850 men. Her dimensions are as follows:—In extreme, or from figure-head to taffrail, 266 feet; length between the perpendiculars, 230 feet; length of keel for tonnage, 195 feet 2½ inches; breadth extreme, 55 feet; breadth moulded, 53 feet; depth in engine-room, 24 feet; burden in tons, 3102, old measurement.

At half-past two o'clock on Saturday, the Duke of Northumberland, First Lord of the Admiralty, with the Duchess of Northumberland, the Earl of Hardwicke, the Earl of Wilton, Lord Grosvenor, Lord Ellesmere, and a number of the nobility, arrived at the Dockyard; Mr. Augustus Stafford, Secretary at the Admiralty; Captain W. A. B. Hamilton, Second Secretary; and Captain Pelham, Private Secretary to the First Lord, left the residence of Commodore Henry Eden, with Mrs. Eden, and proceeded to the bow of the Agamemnon, where a bottle of wine was uncorked, and Mrs. Eden drank success to the Agamemnon. The bottle with the remainder of the wine was then suspended and broken on the bow of the vessel in the usual manner by Mrs. Eden, who named her the Agamemnon. The shipwrights, under Mr. Lang's direction, immediately after commenced driving out the blocks from under the vessel, and at seven minutes past three o'clock the Agamemnon began to move slowly, and, as she progressed, gradually quickened her pace, and entered the water amidst the cheers of the assembled thousands in the Dockyard, on the river, and on the opposite bank of the Thames, the band of the Royal Marines on the platform, and the band of the Dockyard battalion on board, playing "Rule Britannia" and "God save the Queen." It was a truly splendid sight, and every one appeared delighted with the spectacle.

There were upwards of 1000 persons on board the Agamemnon when she went off the stocks, including the band of the Royal Dockyard Battalion, the pensioners who had served in the old Agamemnon, and more than 500 admitted by cards, besides the riggers and others under M'Donald, Master-Attendant, who had the charge of bringing the vessel to her moorings when afloat.

The ship, after quitting the dock, reached nearly across the river to the Essex shore. She was then hove into the stream with the Royal standard flying at her main, the union jack at the fore, and the Admiralty ensign at the mizen. Not the slightest accident occurred to mar the pleasures of the day.

The Agamemnon was built very rapidly, her keel having only been laid in December, 1849. Her engines, of 600-horse power, are to be fitted by John Penn and Son, on their patent trunk-engine principle, and are of the same description, but double the number of horse power, as those fitted by the same firm in her Majesty's steam-frigates Arrogant and Encounter. Although the order for the machinery of the Agamemnon was given only in September last, the works are already sufficiently forward to begin to fix them on board, and a boiler will be alongside by the time the ship is taken into the basin. The whole of the machinery and boilers will be considerably under the water-line, the depth in the engine-room being 24 feet 6 inches.

CYCLONE.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS*.)*

HAVING frequently observed in your Journal accounts of hurricanes encountered by ships, I forward you a statement communicated to me by the owners, Messrs. Somes; being an extract from a letter just received by them from the master of their ship Equestrian, bound from the East Indies to England.

Captain Robertson very justly remarks, that the direction in which this Cyclone was moving was different from that which Cyclones generally supposed to take, as it is very unusual for them to commence recurving so far to the eastward of the Mauritius as the longitude 85. It is therefore desirable, that, for the warning of future voyagers, this instance should be made known through the medium of your very extensive circulation.

Had this Cyclone continued in a W.S.W. course, as was to have been expected, no position could have been more favourable than the Equestrian's for making the most of a fair wind; but it appears to have recurved very suddenly, and on recurving to have moved southward very rapidly, whereas, whilst recurving, Cyclones generally move very slowly, consequently the Equestrian was involved in it before she had time to run on ahead out of its way.

F. P. B. M.

P.S.—I have been favoured by Messrs. R. and H. Green with the following extract from the log of their ship Nile, which appears to have run across the Equator into the hinder part of this Cyclone.

"The Nile, from Madras to England, on the 25th December, had light breezes; at noon she was in lat. 0·2° N., long., 81 46 E.; bar., 29.98.; therm., 79; P.M.: variable breezes at N.N.W. and West.

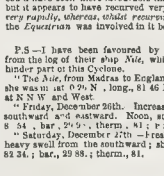
"Friday, December 26th. Increasing westerly breezes, with a long heavy swell from the southward and eastward. Noon, squally with rain; lat. obs., 2 32. S.; long. chron., 8 54., bar., 29·5·., therm., 81; P.M., fresh breezes at S.W., and squally, with rain.

"Saturday, December 27th.—Fresh westerly breezes, with hard puffs and squalls, with a heavy swell from the southward; ship pitching heavily. Lat. obs., 5 38. S.; long. chron., 82 34.; bar., 29 88.; therm., 81.

"Messrs. R. and H. GREEN."

"St. Helena, Feb. 14th, 1852.

"Gentlemen,—I regret to have to announce to you an unfortunate disaster to the Equestrian in a hurricane she encountered on Christmas-day, in about lat. 16 south and nearly long. 84 east. On the afternoon of the 24th December, the wind, which had been blowing fresh from the eastward for some time before, increased as the sun went down to a hard gale at E.N.E with a very high and troubled sea, and thick drift and rain. We had sent down the royal yards, close-reefed the sails, and furled every thing but the close-reefed fore and main topsail and foresail, under which sail I thought to be able to run, keeping the wind as much on the port quarter as the sea would permit us, and so to edge to the south, clear of the centre (should this be the verge of the Cyclone).

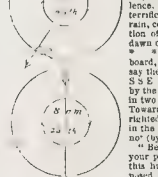


* * * Unfortunately for us, this hurricane, as I can fully prove, was progressing a contrary [Qu. different.—ED.] direction from that which they are generally supposed to take, and to the south-eastward, consequently across our path, however we might be placed.

"About nine P.M. the maintopsail began to go: this with some difficulty was got and secured, the wind increasing rapidly. Before midnight the foresail and fore-topsail both were taken away, and the ship laid in the trough of the sea helpless, the wind now howling over her with fearful violence. The sea high, very high before, had now risen to a terrific height, but from the dense mass of foam, drift, and rain, could only be judged from the excessively violent motion of the ship. The wind if possible increasing, and at dawn of day its violence was beyond my power of description.

* * * About ten A.M. the mizen top-mast went by the board, taking part of the top with it, and at noon I may say the hurricane was at its height, and had veered to S.S.E. gradually. Between one and two the mainmast went by the rigging, and mainyard with a dreadful crash broke in two across the bulwarks, and doing much damage. * * * Towards sunset it began to abate; and when the ship righted there could not have been less than four feet of water in the hold, by the time I took to pump her out. We could not (by feats) ascertain by sounding. * * *

"Before concluding, I hope I shall not be trespassing on your patience by the following remarks, to show why I think this hurricane was travelling contrary to the generally supposed rule they take according to storm writers:—They give it as a general rule that hurricanes here move to W.S.W., and according to them, with the wind as we had it at midnight, E.N.E., would place us to the S.S.E. quarter, and in a position not to be injured by a hurricane moving south and west, and, as it moved, would change our wind to the northward. Our changes were as follows:—Midnight, 24th, E.N.E.: 4 A.M. 25th E.S.E., 8 A.M., S.E., noon, S.S.E., and so round: so that, allowing the rotatory system correct, to give us the changes, laying dead as we were, it must have come up from N.N.W. to N.W., and very rapidly. The barometer only commenced falling about 4 P.M., and 29 10 was its lowest range.



"I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

"JOHN ROBERTSON, Master of the Equestrian."

NEW TOWN-HALL AND CORN MARKET, HEMEL HEMPSTEAD, HERTS

THE populous market-town of Hemel Hempstead, delightfully situated on the side of a hill sloping down to the rich valley of the Gade, has one of the largest "pitched markets" in the county for corn, but appears to have hitherto been but ill provided with a market-house. The Town-hall, which has lately been taken down, was a long narrow building, with an open space under for the market, the erection of which dated from the reign of Henry VIII., by whom the charter of incorporation for a weekly market was granted to the town. It fronted the churchyard, in the middle of which is the fine cross-church, partly of Norman architecture, of which the west door is one of the richest specimens in the county.

At the beginning of last year the inhabitants determined to rebuild the Town-hall, and at the same time to combine with it a more commodious Market, which the increasing trade of the town urgently demanded. Accordingly a new edifice was commenced in July last, and has just been completed. It is entirely supported on piers and arches, and has a frontage of 88 feet next the High-street. The lower portion of the building is appropriated to the Corn-market, held on Thursdays; and the southern archway forms the principal approach to the church. The access to the principal floor is from a spacious stone staircase situate at the northern end of the building, leading into an ante-room from which the Hall is approached.

The Town-hall, 50 feet long, 25 feet wide, and 25 feet high, is lighted from five mullioned windows, looking on to the High-street. The sides of the Hall are ornamented with a range of moulded pilasters, supporting a deep cornice, running entirely round the room. The ceiling is coved, and has an enriched soffit and centre flowers, from which hang two elegant chandeliers.

Adjoining the Town-hall is a Magistrates'-room, 15 feet wide and 26 feet long, lighted from windows looking on to the High-street and into the churchyard.

The style of architecture adopted is that which was prevalent during the reign of James I.; and the materials used are red brick, with stone dressings and enrichments.

The building was opened to the public on Tuesday last, when the event was celebrated by a dinner in the Hall, presided over by the High Bailiff, W. Roberts, Esq., to which about 150 of the inhabitants of the town sat down. Amongst the company were Sir Astley Cooper, Bart., Dr. Bingham, and several other gentry of the surrounding neighbourhood. The Hall was tastefully decorated for the occasion with flowers, evergreens, &c

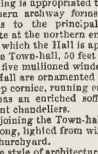
OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

JAMES, FIFTH EARL CORNWALLIS.



THIS nobleman, the last male representative of the ancient family of Cornwallis, of Brome, county Suffolk, was only surviving son of James, fourth Earl, Lord Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, and grandson of Charles Marquis Cornwallis, the well-known military commander, who died (Governor-General of India) in 1805. The deceased Peer's mother was Catherine, sister of Sir Horace Mann, Bart.; and, in her right, his Lordship changed his patronymic, in 1814, for the name of Mann. The Earl was born 30th Sept., 1778, and was thrice married: his first wife was Maria Isabella, only daughter of Francis Dickins, Esq., and by her (who died in 1823) he had a son, Charles James Viscount Brome, who died, unmarried, in 1835, aged 22; and a daughter, Lady Jemima Isabella, who wedded, in 1838, Charles Wykeham Martin, Esq., of Leeds Castle, Kent, M.P., and died in 1839. Lord Cornwallis married, secondly, 23d January, 1819, Laura, daughter of William Hayes, Esq., which lady died s. p. 3d August, 1840; and thirdly, 4th August, 1842, Julia, fourth daughter of Thomas Bacon, Esq., of Redlands, Berks, by whom (who died 4th Nov., 1847) he leaves an only child, Lady Julia Mann Cornwallis, born 3d July, 1844. The Earl died on the 31st inst.

SIR RICHARD WOLSELEY, BART.

THE Rev. Sir Richard Wolseley, fourth Baronet, of Mount Wolseley, in the county of Carlow, was born on the 15th June, 1769. He was the son of Colonel Clement Wolseley, of Wolseley Bridge, county Carlow, and succeeded to the title at the demise, unmarried, of his relative, Sir William, the third Baronet. Sir Richard, who was in holy orders, married thrice, but has left no issue. His death occurred at Cheltenham, on the 3d instant. The Wolseleys, Baronets of Mount Wolseley, are a branch of the very ancient family of the Wolseleys of Wolseley, Staffordshire. The Rev Sir Richard Wolseley is succeeded by his title and estates by his nephew, Major Clement Wolseley, the present High Sheriff of the county of Carlow.

THE HON. J. C. TALBOT, ESQ., Q.C.

THE Hon. John Chetwynd Talbot was the fourth son of Charles, second and late Earl Talbot, and brother of Henry, the present Earl. He was born the 31st May, 1806. After graduating at Christ Church, Oxford, he was called to the bar by the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn, the 27th November, 1829. He went the Oxford Circuit, and latterly attained great eminence and very considerable practice in that particular department of his profession which relates to proceedings before parliamentary committees. His profits during the railway mania must have been something enormous; and, if his continued employment be considered, they cannot be said to have much decreased since. Mr. Talbot was a Queen's Counsel, a Bencher of the Middle Temple, Recorder of Windsor, and Attorney-General to the Prince of Wales. He married, the 30th August, 1830, Caroline Jane, only surviving daughter of James Archibald, first Lord Wharncliffe, by whom he leaves issue. The hon. and learned gentleman, who was much respected and esteemed, both in public and private life, died suddenly on the 26th inst., of, it is supposed, a disease of the heart. The Hon. John Talbot bore the distinction of Count of the Holy Roman Empire.

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE BILL.

Lord CRANWORTH moved the recognition of the report on this bill, the object of which was to simplify and abridge, as far as possible, the proceedings of the courts of common law, and he ventured to say that this object had been successfully accomplished. (Hear hear)

The report was received, and the bill ordered to be printed.

THE INCOME-TAX.—THE COMMERCIAL POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The Earl of DERBY moved the second reading of the Property and Income-tax Continuance Bill. The noble Earl, having adverted to the arrangement that no measure involving a change of policy of any moment should be introduced, proceeded to say that the relief the continuance of this originally temporary measure on its necessity for the maintenance of the public credit, as, if it were repealed, there would, in all probability, be a deficit at the end of the year 1853 of five millions. He admitted that the tax was unpopular, and intrinsically unjust; and added, that if, consistently with the maintenance of the public credit, it could be dispensed with or modified, he should rejoice if it fell to the lot of his Government to submit a proposition for that purpose.

The Duke of NEWCASTLE denied that the Income-tax was a temporary measure in the sense asserted by Lord Derby. It had been originated, as the noble Earl, having himself been a colleague of the late Sir R. Peel, would recol ect, to enable the Government of the day to deal with the other branches of revenue in such a manner as that these revenues might eventually recover themselves, after which the tax might be dispensed with, but it was not then contemplated that the revenue would recover itself so speedily as the noble Earl would now wish the House to believe. With regard to the state of the country, the noble Earl seemed to anticipate ruin from the continuance of our present policy; but he (the Duke of Newcastle) could see no indications of ruin, but, on the contrary, increasing prosperity, in spite of the remission of taxation to the amount of £1,500,000. The noble Duke then went into statistical details as to the reduction of the duties on corn, as to the influx of gold into this country, as to the increased consumption of sugar, and as to the repeal of the Navigation Laws; but coincided in warning Lord Derby, that, however much he might desire in the next session of Parliament to repeal or modify the Income-tax, he might not attempt to effect his object by re-imposing import duties on the food of the people. The noble Earl boasted of being the champion of Conservatism against Democracy, but he had no right to assume that the bill he should have made a clean breast of it, and abandoned all intention of restoring the Corn Laws and tampering with our commercial system. A Conservative policy was a policy of progress; but a Government of reaction, however slow, was a Government of revolution.

Lord BEAUMONT denied that the dim nution of pauperism was general, and quoted Norfolk as an exception to the legal rule.

Lord WORTHOUSE gave his experience in favour of the statement of the Duke of Newcastle.

The Earl of ALBEMARLE bore testimony to the improved condition of the agricultural labourers, and the improvement in agriculture under Free Trade.

Earl GRANVILLE complained of the brevity of the Premier's introductory statement, and called for some definite explanation of the future policy of Ministers. He wished to know whether it was or was not the intention of the Government to continue the policy of the late Sir Robert Peel, for up to the present moment the country was quite in the dark on that point, though Lord Derby had made a speech in which he had said that the present system was mischievous, and that the maintenance of a duty on corn for purposes of revenue and Protection was a matter of necessity.

The Earl of DERBY.—The noble Earl s quite wrong in supposing that I said a duty on foreign corn was a matter of necessity. I stated that, for the purpose at once of relieving the suffering agricultural interest, and also for the purpose of improving the revenue, and thereby enabling us to take off other taxes without injury to the consumer, I thought it might be desirable to impose a moderate fixed duty on foreign corn. I distinctly stated that that was my own opinion. I did not say that it was a matter of necessity; but I stated that, whether the relief should be given by the imposition of a duty upon foreign corn was a matter which rested upon the judgment of the constituencies, but that I thought that was a desirable mode of affording relief to the agricultural classes. I hold to that opinion still; but I state again, that that is a question which must be left to the constituencies of the country; and, moreover, if it give any satisfaction to the noble Earl, I may state that I am not personally opposed, my opinion is, from what I have since heard and learned, there certainly will not be in favour of the imposition of a duty on foreign corn that extensive majority without which, as I stated to your Lordships at the beginning of the session, it would not be desirable to propose it. (Loud cheers from the opposition benches.)

Earl GRANVILLE expressed the gratification he felt at having been the means of drawing from the noble Earl a statement so satisfactory as that which they had just heard.

After a desultory conversation, in which the Marquis of CLANRICARDE, the Earl of DERBY, and the Duke of NEWCASTLE took part, as the Lords were having been summoned for the discussion of so important a matter as the Income-tax,

Earl GREY, in reference to what had fallen from the noble Earl at the head of the Government, said that he would have been glad if the noble Earl had given as satisfactory a statement with regard to sugar as he had with respect to the Corn Laws and the Navigation Laws; and, after referring to the intimation given in the other House of the proposibility of a return to Protection in reference to the colonial produce, quoted returns to show, that, as the discriminating duties ceased, the quantity of sugar produced in all our colonies had gone on increasing. He relied on the Prime Minister to know that he had been wrong in his course for the last six years, or to show his faith in his principles, by standing out fairly, now he was in power, to carry them out.

The Earl of DERBY said, it was own opinion remained unchanged; and though he was compelled to admit that the consuming classes had been benefited by Free Trade, it had been at the expense of the producing classes, upon whom that policy had entailed great suffering; and he should not, in his duty, whenever opportunity offered of doing so with success, to bring forward measures of relief to that interest.

The Duke of ARGYLL denied that as a class the producers had suffered. He expressed satisfaction at the intimation of Lord Derby, that the country would not give him a majority to favour of Protection at the coming election; and as that intimation amounted in effect to an abandonment of that policy, he pressed on his Lordship that no disadvantage could result to him if he would honestly declare that it was finally abandoned, and that no future attempt would be made to press on a reluctant people measures which he believed would be fatal to the safety of the country.

The bill was then read a second time, and their Lordships adjourned at half-past 10 o'clock.

He wished to ask the right hon. gentleman if he intended to proceed with the park bill; and, if so, whenever opportunity offered of doing so with success, to bring forward measures of relief to that interest.

The Chancellor of the EXCHEQUER said that the new estimate had been referred to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and that the Government had received the new estimate to which the hon. gentleman had referred; but he was sorry to say that upon examining it he did not feel himself justified in bringing in a bill during the present session to carry out that policy, he pressed on his Lordship that no disadvantage could result to him if he would honestly declare that it was finally abandoned, and that no future attempt would be made to press on a reluctant people measures which he believed would be fatal to the safety of the country.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The ensuing week, if wanting in a "Derby," will be a great one at Manchester, where three days of first rate sport, with large fields and plenty of betting, may be relied on; in sporting, as in commerce, things are always carried on in a grand and liberal scale in Lancashire. The other fixtures are:—Wye and South Shields on Monday; Epping Town and Erith on Tuesday; Lenham and Coggeshall on Wednesday, Southwell and Dean on Thursday; and Deversions on Friday.

The Cricket register is unusually full; it embraces the following interesting matches:—Monday: Sussex against England, at Lord's. Tuesday: Middles between the Kingsbury Cricket and Clarendon Club, at West Wickham. Wednesday: The Oval and Clapham Club, at the Oval; and the Surrey v. the Brunshill Club, at Brunshill. Thursday: The M. C. C. and the University, at Oxford; Nottingham v. Surrey, at the Surrey Ground; and the Vine v. Pinnaeri, on the Vine. Saturday: The Odd v. the Present Harrovians, at Harrow. The only aquatic fixture of any public interest is the Hammersmith Regatta, on Monday.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—Although the last public day, the attendance was moderate, and the betting slack. The only horses in force were the two favourites; Stockwell and Somersaby, Asgyr, Achille, King of Trumps, and Chief Baron Nicholson were altogether out of favour.

EPSOM RACES.

The "Epsom week" has been distinguished this year for its unpropitious weather, and the extraordinary disappointment of hopes arising from that cause.

On the first day (Tuesday), a cold north east wind and a dull sky were not sufficient to prevent a strong muster of all ranks and ages, both of "racing men" and general company, on the Downs. Among the leading members of the turf present were the Duke of Richmond; the Marquises of Exeter and Drogheda; Earls Chesterfield, Glasgow, Wilton, Airlie, Uxbridge, Zetland, March; Lords Maidstone, Anson, Enfield, Lascelles, Torrington, H. G Lennox, Exmouth, Alexander Lennox, Ribblesdale, G. Manners, Paget; Sirs R. P. Glinton, R. Peel, G. Armytage, R. Pigot, &c. The racing, as the detailed report below shows, was excellent, and seldom has there been a better "first day" at Epsom.

On Wednesday (the Derby day) there was a sad change of scene. Since the "Bloomsbury" year, when the Derby was won in a snow-storm, there has not been so great a damp thrown over the gaiety of the greatest of our metropolitan holidays as was produced by the incessant rain which, beginning at six o'clock in the morning, continued determinately until within a short time of the race. At the Derby day is a universal holiday—a real Derby, a day of disappointment that calculations; thousands, it is true, were covered, but there was no fighting for seats, nor was there any difficulty in obtaining conveyance from the Epsom terminus to the course. In spite, however, of the elements there was a great crowd on the Downs. If the hill, one of the principal features of the Epsom panorama, showed an unmistakeable falling off in the number of carriages, the Grand Stand, and the smaller ones on its right, showed little diminution in the number of visitors; the devotees of the turf were not likely to be deterred by rain from being present at a race in which their fortunes were so heavily involved, and it may be questioned if they ever mustered in greater numbers.

The Duke of Royal, titled, and fashionable company included his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, attended by Major the Hon. James Macdonald; the Duke of Richmond, the Marquises of Downshire, Clanricarde, Exeter, and Drogheda; the Earls of Rosebery, Dunraven, Eglinton, Chesterfield, Airlie, Uxbridge, Zetland, and March; Lords Maidstone, Anson, Enfield, Lascelles, Torrington, Exmouth, Henry Gordon Lennox, Alexander Lennox, Ribblesdale, G. Manners, Paget, F Fortescue, and G. Lennox; Sirs R. P. Glinton, R. Peel, J. Shelley, M. G. Armitage, R. Pigot, C. Rushout, H. Meux, W. W. Wynne, and H. Campbell; Honourables—Admiral Pakiett, General Anson, Colonel Stanley, S. Herbert, Colonel Boyle, Major Pitt, Major Needham, T. Stonor, Colonel Wyndham, H. Forrester, Agar Ellis, F Villiers, Colonel Peel, Colonel Newton; Messrs. Greville, Payne, Nevill, Basbow, Rush, Smythe, Mills, S. Graham, A. Heathcote, Milner, W. H. Williamson, Mytton, Bowyer, Wigram, Hawkins.

There was a remarkable falling off in the attendance of ladies, and their absence added materially to the gloom and dullness of the day.

The racing commenced with the Carew Stakes, to which little attent on was paid, either in or out of the ring, and which, from the same cause that delayed the starts on Tuesday, was much behind time. This having been decided, the grand race was then run for the Derby, for which 27 starters only (out of the 34 originally named) were enumerated in the card. The only change of any moment in the jockies was the substitution of W. Sharpe for Wattehouse, and the only alteration in the betting deserving special reference was in the two favourites, the Danbury nag obtaining an unequivocal lead as soon as the ring was formed in the inclosure. The horses having taken their canters proceeded to the post, and at half-past three, after a couple of failures, were started in good order. The race, which was run at anything but a great pace, was, from the distance, left to four, and terminated in the triumph of an animal from whose previous running a very different result might have been anticipated. It was at first thought in the stand that Barbarian had won, and told the expressions of triumph amongst the Irish party; and when it was ascertained that Daniel O'Rourke had first caught the judge's eye, their delight was scarcely less enthusiastic, on a noble Marquis throwing up his hat, and betraying symptoms of unrestrained gratification.

The time that was cut up to this race was recovered in those that succeeded, and by o'clock the sports were concluded.

Subjoined is an account of each day's running:—

Lord Exeter stood to win £10 with Stockwell.

A good start was effected, after a couple of failures. Little Harry, immediately after leaving the post, took a decided lead, followed by Stright leal, nearly Hobbe Noble, King Pepin, Harbinger, King of Trumps and Orelio next, and the whole lot, with the exception of Treasurer and Maidstone, lying up in very close order With one or two changes of course the race to the end, where Stockwell and King Pepin gave way, Harbinger took to a second place, and Hobbie Noble the third; next to him, in a body, coming Womersley, Chief Baron Nicholson, King of Trumps, Barbarian, Daniel O'Rourke, Alarum, Asgyr, and Stockwell; Harbinger was beaten in making the turn, and at the road Little Harry showed symptoms of distress; a few strides further he gave way, and Barbarian took a decided lead, Hobbie Noble and Chief Baron Nicholson lying second and third on the lower side, and Daniel O'Rourke fourth on their right. The race from the half distance was left to this lot; Daniel O'Rourke, who came with a rush a few strides from the corner, was easy by half a length, Barbarian beating Chief Baron Nicholson a length for the second place, and the last or beating Hobbie Noble by a head: Alcorau was fifth, King of Trumps sixth. The race was run in 3 min. 2 sec.

This horse, though bearing an Irish name, and by an Irish stallion (Birdcatcher), his dam Forget-me-Not, was bred in England. He is a small chesnut colt, most elegantly proportioned, utterly bare the facetious name, from his few admirers, of "the pony" Daniel O'Rourke is the property of John Bowes, Esq., late M.P., of Gibside, county of Durham, who was also the owner of Mundig, who won the Derby in 1835, and of Cotherstone, who won the same race in 1843. the rider on each occasion being William Scott On Wednesday last Mr. Bowes's colours were cleverly led to victory by Frank Butler, now considered to be one of the best riders of the day, albeit he never hitherto accomplished the Derby feat.

It is shown by a return to Parliament, that in the year 1851 the quantity of corn, grain, meal, and flour, &c., imported into the United Kingdom, being the aggregate of all sorts, was 24,918,624 quarters. The average price of wheat from the 5th of January, 1851, to the 4th of January ast, was 34s. 6d. in bulk or 24s. 9d., of oats 18s. 7d. or 12s 3½ d., of beans 25s. 7d., and of peas 27s. 3d. The average price at which the whole quantity of foreign corn was sold for home consumption during the year was—wheat, 8s. 2½d. imperial bushel, 3s. 10½d. barley, and 2s. 7½d oats

An "affair of honour" took place on Friday week, between the Hon. G. S. Smythe, M.P., for Canterbury, and Col. Romilly, also M.P. for the same place, and a candidate for re-election. The parties, accompanied by their respective friends, Capt. the Hon. J. G Vivian, M.P., and the Hon John Fortescue, M.P., travelled on the night of the evening by the South-Western Railway, and met at a spot upon Lord Ebrington's Hatchford estate, where, after an exchange of shots, which proved harmless, the parties returned to town without any reconciliation being effected. This arose out of some remarks that fell from Mr Smythe in his recent speech to his constituents, and which were deemed offensive to Col Romilly.

The Lord Chancellor has issued the following orders in reference to the investment of dividends and accumulations:—By virtue of the powers contained in the act of the 37 George 3, c. 135, and of all other powers enabling him in that behalf, the Right Hon. Edward Burtenshaw, Lord St. Leonard's, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, doth hereby order and direct, that the Accountant-General be at liberty, unless he shall have received, on behalf of some party claiming to be entitled, notice in writing of an intended application to this Court for other disposal of the fund, from time to time to lay out and invest the dividends on such stock when so purchased, and all accumulations thereon as the same shall accrue due, in the purchase of like Bank £3 per Cent. Annuities, or such other formal stock for the time being as the stock purchased with such dividends to the said several matters and accounts to which the original sum of stock respectively stand, and the Accountant-General is to deliver the certificate of stock purchased, subject to the further order of this Court; and for the purposes aforesaid the Accountant-General is to draw on the Bank according to the forms prescribed by the act of Parliament and the general rules and orders of this Court in that case made and provided. And in pursuance of the act of 10 and 11 Vict., it is further ordered, where any trustee desiring to pay money or transfer stock or securities into the name of the Accountant-General of the said Court, dated the 10th day of June, 1848, directed to file an affidavit intituled in the matter of the act and of the trust, setting forth certain matters and things in the said act mentioned, and also stating that to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief, the sum of £ or the stock or securities therein mentioned, and intended to be paid, transferred, or delivered to the Accountant-General, is not subject to any lien or charge in lieu of interest or otherwise, or to any claim or demand, or interest on the like stock, and all accumulations of the dividends or interest on such stock or securities, or any part thereof, or the dividends or interest on such stock or securities, or any part thereof, unless the same or some part thereof is specified in the affidavit; and that the said sum is to be paid, transferred, or delivered to the Accountant-General as an absolute fund, free from all claims and demands whatsoever, or to the effect mentioned in the said act, and if the affidavit shall contain no such statement the Accountant-General shall be at liberty to invest as soon as convenient; may be the said cash in Bank £3 per Cent. Annuities in the matter of the particular trust; or in cases of dividends or interest on stocks or securities transferred to the Court or interest on the like stock, and all accumulations of the dividends or interest on such stock or securities, the Accountant-General is to declare the trust thereof and to purchase the like stock, and without any formal order made by the Court in that behalf, and without any formal request for that purpose. And the Accountant-General is to declare the trust thereof and to purchase the like stock in the order of the Court by which the same was transferred, or otherwise as aforesaid, the Accountant-General is to draw on the Bank, according to the form prescribed by the act of Parliament and the general rules and orders of the Court in that case made and provided. Provided always, that if any such person shall require writing, by or on behalf of any party claiming to be entitled, that such investment shall be made, and shall be left with the Accountant-General, he shall be at liberty to cease making such investment in the particular trust until the Court shall have made some order in that behalf.

Several incendiary fires have lately occurred in the neighbourhood of Gravesend, causing loss of farming property to the amount of several hundred pounds.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

One of the leading features in the general Money Market this week is an announcement by the Messrs. Rothschild to the effect that they have received instructions from Vienna to negotiate a loan for the Austrian Government of £3,000 000 Of that amount they proposed to be raised in London, the remainder at Frankfort. Nominal the bonds will be issued at 90, but reductions for pre-payment will make it £88 15s., 7d. for a five per cent. stock. It is pretty generally thought that this attempt will prove a failure, as most of the loans have refused to become purchasers.

Further large imports of bullion have swelled the total stock in the Bank of England to £20,500,000 This week nearly £400,000 in gold has arrived from Australia, £230,000 in gold and silver from South America and the West Indies, and £75,000 from other quarters, £ 1,000 being from France. The immense amount of surplus cash in the Government Banks surrounding the London and Provincial facilities to parties housing bills in the provinces; hence, in self-defence, the country bankers have been compelled to lower the rates of interest, and we hear that a similar course has been adopted in Scotland.

On Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, the Consol Market underwent scarcely any change, the Three per Cents touching to the extent of ¼ per cent. On Thursday, Consols both for Money and Account were run up to par. The opening price was 99¾ the closing, 99⅝ to 100. The Three per Cents Reduced were done at 100¼ to ⅜, and New 3½ ditto at 99¾ to 100. Long Annuities were firm, at 6 5-16 ditto Bonds, 83s. The Unfunded Debt, notwithstanding that the interest will be reduced next month to 1½d. per diem, has kept high. March Bills, Small, were 75s to 78s; and June, 75s to 78s, 5 pm.

In the Foreign House the amount of business doing has been comparatively small. It being still uncertain whether any interest will be paid upon the Mexican bonds (we have just exceeding 3 months' test operations in the old Colombian debt, owing to the Government financial failure, have been suspended. On Dutch we have only small transactions to report. Dutch Certificates, 5 per Cents were 97½ to 98; 4 per Cents, 89½ to 90. Brazilian Bonds, Deferred, 90½ to 91; Spanish Three per Cents, 4. Ditto New, 2½. Do. Deferred, 20¼; Venezuela Three-and-a-Half per Cents, 20½ to 21; Chilian Six per Cents, 103; and Dutch Four per Cents, 97½. These prices exhibit a decline of three-quarters to one-eighth per cent during the week.

The settlement of the Account in the Railway Share Market, and the decreased traffic receipts, compared with those of the corresponding period in 1851, have had some effect upon prices, but on the whole business has been to a fair extent. The terms for time bargains are extensive one, and the rates of contango demanded for carrying over have been moderate Those upon London and North-West rose have been equal to 2½ to 7/8; London and South-Western, 2½ to 3/4; Great Western, 2½ to 10⅝; Lancashire and Yorkshires, 4½ to 6¾; Midlands, 3½ to 9/16; South-Easterns, 3½ to 11/16, and Caledonians, 4½ to 5/8 per cent, per annum. From these it seems somewhat that some of the small dealers are about to close their accounts. Annexed are the closing prices on Thursday:—

ORDINARY SHARES AND STOCKS—Aberdeen, 12½. Mining Shares have been very inactive. On Thursday, Agua Frias were done at ½ to 9-16; Anglo-Californian, ⅜; Australian, ⅞, Australian Freehold, ⅜ to ½, Ave Maria, ⅜ to ⅝; British Australian Gold, ⅜; St. John del Rey, 39; Carson's Creek, ⅛; Golden Mountain, ⅜; Nouveau Monde, ⅜; Port Phillip, 1¼; and Santiago de Cuba, 10

A further advance has taken place in the value of Canada Six per Cent. Bonds, they having been done at 114¾ City Navigation Bonds have realised 97. Shares in the New Crystal Palace Company are been operated in at ¾ to ¾ prem.

Bank Shares have continued in active request, and, in some instances, rather higher rates have been paid. Australian have marked 47; Colonial, 14¾; London Joint Stock, 18¾; London and Westminster, 39¾; National Provincial of England, 42¾; National of Ireland, 19¾; Oriental Bank Corporation, 20; Provincial of Ireland, 45¾; Union of Australia, 43; and Union of London, 16¼.

Steam-boat Shares have changed hands freely. Peninsula and Oriental have produced 83; the New, 3½; Royal Mail Steam, 78; General Steam, 2¾; Screw Steam, 1¼; and Royal American and Mail, 2¾.

The various produce markets have been very active during the week, and a good business has been transacted in most articles, at very full prices. The wool sales continue to attract a large number of buyers.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Very moderate supplies of English wheat have been received up to our market this week, constituted chiefly of inferior parcels. The best have been sold at a further advance, and have been well supported in every instance. Fine foreign wheats have likewise realised quite as dear, but low parcels have commanded very little attention A fair business has been transacted in English and foreign flour, at late figures. As very little grain has been on sale, malt has produced extreme quotations, but Making Barley, the value of which has been small, has produced extreme quotations, but Making Barley, the value of which has been small, has produced extreme quotations, but reading and distilling sorts have made a move on. No change in malt Imports of foreign oats having been on a very extensive scale, the trade must be described heavy, at a decline of 6d per qr. Fine Irish and Scotch oats, 1s per qr. more. Beans, 1s. per qr. lower. Peas, 1s. per qr. higher. In floating cargoes of wheat we have nearly the same remarks to report, but Indian corn off 1s. Spanish has been held for more money.

THOMAS COLE. ROBERT COOMBES.

(FROM DAGUERREOTYPES BY CLAUDET.)

CHAMPIONSHIP OF THE THAMES.

This great contest, perhaps the most extraordinary boat-race ever witnessed, came off on Monday afternoon. The result is, that, after the most gallant struggle on record, from the first to the last, over a course of nearly four miles and a half, Robert Coombes, the champion of the Thames and Tyne, the hero of nearly half a hundred desperate conflicts, the pride of the Thames, sustained a defeat; yet, so confident were Coombes' friends, that, at the moment of starting, he was backed by many at 2 to 1.

The match was for £200 a side; and the competitors Robert Coombes of Westminster, and Thomas Cole of Chelsea.

In the course of last season Coombes imparted some of his principle and practice of training to Cole, who was at that time taken under his charge to be got in condition against Robert Newell; and the pupil has proved superior to the preceptor. Cole won Dogget's coat and badge in the year 1849; but there was little else on record to recommend him. Both men had been in training since the early part of the winter; and they came to the starting-post in the most beautiful condition. Coombes, who has in his time beaten 11-stone men, is in his 43d year, and his rowing weight was 9 st. 11 lb. Cole is only twenty-five years old, and is half a stone heavier.

The distance was from Putney bridge to Mortlake, and the attendance of spectators was very great. Betting was brisk at 6 and 7 to 4 on Coombes, and in some instances at 2 to 1.

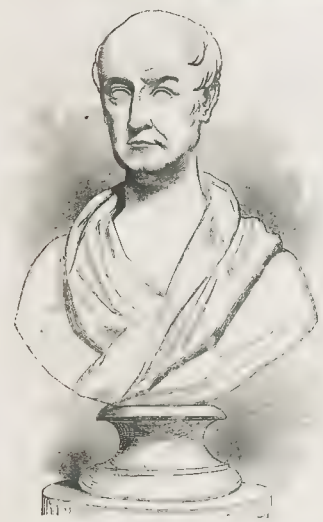
Soon after five both men rowed to their station, Cole having the choice, and taking the Middlesex side of the centre arch. Royal was umpire for Coombes, Salter for Cole, and Mr. E. Searle kindly officiated as referee. Coombes rapidly dashed his sculls in the water, and took a lead of something like a quarter of a length, which he retained for only about twenty yards: then they were scull and scull, and no two rowing men ever so ably displayed the perfection of style, while their pace was surprising. Within fifty yards of the starting-place Cole's boat began to "peer" in front; off the Messrs. Searle's it was three-quarters of a length in advance; and ere their arrival at Craven-cottages, it had drawn clear and taken the lead, and was still rowing very powerfully, closely pressed by Coombes. The speed of both was unabated, and the cheers of the partizans of either rent the air. Cole drew a trifle more in advance, but a first-rate spurt brought Coombes' boat again within a yard of his adversary's stern. Both slid through the water towards Hammersmith bridge, Surrey pier, and the dashing work of Cole put him through the bridge a clear length and a half in advance; but between this and Chiswick Eyot, Coombes forced his way within a yard or so of his opponent; but Cole, in three minutes, increased the gap to a boat's length. On nearing the railway bridge at Barnes it was again lessened by another desperate effort of Coombes; but Cole kept in advance, and won by half a clear length, doing the distance in 29 min. 12 sec.

The Portraits, which are from Daguerreotypes by Claudet, give with remarkable truth the physique and style of the men, and the contrast between the veteran and his more youthful opponent is shown with an accuracy that could not have been obtained by any other process.

NEW MASONIC PLATE FOR THE GRAND LODGE OF ENGLAND.

MASONIC PLATE FOR THE GRAND LODGE OF ENGLAND.

This superb Plate, consisting of cornucopia, ewers, and pillars, has just been manufactured in silver gilt by Messrs. Lambert and Rawlings, of Coventry-street, for the Grand Lodge of England; together with three ivory gavels, for the use of the Grand Master and his Wardens, in the ceremony of laying foundation-stones. The ewers are for holding oil and wine, one having olives as the emblematic decoration, and the other bunches of grapes. The horn of plenty is to hold corn, and round its lip is a wreath of corn. The gavels are exceedingly large, and are made solid, from the best Siam ivory, with silver gilt plates, on which are engraved the emblems of the office of the Grand Master and his Wardens. The manufacturers are members of the craft, and past masters of the Percy Lodge No. 234. They were exhibited to the brethren at the grand festival held at the Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen-street, London, on the 28th of last month.



BUST OF EDWARD RIDDLE, ESQ., F.R.A.S., LATE HEAD-MASTER OF THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL, GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. RIDDLE, F.R.A.S.

Yesterday week a number of officers of the Royal Navy, in full uniform, the gentlemen official y connected with Greenwich Hospital, and a large number of the private friends of Mr. Riddle, late Head Master of the Royal Naval School, assembled in the boys' department to present the above gentleman his Bust, as a testimony of their regard.

The boys (numbering 800), under the superintendence of Lieut. House, were marched into the dining-hall, with their colours flying. The Governor, Sir Charles Adam, having arrived, the Bust was uncovered. It was executed by Mr. Theed, of Henrietta-street, Cavendish-square, and met with universal approbation, not only as a work of art, but as presenting most admirably the individual characteristics of Mr. Riddle. A deputation, headed by Mr. Richards, having asked permission of Sir Charles Adam, an address was then read, signed by upwards of 80 subscribers, requesting Mr. Riddle's acceptance of the Bust, as a testimonial of the esteem and regard in which he was held by his pupils, as Master of the Trinity School at Newcastle, and particularly as Head Master of Greenwich Nautical School, which his unceasing exertions have in an eminent degree contributed to raise to its present high standing.

Mr. Riddle replied in a written address, which was read to the company by his son. In this document Mr. Riddle characterised the professional skill and perseverance of his pupils by reference to the number of them who have risen to the command of ships in the merchant navy, who are and have been attached to the Arctic Expedition, and the surveying branch of the naval service; "and," added Mr. Riddle, "it is very gratifying to me to find that my labours thirty years ago have been recognised." The address then referred to the high character of the school, and concluded with an expression of Mr. Riddle's thanks to the esteemed Governor, Admiral Sir Charles Adam.

Sir Charles next addressed the assembly, and in a most feeling and eulogistic manner referred to the valuable labours of Mr. Riddle in the establishment, and his private as well as public worth. Sir Charles also called the attention of the boys to the gentlemen present, and pointed out to them that, by perseverance and good conduct, it was in their power to become equally distinguished in the service of their country. Mr. Riddle had, as he deserved, at the recommendation of the Commissioners of Greenwich Hospital, been permitted by the Admiralty to retire on full pay, which was the utmost acknowledgment they could give of his services.

At several periods the lungs of the 800 boys proved their soundness by hearty, loud, and prolonged cheering. The Governor and John Riddle, F.R.A.S., successor to his father, standing on one side of the Bust, and the deputation on the other, the boys marched past it, two and two, out of the large dining hall.

Mr. Riddle is a native of Troughend, in the county of Northumberland, and commenced as a teacher when only a boy. In September, 1814, he was appointed Master of the Trinity House School at Newcastle-upon-Tyne; and in September, 1821, Head Master of the Nautical School, Greenwich, which office he resigned in September last, and was succeeded by his son, John Riddle, F.R.A.S. In the years 1814 and 1819 Mr. Riddle, sen., obtained the prizes of the "Ladies' Diary;" he has also published several tracts, and "A Treatise on Navigation and Nautical Astronomy, adapted to Practice," which is a text-book. He is noted for taking celestial observations with surprising quickness and accuracy, and was one of the council of the Astronomical Society. His devotion to his duties at Greenwich has called forth repeated acknowledgments from the Admiralty, and the highest praise is given to him in the Government Report on Schools. He would never consent to the usual plan of preparing his pupils for public examination, so that on the visits of the Admiralty they saw the school in the same manner as it was uniformly conducted.

It may interest the reader to be reminded that a detailed account of "the Greenwich Royal Hospital Schools," with several Engravings, appeared in the Illustrated London News, No. 303.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 562.—VOL. XX.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1852. [SIXPENCE.

THE SOCIALISM OF THE FRENCH PEOPLE AND THE FRENCH PRESIDENT.

"WOE to those rulers whose interests are not bound up with those of the people; woe when the glory of the one does not entail glory upon the other—when the maintenance of the one is the detriment of the other, and when they cannot have mutual dependance upon each others promises and oaths." Such were the words of a certain M. Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, published when he was an adventurer, positively needy, comparatively obscure, and superlatively reckless. We find the passage in a collection of his writings, recently translated from the French,* and select it partly from its aptness to describe the present position of the author, as well as that of the unfortunate nation which he has defrauded of its liberties, and partly as an introduction to a more detailed notice of the earlier and later writings of this remarkable personage than we have yet had an opportunity to bestow.

The constant efforts which he and his partisans have made, and are making, to represent France as being in such extreme danger from Socialist, revolutionary, and anarchical doctrines, as to require a stringent despotism to preserve society from dissolution, naturally attracts attention to his own published opinions, and the long and laboured attack on the independence of the neighbouring kingdom of Belgium, which the Constitutionnel, the organ of the President, has been instructed to lay before the world, and in which the social bugbear is again brought forward, point irresistibly to the same scrutiny. Whether it be to strengthen himself in France, or to maintain or plant French ascendancy abroad, it is stil Socialism that he places in the foreground, and it is ever upon this point that he claims to be the saviour of society. The article in the Constitutionnel, in which the claim is last advanced, is from the obsequious and slavish pen of M. Granier de Cassagnac. When we consider the sources of his inspiration, it is difficult to conceive anything more impudent than that article. Not daring to invade and annex Belgium, but desiring to influence and coerce that independent kingdom—which a certain class of French politicians, deriving their ideas from the wars and the system of the first Napoleon, would be greatly pleased to have incorporated with France—Louis Napoleon has threatened, through his obedient journal, that if the elections which are about to take place in Belgium shall be favourable to the present Belgian Ministry, and if Belgium shall not hereafter change the electoral law by means of which men are returned to the Belgian Parliament who are determined to maintain the independence of the country, the Custom-houses of France shall be closed against Belgian produce and manufactures. In other words, Louis Napoleon states that unless a Ministry be formed in Brussels which shall govern Belgium on the Napoleonic system, every means will be taken, that a war of tariffs will permit, to ruin her trade, and to force her bankrupt artisans and starving population to demand incorporation with France, as the best, if not the sole, remedy for their miseries. Not that the President—if we are to believe M. Granier de Cassagnac, a writer who has as much regard for the holiness of truth as his prompter, and no more—wishes to annex Belgium by those or by any other means, or that foreign warfare is in any way present to his mind. He would have the world believe that his objects are peaceful, and that his only mission is to destroy that great hydra of Socialism, alike the pest of France and of Belgium. "Although Belgium," according to the Constitutionnel and to the President, "would have an immense commercial interest in being reunited to France, the interest of France in that reunion is infinitely less." "Besides," says the Constitutionnel, "the Prince President, as all Europe well knows, only entertains ideas of organisation at home and peace abroad; it is not to set nations one against the other, that he has saved them from Socialism. His task is greater and more glorious for his ambition than any conquest could be."

This passage is the very cream of the "organised hypocrisy" that is now installed by the help of bayonets in France. What Belgium could gain by being reunited to France, unless it were an increased burden of taxation, it is not easy to see. She would certainly lose the liberties which she possesses, and would gain nothing, either commercially or politically, to recompense her in the slightest degree for the enormous sacrifice. But it suits the double purposes of the President to familiarise the Belgian mind and that of Europe with the idea of such an annexation; and it also suits his purpose to harp continually upon the one string of Socialism, to scare the timid, and to make it appear that, were it not for the strong hand with which he governs, the Socialists would possess themselves of the castles and farms, the jewels and the furniture, the bullion and the coupons, the shops and the mills, together with the wives and the daughters, of all the peaceable inhabitants; and that a worse war than a jacquerie would commence throughout Europe.

It is clear to us, however, as it will probably be to all the readers of the published works of M. Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, that it Socialism have taken any deep root in France, it is he who has planted and tended the tree. If he be not a Socialist, there are no Socialists in France. His writings show him to be the high priest of the doctrine, and to have indulged in and promulgated these ideas to an extent which no other Socialist of our times has surpassed. Louis Blanc's organisation of labour, Fourrier's phalansteries, St. Simon's communities, and Cabet's Icarias, are not a whit more "Socialistic" than the ideas which have been put forth by the and President of the Republic, and largely circulated in France with all the authority of the name unhappily so dear to the ignorant and warlike peasant proprietors. In the second Volume of the work to which we have alluded we find a plan for the extinction of pauperism, drawn up by the Prince in the solitude of his dungeon at Ham. We string a few passages together, to show that Socialism, if it really exists to any extent in France, and if it is really to be destroyed by the President, will meet its death at the hands of a friend.

"Industry," he says, "devours her children, and lives only by their destruction; she is the true Saturn."

"Taxation is the best investment for the public. It is in the budget that we must seek the first support for every system which has for its object the relief of the working classes."

"Savings-banks are of no use to the most numerous class."

"The working classes possess nothing; we must make them landholders."

"They are now without organisation and without ties—without rights, and without a future; we must give them rights and a future, and raise them in their own good opinion by promoting association."

"Let the Chambers decree that all the uncultivated lands of France (amounting to upwards of 9,000,000 hectares) belong by right to the workmen's association, on paying annually to the actual proprietors what these now get for them."

"This scheme ought to be carried out by the creation of agricultural colonies, which, established throughout France, should form the basis of one vast organization, of which the poor workmen should be members without being personally proprietors."

"The necessary advances for creating these establishments must be furnished by Government."

"According to my calculations the cost would amount to nearly 300,000,000 of francs"—"which would not be a loss, but a magnificent investment."

"Multitudes without organization are nothing; when organized, they are everything."

"At this period the object of all enlightened Governments should tend by its efforts to hasten the period when men may exclaim, 'The triumph of Christianity has destroyed slavery; the triumph of the French revolution has put an end to bondage; the triumph of democratic ideas has caused the extinction of pauperism.'"

We think these passages are tolerably strong. We need quote no more, though we could select hundreds of others equally emphatic and clear, to prove that if Socialism be formidable in France, the teachings and preachings of Louis Napoleon have largely contributed to make it so.

We say nothing at present of the truth or the error of these doctrines, of the wisdom or folly, the practicability or impracticability of the schemes broached by this high authority; but we merely cite them to show that, whatever he may now be, Louis Napoleon was once a Socialist; and that if Socialism now be the raging and rampant demon that he continually represents it to be in all his recent manifestos and in those of his paid journalists, he himself stands in a relation towards it very similar to that of Frankenstein towards the monster whom he fashioned. With one more quotation from the Prince's writings—curiously apt, though written twenty years ago—we conclude. "It is not so difficult," says Louis Napoleon in his "Political Reveries"—the first of his series of pamphlets—"to acquire liberty as to preserve it; and how are we to preserve it when those who ought to defend it are unceasing in their attacks against it? In our day it is not brute force alone which dominates—not alone treason which impairs, but a doctrinal spirit which destroys every germ of popular vitality. It is this spirit which, little heedful of the honour of France, has abandoned all to the dread of anarchy, which there were no grounds to apprehend." The words are true, and almost prophetic; but men who aspire to be Presidents and Emperors ought never to write books. Their own words stare them in the face at unwelcome seasons, and sometimes take the shape of still more unwelcome facts to push them their stools.

THE "EL DORADO," IN SACRAMENTO.

We have to thank an accredited Correspondent in Sacramento city, of date April 16th, for the strange scene engraved upon the preceding page, presenting, as it does, a fearful picture of the state of society in that place; it is, we assured, "very truthful." Our Correspondent adds:—"The El Dorado is one of the gambling saloons in the city, where thousands of dollars change hands daily. There are in this room twelve banks or gambling tables, each having from five to twenty thousand of dollars. The games played are monte, faro, roulette, and dice bearing the six first letters of the alphabet. Nearly every one has his Colt's revolver under his coat, secured by a belt. There are a pianist and violin players, who perform in the orchestra day and evening. Every colour, complexion, and country of the universe may be seen grouped together here."

We select the following from the Sacramento Union of April 15, 1852:—

Great excitement has been created within a few weeks past in the northern section of the State, owing to reported discoveries of rich auriferous diggings on Rogue River. Many mining camps and settlements in Shasta have been deserted, and the forces is scarcely less than that of the famous Gold Bluff humbug.

New and rich diggings have been discovered in the hill at the head of Rich Ravine, near Auburn, and also in various parts of Calaveras county. A rich deposit of auriferous earth and quartz has recently been discovered near Butte city, in the same county.

The Indians in Northern California are still committing depredations. The latest news from Trinity gives information of a hostile engagement, in which forty Indians were killed. It is considered exceedingly dangerous to travel the Sacramento Valley without a party of sufficient numbers to repel any attack of the Indians.

LUMPS OF GOLD.—Adams and Co. write from Sonora to the editors of the Alta Californian as follows:—"The finest specimen ever seen has been deposited in this office. It is solid gold, and weighs 305 oz. 13 dwts. It was dug at Sonoita, on the 24th ult., by W. L. Durham, from a hole 54 feet deep. This is the largest lump of pure gold ever yet found in California."—We have had exhibited to us a beautiful lump of pure gold taken from the placer diggings at the end of Slate Creek, near Loytown, El Dorado county. This specimen weighed 38 oz. We learn from the Calaveras Chronicle, that at Vallecita, in Calaveras county, a few days ago, a party of miners unearthed a lump weighing 26 lb. of nearly pure gold.

THE AUSTRALIAN DIGGINGS.—The following is an extract of a letter from the neighbourhood of Geelong, dated January 10, 1852:—"When I got home I found all well; but as the end of the year drew on, almost all my people gave me notice that at the conclusion of their engagement they meant to leave me, and here we are now—the cook left, though I offered her £40 a year to remain, and four domestic servants are reduced to little e F——— and J. M———, who is still a child, a native black to cook, and a native boy to wait at table, &c. In the men's hut, where we used to have from eight to twelve men who attended to the dressing of the sheep's feet, and did all the other work, we are reduced to two, who get their rations and 22s. 6d. a week—22s. 6d. each. My sheep, which used to run in flocks of 1500 to 2000, are now or will be next week in four flocks of about 5000 each—one under the charge of the gardener and his wife, who both speak, by under arrangement to meet half-way; one under charge of a native black; and the other two with the former shepherds, whose times are not yet out. My late overseer, together with three men who were shearing for me in November, and three others, made a party and went to the diggings. In 17 days they took out of 16 feet square of ground 140 lb. weight of gold, value between £3000 and £4000."

Australia produces the most gold of any European state. It amounts yearly to 7500 marks, which promises a sum of 603,000 ducats. Much of this is obtained by the gipsies, by sand washing in Hungary and Siebenburgen. There are two ways in which the gold is found; one is in the deposits of sand and soil, the other in the strata of ore. The latter is the most common method of finding it in Hungary and Siebenburgen. A famous place for finding it in Hungary is near Weisskirchen, where, by the convent of Slatiska, a piece of gold was found weighing three-fourths of a mark, and worth 62 ducats.

A Government bill was, on Wednesday, printed, to alter and amend certain acts relating to the Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues of the Crown. The object of the bill is to enable the commissioners in a number of matters to exercise a discretionary power in dealing with the property of the Crown, so as to facilitate arrangements, &c.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS

FRANCE.

Some correspondence, which originally appeared in the London papers within the last ten days, indicating resolutions which have been agreed on by the Emperor of Russia, in conjunction with the Emperor of Austria and the King of Prussia, to oppose by every means in their power, as contrary to the treaties of 1815, which settled the present territorial arrangements of Europe, any assumption by Prince Louis Napoleon of the office and functions of hereditary Emperor of France, although they would acknowledge the title if only taken for the lifetime of the Prince without power of transmission to his heirs, has been met by an official declaration in the Moniteur, to the effect no change in the present constitution of France was intended by the Prince President; and that, therefore, the correspondence referred to, being based on an erroneous assumption of facts, was not authentic, and was unworthy of credit. Various circumstances, however, show that the correspondence was correct, and that the very fact of the Prince President's finding such a strenuous opposition to his designs in so high and powerful quarters has been the cause of his abandoning those designs for the present, and thus enabling him to state now, without actual falsehood, that he has no intention at present of altering the existing institutions of France. The attitude of opposition taken up in the North has had, in a word, the effect of putting an end, without any further effort, to the schemes it was meant to menace, and Louis Napoleon has acted in the matter on the principle of "a word to the wise is sufficient."

The refusals of eminent public men to take the oath of allegiance to Louis Napoleon continue, and create much bitterness at the Elysée. Amongst the latest has been the refusal of the well-known statesman, M. Duvergier de Hauranne, who preferred resigning his post as member of the Council-General of the Seine to taking the oath. M. O. V. de Saint Bonnet, a leading member of the bar at Lyons, and a Councillor-General in the Loire; M. Reynaud-la-Gardette, ex-representative, and M. Monnier, the Mayor of Orange, Councillors-General in the Vaucluse; M. d'Alligny, Councillor-General in the Jura; and M. Perthuiser, the Mayor of Doubs, have also refused the oath.

On Monday the President gave, at the Palace of St. Cloud, a day and night fête, at which, besides the Ministers and some of the Senators, several foreigners of distinction were invited. Amongst the latter were the Marchioness of Douglas, the Countess Krasenska, the Marchioness Doria, Prince Odescalchi, the Marquis of Douglas, &c. At four in the afternoon the ladies of the party and a few of the gentlemen entered carriages drawn by four horses, the servants wearing green and gold liveries, and proceeded to visit the palace of Trianon. The President, the Marquis of Douglas, and the Minister of War accompanied the party on horseback. On their arrival the President acted the part of cicerone, explaining to his guests, even to the minutest details, the pictures and works of art collected there. It was remarked that in passing the cradle of the Comte de Paris he made no remark; but that, on the contrary, he stopped before that of the Count de Chambord, whom he called by that name, and directed the attention of those around to the wonderful workmanship of the cradle, as a perfect chef d'œuvre of marqueterie. The party returned to St. Cloud by seven, and dinner was soon after announced. Part of the plate used on the occasion still bears the fleurs de lis of the elder branch of the Bourbon family; the napkins and damask table-linen had the cipher of Louis Philippe; and various other objects were adorned with the imperial eagle—the whole giving a faithful image of the condition of the present time in France. During the dinner a military band executed overtures and symphonies. Dancing was afterwards commenced, and lasted until two in the morning, when the fête concluded.

The advocate of the Council of State, M. P. Fabre and M. Mathieu Bodet, charged to defend the appeal of the Princes of the Orleans family against the decrees relative to their property, have published a memoir, from which it appears that they intend to rely on four points, viz.:—1. That the Princes possess the property in virtue of the deed of the 7th of August, 1830, and that that property could not return to the State before the 9th of August. 2 That they are heirs of the King, their father, for that part of Neuilly which was purchased subsequent to 1830, and of Madame Adelaide for the part of the domain of Monceaux. 3. That they have enjoyed the property for more than twenty years on what they considered a good title and with good faith. 4. That the property has been made the subject of marriage settlements, which have created irrevocable rights for the married parties and their children; and, finally, that the ordinary judicial tribunals are the proper ones in the case.

According to the Pays, a sumptuary law is to be submitted to the Council of State imposing a tax on carriage and riding horses, and dogs.

Owning to the great excess of expenditure over income, the Government are disposed to suggest fresh taxes; but the Budget Committee of the Legislative Body are, it is said, opposed to any such scheme.

The fête of the distribution of the eagles to the garrison at Lyons took place on Monday and Tuesday and passed off with great éclat. General de Castellane presented the eagles.

The Court of Nantes has decided that, notwithstanding the decree concerning the press, a journal cannot be punished for the publication of false news, if it be not calculated to do injury to personal interests.

The Vieu National of Grenoble has received a preliminary warning.

According to the Gazette du Midi, the notorious Madame Lafarge, who has for some time past undergone her sentence of imprisonment in a maison de sante at St. Remy, has been released from prison, the remainder of her sentence having been remitted.

Letters from Algiers state that another battle had taken place in Kabylia, in which the native soldiers were defeated with great loss.

The bagne of Rochefort is now almost emptied. The number of convicts who demand to be sent to the penitentiary establishment at Cayenne increases every day. A number of women, also, who have been condemned to hard labour for life, have accepted the offer to be transported, which will diminish the number confined in the prisons. It is said that a number of the youngest and strongest among these are about to be sent to Cayenne.

Rear-Admiral Motard died at Houdleur on May 25, aged 81. He entered the service in 1792 as a midshipman, and was second in command on the staff of the fleet which carried out General Bonaparte's army to Egypt. He was wounded at Aboukir, and taken prisoner by the English. Being afterwards exchanged, he was in the campaigns of the Mediterranean and of St. Domingo, and continued captain of the Semillante for six years. On his return he was made Baron, Commander of the Legion of Honour, Colonel of the Imperial Guard. He then made the campaigns in Germany until 1812, when his wounds forced him to quit the service. He was placed on half-pay in 1814, with the rank of Rear-Admiral.

UNITED STATES.

Advices from New York to the 19th ult. state that in Congress nothing had been done in the matter of the proposed extended grant to the Collins' line of steamers.

In the Senate an important bill in regard to the compensation of members had been introduced. It provides that each senator and representative shall have 2000 dols. per annum, with 20 cents per mile, the distance to be computed by the "air line." Another and more important feature is a deduction of ten dollars per day for absence, except in cases of sickness. The salary proposed is equal to sixteen months session for each Congress, or 22 dols. per day for the short session.

A destructive fire had occurred in New York, by which Swift's extensive sugar refinery was totally destroyed. The damage was calculated at nearly 500,000 dollars.

The court sitting at Columbia, South Carolina, had refused to hear the appeal of Manuel Pereira, a British coloured sailor. He continued in gaol at Charleston, and the hearing of his case had been postponed to January, 1853. Coloured free men are by the laws of the State liable to imprisonment whilst they remain on the territory.

Mrs. Adams, the venerable relict of the late John Quincy Adams, ex-President of the United States, died at her residence in Washington, on the 15th ult.

Kossuth was at Albany, where he was well received. The State of New England has done well for Kossuth in the way of furnishing him with "material aid," having contributed no less than 11,830 dols. in two weeks for Hungarian liberty. From New Jersey the entire amount received by contributions and from meetings was 1629 dols.

From California the latest dates are to the 16th of April; the amount of specie which had arrived thence at New York was very large. The papers give a favourable account of the mining interests and of the prospects of business in the larger cities. The interior continues to suffer from Indian depredations.

A recent arrival at San Francisco brought several gentlemen with slaves—one with twelve, another six, another seven, another five, and so on. Of course, they expect to hold them in the free state by the strong hand, as the organic law makes the bondmen free the moment their foot presses the soil of California. The Fugitive Slave Bill, which had been passing in the legislature for some time past, had passed, and would probably become law. The press generally opposed it, on the ground that its object was insidiously to introduce slavery into the State.

Late advices from the city of Mexico announce that much excitement existed there in consequence of the discovery of a grand conspiracy against the Government.

Under date Panama, May 6th, we learn that the South American Republic of New Granada had anticipated General Flores, by declaring war against Peru and all enemies of the present government of Equador. Although the movements appear so formidable as first reported, it is very probable that the effort of Flores to revolutionise Equador will lead to serious trouble among all the South American states. Should he be successful, the existing governments of Venezuela and New Granada will find it difficult to maintain their position for any length of time. Flores belongs to the Paez school of leaders. He is a native of Venezuela, and a sort of South American Yankee.

The leader of the pirates, Cambiaso, who seized the American barque Florida, and murdered Mr. Shaw, the owner, in the Straits of Magellan, had been executed by the Chilian authorities.

WEST INDIES.

We have advices vid New York this week from Havannah, dated May 12. We learn that the Cubans were apprehensive of another contemplated attack upon them by persons from the United States. The place of rendezvous for the troops was reported to be Venezuela.

The yellow fever was said to be raging with great virulence in Demerara. Among others, the crews of two or three British vessels had been swept off by this fatal disease. The crops were becoming blighted, and the cattle were dying at Antigua and St. Kitt's, in consequence of the severe drought.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

By the steam frigate Gladiator, of the Royal navy, which has come from the Cape, with the late Governor, Sir Harry Smith, Lady Smith, and suite, we have intelligence dated April 18.

Major-General Cathcart, the new Governor, had arrived at British Caffraria, and commenced operations where his predecessor had left off. But nothing can be known as to his success in the field for some time to come. His Excellency arrived at King William's Town on Good Friday, where he had a long interview with Sir Harry Smith, who left on the following morning, at three o'clock, for the place of embarkation. On the late Governor's starting, although dark, the whole of the troops in garrison voluntarily turned out to greet him, together with a large number of inhabitants. The reception given to Sir Harry Smith by the colonists on his return to Cape Town was also most gratifying to him.

According to the latest advices from the seat of war, the enemy was as active as ever. Colonel Eyre had had a desperate action with a strong body of them, in which Captain Gore, of the 43d, and Dr Davidson were killed, and several men wounded. Major Tottenham, of the 12th Lancers, had also had a smart affair with the enemy, in which he also lost some of his men, and was very hard pressed by the Kaffirs.

These accounts do not correspond with the report prevalent in Cape Town, that the result of the recent operations by Sir H. Smith, detailed in the accounts by the last mail, have had the effect of inducing the chiefs to sue for peace, and that the negotiations with them, which were continued by his successor Major-General Cathcart, were very likely to end in peace. There were strong grounds for fearing that such a result would not follow.

Recent accounts from Constantinople state that the press had been placed under certain restrictions, which would prevent any books or pamphlets from being printed, except those duly authorised by the Government.

BRITISH TRADE WITH PORTUGAL.—The Earl of Malmesbury's attention has been called by a large body of shipowners trading to Portugal to extortions practised by the Portuguese consular agents in Great Britain upon British vessels proceeding to Portuguese ports; and there is every reason to believe the evils complained of will speedily be removed.

THE LOBOS ISLANDS.—At the usual monthly meeting of the council of the Royal Agricultural Society, held on Wednesday, the subject of the Lobos Islands, which has lately been attracting so much attention, was brought forward in a conspicuous manner by a speech of Mr. Fisher Hobbs, seconded by Mr. Shaw, it was resolved that a deputation from the society wait upon the Earl of Derby to represent to him the importance of taking every possible means to effect a reduction in the price of guano. This step taken by the society will add immense weight to the agitation in progress throughout all the leading agricultural associations of Scotland and England on the subject; and if it is vigorously and firmly followed up, there can hardly be a doubt that a most unjust monopoly will be wrested from the hands of the Peruvian Government. As every intelligent farmer will readily perceive, the question is one of great importance to them; and it is a significant and hopeful sign of the times to see such institutions as the Royal Agricultural Society, the Highland Society of Scotland, the Farmers' Club, and the leading agricultural societies throughout the United Kingdom, thus engaged in the attainment of practical benefits for the classes which they represent. In the absence of Earl Ducie, the president, Lord Portman, one of the trustees, took the chair at the meeting, and the requisite arrangements were made for ascertaining when Lord Prime Minister could receive the deputation, which with the co-operation of the Duke of Richmond, will no doubt be of the most influential character.

SPURIOUS FRENCH COIN.—Remarkable ingenuity has been shown in Paris recently in the adulteration of five franc pieces. The modus operandi of the money utterers is stated to be as follows:—One side of this coin is carefully removed by the use of a very thin fine saw; as much of the interior as possible is then cut out. The space left vacant is filled up with a composition having the same weight, and nearly the same sound or ring as silver. Then the side is carefully soldered on again, and the coin has of course the same outward appearances as before. Most of the pieces thus altered bear the effigy either of Louis XVII., Charles X., or Louis Philippe. The fraud was detected at the Bank of France. The deterioration of the coins thus altered is about seven-tenths.

DEATH OF A TIGER HUNTER.—The Bengal papers of April 12 announce the death of Captain Charles Colby, of her Majesty's 98th Regiment, and commanding the convalescent depôt at Murree, under the following distressing circumstances: On the 20th of the previous month Captain Colby went out tiger-shooting at the foot of the hills on which the Murree depôt is situate, and having come upon a large male tiger, fired at and wounded him, as he supposed mortally. The animal, however, charged the elephant, and, descending, approached the animal, which lay to all appearance dead, but which, on his coming close to it, sprang upon him and mutilated him dreadfully. He was carried home by the mahouts and servants of the shooting party, some of whom immediately started for Rawul Pindee, to give information of the occurrence, on receipt of which two medical officers at once mounted an elephant, and proceeded to the scene of the accident, which they reached early the next morning. They found Captain Colby dreadfully wounded, and judged amputation of the left arm absolutely indispensable, expressing their opinion and decision to the sufferer, who immediately consented. The operation was at once performed near the shoulder; but as great had been the loss of blood and the injuries the tiger had inflicted, that the patient quickly sank, and expired the same evening.

FATAL OCCURRENCE AT LIVERPOOL.—An accident of a serious nature, both as regards its immediate results and the panic which it has created among the corn-factors frequenting the market, occurred on Tuesday, soon after 12 o'clock, in the Corn-Exchange, Brunswick-street, Liverpool. It appears that about the period referred to the room was nearly four-fifths full, in expectation of the arrival of the Protectionist candidates, Messrs Mackenzie and Turner, addressing their constituents. These gentlemen having accordingly entered the market, accompanied by several of their supporters, were in the act of canvassing, when the floor in the middle of the building suddenly gave way, and about three-fifths of the persons assembled, including Mr. Turner, were precipitated to a depth of eight or nine feet. Mr. Mackenzie, as it happened, was in a different part of the room, and thus escaped. They all, however, succeeded in scrambling their way out of the ruins unhurt. Two workmen, of the names of Edward Gouldborne and John Rogers, labourers, who had gone under the arch when it fell for the purpose of having their dinners, were, however, suffocated amid the rubbish.

According to letters from Raitea to the 9th of March announce that in all the dominions of Queen Pomare, except Raitea, there was every appearance of a revolution, especially at Huahine. The natives at that place had already declared the authority of Queen Pomare and forbidden her the island, and had chosen a King. It is further said that Queen Pomare had applied to the American, French, and English authorities at Tahiti for protection and aid, but that it was refused. They have issued letters to all foreign residents to take no part in the fast brewing affray.

Not a single person was admitted into the Ipswich Union-house last week, and the number of inmates now in the house (212) is 47 less than in the corresponding week of last year. The able-bodied paupers are happily so scarce as to be almost curiosities.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM, Bart., has made a present to his tenants of all their grass and clover seeds for this year's sowing, besides 40 bushels of lime per acre.

The Killimoon estate, late the property of Colonel Stewart, has, it is said, been purchased within the last few days by the eminent firm of Fox, Henderson, and Co., for 20,000 guineas.

ELECTION INTELLIGENCE.

SANDWICH.—The election for the borough of Sandwich has terminated in the return of Lord Charles P. P. Clinton (Conservative), by a majority of 203 over his opponent, Captain French (Whig Radical). The vacancy was occasioned by the circumstance of the late member, Mr. C. W. Grenfell, having accepted the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds.

ATHLONE.—Mr. Henry C. Ibbitson, of Chester-terrace, London, has entered the lists, in opposition to the re-election of Mr. Keogh for the borough of Athlone. He is an "advocate for a revision of the taxation of the empire, so as to remove from the agricultural interest those unfair burdens unfairly imposed exclusively upon them." He would not, however, support any measure which may tend to increase the price of food to the consumer: and he is altogether antagonistic to the restrictions upon the perfect liberty of any class of men in the community.

BELFAST.—The Belfast Whig states that the Liberal electors have decided on calling upon Lord Castlereagh to come forward as a candidate for Belfast at the ensuing election. That journal says:—"We believe that in a short time such a requisition will be presented to him as it has seldom fallen to the lot of a Parliamentary candidate to receive. We are happy to know, too, that such an appeal from a town like Belfast will be most cheerfully engaged, soliciting the suffrages of the electors: Mr. Benjamin Bond Cabbell, on Conservative principles, as a supporter of the present Government; Mr. J. A. Hankey, the West India merchant, on Liberal and Free trade principles; and Mr. G. H. Heathcote, as a Protectionist. Mr. Hankey has proceeded three days on his canvass, and met with great success.

BRIGHTON.—Mr. J. S. Trelawny, who recently sat for Tavistock, has been invited by a section of the Liberals to stand for the representation of this borough. He has complied with their request. Mr. Trelawny declares himself a Free-trader, in favour of the abolition of church-rates, an advocate for household suffrage, vote by ballot, financial reform, and a supporter of religious liberty in its widest acceptation.

BRISTOL.—Mr. H. Berkeley, the liberal member for Bristol, paid a visit to his constituents on Tuesday; and his intention having become known in that city, some of the working men put out a bill calling upon their co-electors to give him a hearty reception. This invitation was heartily responded to by the people. The station at which he was expected by the leading members of the Free-trade party, and the streets immediately adjacent to the terminus, and, indeed, throughout the centre of the city, were rendered almost impassable by the multitudes which crowded them. From the windows of many of the houses on the route, flags and banners, bearing suitable mottoes, were suspended, and two bands of music, provided by some of the operative voters, preceded the cavalcade through the city, playing "See the conquering hero comes." The people took the horses from his carriage, and drew him through the streets.

CARMARTHENSHIRE BOROUGHS.—A spirited contest is likely to take place for these boroughs. In opposition to the sitting member, Mr. Hughes, a requisition has been extensively signed, requesting Mr. R Davies, of the Menai bridge, to allow himself to be put in nomination for the boroughs. That gentleman on Friday waited and addressed the electors to the effect that, if returned to Parliament, he will do his part towards strengthening the cause of religious liberty, and aiding, by means of Free-trade, the social and commercial progress of the country. He also promises to advocate vote by ballot, extension of the suffrage, and, as far as practicable, the general diminution of taxation.

CIRENCESTER.—A requisition is in course of signature calling on Mr. S. Bowley, the well-known temperance advocate, to come forward at the dissolution.

DUNDALK.—A third candidate is in the field for the representation of this borough: Mr. Captain Dowdy, brother to the Earl of Sefton. He declares himself independent of individual or party, opposed to the reimposition of a duty upon corn, in favour of tenant-right, and decidedly averse to the centralisation system. The friends of Captain Dowdy are confident of success.

EXETER.—Mr. Divett has met with an enthusiastic reception in Exeter during his canvas, which has best very successful. The manner in which the hon gentleman has been welcomed assures him of a triumphant majority at the ensuing struggle.

FINSBURY.—At a meeting of the electors of the Clerkenwell district, held this week at the National School-rooms, Red Lion-street, Mr. Bennett, M.P. for Wilts in the chair, it was resolved that Mr. Alderman Challis was a fit and proper person to represent the borough. A requisition to Alderman Challis is in course of signature.

GLASGOW.—Sir Harry Smith, the late Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, who has just returned to this country, is spoken of as a candidate for the representation of this city on Liberal-Conservative principles.

GRENNOCK.—The Duke of Argyll has accepted the invitation that was addressed to him to come forward, at the approaching general election, as a candidate for the representation of Greenock. He opposed it will be recollected, Lord Malgund at the last election; and on this occasion it is thought his chances of success have greatly improved, as he has received a requisition to stand signed by no fewer than 473 electors. Mr. Dunlop is, like Lord Malgund, a Liberal; so that it will be said the noble Lord receive to go to the poll, in the event of the latter not that it may give the Tory candidate, Sir James Logie Elphinstone, some chance of being returned.

HAMPSHIRE (NORTHERN DIVISION).—The Right Hon. C. Shaw Lefevre, Speaker of the House of Commons, has issued the following address to his constituents:—"GENTLEMEN,—Reports having been circulated that I am about to retire from Parliament, and that I feel it unnecessary to offer myself as a candidate at the next general election, I feel it necessary to declare that I am no longer to delay the announcement of my intention again to seek the honour of representing you in the next Parliament I am aware that I stand in a different position from that which I occupied at the last election, having had the honour by the unanimous vote of the representatives of the people in the chair of the House of Commons. I have been withdrawn from the strife of parties, and can claim no merit in the great measures of reform and the other great political changes which have taken place of late years. But I have anxiously devoted myself to the laborious duties which have been intrusted to me; and, believing that my constituents, the landowners and farmers of the county, would not wish me thereby to be faithful discharge of those duties, I do not hesitate to ask you for a renewal of that confidence which I have enjoyed for more than 20 years, and which it has been my constant endeavour to deserve.—I have the honour to be, gentlemen, your faithful servant, CHARLES SHAW LEFEVRE."

HEREFORD.—Sir Robert Price and Mr. H. M. Clifford, the present Free-trade members for this city, have just issued addresses to their constituents, announcing the existence of a vacancy required to Parliament as their representatives at the ensuing general election, notwithstanding the efforts made in behalf of the new Conservative candidate, Captain Meyrick. Sir Robert says—"The course of Ministers will not give their cordial countenance to a Government whose adherents are Protectionists in the counties and Free-traders in the cities and boroughs; who entertain opinions calculated to create distrust amongst the trading and labouring classes, and the great masses of the people, as tending to reverse the principles of Free Trade, and to raise the price of food, while they hold out vague and illusory promises to the landowner and the agriculturist, for which relief to any substantial or permanent extent has been denied. The electors of Hereford will withhold their confidence from an Administration who do not ground their claims to support upon any defined measure of public policy, but who adopt those which they deem best calculated to keep together them in power after the event of the elections has been ascertained." Captain Meyrick has also favoured the electors with an address, intimating his determination of the poll, and his belief that he will be returned.

KERRY COUNTY.—Mr. Reuben Plant, who had been named as likely to contest this county with Mr. M. J. O'Connell, has publicly disclaimed any intention of doing so.

LAMBETH.—Mr. William Williams, the sitting member, has issued an address to his constituents, soliciting a renewal of their confidence at the forthcoming general election.

MANCHESTER.—Mr. Bright, in his late address to the electors of Manchester, said:—"In the next time Mr. Loch goes to confession he will feel it upon his conscience to explain why paid the £5000 or £6000 which was expended at Falkirk." Mr. Loch has since addressed the "independent electors," and complains that Mr. Bright has charged him with expending £6000 or £6000. Mr. Loch says he did not pay more than £3300 to £3600, and this upon a requisition signed by Row, Mr. Loch polled exactly 844 votes, so that his legitimate expenses cost nearly £5 a head. To win Manchester he will require something like 6000 votes, which, at a similar rate, would cost £30,000—rather a heavy price to pay for the honour of representing the people of Manchester.

NORTHUMBERLAND (NORTH).—On Saturday (market-day) Sir George Grey, M.P., addressed a numerous body of the electors from the steps of the Queen's Head inn-room at the Star Inn, Alnwick. The hon. Baronet haunted the two noble Lords who opposed him (Lords Ossulston and Lovaine) with expressing no precise opinions in their addresses; consequently he could make no comments upon them. He urged the question of reform, and announced at present the benefits of Free Trade being frittered away by specious schemes for 'adjustment of burdens."

LYE.—The only candidate in the field until this week was Mr. Pomfret, the banker; now, however, a Free-trade and Liberal candidate has appeared in Mr. Alexander Mackinnon, eldest son of the M.P. for Lymington, who has expressed his intention at the poll every Liberal voter to record his vote and SLIGO.—Mr. Sheriff Swift, of London, means to contest this county while a still a voter remains to be polled.

SOUTHWARK.—A meeting of the electors of Southwark took place on Tuesday evening at half-past seven o'clock, to consider of the re-election of Sir W. Molesworth, Bart., M.P. for Southwark. The chair was taken by George Trweeks Scobell, Esq., M.P. for Bath; who having introduced and called upon Sir W. Molesworth to address the meeting, Sir W. Molesworth said that his object in addressing them was to ask them again to do him the honour of returning him to Parliament. They had already done him that honour upon various occasions, and during the period he had had a seat in the House of Commons he had never swerved from his political principles. He had voted against the ballot, because he did not believe that there was any necessity for an increase of the military force; and if it was to be done it must be done by an increase of the standing army. He always supported the ballot, as being the best protection to honest men against intimidation. He would abolish small rotten boroughs, and give the representation to larger constituences; and he had always supported the abolition of the property qualification of members of Parliament. He considered that all religious sects ought to be equal, and therefore he had always voted in favour of the emancipation of the Jews. He denied the possibility of upsetting the endowment of Maynooth. With regard to the Maynooth question, and the Roman Catholic question under the consideration of the House, it appeared that Mr. Spooner wished for a committee of inquiry into the system of education pursued there. This motion of Mr. Spooner was no honest motion for inquiry. It was intended to be considered, and it would be considered by many persons, as a preliminary step to the disendowment of that institution. With respect to Lord Derby and his policy, he was a happy abstract of nothingness and nonsense, a retarding or one moment, then saying anything, and then the contrary. He was a political jockey, riding on a raised horse; a thimble-rigger, cramming the clowns, and thimble-rigging with the yes of Protection, several times since having been proposed, and satisfactorily answered by Sir W. Molesworth, a resolution was passed pledging the meeting to support him at the ensuing election, and the meeting broke up.

SURREY (EAST).—An address to the electors of this division of Surrey has recently appeared from Mr. Moreton F. E. Frewen, the unsuccessful candidate for Cork county, in which he writes that, understanding Sir Fitzroy Kelly did not intend to solicit their suffrages at the approaching general election, it was his intention, if no Protectionist gentleman connected with East Surrey should come forward in his room, to offer himself as a candidate for the high honour of being one of the representatives in Parliament. He would appear in the field on ground for Mr. Frewen's anticipation of Sir Fitzroy Kelly's contemplated retirement; indeed, Sir Fitzroy some days since issued an address to his constituents, soliciting a renewal of their confidence at the approaching election.

SURREY (WEST).—On Monday afternoon a numerous and very influential meeting of the electors of West Surrey was held at the Crown Inn, Chertsey, to take into consideration the propriety of bringing forward a liberal candidate to bear from Colonel B. Challoner, of Portnall, park, the Liberal and Free-trade candidate, a detailed expansion of his political opinions. The chair was taken by Captain the Hon. C. C. Cavendish, R.N.; and Colonel Challoner having severally addressed the meeting, Mr. R. W. Edgell (who contested the county in 1849) congratulated the meeting upon having obtained a candidate so peculiarly qualified to carry out their views, and proposed that they should at once take steps to promote the return of Colonel Challoner. An influential committee was then appointed, and the proceedings terminated.

WINDSOR.—Lord Charles Wellesley and Colonel Bulkeley commenced their canvass of the electors on Wednesday. The promises which the latter has received from him to say that he shall go to the poll with a prospect of success. Mr. C. W. Grenfell, M.P., completed his canvass on the same day, and has issued an address, in which he says:—"It has afforded me the highest gratification to find, whilst offering you my personal services, that the good hand and zealous support at the late election, that I may safely rely on a renewal of your confidence when the approaching dissolution of Parliament shall again render it necessary for you to exercise your elective franchise."

YORK.—Mr. W. M. E. Milner, who had announced his intention of retiring from the representation of this city at the close of the present Parliament, has received a requisition, signed by nearly 1600 Liberal electors, inviting him to offer himself a candidate again for their suffrages when never a general election should take place. The hon. member has consented to resume his Parliamentary services, and has intimated that he should continue to uphold to the utmost extent those principles of commercial freedom under which the country has flourished since 1847, and to endeavour to gain for the people those rights to which they are justly entitled.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR CHARLES FORBES, BART.

SIR CHARLES FORBES, second Baronet of New and Edinglassie, Aberdeenshire, was the eldest son of John Forbes, Esq., by his wife Mary Anne, youngest daughter of Henry Lannay Hunter, Esq., of Beech Hall, Berks, and the grandson of Sir Charles Forbes, an eminent Bombay merchant, the first Baronet. He was born in 1832, and succeeded to the Baronetcy on the decease of his grandfather, the 20th November, 1849, and has not survived him three years. Sir Charles, the second Baronet, died unmarried on the 23d ult., at Funchal, Madeira. He is succeeded in the family title and estates by his brother

THE Hon. Forbes, Baronets of Edinglassie, are a branch of the noble house of Forbes, and are said to be the parent stock whence descend the Baronets of Pitsligo, who bear the same name.

LADY JOHNSTON.

LOUISA CAMPBELL LADY JOHNSTON, of Carnsalloch, died on the 7th instant, at the ancient seat of this family in Scotland. The lady was born in the month of October, 1774, and was the only surviving daughter of the late Right Hon. Lord William Campbell, youngest son of John third Duke of Argy..., a distinguished naval officer, who was severely wounded while acting as a volunteer on board the Bristol, at the attack on Charleston, 28th June, 1776, commanded by the gallant Sir Peter Parker. Lord William Campbell was Governor of Nova Scotia, and was subsequently appointed in the same capacity to South Carolina, and was in that situation at the breaking out of the American war. He also distinguished himself at the attack on Fort Moultrie, where he was dangerously wounded. He returned to England, and died at Southampton on the 5th September, 1778, from the effects of a wound which he received two years previously at Charleston. His daughter Louisa, on her father's death, was adopted and entirely brought up by the late Field-Marshal Conway and his wife, the Countess of Aylesbury. Lady Johnston in early life was much noted for her beauty, talents, and other accomplishments, which she inherited from her grandmother, the celebrated Mary Belenden. In the representation of private theatricals at Richmond House, Louisa Campbell was one of the principal persons whose delightful acting captivated and charmed the fashionable world of that day. She also displayed in her accomplished taste and great powers in modelling, several of her early works being still in existence, as well as those of her cousin, the late Right Hon. Sir Alexander Johnston, the representative of an old family in Dumfriesshire, who died in 1849, and who had held several high offices in the service of his country, leaving to England several thousands of pounds, to which he was fully entitled at the period of his decease. Her Ladyship has left four sons, viz. Colonel Johnston, now of Carnsalloch, who lately commanded the 6th Regiment; Patrick Francis, Deputy Lieutenant of Dumfriesshire, formerly a Commissioner of Charities in England and Wales; Alexander Robert, now in the diplomatic service in China, and for some time Lieutenant-Governor of Hongkong; and Frederick Erskine, a Commander in the navy, who distinguished himself while acting against the pirates in the China seas. Lady Johnston was buried in the family mausoleum in Scotland.

A RAILWAY IN DIFFICULTIES.—A circumstance, perhaps unprecedented in railway annals, has within the last few days occurred to the Preston and Longridge Railway, the result of which has been that the line has been unavoidably closed, the locomotive power confiscated by a bailiff, and the Fleetwood, Preston, and West Riding Railway Company have taken possession of and sold under a warrant of execution. Some years ago a company called the Fleetwood, Preston, and West Riding Railway was formed, the last-named line commencing by a junction with the Fleetwood, Preston, and West Lancashire Line, and terminating by a junction with one of the Yorkshire railways, and securing an uninterrupted communication between Fleetwood and Leeds, Hull, &c. As the Preston and Longridge Railway lies on the same line, and is the passage from Preston towards Yorkshire, the Fleetwood, Preston, and West Riding formed an alliance with it, the result of which was, that a year or two ago they became tenants to the Directors, of the Preston and Longridge Company. The fortunes, however, of the Fleetwood and West Riding Company have turned out somewhat disastrous, and their line into Yorkshire has not been carried out. Some time ago various differences arose between the Preston and Longridge directors and the lessees of their line, but the exact nature of those differences has not transpired. One consequence, however, has been that the lessees have withdrawn the rent from their hands, who, a few days ago, brought matters to a close by taking forcible possession of all the rolling stock, cranes, and other working materials, as well as office furniture, ticket machines, &c., on the various stations along the line. The stock was brought to the market on Monday. Whether the line will be permanently closed remains to be seen.

The jury empanelled to inquire into the causes of the recent colliery explosion at Coppull, by which so many lives have been lost, have returned a verdict of accidental death. At an early hour on the morning of Friday week, another explosion took place in Mr. Hargreave's coal-mine, at Coppull, in consequence of a collier taking a lighted candle in his hand, which ignited his fire-damp in a working which had been closed up for some time. Two men and two boys were severely injured by the accident.

The crops throughout the various districts in the northern part of Wales are most luxuriant; the wheats especially are in a thriving condition, and the early potatoes, so far, present a very healthy appearance. The grain crops, generally, look well; and, notwithstanding the long drought and easterly winds that have been experienced, there is every likelihood of an abundant hay harvest.

A paragraph appeared lately in the newspapers, stating that Mr. (late Archdeacon) Manning's return from the Catholic Church to the Church of England was expected. Mr. Manning has given official contradiction to this statement.

LAW AND POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

In the Court of Queen's Bench, on Monday, Mr. Serjeant Byles applied on behalf of Sir Charles J Napier for a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding the directors of the East India Company to pay over to Sir Charles Napier a sum of 20,158 rupees, or about £2000, being a sum of money alleged to have been unlawfully deducted from his pay in India under an order of the directors. In 1843 that campaign took place which resulted in the annexation of Scinde to the British dominions. Gold and silver and other property to the amount of 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 of rupees were then captured, which, after certain deductions, were ordered to be distributed to the officers and soldiers who were serving at the time. In 1849, when Sir Charles Napier returned again to India, he received four separate appointments; viz. Commander-in-Chief of the Queen's troops in India, Commander-in-Chief of the Company's troops; and two local appointments. On the arrival in India, no complaints existed; and extraordinary manner of the Supreme Council of India, to which likewise, by an act of Parliament, when the Commander-in-Chief was a member of the Council, no pay was attached. The first and second distributions took place in 1849, without any question. In April, 1850, an order, however, was issued by the Indian Government to the effect that "certain charges debitable to the Scinde prize money had been omitted to be debited from the distributions of, and ordering the amount to be deducted from the pay of the Commander-in-Chief and the other officers. The pay of all the officers was accordingly stopped in the following month, and a portion of it was also stopped in the month of June. Sir C. Napier thereupon addressed a protest to the Indian Government against such deductions, which resulted in the arrears for May and June being paid over. The directors, however, subsequently issued an order rejecting the claims of the final order (£1000 be objected), in consequence of which deductions were made in the pay of all the officers in October and November. On this Sir C. Napier forwarded another protest to the Government, dated on the 15th of October, 1850, in which he said, "I may fairly dispute the moral obligation, and doubt the legal obligation of refunding any portion of the prize money distributed by the Indian Government in the capacity of agents for her Majesty's gift of prize money to the army which made the capture of the Scinde prize booty." Sir C. Napier returned to England in the course of last year, and applied to the directors for the two months' pay, but his application had been refused. He stated in his affidavit that he was advised and believed that he had a legal remedy for this pay if this Court would, on this refusal by the Company, grant the application for this mandamus. The Court took time to consider their judgment.

FERGUS O'CONNOR AND THE NATIONAL LAND SCHEME.—In Vice-Chancellor Turner's Court, on Thursday, an application was made in the case of Goodchap v. Weaving, that the defendant and Mr. Roberts, his solicitor, should be compelled to produce certain deeds and paper writings relating to the Sing'e and property, which were deemed necessary to carrying out the reference of the inquiry before the Master for the winding-up of the affairs of the National Land Company. Mr. Bethell and Mr. Fergus O'Connor in support. The application had previously been made for the same purpose; but there being another suit in the Court involving the same question, it was arranged that the decision on the present motion should decide the question as to whether the solicitor of Mr. O'Connor, as the agent of the company, could withhold the production of the deeds in respect of a lien for costs against the company as solicitor. The Court made an order for the production of the deeds and documents, and their delivery over, subject to any lien Mr. Roberts might have and establish before the Master.

BIRCH, LATE PROPRIETOR OF THE "WORLD" NEWSPAPER.—In the Court of Queen's Bench, Dublin, James Burch, the proprietor and editor of the World newspaper, whose name has become known, of late, in connexion with his employment by the late Lord-Lieutenant (the Earl of Clarendon), to support, in his capacity of newspaper writer, the policy of the Whig Government in 1848 and 1849, during the political disturbances in Ireland, was on Monday last sentenced by Mr. Justice Crampton to twelve months' imprisonment for a gross libel against Mrs. Sneyd French, the daughter of the eminent Queen's Counsel, Mr. Brewster. Birch pleaded guilty to the libel, admitting the utter falsehood of the calumnies which it contained, and stated that he was incited to the commission of the offence by the exasperation which the observations of Mr. Brewster had created in his mind on the occasion of a late trial arising out of Birch's connexion with Lord Clarendon.

CHANCERY REFORMS.—The Lord Chancellor's bill to amend the practice and course of proceeding in the Court of Chancery, and to abolish, has just been printed by order of the House of Lords, and will be shortly brought before the House of Commons. As amended, the bill contains sixty-two clauses, and is to come into force from and after the 1st of November next. Among the improvements to be effected by this practical measure is the discontinuance of engrossing bills on parchment, in lieu of which a printed bill is to be used. Writs of subpœna and summons are to be abolished; and, further, it is purposed to get rid of a good many technicalities in equity proceedings, and to simplify the same. A new practice is to be introduced into the Court of Chancery with respect to the examination of witnesses. Witnesses are to be examined by one of the examiners when orally examined. Affidavits may be filed, and in cases where the deponents may be orally examined in the presence of the parties to the suit. It is the will, with the bill to abolish the Masters' Offices, who, come into force at the end of the present year, and may be regarded as the Chancery reforms of the present session.

AN ATTORNEY'S BILL.—In the Court of Common Pleas, on Monday, an application was made in the case of "Quarrie and others (assignees of Parker) v. the Great Western Railway Company," for a rule calling on the Master to review his taxation of the plaintiffs' attorney's bill of costs. The action was originally brought by the assignees to carry on a suit Parker against the defendants' railway for overcharges made from 1844 to 1846 on parcels carried by him on their railway, for which the plaintiffs had recovered a large sum of money. In the course of the suit Parker was paid £1000 into Court before a jury, an order at Nisi Prius was made for the verdict to be entered for the plaintiffs, subject to a special case to be drawn by Mr. Rew. Mr. Rew held Lurly incidents in the case in order to ascertain the amount to be the subject of claim, the Court gave judgment for the plaintiffs on five, and for the defendants on one. The case then went back to Mr. Rew on a reference to settle the amount to be awarded on the issues which were found for the plaintiffs, and he awarded £3315 to the plaintiffs, and ordered the defendants to pay the costs of the reference and the costs of the cause. Upon the taxation of the attorney's bill of costs, one of the most important items in it was the cost of "notice of action," to which the defendants refused to pay their share. The cost of the notice of action was 2s 6d, and a very large sum—£1300—and the Master had struck off £1000 from that item. Mr. Rew, plaintiff's counsel, said it had cost the plaintiffs £600 to prepare the draft of the notice. It consisted of 1500 folios, which, at 4d a folio, was £765 15s., and two copies amounted, at 4d. a folio, to £511, and there was a charge for paper of £37, making altogether £1300. The Master had allowed £100 for the draft, and £175 for one copy, and £525 for paper. The notice of action is comprised in 41 folio volumes; had taken three years to prepare, and had occupied ten clerks, including the attorney himself, and every folio and a half had consumed about an hour, occupying ten clerks nearly a fortnight (A laugh.) The Chief Justice.—It seems to me to be a most scandalous abuse of the opportunity you have of multiplying costs. You might just as well give the items of a doctor's bill in the notice of action against a magistrate for imprisonment. £1300 for notice of action is a scandalous! Mr. Brown contended that the notice of action would have been insufficient without these particulars, under the company's Act. The Chief Justice and Chief Justice Cresswell as I was of opinion there ought to be no rule There was a claim made for £1300 for notice of action, from which the Master had struck off £1000, allowing £175 for engraving the draft, and £525 for paper, and £100 for the draft as cost, and £525 for paper. It seemed to him that that item was too large an allowance. He took a rule to be, that in the preparation of cause of action an attorney could not charge for consultations with counsel, and that the cost of preparing the statement of his books to prepare for the trial, and seeks to charge the defendants with the cost of that preparation, an amount which would not be allowed between the parties. The Court thought that £100 would be allowed amply sufficient. The plaintiffs then claimed for two copies of the notice of trial. The object of the second copy was to use it, necessary, as secondary evidence at the trial. He thought the Master had exercised a very wise discretion in assuming that the rough draft was sufficient for that purpose. His lordship then made overruled the other points raised, gave judgment against the application.—Rule refused.

THE female who applied at the Westminster Police Court last week, in the character of a deserted and distressed officer's wife, was on Wednesday again in attendance. From the publicity given to her previous statements by that, as well as by the other papers, many benevolent individuals have forwarded sums to the court for her relief and that of her children. The same peculiarity was the means of bringing to the court persons who were acquainted with the various events of life, and a long investigation ensued, which ended by a declaration on the part of the magistrate, that he regretted very much that he could only come to the conclusion that the applicant was altogether a person most undeserving of public sympathy. He had received some sums from benevolent persons, and one farthing which he could not consent to accept of giving; but it was a matter of consideration with him, although the amount at that moment was inadequate for anything like the purpose, whether they might not be applied to the benefit of the two poor children.

EXTRAORDINARY AFFAIR.—In November last, two boys, sons of a master collier residing, disappeared from their home, in the village of Sherwood, near Nottingham, and went no one knew whither. A year ago one of the rambling youths reappeared, and, in reply to queries addressed to him, stated that he had last seen his runaway brother in Derby. To this story the neighbours were not disposed to attach credence, and one of the neighbours having dreamt that the boy had been murdered by his father, and buried in the garden, the report speedily spread through the village, and the parent was suspected of foul play. Perkins was apprehended, and the police, with a spade in the county gaol, and a searching investigation for the body of the youth was made in the garden. No body was found in the garden, and the suspected father was set at liberty. That Perkins should be apprehended and placed in prison on suspicion of murder upon so stronger evidence than the dream of an old woman appears almost incredible, but such seems to have been the case.

AN importation has taken place from Belgium of some packages of an article supposed to be an extract or compound of different materials, which has been submitted to an analysation by competent parties in the employ of the Government, and found to contain grape sugar and a bitter, somewhat resembling hop in flavour, and apparently an extract that could be used in the brewing of beer, and for which, from its character, it is probably intended

PANORAMIC VIEW FROM THE PROPOSED SITE OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE AT SYDENHAM.

THE PROPOSED SITE OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

ABOUT half-way between the Sydenham and Annerley stations, on the right of the railway from London to Croydon, glimpses of the picturesque chimneys of an Elizabethan mansion may be caught just peeping over an intervening screen of trees. This is Penge-place: it was rebuilt by Blore on the foundation of an ancient mansion, and is soon to be removed to afford a site for the Crystal Palace. Thus, for beauty of scenery and perfect retirement, combined with easy access from London, it is impossible to imagine a more fortunate station. The park, pleasure-grounds, gardens, and pasture-fields contain 280 acres, lying on a gentle slope, varied by round barbed spurs, on one of which, a sort of promontory, the mansion now stands. The park and pastures are adorned with clumps of ornamental timber, and surrounded by a thick belt of plantations which completely separate it from the road and from adjoining properties. One considerable part of this plantation, intersected by winding paths, is formed of magnificent hollies and other evergreens, which must afford a most delightful winter's walk. The situation, sloping down into a valley and hedged in by thick plantations, affords the most perfect solitude: not a sound, not an object within view, betrays the close vicinity of a great city. The blackbirds and thrushes sing away in harmonious rivalry, and the rabbits dashing through the brushwood and wobbling along the fields complete the idea of a remote rural district, only disturbed by the occasional thunder of a train dashing along the valley below, unseen, but marked by a following train of vapour. The village in the valley is hidden, all but the tapering white spire of the church, by the roll of the ground and intervening clumps of trees; but, rising beyond, the Surrey hills, almost covered with wood, spread out in a vast panorama, until they are bounded by the horizon.

With the exception of the belt of plantations which surrounds this future park of the million, very little has been done by art to improve and develop the beauties of what Sir Joseph Paxton has called "the most beautiful spot in the world for the Crystal Palace."

At present there is no water to complete the picture as the eye travels down the green slopes before rising to take in the delicious prospect afforded by the opposite wooded vales, dotted here and there with villas. But from the fall of the ground it will be easy to construct a small lake, or a series of basins for waterfalls. If possible, we should like to have a series of trout preserves, like those at the Wolf's Den, near Heidelberg.

It is indeed delightful to contemplate that this park, from its position, never can be intruded upon by building speculation, but can command solitude for centuries to come. When the Crystal Palace, revived with all the triumphs of taste and skill that are in contemplation, is removed to this park; when four termini of railways are close adjoining the silent highway of the Thames, and are ready to convey all classes to the garden wilderness for the cost of an omnibus fare—into the midst of flowers and rare shrubs in full bloom in winter, and fountains and shady walks in summer, away from the smoke and the din of London, where all will be framed with the view of purging and instructing by the eye and the ear, and every debasing habit and association will be excluded—a new era in the public amusements will have commenced. The day of pot-house gardens, and the pot-and-pipe selfishness of husbands, will soon pass away.

Every year the increase in the size of London and dearness of rent render it more essential that the masses should have the means of healthful recreation, fresh air, and amusement, without the temptation of intoxicating liquors, to refresh them after their toils. Already the improvements in our parks and public gardens have done much to improve the character of the working people in London. But the winter is no time for walks in the park, or excursions to Kew or Hampton Court. The Crystal Palace gets over this difficulty; and it is satisfactory to find that for all the inhabitants of the east end of London—of Greenwich and Deptford, of Vauxhall, Bermondsey, and the suburbs on the river—the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, with the railway running into it, will be nearer and cheaper than if it had been planted in Hyde Park; while a park fitted for every healthful game will be added to its other attractions.

OPENING OF THE SILESIAN INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION.

IMITATIONS of our Crystal Palace are making the tour of the world. The earliest, we learn from the Berlin Correspondent of the Times, is to be found in Breslau, the capital of Silesia, almost on the verge of the German language, and in the heart of the theatre of the Seven Years' War. The idea was imported from London by some of the Silesian contributors to the giant collection in Hyde Park; and it is gratifying to find that great "world-idea," as the Germans call it, so soon bearing fruit, and excellent fruit too, elsewhere.

A general resemblance has been preserved—that is, the Silesian Building consists of a long nave and a transept, a fountain where they intersect each other, side aisles, and galleries; but the last only extend the width of the transept, and the magic effect of glass everywhere is wanting. The Building is abundantly lighted, but the roof is of slate and common beams.

The Building stands on the Exercier-Platz, behind the theatre. Two long wings and a gable-roofed centre form the exterior, which has no peculiar architectural effect. The size may be guessed from the calculation minutely made, that twenty-nine buildings of the same dimensions would have stood under the roof of the London Glass Palace. Inside it does not seem even so large, and, judging by the eye, one would say the Hyde Park edifice would have shut in forty of the same size; but the above scale is the result of actual measurement. A gallery has been carried from one end of the Building to the first floor of the Stand-Haus, and seven or eight of the rooms of its belle étage have been appropriated to the Exhibition, so that the actual extent of the space available is about one twenty-fourth of that in Hyde Park.

The Building was opened with great ceremony on the morning of the 28th ult., when all who received cards of admission assembled at the Zwinger, belonging to the Merchants' Club. Everybody was in full dress. The Marshals of the day were resplendent with gilded staves and yellow and white streamers, the Silesian colours; the clergy had only one representative.

Shortly after eleven, the Marshals arranged a procession out of the mass in a prescribed order, each division wearing their cards (by particular desire) in their hatbands. First went the workmen and masters engaged on the Building, then the Secretaries, the Central Committee, the President of the Breslau Trade Union, the Presidents of the Provincial Trade Unions and Chambers of Commerce, the Chief President of Silesia, the Generals in command of the district, and the heads of the civil departments of the Government, the guests specially invited, the Magistracy, the Town Council, and the Seniors of the merchants' guild, the members of the special committees (for different branches of industry), and last the exhibitors. The line marched through a double row of Communal Guards and spectators to the Exercier-Platz, disappearing into the Building.

The President of the Central Committee, M. Geheimrath Elwanger, addressed the assembly from the edge of the circular basin, through a hum of voices and shuffling of feet that did not allow a word to be heard. The Chief President of the province, M. von Schleinitz, was more successful: he opened at once on the importance of the Exhibition, of which the number of spectators present was a proof, and the beauty of the Building, which was most creditable to all concerned in it, considering it had been constructed in less than three months. The contributions sent in from all parts of the province would speak for themselves, and show the point of culture at which the industry of Silesia had arrived. He paid a deserved compliment to those who had more especially originated the undertaking and called it into life. He then mentioned that the King and the Prince of Prussia had both promised to visit Breslau in a short time, and concluded by giving three cheers for his Majesty. The fountain, which had been stopped, was let on again, the spectators cheered stoutly, the ladies waved their handkerchiefs, the band struck up "Heil Dir in Sieger Kranz" (our "God Save the Queen"), and the company dispersed to ramble through the Building.

The most important divisions of the Exhibition are those allotted to the iron manufacture, the linen trade, and wool and woollen goods, the staples of the province, and the display is excellent. The specimens of ores, minerals, and fossils of the province are numerous, and well arranged. A steam-engine outside the Building is preparing for putting the different machines in motion. One of the "features" of the collection are two gigantic figures in hammered zinc of a Spanish and a German halberdier: the workman has followed the design of a good artist, and the costumes are correct. The light wares, glass, porcelain, and jewellery are placed in the galleries. There is a fountain of perfumed water, in which a Breslau manufacturer threatens to equal any of the two dozen genuine and original Maria Farinas of Cologne. There are numerous specimens of photography, and some curious wood mosaics. Kalide's Bacchante," a cast of which was in the London Exhibition, has here the place of honour, by the side of the fountain. From either of the end or side galleries the view of the whole interior, with the flags of all the Silesian towns waving from the roof, the coloured goods of the stalls, and a crowd actually interested in what they are seeing, had something of the charm that made the London Exhibition so attractive. But the touch of magic is wanting that rendered the edifice of glass so different from all other covered buildings.

THE SILESIAN INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION BUILDING, AT BRESLAU, OPENED MAY 26.

The admission price from to-day is fixed at 15 groschen (1s. 6d.) for a fortnight, after which a lower scale will be adopted.

A purchase has been made on the part of the trustees of the National Gallery of London, at the sale of the late Marshal Soult's collection, of a picture by Titian, and also of a picture at another sale in Paris, for the purpose of being deposited in that national establishment. The pictures have been shipped to London and Calais, and removed with every care to the National Gallery.

Mr. J. H. Foley, A.R.A., has received a commission to execute for the Houses of Parliament a statue of Selden. The order could not have been placed in better hands than those which executed the noble figure of Hampden.

A letter from Rome of the 24th ult. says:—"M. Thiers is still here. He will shortly set out for Naples, and thence to Sicily, to be present at the fête of St. Rosalia. M. Thiers is occupied solely with works of arts, passing his whole time in the churches and museums. He is now visiting Italy for the seventh time, and is collecting the elements of a great work which he intends to publish under the title of 'Histoire de la Civilisation.'"

The Queen of Spain has just created a new decoration for ladies. It is to be called the Medal Cross of Queen Isabella; it is in enamelled gold, and ornamented with brilliants. On days of ceremony it will be worn suspended round the neck by a red ribbon, and on ordinary days it will be attached to the left shoulder with a small ribbon of the same colour.

The Piedmontese Gazette announces from Parma, 27th ult., that private teaching has been again allowed in the superior schools of Piacenza during the remainder of the present scholastic year. Nevertheless, a list of students to be excluded is to be sent by the Government to the authorities of the schools.

"A girl, 16 years of age, named Brisoux, residing near St. Malo," says the Union Malouine, "has been for six weeks plunged in a lethargic sleep, and during all that time she has neither eaten nor performed any animal function. The pulse can be distinctly felt beating. Hundreds of persons have gone to see her in this state."

On Tuesday morning the Australian, steam-ship, belonging to the Australian Royal Mail Steam-packet Company, left her moorings off the entrance to the East India Docks, on her "maiden" voyage for Australia. She is a fine-looking vessel, 1400 tons burthen, worked by the screw. She carries out a very valuable cargo, and upwards of £200,000 in specie, besides no less than 180 passengers, of whom 48 are first-class.

VORACITY OF THE PIKE.

VERY many instances are related of the voracity of the Pike, and the group here engraved adds a remarkable example. The two fish were taken in April last in the "crystal Colne" (the Duke of Northumberland's waters), precisely in the position here represented, and in which they have been excellently preserved, by J. Cooper, Radnor-street, St. Luke's. The Pike, it will be recollected, is one of the most voracious of fish, and, it is said, will even eat those of its own species, of which ferocity this may present the first stage. It is a strange action of Pike v. Pike. The two fish were swimming in the Colne, one with open jaws into which the other darted and became transfixed, and "faucibus hæsit," as we here see it.

PIKE, AS TAKEN IN THE COLNE.

Two remarkably fine nylghaus (male and female), three splendid African ostriches, a king vulture, and a rare and curious cat, were landed on Tuesday in the Docks, and proceeded at once to the Surrey Zoological Gardens.

The Warrington town-council have resolved to advertise for plans and specifications for a new covered market, to be erected in the market-place at a cost of £2000.

Smith, Payne, and Smith, London; London and County Bank, London
Yorkshire Banking Company, Leeds

This Company is incorporated by Royal Charter, granted for 31 years, and limits the liability of each shareholder to the amount of capital for which he subscribes
Under the provisions of the Charter the Company is empowered to purchase land in fee, and dispose of the same at any period within 20 years from the date of the Charter
One-fifth portion of the capital of the Company will be reserved as a fund for the permanent improvements of the estates purchased
The Irish Land Company is established for the purpose of purchasing property which is daily offering for sale in large quantities in the Encumbered Estates Court; and for improving, by the expenditure of a portion of the purchase money, the property so purchased, disposing of it, on its improved condition, in such quantities as can be advantageously resold either for occupation or investment
In consequence of the large quantity of land now on sale in the Encumbered Estates Court, and the almost perfect title obtained by the purchaser, the present time is considered particularly favourable for the purchase of such property. For want of the necessary capital on the part of the present proprietors, and from various other causes a large portion of the land is in a state wanting many of the necessary conditions for its successful return.
The object of this Company is to purchase such land as drain, construct, or repair farm roads; to build farm-houses and outbuildings; and, either by arrangement with tenants or otherwise, to have the land put into the best condition necessary for its proper cultivation, and generally to make all those improvements required to give it a marketable value
Within the above are the general objects contained and by the proprietors, it is proposed that all expenditure shall be made with a view to the most ultimate return to the shareholders; and that the first operations of the Company shall be conducted with that due caution necessary to secure, out of the limited capital which can be usefully employed, a return sufficient to obtain a profitable return for the money invested. The position of land in Ireland, at the present moment, gives to a Company, with adequate capital and a large tract of land, great advantages for improvements of the character above mentioned. For, with the proper amount of capital economically applied to put the land in good condition for agricultural purposes, there is no reason why such land should not be ultimately equal in value to any other land at the same distance, and with the same facilities for its produce reaching the great agricultural markets
This Company being in a position to purchase large estates, and put them in first-rate condition, will be enabled to offer to the tenants small quantities of 20 acres and upwards at reasonable rates, and at the same time ensure a fair profit to the shareholders. There are at the present time in Ireland numbers of persons who are desirous to invest moderate sums in the purchase of land, and who have not now the opportunity which this Company will afford them. Advantages will be offered to all parties desiring to purchase estates, and especially to tenants wishing to become proprietors of their farms, by owning a portion of the purchase-money to remain upon the estate, and to be repaid by instalments extending over a moderate fixed period of time
The continued increase of problems metals and the accumulation of capital, will have a tendency to improve all property and the interest will, ultimately, be very large
The promoters of the project believe that, in a commercial point of view, this Company will secure a profitable and safe return to the capital in; and that it will, at the same time, promote social advantages to the districts in which its operations are conducted
Applications for Shares may be made to Messrs George Barnard and Co., 56, Cornhill, London, Mr Henry Rawson, Exchange Arcade, Manchester; Mr John Fildes, Manchester-street Manchester; Messrs Newman and Binkey, silver-street, Halifax; Mr Rhodes, Arbitrator, Leeds, Messrs Wilcox, Lord-street, Liverpool; Messrs Woods and Co., Liverpool; Messrs Brown and Symes, Dublin; and William Whidborn, Belvoir-street Leicester.

TO THE DIRECTORS OF THE IRISH LAND COMPANY.

GENTLEMEN,—I thus I feel oh lged by your a lotting me [illegible] shares in the Irish Land Company, and I hereby agree to accept the same, or any less number that may be allotted to me, and to pay a deposit of £1 0s per share when required, and to execute a proper deed or deeds in conformity with the terms of the prospectus.

As a national organ, the DAILY NEWS is at the head of the Liberal Press of Great Britain; as a commercial organ, it is in the broadest sense, and all sound and practical reforms, whether political, social, or ecclesiastical.

In the extent of its General News—in the accuracy of its Law Reports—in the character of its Foreign Intelligence, and in its varied mercantile and commercial information, this Paper is unsurpassed.

It contains a more detailed list of Shipping than any other Paper—an exclusively early report of Shipping in the Indian seas by every Overland Mail—and the only daily Mining Record, with Sets of Prices, published anywhere.

It excludes from its columns all offensive advertisements.

By the last Returns of Stamps issued for the year 1850 to the leading London Newspapers, it will be seen that this Paper (the youngest by more than sixty years) had in five years beaten its three oldest competitors:—

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1852.

THE second Burmese war has opened with a brilliant success to the British arms. The towns of Rangoon and Martaban, with a considerable quantity of guns and ammunition, have fallen into our hands, and a blow has been struck which would have convinced any European and reasonable potentate of the formidable character of the enemy against whom he had to contend, and the expediency of coming to terms. But Eastern potentates are more hard to convince; and it is doubtful whether this success, which, unfortunately, cannot for some time be followed up, on account of the setting in of the rainy season, will produce the results that might have been anticipated, had it occurred at an earlier period, or against enemies less lofty in their ignorant self-conceit than the Burmese. The gallantry both of the naval and military forces employed in the off-hand and brilliant attacks which placed these two important towns in our power, was of the true British stamp; and if the cholera and the climate shall spare the troops to renew the attack in the more auspicious season of the year, there is no great reason to believe that the war can be a protracted one.

We wish that as much could be said of the military prospects of the nation in another portion of the vast empire that owes allegiance to the British Crown. The return of Sir Harry Smith, and the simultaneous arrival of news from the Cape of Good Hope, renew to the public interest in the sore subject of Kaffraria and the Kaffirs. As regards Sir Harry Smith himself, who was recalled by Earl Grey at a period exceedingly inopportune, and in a manner exceedingly harsh, if not unjust, he has already received at the hands of his countrymen a reception enthusiastic enough to make him amends for his sufferings at the hands of the Whig Colonial Secretary. But the state of affairs in and around the colony he has quitted is a matter of far more serious concern to the nation, whether viewed in relation to the character of Great Britain, or to the meaner but nevertheless highly important considerations involved in the expenses of the struggle.

The Kaffirs take an immensity of beating; for, though continually conquered, they remain unsubdued. But, in fact, no civilised nation can ever expect profit or honour in a war with savages. All wars are unprofitable, though all are not dishonourable; but when a great State has the misfortune to be entangled in hostilities with barbarians, whom it is cruel to subdue, and still worse to encourage in their audacity of insult and outrage, the honour and the profit of the encounter are equally worthless. To exterminate such foes as the Kaffirs, though it may be considered by some to be absolutely necessary, is too ruthless and sanguinary an operation for a Christian community either to rejoice at or to sanction. To gain small victories over them, leads to a result as vexatious as that of drawing water out of a well with a sieve, or rolling the stone of Sisyphus up the mountain; and to gain great victories is a matter, if not impossibility, of the extremest difficulty, with such an enemy, in such a country as Kaffraria. Sir Harry Smith has a sanguine belief that his successors in the government of the colony, and in the command of the troops, will have an easy task in concluding the war; but the British public, while it would only be too happy to think that his glowing anticipations are correct, have had too much experience of the "long drawn misery" of such wars, to be satisfied with hopes that have no more solid foundation than isolated victories over foes whom it is so easy to beat, but so difficult to conquer.

ANOTHER of the wonderful achievements of modern science has been happily inaugurated during the present week. Great Britain and Ireland—still unfortunately estranged in politics, as well as in religion—have been brought closer together by means of the subtle agency which, ere long, shall girdle the earth. The electric telegraph has bridged St. George's Channel, and the Celt and Saxon can send messages from London to Dublin, and vice versâ, in as many minutes as it formerly took hours to express their confidence in, or their fears of each other. It was a grand day for science and humanity when England and France were linked together by this marvellous agency; and the union of Great Britain and Ireland by the same means—a union not to be permanently repealed by all the power of ten thousand O'Connells and of twice as many Cardinals—is but the necessary sequence of that realised idea. The next great feat—a greater than all, but one of which the accomplishment is solely dependant upon money and patience—is to stretch the electric wires over Ireland to Galway, and from Galway across the Atlantic, until communication between London and New York shall be but the work of a forenoon, and when the sober matter-of-fact of the nineteenth century shall surpass the poetic dreams of all the bygone ages of the world.

It would be sanguine to expect that any large immediate benefit to Ireland will result from the laying down of the electric wires; but if it has taken nearly 6000 years for the intelligence of man to arrive at an end so magnificent as the instantaneous transmission of thoughts to the remotest corners of the globe which he inhabits, we may think the lifetime of a few generations of mankind but a short period for bringing the long-estranged nations and races of the earth to a better understanding with each other than has hitherto been possible. The great cause of all the disputes and wars that have desolated the world has been ignorance. Ignorance is a mountain that it is difficult to remove or to cut a way through; but high-roads, and railroads, and steam ships, and electric wires will pierce it sooner or later. Many Utopias will cease to appear utopian when nations that can converse together, shall shake hands, and learn that the interest of one is the interest of all, and that duty and interest are but two names for one fact. The miseries of Ireland will yield like other evils to the great power of self-knowledge; and the repulsion of Celt to Saxon, and of Saxon to Celt—a repulsion that often appears natural, but that is purely artificial—will be replaced by a very different feeling. One imaginary remedy for the woes of Ireland, suggested by a wit and a philosopher, was to drive it out a thousand miles into the middle of the Atlantic, and leave it to govern itself, under King Daniel or King O'Brien; but a real and a better remedy has been found, in bringing it within five minutes of London. It will take time to work the cure; and in after years the fact recorded in a simple paragraph of the daily journals of the 2d of June, 1852, will be duly acknowledged in all its efficacy and greatness.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

The fourth and last Drawingroom for the present season, and a musical performance on Tuesday morning at the Palace, have been the chief features of Court life during the past week.

On Monday the Queen and the Prince Consort honoured the performance of the French plays with their presence.

On Tuesday their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess de Montpenser had an audience of her Majesty at Buckingham Palace. Their Royal Highnesses were attended by Senor Isturiz, the Spanish Minister. After the audience the Duke and Duchess paid a visit to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent. On the same day her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, with the Prince of Wales and Prince Alfred, took a drive in an open carriage and four. In the evening the Queen had a dinner party.

On Wednesday the Duke and Duchess de Nemours visited her Majesty at Buckingham Palace. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and Prince Alfred, attended by Mr. Gibbs, visited the Exhibition of the Works of Practical Art and Design, at Marlborough House.

On Thursday her Majesty held her fourth Drawingroom for the present season

The Court will leave town for Windsor Castle (for the Ascot race week) on Monday next.

The Hon. Amelia Murray and the Hon. Lucy Kerr have relieved the Hon. Matilda Paget and the Hon. Mary Seymour in their duties as Maids of Honour in Waiting to the Queen.

Major-General Buckley has relieved Lord Charles Fitzroy in his duties as Equerry in Waiting to the Queen. Colonel Couroyeris has relieved Lieut.-Colonel F. H. Seymour in his duties as Equerry in Waiting to his Royal Highness Prince Albert. Major-General Berkeley Drummond has relieved Mr. R. Ormsby Gore as Groom in Waiting to her Majesty.

The State apartments at Windsor Castle are closed until further orders.

THE QUEEN'S DRAWINGROOM.

The Queen held a Drawingroom on Tuesday, at St. James's Palace. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort arrived from Buckingham Palace at two o'clock, escorted by a detachment of the Royal Regiment of Horse Guards.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge attended the Drawingroom.

His Highness Prince Vere Bolander was also present, attended by Major Drummond and three native members of his suite.

The Queen and the Prince Consort were attended by the Mistresses of the Robes, the Marchioness of Ely (in waiting), the Countess of Gainsborough, Viscountess Canning, the Marchioness of Douro, the Countess of Desart and Lady Char otta Copley, the Ladies of the Bedchamber, the Maids of Honour, and the various great officers of State.

The Queen wore a train of blue silk, brocaded in silver, of English manufacture, trimmed with silver blonde and white tulle. The petticoat was of white satin, covered with white tulle, and trimmed with bows of white satin ribbon and blue and silver ribbons. Her Majesty's headdress was formed of diamonds and feathers.

The foreign Ministers were first introduced, and several presentations took place

The general circle were next introduced. The Lady Constance Grosvenor and Lady Williams Wynn were amongst the presentations to her Majesty on this occasion.

His Excellency the French Ambassador and the Countess Walewski gave a grand entertainment on Wednesday evening, at the residence of the Embassy, in Grosvenor-square. After the banquet, the Countess Walewski received a se ect circle of the aristocracy at a musical soirée, the enjoyment of which was prolonged until an advanced hour.

The Duke and Duchess of Norfolk gave a magnificent entertainment on Wednesday evening, at Norfolk House, to their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary

On Saturday Lord Londesborough gave a conversazione at his mansion, on the Terrace, Piccadilly, at which a great number of the learned and scientific societies of the metropolis assembled

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge has taken formal possession of the wing of St. James's Palace formerly occupied by the late King of Hanover.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—The following appointments and preferments have recently been made:—Rectories: The Rev. Henry Mildred Birch, late tutor to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, to Pre-twich cum-Oldham, Lancashire; the Rev. Joseph Lloyd Brereton, to West Buckland, Devon; the Rev. George Richards, to Thornbury, near Bedford; the Rev. Thomas J. Saunders, to Week St. Mary, near Stratton, Cornwall; the Rev. W. Singleton, to Worlington, Suffolk; the Rev. Bourchier Wrey Savile, to West Buckland, Devon. Vicarages: The Rev. J. Darin Brown, to Braintree, Essex; the Rev. Charles John D. Marsden, to Gargrave, Yorkshire; the Rev. Sidney J. T. Allen, B.A., to the vicarage of Leysdown, with Harty P.C., county of Kent; patron, Archbishop of Canterbury.

TESTIMONIALS.—The following clergymen have recently received testimonials of esteem and respect: The Rev. John Hancock, by the parishioners of Irthington, on his departure; the Rev. G. T. Fox, from his friends in the parishes of St. Nicholas, St. Oswald &c., Durham; the Rev. J. R. Aleop, incumbent of West Houghton, near Manchester, from his communicants and parishioners, expressive of their attachment; the Rev. John A. Dolan, late curate of St. Cuthbert, Gateshead, from the congregation; the Rev. Richard Rees, Marsden, Lancashire, from his congregation; the Rev. N. G. Pilkington, late assistant curate at Christchurch, Tynemouth, upon his leaving the parish, from his parishioners.

The Bishop of Cape Town, who has recently arrived in England, has issued an appeal for aid to the Church in South Africa, and earnestly solicits contributions of all who value the spiritual privileges which they enjoy at home towards the four following objects:—1st, the division of the diocese; 2d, the future maintenance of the clergy; 3d, missions to the heathen; 4th, the foundation of a college.

EPISCOPAL CONSECRATION.—The Rev. O. E. Vidal, D.D., incumbent of Upper Dicker, Horsebridge, Sussex, was on Sunday consecrated in Lambeth Palace Chapel as Bishop of Sierra Leone. The Archbishop of Canterbury was assisted on the occasion by the Bishops of London, Chichester, and Cape Town. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of London, from Acts xvii. 24, 26, and 27. After introducing his subject by some able remarks on the unity of the human race, and the universal responsability of man, he reviewed the various efforts which had been made for the benefit of Western Africa, in the suppression of the slave trade, and the establishment of Christian missions along the coast; the constancy of the female converts of Abbeokuta under a severe persecution, recalling the Blandinas and Perpetuas of the second century. He had himself witnessed proofs of the African's capability for moral elevation, as he had ordained no less than three persons of negro blood, presented to him for ordination by the Church Missionary Society, one of whom had written during his examination a paper on the evidences of Christianity, which would have been no discredit to any English student. He also alluded to the fact that twelve catechists would be presented upon his arrival by the Bishop of Sierra Leone for admission to the ministry of the church there, and to the wide opening for the employment of his philological talents in the translation and adaptation of the liturgy of the Church of England into the languages of Africa. He hoped that the time would come when that continent would have its own Cyprians and Augustines again; but at present the fostering care of an European Bishop and the zeal and energy of a band of English clergy were needed in order to establish Christianity in that region.

CAMBRIDGE.—The gold medal, given annually by his Royal Highness the Prince Chancellor to the resident undergraduate who shall compose in English the best ode or poem in heroic verse, has been adjudged for the present year to Mr. Fred. William Farrar, scholar of Trinity College. Subject, "The Arctic expeditions, and the hopes of recovering the lost adventurers."

METROPOLITAN BUILDINGS.—The bill brought forward by Lord John Manners, to amend the law relating to metropolitan buildings, has just been printed by order of the House of Commons. It contains 79 clauses.

It is stated that employment in the midland counties is generally abundant; and, with the exception of some of the frame-wrought glove bands, all classes of operatives, including lace makers and frame-work knitters, are fully employed; indeed, in some departments, hands in sufficient numbers cannot be had. Domestic servants, for instance, are in great request, the local manufacturers employing the young people of both sexes at much better wages than servants usually receive. Some manufacturers are unable to extend their business for want of needlewomen of good character, and are thinking of procuring supplies from the south and west of England, if possible. Thus, again, the trade people connected with building are in great demand

A violent storm visited Caen and the adjacent villages on Saturday. Some houses at Cartigny-Lepeney, Lison, and Castelly were partially destroyed by lightning, and the crops were greatly injured by hail.

INDIA.—THE BURMESE WAR.

Full accounts (dated Bombay, May 3) of the capture of Martaban and Rangoon by the British troops, a brief announcement of which by electro telegraph appeared in our late edition of last week, have been received. It will be seen from the details, below given that success of our troops has been most complete; and, notwithstanding the excessive heat, which was more fatal than the enemy's bullets, the vigour and energy with which the attack of the British troops was conducted carried all opposition before it.

Martaban was stormed on the 8th of April, and Rangoon was taken on the 14th of the same month. The troops engaged in the affair of Martaban formed the Moulmein brigade, and consisted of a wing of her Majesty's 18th, a wing of her Majesty's 80th, a wing of the 26th Madras Native Infantry, with details of Bengal European Artillery and Madras Sappers—in all about 1400 men. The attacking party was commanded by Colonel Reignolds, C.B.; and Captain Gillespie, of the 18th, was first on the walls. Only eight men were wounded; no officer killed or wounded. Her Majesty's steamers Proserpine, Rattler, Hermes, and Salamander worked in concert with the troops, bombarded the place, and covered the landing of the troops.

The capture was a work of comparative facility, the troops, on having landed, advancing rapidly, in conjunction with the artillery, upon the works of the enemy. The whole operations lasted only some four or five hours, when the place was ours.

The Bombay Times says—

Unfortunately the Hermes grounded about 2000 yards off; but the Rattler and Proserpine brought up, the former at 313 yards from, and the latter within 50 yards of, the main wharf.

The enemy were in considerable numbers lining the mud wall which runs along the bank of the river to the large pagoda; and as soon as the steamers came opposite the wharf, each opened a sharp cannonade, which was returned with goodwill by the enemy, both with guns and musketry. The fire from all the vessels was most effective. The Rattler and Proserpine, from being so close, must have caused many casualties, and the practice from the Salamander and Hermes was admirable: even at the distance they were, every shot told. Too much praise cannot be given to Captain Brooking for the noble manner in which he worked and fought his beautiful little vessel, the Proserpine.

When the landing-place was cleared of the enemy, the troops, which were at hand, were landed from the steamers, and most gallantly driven from every house there, following them up the hill, and from position to position, meeting with considerable opposition from their musketry, but immediately driving them from, and getting possession of their guns. The town was at the same time cleared, the first to make his escape being the Governor. The place was entirely in our possession a little after eight a.m., but the last of the troops did not return to the big pagoda, where the general had established his head-quarters, till about one P.M.

The casualties were very few. A havildar of the 26th Madras Native Infantry and a private of her Majesty's 18th Royal Irish being the only two dangerously wounded, and fifteen Europeans slightly so. The loss of the enemy is not known, for they removed all their dead and wounded: but it must have been considerable, for the fire from the steamers was very sharp, and continued for some time.

After the capture of Martaban the troops re-embarked and proceeded to the Rangoon River, where, with the Madras contingent, they joined the Bengal force and proceeded up the river to Rangoon.

The operations against Rangoon were begun on Easter Sunday, the 11th, when the entire squadron proceeded up the river, not intending, however, to commence operations on that day; but the steamers towing the transport having taken them higher up than was intended, first came within range of the river batteries of the Burmese, which immediately opened upon them, and a reply was inevitable. A terrific cannonade was then commenced on both sides, the steamers opening their broadsides on the river face of the Burmese works on both banks of the river, and entirely demolishing them, both at Rangoon and Dalla. Her Majesty's ship Serpent then proceeded up to Kemmendine, upon the works at which place she opened fire; but the return was so severe, and the enemy's guns so well served, that the brig was obliged to haul off, and send down the river for aid, when two war steamers were sent up to her assistance. With these the Kemmendine batteries were silenced; and a landing having been effected, the enemy deserted the works, which were occupied by our sailors and marines from the ship, and European troops. During the cannonade and shelling on Sunday, besides the destruction of the Burmese works on the river face, the enemy suffered great loss by the explosion of their powder magazine, a shell from one of our guns falling on it and causing it to blow up with terrific force. On Monday, the 12th, the land operations commenced, the troops effecting their debarcation under the protection of the ships' guns, and all the boats of the squadron being employed in effecting the landing. Here the brunt of the work commenced, as it was necessary, soon after landing, to attack and capture a strong stockade a short distance in shore, where the enemy fought most gallantly and caused considerable loss to our force. On Tuesday, the 13th, there was a pause, which was occasioned by the unavoidable delay in landing the heavy guns from the ships, the last of which did not arrive in the camp, as we may so call the bivouac of the troops, till midnight on the 13th. On the 14th, in the morning, the entire force broke ground, and advanced towards the great pagoda stockade, throwing out skirmishers, which became also fighting well in their fashion, and knocking over many of our men. Nothing, however, could check the advance of our soldiers, seconded by a tremendous fire of artillery, and they advanced rapidly but steadily towards the pagoda stockade, taking some minor ones in their forward movement. At length, towards noon, it was resolved to make the general assault, and it was accordingly effected by all arms with the greatest spirit and intrepidity, on the north-east angle of the pagoda hill and stockade. The enemy yielded to the rush at once, gave way, and retreated at all points. They never expected that the assault would have been made at the point, and a gate was actually found open there, through which our troops rushed in and instantly occupied the place, all the fighting being concluded by two o'clock in the afternoon. All the country round fell with the pagoda.

The operations among the officers, &c. are thus summed up:

OFFICERS KILLED.—Lieutenant Doran; Ensign Armstrong. WOUNDED.—Lieutenant Donaldson, mortally; Lieutenant Chads, slightly; Captain Allan, severely; Lieutenant Williams, slightly; Lieutenant Trevor, severely; Captain Rundall, slightly (Madras); Lieutenant Ford, slightly (Madras). Her Majesty's 18th—Colonel Coote, severely. Captain Bruce, slightly; Lieutenant Elliot, slightly. Her Majesty's 80th—Lieutenant Turner, slightly. Her Majesty's 51st—Captain Blunchell, dangerously, Lieutenant-Colonel Doyle, severely (Madras); Lieutenant Harries, dangerously (Madras); Ensign Hawker, slightly (Madras).

KILLED.—Officers, 2; Rank and file, 15: total, 17.

WOUNDED.—Officers, 14; Rank and file, 114; Lascars, 4: total, 132.

Besides these, in the action of the 14th, in taking the White-house stockade, Major Oakes, Madras Artillery, and Major Griffiths, Madras Infantry, both died of coup de soleil. The heat was so excessive that further operations on that day were suspended, Colonels Foord, Warren, and St. Maur suffering most severely from the heat.

The operations of the 14th are thus noticed in the Bombay Times:—

Immediately on leaving the bivouac of the previous day a sharp firing of musketry commenced on both sides, and on our reaching an opening in the rising ground all around us two stockades concentrated the fire of their guns upon us and did some slight damage. On arriving at a distance of 800 or 1000 yards from the great pagoda, four 8-inch howitzers, which had been dragged up from the rear by the seamen of the fleet, were brought to bear upon it, and continued to do so till about one o'clock, when the order was given for the storming party to advance, headed by her Majesty's gallant 18th Royal Irish. It received little molestation till it commenced the ascent of the steps leading to the great pagoda, when it was received by a discharge from two guns and from hundreds of muskets and matchlocks. The three first who ascended were Lieutenant-Colonel Coote and Lieutenant and Adjutant Doran, of her Majesty's 18th Royal Irish, and Captain Latter; and I regret very much to add that the first officer was severely, and Lieutenant Doran mortally, wounded. Poor fellow, he received seven wounds, and expired in half an hour, deeply and sincerely regretted by every officer and man in the regiment, and most deservedly so, for a nobler fellow and more gallant and amiable soldier never lived.

The army is now occupying quarters about the great pagoda, and evidently the enemy were totally unprepared for our attack; quantities of food just cooked, clothing, &c., were found in every direction. A return of the ordnance captured is being taken by Majors Read, of the Bengal, and Montgomery, of the Madras Artillery: the number is about 100 guns of sorts (including nine 18-pounder iron guns), and 70 or 80 wall pieces and jingalls. Thousands of balls and pieces of china were lying by the guns, most of which were found loaded and spiked, some to within six or eight inches of the muzzle, one filled with duckshot.

The place is most offensive from the number of dead bodies of men and dogs, and from the stench of the decayed fish, which the Burmese are fond of, and sickness has, I am sorry to say, commenced to a very great extent. Cholera is raging fearfully. One officer, Captain Hunt, Paymaster of her Majesty's 80th Foot, has already fallen a victim, and another is scarcely expected to recover. The soldiers of the different regiments are dying in numbers. The heat since the troops landed has been fearful

At present nothing is known of our future proceedings, but it is generally believed we remain here during the rains.

It is understood that the Governor-General of India (Lord Dalhousie) has sent the King of Ava a bill, amounting to £300,000, for the expenses ncurred up to the 31st of March, with a notice that he will be charged at the rate of £10,000 a day for the expedition till he comes to terms. The present strength of the expedition is about 6000 troops, 16 or 17 steamers (all but two armed), four or five transports, a line of battle ship, a 44-gun frigate, and a brig of war.

THIEN, OR SACRED TEMPLE, AND ZAYAT.

If operations on a larger scale are required after the rains everything will be in readiness with reference to such a contingency. The Governor-General has stopped all leave of absence, furloughs, and retirements in the armies of Bombay and Madras. The order extends to the officers of the Bengal army, but not to its Sepoys—a tacit acknowledgment that the latter are of no use for foreign service. The troops of the minor Presidencies, however, are eager to supply their place, and are sufficiently numerous to do so without inconvenience. It is mentioned en passant, as another melancholy instance of the small dependence that can be placed on the Bengal native troops, that in the neighbourhood of Peshawur, on the 31st of March, Lieutenant Tottenham, with the 5th troop of the 7th Bengal Light Cavalry, having succeeded in getting between a party of the Momunds and the hills, immediately ordered the charge, and set the example by dashing through them himself, but was only followed by the subahdar of the troop and a single trumpeter. No reason is assigned for the dastardly conduct of the whole troop, who, it is said, had an opportunity of striking a blow more severe than any the Momunds have yet felt. This instance is not, unfortunately, a singular one: it was only a few weeks previously, that a party of regular cavalry, on their way from Kohat to Peshawur, surrendered their horses and arms to a party of Affreedees without sustaining a wound or striking a blow.

From other parts of India we learn that that most troublesome district, the north-west frontier near Peshawur, is in an unsettled state, and Sir Colin Campbell had some severe skirmishing, on April 15, with a body of Momunds some 4000 or 5000 strong.

It is reported from Cabul, that the people of Kohistan have rebelled against Dhost Mohamed, and worsted a body of his troops. The Dhost's youngest son had marched against the rebels with one regiment of infantry and two of cavalry, with four guns. Gholan Hyder Khan was expected to leave Cabul about the 25th, with a strong force for the occupation of Herat.

The state of the Nizam's territories continues bad. The Government is unable to realise its revenue, and credit is at an end. The country is covered with predatory bands of Rohillas.

Apprehensions of further Mopla disturbances in Malabar were entertained.

The Governor-General was in Calcutta, but the circumstance of the Commanders-in-Chief of Bengal and Madras being respectively at Simla and the Neilgherry Hills at such a juncture as the present is much commented on.

We annex five Views from the seat of the war.

posts; and the Zayat is the building on the left, used principally as a place from which the priests can harangue the assembled congregation.

Upon the opposite page, also, is a Temple at Moulmein; it contains an image of their deity, Guadama: it is built of brick, faced with chunam. The pagodas are always surrounded by temples of this description. Next is a part of Moulmein, with Martaban in the distance. In the foreground, on the left, is one of the sacred posts which are always erected in the vicinity of the temples; and on the right is the house of the chief priest at Moulmein.

VIEW ON THE SYNE, WITH BURMESE RACE-BOAT.

This represents some curiously picturesque rocks that rise abruptly from a plain on the banks of the river Syne, about twenty miles north of Moulmein. They are covered with shrubs and trees, and are so steep that they are nearly inaccessible; nevertheless, the Burmese priests have managed to erect a pagoda on the very summit of the highest rock, and it is said to have been built by means of religious penances inflicted upon the inhabitants—every Burman performing such penance being compelled to scale the rock with a few bricks and some mortar secured on his back. In the foreground is one of the Burmese race boats. It is supposed to have just passed its opponent; and the three figures standing up and dancing are taunting their adversaries with their want of skill and boasting that they can beat them without their rowing, or rather paddling.

BURMESE SCHOOL

In this Sketch is seen a Burmese school; and a highly amusing scene it is to see one in full operation, for, like some of our European systems, every boy vociferates in a loud voice at the same moment the word or sentence that is to be learned; and as the Burmese language possesses most strange and unaccountable sounds to European ears, the noise created is most discordant. The scholars invariably belong to the priesthood, and the lessons taught are generally few and simple, being confined to reading, spelling, and a few rules in arithmetic. Their books are made of the leaves of the palmyra tree, and are sewn together between two pieces of bamboo. In the middle distance is a hill studded with white pagodas, commanding distant and beautiful views of the [illegible] Martaban.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their Lordships assembled after the Whitsun recess, and having received a few petitions, and read the Representative Peers (Scotland) Bill a second time on the motion of Lord REDESDALE, immediately adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The House met after the Whitsun recess

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

A conversation on the state of public business in the house occurred between the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and Sir J. GRAHAM, in which the latter pressed on the Government the necessity of stating what measures they meant to go on with, and what to throw over this session.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER intimated, that, for the convenience of the members from Ireland, he meant to postpone the Maynooth question from the next day (Friday) to Tuesday next. He added, that it was his intention to state, on Monday next, the views of the Government generally with regard to the conduct of public business, and he would reserve any observations he might have to make in reply to the inquiries of Sir James Graham until then. He would merely say he did not despair of being able to effectually accomplish this session all the business that was absolute y necessary. It was not his wish to deprecate the fullest discussion on the items brought forward in the Committee of Supply, but he appealed to hon. members not to press any questions which had no particular reference to the vote under consideration.

MR. MATHER.

In reply to Mr. Osborne, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said he would lay the papers connected with the case of Mr. Mather on the table of the House to-morrow.

SUPPLY

The House then went into Committee of Supply, Mr. BENNAL in the chair

The first vote, of £113,476 for the repairs of Royal Palaces and public buildings, &c., was agreed to, after some opposition by Mr. W. Williams, and a short discussion, in which Mr. Hamilton explained the various items of which the vote was composed.

Several other votes of the miscellaneous estimates were agreed to, amongst which were £39 000 for secret service money; £189,123 for the maintenance of prisoners in county gaols, in philanthropic institutions, and in lunatic asylums, and for the removal of convicts; £101,041 for the transportation of convicts, and £223,387 for the convict establishments in the colonies.—Adjourned.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—The second report of the Select Committee on Ventilation and Lighting of the House of Commons has been issued. The committee allude to the differences between Sir Charles Barry and Dr. Reid, and are of opinion that, as regards future management, the entire responsibility of ventilating and lighting the House and its appendages should be confided to one competent person under the direction and control of the Board of Works; and, with a view to secure proper attention to any complaints that may arise, a committee should be named, at the commencement of each session, to confer with the Board of Works upon any measure that may appear necessary to remove such complaints

WOODS, FORESTS, AND LAND REVENUES.—A Government bill has been printed to alter and amend certain acts relating to the Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues of the Crown. The object of the bill is to enable the commissioners in a number of matters to exercise a discretionary power in dealing with the property of the Crown, so as to facilitate arrangements, &c.

LORD LANSDOWNE.—A number of the friends and admirers of Lord Lansdowne have proposed his Lordship to sit for his bust, as a testimony of respect for his public character during a long course of parliamentary and official life. The addr ss has been signed, as we hear, by above 140 persons, embrac ng various shades of political opinion.

HALIFAX SCHOOLS.—On Monday a great Sabbath-s hool demonstration took place in the Piece-hall, Ha ifax. In the area of this vast building were assembled nearly 21 000 teachers and scholars, with between 300 and 400 professional singers and musicians, erected on the east side of the hall, was occupied by 800 instrumental performers. The galleries were filled with spectators; and the whole number of persons present was 30,000. The proceedings were commenced by the singing of the first of the appointed hymns, the effect of which was very impressive. After the second hymn, refreshments were distributed. In the course of an hour the third and fourth hymns were sung, and the proceedings terminated with the National Anthem.

THE SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH BETWEEN HOLYHEAD AND HOWTH.—The communication between England and Ireland, by means of the electric telegraph, has been accomplished The telegraph cable, which was manufactured at the gutta percha and Indiarubber manufactory of Messrs. Newall and Co., London, is of the very finest quality, and is in length, the width of the Channel between Holyhead and Howth being sixty-five miles. On Friday weak the cable having been properly coiled on board the Dublin and Liverpool Steam-Packet Company's vessel Britannia, the operation of sinking the telegraph commenced; after the Admiralty steamer Prospero having joined as pilot and tender. However, when about four miles had been performed, so great a strain fell upon the cable, that it was thought complete success, and the wire sank from sight. It was raised again in order to repair the fracture The Britannia was therefore obliged to return to raise the broken part, and re connect the wires On Tuesday last, however, the operation of "paying out" the cable was completed in the most successful manner, and the first message was transmitted from Howth, across the Channel, at half-past eight o'clock in the evening, and an answer instantaneously received. The Britannia and Prospero started their second start from Holyhead shortly after two o'clock A.M. on Tuesday morning. The Britannia "paying out" the cable steadily, and constantly testing, by the indicators on board and ashore, the perfection of the communicating. The voyage was unmarked by any incident of importance, and was happily free from any accident. The cable fa.l so straight, and sank so evenly, that only three miles more than the straight line across the Channel were payed out. This, in a course of sixty-five miles, is really extraordinary. A few minutes after three o'clock P.M. the vessels were sighted from Howth, and at eight o'clock P.M. the Prospero entered Howth Harbour, the Britannia lying outside, near the Island of Ireland's Eye, through the channel near which the cable was subsequently brought to shore by boat. The moment the Britannia had arrived at her destination, and communicated the fact to Holyhead that the Irish shore was reached, the final grand test was applied to the telegraphic cable by connecting the wire with one of the ship's loaded guns, and passing the word "Fire!" to Holyhead. The answer was the immediate discharge of the gun on board the Britannia The hour was then just half past eight. The wires had been performed in little more than 18 hours. Messages were now rapidly interchanged, and a salute of the Britannia's guns fired from Holyhead A letter had arrived in Dublin, directed to a gentleman who had left for Holyhead by the mid-day steamer, and whose presence was immediately required in London. A message was sent to seek him out. Within half an hour he was discovered, and he responded "I am here." "You are wanted in London." "I shall start by the next train." Another hour and the cable was ashore, the connexion completed with the landwires, and the indicators at the Dublin terminus of the Drogheda Railway, in Amiens-street, were conversing with those at the terminus of the Chester and Holyhead Railway, in Holyhead.

THE ESCAPE OF THOMAS F. MEAGHER.—The Dublin Nation of last Saturday says:—"The Colonial Government have offered a reward for the apprehension of Thomas Meagher. Here is an extract from the private letter of the officer of the 99th regiment:—"Hobart Town, Jan. 25.—Meagher has escaped from this place. It is not as yet known where he has gone to. He gave up his ticket of leave before he went. This is the description that was in the Gazette.—"From his residence, near the Dog's Head, Lake Sorrell, in the district of Campbell Town, on the 23 of January, Thomas Francis Meagher, per Swift, tried at Clonmel, 21st October, 1848—life.—a law student, 5 feet 9 inches, age 28, complexion fair, hair brown, eyes light blue, native place city of Waterford. Reward £2, or such lesser sum as may be determined upon by the convicting magistrate Certainly no reward is now much. I think he must have got away."

EXTRAORDINARY ESCAPE FROM DROWNING.—A few days ago, a little boy about three years of age, the son of Benjamin Davies, cutler, of Carrigaan, was playing near Cardigan Mill, when by some accident he fell into the mill-stream, which at this place runs with great rapidity, and enters a subterranean passage made under the public roadway, and, after proceeding underground for about fifty yards, falls into the river Mwldan. When the child fell into the stream not the slightest hopes were entertained that he would be saved, on account of the long underground passage; but, to the amazement of every person [illegible] he reappeared in about four minutes floating some distance down [illegible] force of the mill stream having carried him rapidly through the

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—On Wednesday evening Mr. L. ARNOUX, of Stoke-upon-Trent, delivered a lecture, at the rooms of the Society of Arts, upon the ceramic manufactures. After giving a history of this manufacture, and referring to its present condition and prospects in this country, he said that nature had provided England with all the materials for carrying on the potter's art, and at present the annual produce of our potteries was estimated at two millions sterling. 185 factories, employing 60,000 persons, were engaged in the manufacture, 133 of these being congregated in North Staffordshire. 84 millions pieces were annually exported to almost all parts of the world. Of the 185 factories engaged in the manufacture of earthenware, 24 were engaged in that of soft porcelain, the greatest part of the remainder being cold in the country, as no exports did not exceed £60 000 The French had 70 manufactories of hard porcelain, and their exports of this article had doubled in the short space of five years. There were about 40 manufactories of porcelain in the Zollverein Saxony, and Austria. While, however, he bore witness to the improvement which had taken place in consequence of the Great Exhibition, he emphatically insisted upon the necessity of duly impressed attention to the application of the principles of art and design to the manufacture, in order successfully [illegible] competition with other nations in its higher branches. A vote of thanks was very cordially given to the lecturer.

PHILANTHROPIC INSTITUTION.—On Wednesday a quarterly court of the governors and subscribers to this institution, which was founded in 1788 for the reformation of juvenile offenders, was held at the London Tavern, for the purpose of transacting the usual business of the corporation; Mr. William Gladstone in the chair. The report, which was very satisfactory, stated that the number of boys admitted during the past year was 74, of which number there had em grated or otherwise been discharged 71; 23 boys had been received from Millbank Prison under conditional pardons, commuting their sentences of transportation; and 8 others had been received under a similar pardon from the Westminster Bridewell. The number of boys in the school at the commencement of the past year was 96, and there are at the present time 99 It is the intention of the committee to increase the number of boys from 100 to 2 0; and the average cost per head, on a scale of that number, would sink from £32 to £29 per annum. The total receipts for the past year had been £16,139 13s 10d., and after the necessary expenses had been defrayed there was left a balance in hand of £223 4s. Some routine business having been transacted, the meeting separated.

LONDON HOSPITAL.—The quarterly Court of Governors of this institution was held on Wednesday; but, owing to the number present not being sufficient to constitute a court, the meeting was unconstituted. It appears from the books of the hospital, that during the past quarter 921 in-patients had been dis charged, of whom 868 had been cured, and 386 relieved; 55 of the in patients had died, and 216 were present at the quarter days. The number of out-patients on the books was 2026. It further appeared that a legacy of £919 had been bequeathed to the hospital by the late Captain Bean.

ROYAL CALEDONIAN ASYLUM.—The anniversary festival of this institution, established in 1808, and incorporated in 1815, for supporting and education the children of soldiers, sailors, and marines, natives of Scotland, who have died or been disabled in the service of their country, and of indigent Scottish parents, resident in London, was celebrated by dinner at the Freemasons' Tavern, on Tuesday evening. His Grace the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry presided, supported by about 100 friends of the charity. The subscriptions announced in the course of the evening amounted to about £600, including £100 from the noble chairman, in addition to £800 formerly subscribed by him. During the evening Angus M'Kay, the Queen's piper, with the piper and juvenile band of the asylum, played a variety of national marches and other tunes with great spirit.

METROPOLITAN SUNDAY SCHOOLS.—The eighth annual meeting of the metropolitan Sunday schools was held on Tuesday evening in the large room at Exeter-hall, when nearly 3000 children, from various schools connected with the Church of England Sunday School Institute, were present. The chair was taken by the Right Hon. the Earl of Waldegrave. After a short prayer an appropriate collect was sung by the children, accompanied on the organ accompanying the youthful vocalists. The noble chairman then addressed the children, and the Rev. Messrs. Rogers, Noaun, and Power subsequently delivered addresses. Before the conclusion of the evening's proceedings the Sunday-school Anthem was sung with great effect. During the evening the children were regaled with a large supply of buns.

HOXTON RAGGED SCHOOLS.—On Tuesday night the friends and supporters of the Hoxton Ragged Schools held a meeting in the school-room, Hammond-square Mr. Goody in the chair—for the purpose of offering thanks to Almighty God for having so far favoured the exertions of the friends of the charity that it was now out of debt. The meeting was addressed by the chairman, the Rev Mr. Symmonds, and others. A subscription was recommended for the purpose of building dormitories in connexion with the schools, so as to make them family residences.

CITY ORTHOPÆDIC HOSPITAL, HATTON-GARDEN.—On Wednesday afternoon the quarterly meeting of the friends and governors of this institution was held at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, for the purpose of hearing the report of the progress of the charity. The chairman (the Rev. Thomas Gregory, M.A.) said that he had been in communication with his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, who had in the most handsome manner conferred upon the institution the distinguished honour of becoming its patron. It was stated that there were at present 731 patients upon the books.

BRITISH ARCHITECTURAL ASSOCIATION.—The anniversary festival of this institution was held on Wednesday evening, at Willis's Rooms. Lord Ernkine consented to preside in the absence of the Ear. of Shaftesbury. From the report it appeared that the object of the institution was "to afford permanent incomes of £60 or £80 per annum to widows and children of professional men, military and naval officers, members of the learned professions, professors of the fine arts, bankers, merchants, and others of a superior station in society; and to erect a suitable building for the reception of annuitants." It was stated that thirteen annuitants had already been admitted to the benefits of the charity. In the course of the evening subscriptions were announced amounting to the aggregate sum of £1600.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.—The annual general meeting of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals was held on Tuesday, in the Hanover-square Rooms, Lord Redesdale in the chair. Among those present were the Marquis of Westminster, Lord C. Lennox, Lord Ashley, the Vicomte de Valmer, Mr. Mackinnon, M.P., &c. The report gave a favourable account of the proceedings and position of the society. The auxiliary societies continue their exertions, and one has recently been established at Salisbury, of which the Bishop was president. The committee had under consideration the necessity for extending the act (applicable only to the metropolis and its vicinity) with respect to driving dogs in carts, but had not thought it judicious at present to bring forward a measure on the subject. The receipts for the year (including the balance in hand last year) were £5,816 8s. 6d., and the expenditure, £1263 8s. 8d., leaving a balance in hand of £552 19s. 10d. The Earl of Lanesborough moved the adoption of the report; Mr. Mackinnon, M.P., seconded the resolution, with several others.

EMIGRATION.—A meeting of the inhabitants of All Saints, St. John's-wood, was held on Monday night in the school-room adjoining the church, for the purpose of adopting measures for assisting their poor neighbors to emigrate to the colonies. The chair was filled by the Rev. Mr. Maddock, the rector of the parish, who explained the object of the meeting, and impressed upon his hearers the propriety of assisting their less favoured brethren to leave the country. Resolutions in support of object of the meeting, and in favour of the formation of local committees throughout the kingdom to assist emigration, were agreed to.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.—The adjourned special meeting of this company was held on Wednesday, at the railway station, Euston-square, to take into consideration a bill to enable the Holyhead Railway Company to extend their railway to Birkenhead, to amend the acts relating to the company, and for other purposes Mr. G. C. Gyde, M.P., who was in the chair, moved the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:—"That the bill now proposed and read to the meeting be, and the same is, hereby approved, subject to such modifications and alterations as shall be made thereupon by the committee and counsel of this company."

REGENT'S CANAL COMPANY.—The usual half-yearly general meeting of the proprietors in the above undertaking was held on Wednesday, at the company's offices, City-road Basin; the most noble the Marquis of Salisbury in the chair. The report, which was adopted, stated that the directors had entered into contracts for the execution of the works required for the enlargement of the Bow Road Basin, for the jetties and other erections at the Limehouse Dock, which works are to be completed during the present year. The application for extending the Limehouse Dock had been greatly retarded, but it was now awaiting a fair for the accommodation of ships. The profits of the company in the last half-year were £19,941 19s. 2½d., together with the balance of £608 11s. 8½d., remaining on the preceding account (making an amount of £13,450 10s. 10½d.), were sufficient for a dividend of 11s. 6d. per share; but it was deemed prudent to recommend to the proprietors that the dividend be not greater than that declared in December last, namely, 10s. per share, thus leaving a surplus of £1816 10s 10½d. towards the dividend for the next half year.

BRITISH ASSOCIATION FOR THE ERECTION OF DWELLING SOCIETIES.—The first annual meeting of this society was held on Wednesday, at Radley's Hotel, Blackfriars-bridge; Mr. J. Gover in the chair. From the statements made in the course of the proceedings, it appeared that 1176 shares had been subscribed for in the first year, which now amount to 1300. The report stated that "The directors have much pleasure in reporting the business done during the first twelve months. The issue of shares since the formation of the society to April 30, 1852, has been 1176, of which the above department numerous sums have been received, varying from £5 to £700, upon which 4 per cent. per annum interest has been paid. The advances made to members upon the security of property mortgaged to the society amounted to £11,105 10s. 220 agents have been appointed in different parts of the kingdom."

PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.—The twenty-third half-yearly meeting of this company was held in the offices in Leadenhall-street, on Saturday last. Sir James Matheson, Bart., M.P., the chairman of the company, being prevented from attending the meeting, [illegible] queries of severe indisposition, Captain Samuel Thornton, R.N., was called to the chair. The report, which gave a most favourable account of the proceedings and prospects of the company, having been adopted, a dividend of 4 per cent. (free of income tax for the half-year ending the 31st of March last was declared.

NATIONAL SHIPWRECK INSTITUTION.—On Thursday the special meeting of this company was held at the office, John-street, Adelphi—Sir. T. Wilson in the chair—when some formal business having been transacted, a reward of £4 10s. was voted to three coastguard men, who, at the risk of their lives, saved three of the crew the other fifteen being drowned—of the vessel Amy, of London, which was wrecked a short time since in Barry's Cove, on the coast of Cork

THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH COMPANIES.—On Wednesday, before the adjournment of the Parliamentary committee that is now sitting to investigate the merits of the several electric telegraph companies that are before the public, an interesting experiment was made to show the rapidity, precision, and perfection with which an express despatch now daily passes between London and York. For this purpose, at short notice, the telegraph wires communicating from the central office in the Strand with the lobby of the House of Commons were brought up the winding staircase into the committee room, and there attached to an instrument on the table. Notice was simultaneously given to some one hundred intermediate stations to keep the electric line clear for a special despatch. The committee, with the Times in hand, requested the telegraph worker to tell his colleagues at York, 200 miles, to send up the fourth advertisement in the fourth column of that paper, Mr. Baldock, one of the members, timing the transit. In fifteen seconds after the request was sent the advertisement was in question at York; and when read off, without an error, on the face of the instrument in the committee-room, in two minutes and a fraction, to the great gratification of all present, the manipulator stating that he had in fact been for the hurried arrangements it might have been accomplished in one minute, and at a cost but a sightly more than that paid for the advertisement in the paper.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF UNITED TRADES.—The eighth annual conference of this body was held on Wednesday, at the office of the association, Tottenham-court-road; Mr. G. A. Fleming, President, in the chair From the annual report it appeared that the central committee considered the ultimate result of the attempt to establish a uniform list of prices in the Wolverhampton plate trade to be important, and, as regarded the great principle at issue, most satisfactory. The appeal, from the judgment of Mr. Justice Erle to the Court of Queen's Bench had been argued before the locality of the association, and proved that while it kept within the strict letter of its constitution it could be made a powerful means of protecting the interests of labour. In Walsall the association had aided materially in establishing a list of prices equal to those paid in Birmingham, by which a cause of great discontent and frequent disputes had been destroyed, and the men benefited to the amount of 20 per cent. on their former prices. At Stavely, Westmoreland, the central committee had succeeded by means of arbitration in amicably terminating a dispute arising out of the introduction of new machinery Subsequently, however, the principal employers in the bobbin-making trade presented a document to their workmen, which they were required to sign, and which pledged them to withdraw from the association, and, as in many similar cases, the men were forced to submit. The central committee believed, from past experience, confirmed by the recent results of the Amalgamated Engineers' strike, that the time has come for the entire abandonment of strikes and turn-outs as a means of protecting labour. At the annual meeting last year, Mr. J. S. Buncombe resigned the office of president, as he intended in future to devote himself wholly to his Parliamentary duties, and Mr. Fleming, the treasurer, was elected to the vacancy until the annual conference. By the balance sheet it appeared that the income for the year was £983 3s. 4d., expenditure, £974 3s. 4d.

METROPOLIS WATER SUPPLY.—The following are the new additional provisions proposed to be inserted in the Government Water Bill:—1. First commissioner of works to appoint persons to report on the proposed new sources of supply. 2. Before taking water from new sources, notice to be given to the first commissioner, who may appoint persons to report on same. 3. First commissioner to hear and determine on report or complaint; and the order of first commissioner is to be binding, if not appealed from to Secretary of State, whose order is to be binding on the company when laid before Parliament If the order is not complied with, the company may be proceeded against, and the order is not to be affected for want of form. 4. Each company is to be bound to supply the whole district over which its powers extend. 5. Each company to deposit with the clerk of the peace of each county a copy of their scale of rates and regulations with the parish clerk of each parish within their district; and in April of each year each company is to deposit at their office, for public inspection, a copy of their assessment for the current year.

EASTERN UNION RAILWAY.—On Thursday a special meeting of this company was held, and the bill authorising the creation of a new four per cent. preference stock of £250,000, to redeem existing debts of the company, with a provision to raise a further sum of £77,000 on the same terms, was given the assent of the No. 1 preference shareholders, should the £250,000 not be sufficient to cover the claims against the company, approved.

METROPOLITAN NEW CATTLE MARKET.—The corporation of the city of London agreed a few days ago to purchase 60 acres of land in Copenhagen-fields for the new Metropolitan Cattle Market. The purchase has actually been completed, at the price named, of £300 per acre, making the total £45,000. The land is said to be more than worth the amount, apart from the special purpose for which it has been purchased.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—The fanciful bronze gates in front of the British Museum are now opened to the public, and have been so since Monday last. The massive stone piers on either side by which they are supported are sufficiently massive in their interior to form a room for the gatekeepers, who are at present in the occupation of them. There are stories in them, which have furnaces to consume their own smoke. The sentinels have been removed from the spot where the former gates stood, and their boxes are placed on either side of the new gates.

KENSINGTON-GARDENS.—The band of the First Life Guards, under the direction of Mr. Waddell, the band-master of the regiment, commenced performing in the gardens on Kensington-gravel on four to six o'clock, a selection of quadrilles, waltzes, and polkas of our best composers, and will continue doing so every Tuesday and Friday until further notice.

ACCIDENTS ON THE RIVER.—Two accidents occurred on the river on Tuesday, one of which proved fatal. John Evans, aged 60 years, a mariner, while employed in the upper part of the rigging of the Duke of Clarence steamboat, off St. Katherine's-dock, fell with fearful violence upon the deck; he died before he could reach the admission into St. Thomas's hospital. Frederick Shalvey, aged 13 years, an apprentice on board the City of Hamburg steamer, lying at Hoare's wharf, Wapping, fell from the mainyard where he was making some repairs across the central gateway a depth of about 60 feet; whereby he discovered his right arm, received a lacerated injury to the back, and fractured some of the ribs. He was likewise taken to St. Thomas's Hospital, and is progressing favourably.

METROPOLITAN BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 770 boys and 840 girls, in all 1416 children, were registered in London. The average number in seven corresponding weeks of the years 1840-51 was 1364. The deaths were males, 471; females, 443; total, 914. By the official report it appears that there is a considerable improvement in the public health, the mortality of last week being less than the calculated amount by 82. In comparing the number of deaths in the last two weeks it has been that there is a decrease in zymotic diseases from 228 in the preceding return to 205 in the present, in diseases of the respiratory organs from 134 to 115, in tubercular diseases (including phthisis) from 169 to 172, in diseases of the nervous system from 102 to 104, and in those of the digestive organs from 59 to 50. No death from cholera was registered in London since the week that ended the 14th April in the last week, which carried off victims to it, viz. a child aged three months (five days' illness), and a widow, aged 72 years, in the neighbourhood of Victoria-park (28 hours illness).

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean height of the barometer for the week was 29.741 in. The mean temperature of the week was only 50.8 deg., which is 5.8 deg. below the average of the same week in ten years. The mean daily temperature was below the average on every day of the week, and the greatest deficiency was about 7 degrees on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, while on Saturday the decrease amounted to 10.6 deg. The wind blew from the north through out the week.

MR. FEARGUS O'CONNOR, M.P.—This gentleman, who has just returned to this country after his recent trip across the Atlantic, has been indulging in his accustomed practice of attending the law courts on Tuesday. In the Court of Appeal the hon. gentleman created some sensation by his abrupt appearance while Sir W. Page Wood was addressing the bench. He frequently nodded to and shook hands with his friends in the body of the court, and, after having taken his seat, Mr. O'Connor spoke to and shook hands with him. He afterwards turned to their Lordships and muttered some such expressions as "righteous judges," "good men," &c., and seemed anxious to approach closer to Lord Justice Turner. Lord Justice Knight Bruce calling out "Officer," the hon. member departed hastily from the Court. Mr. O'Connor visited the Court of Exchequer on the same day, and conducted himself towards the bench in a somewhat similar manner.

THE HOLIDAY EXCURSION TRAINS.—Liverpool was visited on Monday by a greater number of strangers than at any time for many years past, the railway companies having run the Queen's visit last October. From Manchester, Bolton, Sheffield, Leeds, Birmingham, and all the towns and districts adjacent to those lines of industry, excursion parties by the various railways have poured into the great port, to see the sea and the ships; and the innumerable steamers plying on the Mersey, with their cheap trips to Runcorn on the one hand, and round the floating lightship on the other, have reaped a rich harvest.

The municipal council of the Seine has voted a sum of twelve millions to settle the last expenses of the expropriation or dwellings for the prolongation of Rue de Rivoli. This sum, which will come out of the loan of the fifty millions contracted by the city, will, complete, with the sum of 11,760,486 fr. already voted, the total expense of twenty-one millions at which this vast operation had been estimated, deduction being made of the re-sale of land and the proceeds of the materials. The jury have terminated its labours; all the houses situated on the line have been expropriated, and on the 16th July next the ground will be all in the hands of the workmen.

The Paris Moniteur publishes the returns of the last prices of the hectolitre of wheat in the principal markets of France, and which regulate the import and export duties on corn and flour. The highest prices quoted are that of the markets of Mulhouse and Strasbourg, 21f. 85c.; and the lowest that of Nantes, 16f. 82c. The general average for France is 17f. 51c.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

GRAND REVIEW IN HYDE PARK.—On Wednesday morning the whole of the enrol ed out-pensioners of Chelsea College, amounting to about 2,000, with their bands, under the command of Colone. Tulloch, were reviewed in Hyde Park. At eleven o'clock his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, attended by his staff, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, and a number of noblemen and gentlemen, entered the ground, which was kept by a battalion of the Coldstream Guards, and rode a ong the line, the men presenting arms, and the band playing the National Anthem. His Royal Highness and the distinguished party then took up their position towards the Marble Arch, and the battalions marched by in slow and quick time. The divisions were moved into the hollow, and the manœuvres of a field day gone through with great precis.on. The firing was carried on with great rapidity, and the different charges of the battalions very well got through. At the close of the review the troops were again formed into line, and saluted his Royal Highness and staff as they left the ground. There could not have been less than 30,000 or 40,000 persons present.

NEW LIGHTHOUSE AT QUEENSTOWN (CORK).—An iron screw lighthouse has just been completed in the centre of the basin at Queenstown, and from its peculiar and scientific construction, there is little doubt it will stand the power of wave and wind. Singular to say, it has been built by a blind gentleman (Mr. Mitchell, of Belfast). It is to serve as a beacon, day and night, to warn vessels off the mud-bank inside the harbour's mouth.

THE FLEET AT QUEENSTOWN.—Orders have been received at Cork from the Admiralty to have additional moorings laid down for eleven men-of-war in the Channel fleet—which are to veil Queenstown Harbour during the progress of the Exhibition of Irish Manufactures and Productions, which is to be opened on the 10th instant by the Lord-Lieutenant.

SIR HARRY SMITH.—This gallant officer landed at Portsmouth on Sunday evening, about six o'clock, from the steam frigate Gladiator. At his hotel he was visited by the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Thomas Briggs. On Monday morning he received visits from Lieutenant-General Lord F. Fitzclarence and other distinguished officers. A meeting, convened under the auspices of the Mayor, assembled at four o'clock in the Seamen house, at which a congratulatory address was presented to Sir Harry, who acknowledged the honour done to him, and explained the difficulties he had to encounter in the Kaffir war, and took a general view of the campaign in which he had been engaged, and the future prospects of the colony of the Cape of Good Hope. The speech of the veteran commander was throughout most enthusiastically cheered. In the evening Sir Harry entertained a select party, consisting of the officers of the Gladiator, Rear-Admiral Walis, Captain Morris, &c., at the George Hotel.

The 6th Dragoon Guards (Carabineers), dismounted, embarked at the North Wall, Dublin, on Tuesday, at eight o'clock A.M., for Herne Bay, from which they proceeded to Canterbury, where to remain until ordered to embark for India, to relieve the 3d Light Dragoons. The Carabineers will probably embark for India in about three weeks from the present time. They are to serve as light cavalry.

THE SHIPS ON THE ICE.—SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.

The Admiralty has published this week several documents lately received and bearing on this subject. Amongst them is a letter from Mr. John S. Lynch, dated from Prescott, Canada, May 11th, 1852, and addressed to the "Collector of Customs, part of Prescott, Canada," in which he states that he was the only passenger on board the brig Renovation in April, 1851, from Lunenburg to Quebec, and hears testimony to the truth of the statements made by the master, Edward Coward, and the chief mate, Robert Simpson, as to having seen, as already described, about the 18th or 20th April, 1851, two vessels on an iceberg in the vicinity of the coast of Newfoundland, supposed to be Sir John Franklin's missing ships, the Erebus and Terror. He says:—"The reason which prevented Captain Coward attempting any communication by boat was, he did not think he was justified in risking the loss of the vessel, which, from illness, he was not able to give assistance, by commands or otherwise, and two of his best men and a grown up apprentice confined to their hammocks with dysentery. Had a boat been lowered there would not have been hands enough on board to manage the brig, and all appearance of thick, had weather coming on." The other papers communicate the testimony of Mr. Coward, the master of the Renovation, and of William Lambden and James Figgins, apprentices on board that vessel, all corroborative of the statement of the supposed discovery of two ships imbedded in the iceberg; but Mr. Coward says, he believed at the time, and believes still, that they were Greenlandmen abandoned. His wife has remarkable that the log-book of the Renovation, kept by the mate (Mr. Simpson), contains no mention whatever of the alleged facts.

Additional confirmatory evidence is also supplied by Mr. E. Lordnix, the master of a Mecklenburgh brig—the Doctor Kuesp—who, having sailed from Sligo with emigrants on April 3, 1851, had, on his arrival at New York, on the 6th of May, 1851, reported that he had met with, about the 20th, the banks; he had a so seen two vessels "abandoned and waterlogged." The exact date is not yet made out with sufficient accuracy, and it remains to be seen whether or not the Doctor Kuesp was at the time in the position to which the two vessels would have drifted when released from the iceberg upon which they were seen by the crew of the Renovation.

The only corrective of all this assertion of facts is a suggestion in a letter from the President of the Chamber of Commerce at St John's, Newfoundland (Mr. Thomas), who asserts that it is "almost impossible that an iceberg of the magnitude and description spoken of by the crew of the Renovation could have passed almost from the north, and have reached the latitude of Cape Race, without having been seen by some of the numerous sailing vessels which constantly intersect the fi ld ice in the months of March and April." This, however, as we have already said, is only a suggestion.

WRECKS.—The master of the Lady Bannerman, of Prince Edward Island, which has been locked in the ice al. the winter off Margaree and Chaticanthe, on the American coast, while off the latter place, having observed a large ship in the offing, about 20 miles from land, proceeded with part of his crew and some persons from the shore to the wreck. After a tedious and dangerous passage over the drifting ice, they succeeded in reaching the spot, and discovered the vessel to be the Aberdeen, of Liverpool, about 800 tons burthen, bound to Quebec. There were no persons on board, and al the boats belonging to her were gone, leaving the party to suppose that the crew had taken to them and were safe. About five miles from where the Aberdeen lay they observed another vessel: she was a schooner, embedded in the ice.

AUDACIOUS BURGLARY NEAR LIVERPOOL.—On Wednesday morning, about two o'clock, a daring burglary was committed at Lower House, West Derby, the residence of Mr. Owens. Six men effected an entrance by ropeladders, and proceeded, with their faces covered with black crape, and armed with blunderbusses and pistols, to the bedroom of Mr. Owen, whom they brutally ill-used, and having secured the other inmates, they ransacked the premises, and took away a large quantity of plate, several watches, and about £50 in money. Some idea of the audacity of the miscreants may be formed from the fact that they opened the plate and began to play upon it. It is just possible that the musical talent evinced by the performer may furnish a clue to the detection of the gang.

A SOUND SLEEPER.—An adroit burglary has been effected at Dundee Sands, whilst effectually ensuring the ruin of the house of Mr. Jonathan Benton, farmer, and besides ransacking the drawers, &c. succeeded in taking Mr. Benton's trousers from under his pillow while he was asleep, and emptying them of their contents, amounting of £45 18s. 6d. Though Mr. Benton, his wife, and child, were in the bed from under the pillow of which his trousers were taken, it seems that not one of them was disturbed. Five pounds reward has been offered for information respecting the burglars.—Leeds Mercury.

ACCIDENT AT HAMPTON COURT.—On Monday last one of the vans belonging to Mr Grainger, of Pentonville, drawn by two valuable horses, after discharging its passengers at Hampton Court Palace, was driven into the Thames for the purpose of washing the horses' feet, when it accidentally got into a hole, completely engs fing the van and horses. A little boy was inside at the time of the occurrence, and whether he fell over the driver, through the praiseworthy exertions of the latter, or his own steady grave, but the horses being become entangled in the harness, one of them was drowned before they could be drawn ashore.

A fatal accident occurred on Wednesday in the river, near the Fozyard flag-ship, stationed opposite the Woolwich Dockyard, by the upsetting of a boat, in which were three persons belonging to a brig, and one of them was drowned. Fortunately for the other two, one of the Woolwich steamboats was passing at the time, and saved their lives. The boat was then towed by a schooner.

The buildings, stable, a wheat rick, two straw ricks, and a quantity of hay and fodder, were entirely consumed on Tuesday night, at Baffle's Farm, situated about two miles and a half from Portsmouth, the property of Andrew Nance, Esq. The fire broke out about ten o'clock, and it is supposed originated from some carelessness in the use of a candle in the stable. The furniture was not insured, but the farming stock, the corn, the probable loss, about £500, together with farm-buildings burnt, valued at about £800, were both insured.

A serious accident has just taken place at the Penrhyn slate quarries. The workmen having made preparations for blasting, retired to a place which they considered safe, but by the violence of the explosion a large mass of rock was thrown with great force to the spot where they had assembled. Two men were frightfully injured, and died soon afterwards. An old man had all his ribs dislocated, and several others were sustained severe injuries.

On Tuesday, Sarah Mills, aged 83 years, was accidentally killed as she was endeavouring to cross the carriage-way in the Bethna-green road. A horse and cart belonging to Mr. Bryant, of Princes-square, threw down the locked her down, and one of the wheels of the latter passed over her body. Her death was almost instantaneous. On the same day, a man in the employment of Messrs. Cubitt, the coal-merchants of the name, while sitting upon the side of a coal-waggon, near Brixton Church, lost his balance and fell under the vehicle, the hind wheel of which passed over the lower part of his head, and completely desery ed his jaw. He was immediately conveyed to St. Thomas's Hospital, where he lies without hope of recovery.

Only 20 public acts of Parliament received the Royal assent, and 34 local acts, in the present session, which commenced on the 3d of February—just four months.

The south-eastern portion of Old Verulam, the well-known site of the celebrated Verulamium of Roman Britain, has been bought by a freehold building society, and is already marked out for excavations for houses.

11. Q to K 2d	Q P to Q 6th	21. R to K B 8th	Mate.

(a) The attack is kept up in a way to prove that Prince ODOUSKOFF combines with uncommon talents for Chess, the inestimable advantage of a well-grounded knowledge of the classic openings.

(b) Black may make a fi ht show of resistance, but the eminence force his adversary is now enabled to direct against him renders a successful defence impossible

(c) A very pretty climax to a very brilliant game

CHESS ON THE CONTINENT.

The following remarkable game is part of a match played in Vienna between MR. LOWENTHAL and MR. HAMPE, the strongest player of that city.

(The Q Knight's Game.)

WHITE (Mr. H.)	WHITE (Mr. L.)	BLACK (Mr. H.)	WHITE (Mr. L.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th	11. P to K Kt 3d	K. to K 4th

10. Kt takes Kt	Kt to his 5th (c)	19. K to Kt 3d	Q R to Q sq

And Black resigns (e).

(a) A favourite mode of opening with Mr Hampe.

(b) This may be termed the Evans gambit en contre.

(c) The game now become of singular interest, and the after play of Mr Lowenthal will be found to deserve the highest praise

(d) A daring and fine conception.

(e) Black has no mate now more his Queen to a square where she can be won by the K, giving discovered check.

Dashing skirmish between MR. JENAY, one of the finest players in Vienna and another amateur of that city.

(French opening.)

BLACK (Amateur).	WHITE (Mr. Jenay).	BLACK (Amateur).	WHITE (Mr. Jenay).
1. P to K 4th	P to K 3d	10. Kt to Q B 3d (a)	Kt to Kt 5th (b)
2. P to Q 4th	P to Q 4th	11. P to K R 3d	At takes K B P
3. P takes P	P takes P	12. K takes Kt	Q to K R 5th (ch)
4. Kt to K B 3d	Kt to K B 3d	13. K to Q sq	Kt to Q B 3d
5. B to Q 3d	B to Q 3d	14. B to K 3d	K takes Kt (ch)
6. Castles	P to K 3d	15. P takes K (c)	Q takes K P (ch)
7. Kt to K sq (ch)	B to K 3d	16. K to Kt 2d	Q to Kt 7th (m)
8. K B to K B 5th	Castles	17. B to K B 2d (d)	R to K B sq
9. B takes B	P takes P	18. Q to her 3d	K takes K B P

And Black resigns.

(a) Black prudently abstained from taking the K's Pawn, apprehensive of White's replying with Kt to K's 5th, &c.

(b) Mr Jenay now assumes the offensive, and keeps up his attack with uncommon energy and spirit to the close

(c) He had much better have taken with his Queen, he would have gained two Rooks for her, and then, although inferior to White in position, he would have been about equal in force

(d) He would evidently have been mated on the move if he had moved his King to Queen's 3d

YORKSHIRE CHESS ASSOCIATION.—The amateurs of chess throughout the northern and mid.and counties will be gratified to learn that arrangements have been definitively settled for holding the annual gathering of this long established society, in October next, at Hull.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

Numerous applications have been made during the week by persons of both sexes at the offices of the various Emigration Commissioners in the City, and at the Government Land and Colonial Emigration Office, Park-street, Westminster, for passages to Australia. There is a whole fleet of ships lying in the various docks of the port of London, chartered for Port Phillip, Melbourne, Geelong, Victoria, &c., which will sail in the course of the present and the ensuing month.

A piece of gold, weighing 305 ounces and 11 dwts., solid and shining, has been recently found near Sonora. This is the largest lump of pure gold ever found in California

The Society of Arts have lately addressed a memorial to the Government on the subject of the remission of duty on foreign books, and they pray that measures may be taken for the abolition of the import duty upon books printed in foreign languages, which they say would, "without damage to her Majesty's revenue add great y to the advancement of the sciences, arts, industry, and general intelligence of the nation."

The Directors of the Antwerp Steam-packet Company gave a public entertainment last week to Captain Thomas Jackson, of the steam ship Baron Osy, as a mark of their respect and esteem for a gentleman who has served them for fifteen years in the service of the company, and whose urbanity and attention to the comfort of his passengers, as well as his first-rate seamanlike qualities, are well known to the travelling public between Antwerp and London. M. Maximilian Vandenberg, the managing director, presided.

The report of the committee on postage labels and stamps, just issued, states that they have examined numerous witnesses, and are of opinion that the perforating of the postage stamps would be a great convenience and advantage to the public, and that it would be for the general benefit that the machine of the patentee should be purchased for the use of the public. They recommended that a negotiation should be opened with Mr. Archer by the proper department of the Government for the purpose.

The Growler, steam corvette, arrived at Malta on the 19th of May, from Leghorn, bringing the two Mr. Smithsons, escaped from that city, in continuation of a severer punishment inflicted upon them by sentence of a drumhead Austrian court-martial. These young men were bread-Assistant, at the expense of the Company of Malta, to the Ondine, screw-steamer, which left on the 21st for Gibraltar and Liverpool, from Alexandria.

The Governor and directors of the Bank of England have caused a fountain to be constructed on a space of ground adjoining the Bank parlour, which will be in operation in the course of a few days.

While a prisoner of the name of Lewis, who was recently apprehended in Glasgow with a large amount of gold and silver watches in his possession, was being stripped for the purpose of undergoing the purifying process of a bath, it was perceived that he wore a plaster upon his breast, which he said was there on account of severe illness. On entering the bath, however, the plaster fell off, and was seen by the eyes of the astonished turnkey a treasure trove of six gold watches, which were thus concealed between the skin of the prisoner and the plaster.

A few days ago much excitement was caused amongst the inhabitants of the county of Mayo, in Ireland, by the discovery upon the sea-coast, at Barra Island, of a large quantity of silver coins. They are principally Spanish, of the two Philips; some are French, and a few belong to Holland. One of the coins was dated 1688, and bore the impress of Louis XIV. How those coins were deposited where found is matter of conjecture.

The Augsburg Gazette states that by order of the military governor of Venice, and four political exiles, the Wallachian Prince Ghyka, and his travelling companion the Baron de Brandner, have been arrested at Venice.

A letter from Constantinople announces the death of Count Alexander Pasain, the senior dragoman of that place, aged 83, and especially attached to the English embassy, with which he had been connected for 60 years. His funeral was attended by all the other dragomans, the heads and attachés of the various missions, and the greatest part of the best society of Pera. Mr. S Canning was chief mourner on the occasion, and the corners of the pall were held by some of the colleagues of the deceased.

The total quantity of coals, cinders, and culm, shipped at the several ports of England, Ireland, and Scotland, coastwise, to other parts of the United Kingdom, in 1850, was 9,857,778 tons, and in 1851, 8,816,533. The quantities exported to foreign countries and to British settlements abroad, in 1850, was 3,351,886 tons, or the declared value of £1,284,224, against 3,408,543 tons of the declared value of £1,302 473, in 1851.

Mr. Richard Grosvenor Butler is appointed Inspector-General of Police in Barbadoes, and Horatio Nelson Chapman is appointed a member of the Legislative Council of the Bahama Islands. Frederick Rawlins and James Walker, Esqrs., are appointed members of the Council of Barbadoes.

By a return just printed, which gives the average price of wheat, oats, and barley in eleven of the principal mercantile marine towns in Ireland, from the year 1832 to 1844 inclusive. It appears that in the first year the average price of wheat per qrs. was 18s. 10½d; of barley, 7s. 3d.; of oats, 5s. 4d. In 1840 the price of wheat per qrs. was 34s. 8d.; barley, 12s. 9½d.; oats, 8s. 8d. In the last year the prices were—wheat, 10s. 8½d.; barley, 7s. 2d.; oats, 5s. 6d. The average prices for the whole period were—wheat, 19s. 11½d.; barley, 7s. 10½d.; oats, 5s. 3½d.

Mr. Ward has been employed by the Fine Arts Commissioners to decorate the Commons corridor in the New Houses of Parliament. The subject chosen for his panel is "The Execution of the Marquis of Montrose," and the point taken is the incident of the executioner tying the Latin inscription of Montrose's actions around the neck of the "gallant Graham." Montrose was executed at Edinburgh, so that Mr. Ward will not be without picturesque scenery and architecture to vary the interest of his picture. The dress in which Montrose was executed is still preserved.

A Parliamentary return has been issued, which compares the number of passport s granted by the Foreign-office under the old system at £2 7s. 6d. each, with the number granted at 7s. 6d. Under the former system the number issued in the year 1850 5 was 1178, of which 93 were paid for, realising £2,809; under the new system, in 1851-52, 7304 were granted, of which 6502 were paid for, realising £2437. The highest number granted on one day, under the old system was 74, under the new 76

It is stated that the issue of tickets for the Cork National Exhibition commenced on the 27th ult., when crowds presented themselves to obtain them. Up to last Saturday morning there were no less than 1000 tickets disposed of. The buildings are capable of holding 4000 persons.

"SONGSTRESS," WINNER OF "THE OAKS," AT EPSOM, 1852.

"SONGSTRESS," WINNER OF THE OAKS.

SONGSTRESS," with the same jockey (Frank Butler), wearing the identical jacket and cap in which he puled through on Daniel O'Rourke, won the Oaks on Friday week in gallant style by a length, the race being run in two seconds less time than the Derby. The winner is by Irish Birdcatcher, dam Cyprian, winner of the Oaks in 1836; and it is a proof of the superiority of the sire, that his produce not only won the Derby, but on Friday were placed first, second, and third.

Songstress is a bay filly, the property of Mr. John Scott. Her only performance this year is the Oaks: she is engaged for the second year of the Third Triennial Stakes, at Ascot Heath; in the second year of the Third Triennial Produce Stakes, and the Gold Cup, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne; in the Lancashire Oaks, at Liverpool; in the Great Yorkshire Stakes, at the York August meeting; in the great St. Leger and the Doncaster Stakes, at Doncaster.

This is the fourth year in succession that Frank Butler has carried off the Oaks, once or twice by fine riding; but on Friday he was incontestably upon the best mare which started—because as Red Hind did not get clear off till the others had got away at least a hundred yards in advance, and after all finished in a respectable position—having caught her horses before reaching the upper turn—there is no saying what might have happened if the Goodwood mare had her best chance.

STATUE OF THE LATE SIR ROBERT PEEL, AT PRESTON.

THE Preston Peel Monument was inaugurated with great éclat on Monday last. The statue has been designed and executed by a self-taught artist, a native of the town of Preston, being his first large sculpture. It is placed upon a plain pedestal. The ceremony was attended by most of the clubs and benefit societies, and there was a larger procession than usual through the town. Arrangements were made by many trades to close their establishments for the whole of the day. Cheap trains by rail and river were also announced. The East Lancashire Railway Company made arrangements to accommodate about 6000 persons from Preston to Liverpool; 1000 scholars of the Sunday School Union, 3000 of the Church of England scholars, 1400 Catholics, and 600 from Cannon-street School, to Rufford.

BALMES' HOUSE, HOXTON.

THIS interesting specimen of olden domestic architecture, better known as Sir George Whitmore's House, situated on the west side of, and at a short distance from, Kingsland-road, near Hoxton, will very shortly be taken down; so that our readers may be glad to have their attention directed to this archæological relic of the north-eastern suburbs.

says a chronicler, "the King, with the Queen, the Prince, the Duke of York, Princess Mary, Elector Palatine, and Duchess of Richmond, came in coaches, which turned into Balmes' ground." Here it was that a loyal band of sturdy Cavaliers convened a meeting of the Lord Mayor and the principal citizens during those troublous times, to wait upon his Majesty at Whitehall, to offer him a guard of 10,000 men to protect his sacred person. Here, too, as sang the poet, was

> The once famed abode
> Of plump Lord Mayor and oft-praised civic cheer—
> The seat of loyal Whitmore, good old man,
> Who, for his duty to his King, preferr'd
> To pass in prison-house his lonesome hours.

In ancient records, leases, and other deeds relative to this estate, it is called Baumes and Balmes: and although it is at this time considered to be within the parish of St. John, at Hackney, it was originally part of the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, and so appeared in a plan taken about 1666.

Tradition says, that about the year 1660, a man was found drowned in the moat which at that time surrounded the house; the body having been brought to the churchwardens of Shoreditch parish, they refused to receive and inter it; but on application being made to the parochial authorities of Hackney, the body was received by them, and buried at the charge of the parish, and from this circumstance this house and estate was afterwards claimed as being in the parish of Hackney, and so it has remained ever since that time.

THE PRESTON PEEL MONUMENT.

BALMES' HOUSE, HOXTON.

Balmes' House and Estate has been a place of note for upwards of three centuries. The house, anciently called Baumes, was built about 1540 by two Spanish merchants named Balm, of one of whom a portrait, dated 1543, was found in one of the rooms.

The mansion was pleasantly situated in the midst of gardens and grounds, laid out in the geometrical style of the sixteenth century; and by the accompanying View, in 1580, it had a large gate-house, and a farm adjoining. At the entrance of the principal gate formerly stood a double row of ancient elms, the garden being surrounded with a moat, which had also a large drawbridge.

The old place is associated with days of anarchy, fanaticism, and bloodshed in our history; "for here," says a well-informed correspondent of the Times, "it was that Charles I., with his Court, were entertained in tents in the garden by Sir George Whitmore, who occasionally resided here during his mayoralty, in 1631-32. Here it was, in the year 1641, that the same unfortunate Sovereign was greeted on his return from the north by a band of his devoted loyal subjects; "for here,"

The trees which formed the avenue have long since been removed: the last was cut down in 1794, and some young trees were planted in their stead; but these also have been removed, and houses now line the road on each side all the way to the gate of Balmes' House.

The mansion is built of brick, and has two stories, with dormer windows in the high-pitched roof. The original entrance-gate was destroyed about 1794, and a modern one erected in its place. About seventy years since, the only entrance to the house was over a large drawbridge across the moat. There were two avenues leading to the house—one from the northern extremity of Hoxton, and the other by the road from Shoreditch to Kingsland and Stoke Newington; outside the wall, though within the moat, was a walk planted with fruit-trees, which were removed about fifty years ago. The house and most were supplied with water, time immemorial, from an ancient well in Canonbury-fields, adjoining Canonbury House, Islington. The house front, as we see it in the older View, with six pair of Doric pilasters, has been considered one of our earliest specimens of brickwork and of the Italian style of architecture, introduced about the time of the Reformation.

CARVED APARTMENT IN BAUMES' HOUSE.

The principal apartments present some fine specimens of carving: we have engraved one of the rooms. There is some tapestry remaining in the house, but it has been mercilessly mutilated. After the mansion had ceased to be the abode of opulent citizens, it was converted into an asylum for insane persons. A few years since the estate was the property of Richard Benyon de Beauvoir, Esq.; and the land attached to the mansion is now covered with streets and a square of houses called De Beauvoir Town.

We have omitted to mention that Baumes figures in the archery records three centuries since, and as an exercising field for the Artillery Company in 1664-70.—See Robinson's "History and Antiquities of Hackney."

MADAME JULLIENNE.

MADAME DEFRAN JULLIENNE, whose Portrait is presented by our Artist: after a drawing by Baugniet, was born at Rouen, the town which gave birth also to Poultier, the cooper-tenor, who some ten years since created no little sensation at the Grand Opera in Paris, but whose appearance here last season, at Her Majesty's Theatre, to sing in Italian his great part, Masaniello, was a complete failure, owing partly to a decay of his powers, but more to stage fright. Madame Jullienne was not originally destined for the stage; but her singing-master, M. Moiliot, was so struck with her magnificent voice, that he succeeded in overcoming the objections of her family to an artistic career. Her début took place for a charitable benefit, as Alice, in the first act of Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable," and as Leonora, in the fourth act of Donizetti's "Favorita;" and, as in the majority of cases in which amateurs appear before the stage-lights, the enthusiasm of the public determined Madame Jullienne to follow up her night's triumph by professional studies of the usual severity, and an immediate engagement for the Académie Royale de Musique was the result. In September, 1845, Madame Jullienne appeared on the boards of the Grand Opera as the successor of the celebrated Falcon, as Rachel, in Halévy's "Juive;" Valentine in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots;" and of Dorus Gras, as Alice, in "Robert le Diable." Her success was great—too great, in fact, as the Stoltz dynasty was at that period in full force, and Mdme Jullienne was not permitted to sing too often. At this period she was more remarkable for an immense volume of voice than for style in its management. She subsequently threw up her engagement, and went to Marseilles, where she went through the round of characters in the French répertoire of grand opera with such decided popularity, that the affairs of the theatre, which were in a precarious condition, became quite flourishing. From Marseilles she played in turn at the theatres of Brussels, Antwerp, Ghent, Lille, Rouen, Lyons, Bordeaux, Frankfort, &c., everywhere being received most enthusiastically. The Stoltz-Pilet administration having ceased at the Grand Opera in Paris, MM Duponchet and Roqueplan, the new directors, offered Mdme. Jullienne an engagement; and in the seasons of 1848, 1849, and 1850, she was again prima donna of the Grand Opera, performing in Weber's "Der Freyschütz," Halévy's "Juive" and "Charles VI.," and in "Robert le Diable," "Les Huguenots," &c. At the expiration of her engagement she resolved to sing in Italy, and went to Florence to take lessons of the most famed singing professors. Before she had accepted any offers made to her for the Italian theatres, she was induced to make an essay at the Royal Italian Opera. Her début in Pauline in Donizetti's "Martiri," on the 20th of April last, has been duly recorded in the columns of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. Her Majesty and Prince Albert were present on the occasion. Four times has this work been given, and the third and fourth acts twice the last time on Tuesday night, and no artiste has ever produced a more striking impression on the public than Mdme. Jullienne. The duo between her and Tamberlik in the last scene of the "Martiri," for veritable enthusiasm, has never been exceeded. On the 20th of May, Mdme. Jullienne sang for the first time in London the part of Rachèle in the Italian version of "La Juive," the Queen and Prince Albert honouring the representation with their presence, and remaining from the first scene to the fall of the curtain. In this magnificent opera, which, in addition to its intensely interesting libretto, contains some of the finest dramatic music ever heard, Mdme. Jullienne has permanently established her fame as a great lyric artiste. In all operas in which a powerful soprano is required for strong passions, Madame Jullienne is invaluable. She is never fatigued, or, at all events, she has the ars celare artem, for, at the conclusion of a long and trying work, her voice seems to be as fresh and as vigorous as at the opening. She is yet but young in the profession, and her coming in contact with the refined school of Italian vocalisation cannot fail to develop ultimately the liberal gifts with which she has been endowed by nature, in a still higher degree. It has been already remarked, that, since her first night of singing at the Royal Italian Opera, her method has been much improved. We have heard her in all the characters of the French Grand Opera, Alice, Valentine, &c., and in Verdi's "Jerusalem" ("I Lombardi"), but we understand that her Norma has been also highly successful in the great towns in France. With the noble voice she possesses, and with the disposition to study and improve, a brilliant future presents itself to Madame Jullienne on the Italian lyric stage.

MADAME JULLIENNE, AS "LA JUIVE," AT THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

SCENE FROM THE OPERA OF "LA JUIVE," AT THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

"Beethoven's "Somnambula" was repeated on Saturday night, for the second time, followed by the condensed version of Gnecco's comic opera "La Prova d'un Opera Seria," Mdme de Lagrange appearing as Cornlia; Signor Calzolari, Federico; Signor F. Lablache, Grillotto; and Lablache, Campanole. Light comedy characters are infinitely better adapted to the capabilities of Mdme. Lagrange, than parts exacting dramatic power and passion. The capricious, touchy, and exacting prima donna was well acted and admirably sung: the introduced bravura was a triumph of florid vocalism, and deservedly brought down thunders of applause as she poured forth a series of notes as well as daring roulades. Lablache's duo with Mdme. Lagrange "Ah, guardate che figura," was received as usual with shouts of merriment, although it has been heard season after season for upwards of twenty years. Equally delighted was the auditory with the well-known directions of the sensitive composer to the orchestra. Lablache revels in practical jokes with the members of the band in the distribution of the parts of the scene to each player. Her Majesty, the Duchess of Kent, and Prince Albert honoured the performance with their presence.

On Tuesday Beethoven's immortal "Fidelio" was given for the third time; Mdlle. Cruvelli's Leonora being still her finest lyric assumption. "La Prova" followed the classic work.

On Thursday, for the extra night, Donizetti's "Don Pasquale," another character which no artist but Lablache can attempt to enact, was revived with Mdme. de Lagrange in the part of the lively widow, Norina; Signor Calzolari, Ernesto; and Signor Ferranti, Dr. Malatesta. Lablache was in excellent voice, and never, perhaps, played the part with more humour. "La Fête des Rosières" completed the night's programme.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Bellini's "Puritani" was performed for the second time on Saturday, and Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia" was revived on Tuesday, with Grisi as the Duchess, Mario Gennaro her son, Ronconi the Duke of Ferrara, Mdlle. Segum Maffio Orsini, Polonini Adolfo, Tagliafico Gubetta the Spaniard, and Marini Don Apostolo Carilla, the other parts being filled by Mei, Soldi, Zucchi, Gregorio Rommi, &c., in order to give full effect to the celebrated chorus of masques in the prologue in Venice. With the exception of the new contralto, who must be summarily dismissed with the record of her some-what failure, being vastly inferior to Da Meric, not to mention Negri and Alboni, the former representatives of Orsini, Donizetti's masterpiece was never more effectively executed than on this occasion. The choral and orchestral accompaniments, under Costa's able direction, were magnificently rendered; and Grisi and Mario being in their best voices, sang and acted with marvellous skill and power. Ronconi's Duke is one of the most subtle delineations on the stage. The intense irony with which he carries out the Duke's deadly purpose is quite appalling: in many respects it reminds us of Macready's Iago; and if Ronconi has never seen our great actor in that part, the resemblance between the two conceptions is very remarkable. Mario's voice in the Mazzolata was in a tower of strength, and contributed greatly to the electrical effect of it on the audience. The dying scene of Mario raised the enthusiasm of one of the greatest houses of the season to the highest pitch.

For the extra night, on Thursday, the popular lyric tragedy of Meyerbeer, "Les Huguenots," was represented for the fifth time.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the performance with their presance. The house was filled to overflow.

ST. JAMES'S.

The German company brought over by Mr. Mitchell made their bow to an English audience in Goethe's tragedy of "Egmont," on Wednesday. The performance was preceded by a prologue, delivered by Fraulein Strehmayer; in which homage was paid to Shakspeare, whose bust, with those of Goethe and Schiller, was presented on a pedestal and crowned with laurel by the fair reciter. "Egmont" then followed, and we were soon introduced to Fraulein Stolte as Clare, the burger lass of the Count, and were at once impressed with her personal appearance and enjoyable elocution. Handsome and intelligent, with what we thought some crudity of manner, there was much histrionic power, which subsequent scenes served to develope in remarkable force. Egmont does not make his appearance until the second act, and as impersonated by Herr Emil Devrient, was noble of person, animated in feeling, and graceful in action. In him centres the interest of this historic drama, the performer was consequently capable of testing to certain alent proficient which both entertain as to what will or will not do for stage illustration. One scene in particular proved greatly effective, and, indeed, excited the enthusiasm of the audience—that between Egmont and Clare, in which the Countess affections are brought out into fiction—not to the actors but the veritable men stood before us. Among the minor parts must be distinguished that of Ruysum, the disabled soldier, by Herr Lumbach. It was quite equal to Lama'en. Other characters, such as Silva and Jetter, with an capable intelligence and fitness, significative of the completeness of the company and their habit of seeing together. All was in fine harmony, to which Beethoven's music not a little contributed, though some of the songs of Clare and Brackenburg were, to our regret, omitted. We consider the appearance of this troupe calculated to do much good to the stage, and were delighted to find that her Majesty, with Prince Albert, had condescended to grace their performances with their Royal presence. The house was crowded with a most fashionable and intelligent audience, by whom every point of importance was selected for appropriate applause. The two principal artists were frequently called before the curtain, and at the conclusion the plaudits were enthusiastic.

SADLER'S WELLS.

Under the direction of Miss Priscilla Horton, whose husband, Mr. T. German Reed, for many years at the head of the musical department at the Haymarket, is the director and conductor, an English opera season was commenced on Monday, with Balfe's "Somnambula." Miss Louisa Pyne being the Amina, Miss J. Bolden Lisa, Mrs. Fosbrooke Teresa, Mr. Harrison Elvino, Mr. Wallworth, the Count and Mr. Summers, from Manchester, Alessio. This cast was strong, and the opera was executed amidst the enthusiastic plaudits of the well-filled house. Miss Louisa Pyne quite delighted her hearers by her unique delineation and by her exquisite vocalization. Balfe's "Bohemian Girl" and Auber's "Fra Diavolo" have followed the "Somnambula." In the musical burlesque of "Midas," Miss Rebecca Isaacs, one of the most pleasing of our young actresses, won the suffrages of the audience as Apollo. There is every prospect that the amateurs of the north-eastern quarter of the metropolis will liberally patronise this undertaking.

SURREY.

The inhabitants of the southern side of the Thames look regularly every summer for an operatic season. This year it is the popular Miss Romer, so long the star of English opera at Drury-lane and Covent-garden Theatres, who has undertaken the cares and responsibilities of management. Her campaign on Monday began auspiciously, appearing, as she did, in Raphino Lacy's version of "Cinderella," one of Miss Romer's favourite parts. Always popular as the Prince, Mr. H. Corri the pompous' Baron, Borrani Dandini, Herr Kuehler, Alidoro the tutor, Mr. H. Widdecomb Pedro, the low comedy servant, and the Misses Coveney, the crest sisters. The opera was received with the most lively demonstrations of satisfaction, and Miss Romer had a great encor on the versa of the National Anthem, sung at the conclusion of "Cinderella." For the holyday patrons, a new comedietta, by Mr. Halsell, entitled "The Sweep's Pass; or, the Torrent of the Ghaur-e-Ghol," was provided. As Mr. W. West is stage manager, it may be readily conjectured that the eye for the picturesque has not been in vain. The opening scene of the section of the author's drama, and that some fine groupings were presented, embodied in the chief parts by Messrs. T. Mead, A. Stirling, Brandon, H. Widdecomb, Miss Poole, and the Misses Coveney, with the customary triumph of the good over the wicked—to the honour of Surrey audiences, a never-failing subject of satisfaction: the piece will have its day. Herr Meyer Lutz is the music director, and Mrs. Weiss and Miss Poole and Mr. C. Romer are included in the engagements.

OLYMPIC.

Mr. Fitzball's version of Victor Hugo's beautiful story was revived on Monday under the title of "Esmeralda, or the Hunchback of Notre Dame," the two characters included in the title being performed by Miss Howard and Mr. H. Farren. The piece was throughout respectably acted, and the situations were effective. It was followed by a new extravaganza, taken from "The Arabian Nights," and called "Ganem, or the Slave of Love"—Ganem being impersonated by Miss Howard, between whom and the Caliph Haroun (Mr. Shalders) the interest of the scene pendulates. It is from the pen of Mr. Talfourd, the author of "Atalanta," and, like all his burlesques, spark es with puns. The scenery and costumes are exceedingly splendid: and, though the piece lacks action a little, its vivacity is maintained by the fun of the dialogue, which is incessantly pleasing and, and teases the mind into constant attention. The spectacle was perfectly successful, and the house was full.

VAUXHALL GARDENS.

These famous gardens opened on Monday with great éclat. The improvements are numerous and important. There is scarcely a point of the property upon which the taste of the proprietors, aided by considerable expenditure, has not been gracefully employed; and the new Dioramas of the "Arctic Regions" and the "Lake of Lucerne" are pauned very far above the average merit. The concert is excellent: the madrigals, sung by the boys' voices, created a sensation; and the singing of Signor Marini, a tenore di forza from Naples, was appreciated with enthusiasm. His voice is both powerful and sweet, and his style of the best modern school. He was encored in a song of Verdi, and in Balfe's air, "When the fair land of Poland." The new ballet, in the new theatre, "Zelita, the Maid of Calabria, is a successful specimen of the art choreographic: the music, the scenery, and the dresses are in good taste, and the dancing of Mdlle Pedro and M. Vandris, of the Académie de Musique, at Paris, is adm rable. The corps de ballet is numerous and well selected, and the several groupings are distinguished by their novelty and elegance. The ballet was enthusiastically applauded. Fine weather is alone wanting to secure to the director a triumphant season.

CREMORNE GARDENS.

These gardens were well attended on Monday, when the visitors were evidently delighted with the several novelties, which we have already noticed. A new ballet, entitled "Azurine; or, the Enchanted Waters," was much applauded; the dashing to the music of Bonnay's spirited mazurka, the Polka Cremorne, and the terrific feat of Mdlle. Pauline Violante, overlopping the loftiest trees of the property, with a double company of serenaders, were among the more prominent features of the evening, which closed most brilliantly.

MR. ALBERT SMITH'S "MONT BLANC."—On Wednesday evening, being the hundredth time of this popular entertainment, Mr. Albert Smith presented to each of the ladies occupying the stalls a bouquet of the choice flowers of the season, a graceful compliment which was highly appreciated.

BURFORD'S PANORAMA ROYAL, LEICESTER-SQUARE.—His Grace the Duke of Wellington, accompanied by the Marchioness of Douro, honoured Mr. Burford's Panorama of Salzburg and Nunevah with his presence on Wednesday last. We are happy to say that his Grace looked extremely well, and highly appreciated the excellence of the pictures. Whilst having himself visited the city of Salzburg, his Grace was much interested in the various beautiful objects with which the view abounds, and which appeared to be quite familiar to him.

SCRIBE AND HALEVY'S "JUIVE."

OUR Artists have depicted one of the most striking scenes in the opera of "La Juive," at the Royal Opera. It is the interview between Lazaro, the Jew goldsmith (M. Gueymard), condemned to death, and Cardinal de Brosa, President of the Council of Constance (Herr Formes). The Cardinal, from a sympathising Eachele, finds the Jewish, which he cannot account for, is anxious to save her life, and proposes to the Jew, as the condition, to become a Christian. Lazaro not only glorins in being a martyr to his faith, but avenges his sorrows on the proud churchman, by telling him that the child, which he was supposed to have been parent with the mother, in a fire at Rome, was saved by a Jew, and that he (Lazaro) knows where the lost chi d can be found. The Cardinal, with bended knee, in vain implores the Jew to disclose the secret. It is only when Rachele is sacrificed that the Cardinal learns that he has killed his child.

MUSIC.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The directors are rummaging their library for works "composed expressly for the Philharmonic Society"—a very praiseworthy task on their parts, for which proves, however, that the administrations of former days displayed infinitely greater zeal for art than the men in office of present times, as the "doubting one" principle has been in full force of late years. At Monday's sixth concert we had spohr's somniferous symphony in D minor, and a MS overture by Cusenbini. The former work, albeit admirably rendered, did not make the slightest impression on the auditory, whose taste and judgment, we presume, ought not to be impugned for their frigidity. If music is to be regarded as a mathematical problem, then may hearers be enchanted with Spohr's circumaxic combinations, profound peculiarities, dry details, and clever contrivances; but to learning and science the world will make up its mind a want of fancy and imagination. Even a most cultivated body of amateurs and professors will not be persuaded that mechanical monotony is creative genius. The Spontini double contrabasso obligato accompaniments to Monday's audacity at the D minor of Beethoven, which opened the second part, with the profound apathy attending the hearing of the D minor of Spohr, to comprehend rightly the wide difference in the principles of construction which are capable of evincing the difference in the principles of construction which are capable of evincing the weight of a character of no ordinary subtlety, and of investing it with artistic prominence, without exaggerating. Standing out, as he did, however, from the other performers, we were not prepared for the inferior tone he can produce any violent contrast between him and them. A company so thoroughly competent for the business divided amongst them we scarcely ever recollect witnessing; in this respect it is much superior to the French troupe that accompanied Rachel, and will render these performances eminently satisfactory. Peculiar as this play of "Egmont" is, exclusively political in its interest, and altogether antheatrical in its materials and structure, it proves to be much more dramatically interesting than enacted than might have been anticipated. These performances will, we doubt not, touch something both to English authors and actors, and go far to remove certain absurd prejudices which both entertain as to what will or will not do for stage illustration. One scene in particular proved greatly effective, and, indeed, excited the enthusiasm of the audience—that between Egmont and Clare, in which the Countess affections are brought out into fiction—not to the actors but the veritable men stood before us. If music is to be regarded as a mathematical problem, then may hearers be enchanted with Spohr's circumaxic combinations, profound peculiarities, dry details, and clever contrivances; but to learning and science the world will make up its mind a want of fancy and imagination. Even a most cultivated body of amateurs and professors will not be persuaded that mechanical monotony is creative genius. The Spontini double contrabasso obligato accompaniments to Monday's audacity at the D minor of Beethoven, which opened the second part, with the profound apathy attending the hearing of the D minor of Spohr, to comprehend rightly the wide difference in the principles of construction which are capable of evincing the difference in the principles of construction which are capable of evincing the weight of a character of no ordinary subtlety, and of investing it with artistic prominence, without exaggerating. Standing out, as he did, however, from the other performers, we were not prepared for the inferior tone he can produce any violent contrast between him and them. A company so thoroughly competent for the business divided amongst them we scarcely ever recollect witnessing; in this respect it is much superior to the French troupe that accompanied Rachel, and will render these performances eminently satisfactory. Peculiar as this play of "Egmont" is, exclusively political in its interest, and altogether antheatrical in its materials and structure, it proves to be much more dramatically interesting than enacted than might have been anticipated. These performances will, we doubt not, touch something both to English authors and actors, and go far to remove certain absurd prejudices which both entertain as to what will or will not do for stage illustration. One scene in particular proved greatly effective, and, indeed, excited the enthusiasm of the audience—that between Egmont and Clare, in which the Countess affections are brought out into fiction—not to the actors but the veritable men stood before us. Among the minor parts must be distinguished that of Ruysum, the disabled soldier, by Herr Lumbach. It was quite equal to Lama'en. Other characters, such as Silva and Jetter, with an capable intelligence and fitness, significative of the completeness of the company and their habit of seeing together. All was in fine harmony, to which Beethoven's music not a little contributed, though some of the songs of Clare and Brackenburg were, to our regret, omitted. We consider the appearance of this troupe calculated to do much good to the stage, and were delighted to find that her Majesty, with Prince Albert, had condescended to grace their performances with their Royal presence. The house was crowded with a most fashionable and intelligent audience, by whom every point of importance was selected for appropriate applause. The two principal artists were frequently called before the curtain, and at the conclusion the plaudits were enthusiastic.

The programme included the names of Madame Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Miss Williams, Mr. Lockey, and Herr Kuhe, and the composer conducted his own work. The noble hall was filled with a numerous audience, by whom the performances was received with the greatest enthusiasm. At it will, no doubt, be performed in London before the season is over, our notice will appear in due course. —— The Cecilian society executed, at the Assembly-room of the Royal Hotel, Bancroft's Institute, "La Belle Egypte" by the Sacred Harmonic Society under Costa's direction, and the sixth concert of the Amateur Musical Society ——Next Wednesday will be the sixth and last concert of the New Philharmonic Society, at which Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be repeated; the fourth meeting of the Quartet Association; the marriage of the Misses Birch; and the evening concert of Mr. Benson.——Next Friday will be a concert for the benefit of Mdlle. Clotilde de Beaky, and the annual entertainment of the Royal Society of Female Musicians.——The Liverpool Philharmonic Society, much to its honour, produced on Monday night, at the fourth subscription concert, the new oratorio of "Joseph," composed by Mr. Charles Horsley, the son of the veteran g.ee composer, and brother of the gifted painter. The principal parts were sung by Miss Birch, Miss Williams, Mr. Lockey, and Herr Formes

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Royal and aristocratic Ascot will occupy four days of the coming week, and with the best cup, or rather Emperor's Plate, entry since the famous Zingaree year, and a good general list, is sure to repay a visit. To those who love a crush we recommend Thursday; the "quiet and easy" people will find Tuesday the best. Her Majesty is expected to be present on both these days. The only race meeting besides is Beverley, which is fixed for Wednesday and Thursday.

The only regattas to come off are the Roya. Mersey Club match at Liverpool, and the Royal Thames Yacht Club match, both on Saturday.

CRICKET FIXTURES.—Monday: M.C.C. and Ground v. the Surrey Club, at Lord's. All England match, at Chichester. Tuesday: Matches at West Wickham, Harrow, and Islington. Wednesday: Match between Liverpool and Manchester, at Manchester. Thursday: All England match, at Ipswich. Friday: King's College v. Addiscombe College.

ROYAL LONDON YACHT CLUB.

The extreme wetness of the day on Saturday last had the effect of thinning the attendance of the sailing match. Still there was a considerable assemblage of ladies and gentlemen. The Meteor, chartered by the club for the occasion, left London-bridge at ten in the morning with about 180 persons on board. The following splendid yachts accompanied the boat; viz. the Avalon, Marziana, Phantom, Volante, Fleur de-lis, Eclipse, Frolic, Will o'-the-Wisp, Mersea, Mouse, &c

The race was for a purse of 20 guineas for the first boat, and £5 for the second; the distance, from Erith to the Lower Hope Point and back; and one minute per ton time allowed by the larger to the smaller craft. The following had been entered:—

1	Traveller ..	10 tons	G H Jackson, Esq. .... Blue burgee
2	Julia	8 ,, ...	William Bain, Esq. .... Blue square
3	Water Witch	8 ,, ...	Lieut. Jeffard Wood .... Red and white, quartered
4	Romp	8 ,, ...	Read J Knight, Esqrs. White, with blue border
5	Vandyke	8 ,, ...	R Wallis, Esq. .... White, with red heart pierced with a blue arrow
6	Invicenta ..	12 ,, ...	Lieut. Legg, R.N. .... White, with red cross
7	Ivy	12 ,, ...	T Harvey, Jun, Esq .... White, with blue cross
8	Sea Nymph ..	10 ,, ...	C Mosier, Jun, Esq .... White, before blue
9	Cygnet	9 ,, ...	William Tuckwell, Esq. Blue, with amber border

The start took place, under the direction of Mr. Goodson, the commodore, at 19 h. 29 m. 30 s. All sailed good and the same moment, the Julia exhibiting most skill in setting her sails. The Kitten first got a clear lead, followed by the Romp, and in Long Reach there was about 200 yards between them, and the like distance between the Romp and Britannia: then followed the Valentine, Calliope, Julia, Water Witch, and Traveller. The Julia began to mend her position, when she unfortunately carried away her jib-boom, and the delay consequent upon this deprived her of much chances of success. At Purfleet the Valentine passed the little Calliope, and at Broadness Point the Romp went by the Kitten to the windward. No change of importance occurred to the Lower Hope, where the boats arrived in the following order:—

Romp	..	..	2 hours 19 minutes 45 seconds
Kitten	..	..	2 ,, 55 ,, 10 ,,
Britannia ..	..	..	3 ,, 0 ,, 0 ,,
Julia	..	..	3 ,, 4 ,, 50 ,,
Valentine ..	..	..	3 ,, 11 ,, 0 ,,
Water Witch	..	..	3 ,, 15 ,, 30 ,,
Traveller ..	..	..	3 ,, 31 ,, 30 ,,

It may be necessary here to remark, owing to the subsequent closeness of the mate; between the first two boats, that the Romp lost about a couple of minutes by preparing to round the steamer, which was at anchor, instead of the flagboat, which the Kitten passed on the starboard hand, and made the best use of her time to flood; and off Coal House Point, the Kitten reached by the Romp into the first place. In this position they continued to the finish, where, owing to the wind having so close, the Romp was unprovided with an 80p part of the Kitten's crew, the latter lost the race. At 5 hours 7 minutes 50 seconds the Kitten came up to the flag-buoy, but to the northward instead of the southward. She was consequently surprised at the mistake, and made the best use of her helm to retrace her steps and get round the right way, but had scarcely done so when the Romp came in on the right side, and less than two minutes' time having elapsed between the correct rounding, the Romp was the winner. The time was as follows:—

Kitten	..	..	5 hours 9 minutes 50 seconds
Romp (the winner)	..	..	5 ,, 11 ,, 15 ,,
Julia	..	..	5 ,, 23 ,, 0 ,,
Britannia ..	..	..	5 ,, 31 ,, 30 ,,
Valentine ..	..	..	5 ,, 33 ,, 0 ,,

Mr. Goodson presented the prizes to the two first captains, with a deserved eulogium upon the nautical skill they had displayed; and Mr. Knight, in accepting the larger prize, attributed the success to be owing to the canvas he had that day sailed under, which he subsequently declared enabled him to put his boat much nearer the wind than ever she had gone before.

Mr. Gorst, the well-known caterer upon those occasions, left the company nothing to desire as regarded the viands for the day; and the band of the Royal Artillery contributed largely to the gratification of the company on board the steamer.

UNIVERSITY BOAT RACES.—The annual procession of the boats through the Cambridge colleges took place on last Saturday night. The boats were up, as usual, in the Mil. Pit and returned to Kine's, where they congregated, and the racing season ended with loud and prolonged cheering. A few days before, the members of Christ's College, Cambridge, presented to the Rev. Leigh Hunt, B.A., a handsome silver cup, as a testimonial of their esteem and regard, and of the services which he has on different occasions rendered to the boat club. The cup is a large double-handed one, of an elegant form, highly ornamented with fruit and flowers, in the most approved style of chasing.

ROYAL CORK YACHT CLUB REGATTA.—Mr. Deane, the honorary secretary of the metropolitan committee, has received a communication through Her Excellency the Countess of Eglinton's private secretary, the Rev. F. Gould, authorising him to affix her name, with a subscription of £5, to the list of subscribers for a ladies' cup, to be rowed for by gentlemen at the forthcoming regatta of the Royal Cork Yacht Club. The Lady Mayoress and several other ladies have forwarded subscriptions. It is understood that a couple of crews from Oxford intend to contest for the prize.

ROYAL HARWICH YACHT CLUB, ESSEX.—This club, which was first founded in September, 1841, by vessels from the Cork Light, and Brooke, and the Ryde, or Victoria, Club in 1845), will hold its annual regatta in and off Harwich Harbour, on Mid-summer-day, the 24th of June instant, when three cups will be sailed for by yachts of any Royal club, and a dozen cannon balls, or rowing be decided, as well as sailing matches between professional tars of all descriptions. Any yachtsman or naval officer will be admitted free to the Royal Harwich Yacht Club-house during the regatta, on application to the secretary, or a member of committee. We hear that the sailing match for the Sixty Guinea Cup promises an unusually large entry, and that, consequently, several steamers will accompany the vessels round the Cork Light, and through the Wa.-knowa "rolling-grounds." Two hundred yachtsmen will afterwards dine together at the Three Cups.

FOOT RACE FOR THE CHAMPIONSHIP AND £50 A SIDE.—This exciting struggle for the championship took place on Monday, on the well-known pedestrian and cricket grounds adjoining Mr. Garratt's Copenhagen house between Lovett, the champion, and Jackson, the American bear. Before the starting was 6 to 4 and 2 to 1 on Lovett; at the finish of the fifth mile, 2 to 1 on Jackson; seventh mile, 10 to 1 on Jackson. The start took place at nine minutes to six o'clock. Jackson gained upon his opponent every mile, and he completed the ten miles in 91 min. 34 sec., the quickest run ten miles on record, being ahead of Lovett one third of a mi e.

CRICKET.—The great match, "All England against Surrey," commenced on Thursday morning at the Oval, Kennington. All England went in first, and, after showing some beautiful play, finished at half-past six o'clock, with eighty-six runs; Dean, Sampson, Wright, and Anderson scoring the largest number. The other side then commenced, and left off w ithout losing a wicket.

The Lords of the Treasury have directed that the Commissioners of Customs do authorise brandy, entered for immediate transhipment to a foreign port, to be sampled under the following conditions; viz. that duty is to be paid on the quantity when it exceeds one gallon, and that the samples are to be included in the casks or packages selected for examination by the officers of the revenue.

The Strathaeden arrived this week in the Thames from Sydney, whence she sailed the 1st of January, with 9137 ounces of gold, valued at about £35,000.

A seizure of upwards of 2000 lb. of smuggled tobacco, cigars, and snuff was made by the Inland Revenue officers, at Ross, a few days ago.

A number of respectable young women, chiefly servants, are preparing to emigrate to Australia. On Monday 800 persons set sail from the Mersey for Geelong, all of them having been sent out by the Government Commissioners.

A report recently presented to the town council of Liverpool gives the following statistics of public-houses and beer-houses in proportion to the population in several of the large towns of England. London (metropolitan district), 1 to 427; ditto (City), 1 to 198; Liverpool, 1 to 265; Manchester, 1 to 630; Birmingham, 1 to 39.. Thus it will be seen that there are more publichouses, in proportion to the population in Liverpool, than in any other of the large towns, except that portion of the metropolis which is included in the city of London.

"Father, it tells here about illuminated manuscripts. What were they lighted with?" The father answered, "With the light of other days, my son!"

By the arrival of her Majesty's steam-frigate Dragon, Capt. Gifford, accounts have been received from Lisbon of the 28th ult., which announce the death of Count das Antas, who headed the revolutionary junta of Oporto in 1847. He had been long ill, and his decease was not unexpected.

The wife of Mr. Marshall, baker and corn-factor, of Woodford, Essex, died lately of mortification occasioned by the carelessness of her having punctured her thumb with a pin and shortly afterwards washed her apron in some water in which she had put a quantity of bleaching powder.

On Monday the Custom-house officers at the Belgian frontier, having opened a large package which had been directed to Count d'O——, to contain a marble statue, found t. at it conta-ned a dead body. It was at first supposed that some crime had been committed; but it was afterwards ascertained, from the explanation of Count d'O——, that the body was that of a relation that he was having conveyed for interment to the family vault near Toulon, and that he had made a false declaration of the contents of the case in order to avoid the heavy charges which are usually made for the conveyance of the bodies of persons dying in foreign countries.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

During the whole of the present week there has been an extensive business has been transacted in the market for metal securities, and the near approach of the period for the shutting of the transfer-books has increased the eagerness of the buyers to invest. The result has been a further advance in the quotations for the principal portion of the list, since Friday last, but been about 2 per cent. the Three per Cents having at one time touched 100¾ for sellers. For the next Account large transactions have been entered into; and, judging from the present position of the market, the immense influx of bullion from the sales of the precious metals, and the low value of money, there appears to be every reasonable prospect of even higher prices. It must be borne in mind, however, that the 10th instant is our dividend day for the Three per Cents, and that the actual value of them, ex dv., which they will be shortly marked, is 89¾.

Notwithstanding that the exchanges show no profit upon shipments, after making allowances for freight, charges, &c., upwards of £600,000 sterling in gold has been taken for the United States, and £130,000 has come to hand from New York. From Australia about £130,000 has come in, and several parcels of gold are reported from France. A large quantity of silver has been recently purchased for India; and the steamer which left for Syria on Tuesday took out not less than 250,000 sovereigns. This is the largest export of the precious metals ever made to our Australian colonies, from whence most extraordinary accounts continue to arrive on the subject of the productiveness of the mines.

The public generally have evinced no desire to operate in the new Austrian loan; nevertheless, owing, doubtless, to the influence of the Messrs. Rothschild—the agents on this occasion—the whole of the subscription lists have been filled up, and several transactions have been officially noted at ½ premium. The holders of the scrip have the assurance that the interest will be forthcoming. The bulk of the scrip remains, and not in bank notes of questionable value. Looking to the wretched financial position of Austria, and the owness of her credit in all parts of the world, it is quite evident that the Austrian Government made larger loans to relieve the pressing necessities of the State. Notice has been issued that a large quantity of Danish Five per Cent. Stock will shortly be created, and that the whole of the present Three per Cent. Stock will be converted on the part of the Sardinian Government. The punctuality with which the dividend payments have hitherto been met, and the comparatively small foreign debt of Sardinia, make it pretty evident that the attempt will be a successful one. On the whole, the demand for foreign bonds has not been active. Mexican Stock has continued extremely heavy, but Northern and Spanish has maintained its previous value. On Thursday Account scrip was marked 10¼ Brazilian Five per Cents were done at 100¾; Ditto, new Bonds, 99¾; Chilian Six per Cents, 104; Equador, 4¾; Mexican Three per Cents, 23; Portuguese Five per Cents, 86¾ to 99¾; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 104¾; Spanish Active Five per Cents were done at 100¾; Ditto, new Bonds, 99¾; Chilian Six per Cents, 104; Equador, 4¾; Mexican Three per Cents, 23; Portuguese Five per Cents, 86¾ to 99¾; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 104¾; Spanish Active, 19¾; Passive, 5⅝; Spanish Three per Cents for the Account, 48 to 47⅞; Ditto, New Deferred, 21⅜; Venezuela Three-and-a-Half per Cents, 40¾ to 39¾; Ditto, for the Account, 40; Ditto, Deferred, 19¾ to 19⅜; and Dutch Two and-a-Half per Cents, 62¾ to 62. A few purchases have been effected in Grenada One-and-a Half per Cents, at 20⅛; Ditto, Deferred, 8¾ to 9, and Danish Five per Cents, 104¾; Dutch Four per Cents are worth 99¾.

On Monday the Three per Cent Consols, Money, were done at 100⅜. They continued steady on the two following days, and the general quotations were officially marked on Tuesday as follows:—Annuities, 1860, 100⅜; Consols for immediate transfer, 100⅜; Ditto, for the Account, 100⅜; Three per Cents, Reduced, 99¾; and the New Three-and-a-Quarters, 102¾. Bank Stock was done at 209¾; India Stock, 259; Exchequer Bills, 1½ dis; Bonds, 1¼ dis; India Bonds, 90s premium. The two latter are very high figures, considering that a reduction of interest is about to take place Canada Five per Cent. Bonds have been quoted at 114¾; and City Navigation ditto, 9.

The Joint-stock Share Market has continued somewhat active, and further enhanced rates have been realised. There is no doubt whatever that many of the shares now being sold beneath their intrinsic value. National Provincial Bank of England Shares have improved £1 10s; and Oriental, £1. British North American have marked 56½; Commercial of London, 56¾; London Joint Stock, 18¾; London and Westminster, 25¾; National Provincial of England, 44; National of Ireland, 20; Oriental Bank Corporation, 37; Provincial of Ireland, 40¾; South Australian, 24¾; Union of Australia, 43; and Union of London, 46¾. Steamboat Shares have been done as to lows:—Australian Royal Mail, par; General Screw, 5½; General Steam, 2¾; Peninsular and Oriental, 83; Ditto, new, 3½; and Royal Mail Steam, 78.

The Foreign Share Market on Saturday displayed much animation. The comparatively small traffic returns, compared with ... bilees, prevented buyers from coming ... operations were ... mands are £430,850. During the first six months of the present year they will have amounted to £3,996,178, against £2,838,7.9 last season. The following were the closing prices on Thursday:—

Brazilian, 100¾; Dutch Four per Cents, 99¾; Mexican, 31¾; and Spanish per Three Cents, 47¾. In Railway Shares very little doing.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The present week's arrival of English wheat up to our own last returns has been confined to 5280 quarters, principally from Essex and Kent. By land carriage the receipts of that grain fresh up to-day were very moderate, hence the aggregate show of samples was small. The attendance of both town and country makers was comparatively limited, and only a small amount of business was transacted, in wheat of lamgrowth, at Monday's prices. Very little was doing for forward delivery. Only 1600 quarters of wheat have come fresh to hand from abroad. Selected qualities were in fair demand, but all other kinds were dull, at barely late rates. Floating cargoes of wheat and beans were not lower. The show of barley was very moderate, yet the demand for all kinds was slow at barely previous quotations. We had a dull sale for malt, and oats and pulse were the turn lower. Although the supply of oats was tolerably good—12 220 quarters having arrived from abroad—holders were said to sell except at full prices. Beans, peas, and fine flour steady. The imports of the latter into the United Kingdom last week were 11 650 barrels.

ARRIVALS. English: wheat, 2680; barley, 70; malt, 2030; oats, 2040; flour, 22 0 Irish: barley, 150; oats, 6920. Foreign: wheat, 1600; barley, 3690; oats, 13,300; flour, 290 sacks, 1940 barrels.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THE GRISETTE. BY A. SOLOMON.

MR. SOLOMON has added coquettish treatment to a coquettish subject in this very bright little picture. We all know the passage from the "Sentimental Journey" to which it refers:—

In a few minutes the grisette came in with her box of ices:—"I will buy nothing, however," said I, within myself. The grisette would show me everything: I was hard to please; she would not seem to see it; she opened her little magazine, and laid all her laces one after another before me—unfolded and folded them up again one by one with the most patient sweetness. I might buy, or not; the poor creature seemed anxious to get a penny, and laid herself out to win me; and not so much in a manner which seemed artful, as in one I felt simple and caressing.

We have said the treatment is coquettish; and in this excess of coquetting the artist does injustice to the little heroine of a small every-day adventure, whom the author wishes to represent as a thoroughly artless being. "I was hard to please; she would not seem to see it." Is this verified in the face in the picture, pretty and persuasive though it be? We think not; and, if so, it is not Sterne's grisette. The coquetting of the artist is shown again in the manner in which, excluding the doctor's real presence from the picture, he shows only his reflection in the glass, where, also, the back of the grisette occupies a prominent position; and yet the hat and cane are realities. The picture, withal, is very charmingly painted, and makes a good Engraving.

SHEEP WASHING, ISLE OF SKYE. BY R. ANSDELL.

ANSDELL is making wonderful progress in the department of art which he appears to have adopted, that of wild mountain scenery, and cattle which herd therein. He has three pieces in the present exhibition—(188) "Lytham Sand Hills, Lancashire;" (284) "Cattle Fair, Isle of Skye, Glen Sligisham;" and (1096) "Sheep-washing," also in Glen Sligisham, of which last we give an Engraving. This work evinces wonderful spirit and great skill in the distribution of colouring and effect. The mountain range in the distance, the gushing stream in front, and the clear crisp cold sky over head, are given with the feeling of one familiar with such scenes; whilst the woolly coats of the sheep are rendered with an accuracy, a roundness yet softness of touch, which may challenge comparison with anything of the same class we are aware of. We need hardly add, for the Engraving tells this, that the general effect is in the highest degree healthy, animated, and pleasing, and in every way satisfactory.

WARMING AND VENTILATING THE NEW HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THE third report of Mr. Goldsworthy Gurney on the ventilation, warming, and lighting of the new House of Commons, after describing at some length the present process of ventilation and warming, and pointing out the defects of the system, concludes with the following summary:—

1. We find, on careful consideration of all the results of our experiments, facts, and observations, that the ventilation of the libraries, corridors, and offices of the House is sufficient and satisfactory, except the committee-rooms. The ventilation is sufficient for them when used for select committees; but it is not sufficient for them when used for public committees, but moderately full.

2. That the cooling influence of the large surface of glass in the windows, in most of the rooms on the river front, will, unless insulated, produce great inconvenience by causing cold portions of air to fall from it in winter. These falling sheets, or currents of air, will occasion a disturbance of the whole atmosphere of the room itself, which may be mistaken for bad ventilation, or for draughts of air coming in from without.

3. That the steam-jet, used to assist in drawing off the vitiated air, is imperfectly fitted up, and in consequence makes a disagreeable hissing noise, which it should not do.

4. That the products of combustion from the lights in Westminster Hall, St. Stephen's Porch, St. Stephen's Hall, and Central Hall, escape into these apartments, which should be prevented.

5. That the arrangements for warming are good and satisfactory, with the exception of those parts where horizontal heating pipes are used, for reasons previously stated.

6. That we see no apparatus for cooling the air in summer. The water from the deep wells about London averages 52 deg. in summer: the simple apparatus, described in my evidence to the committee on ventilation, will sufficiently reduce the temperature of any quantity of air by means of the water from these wells in hot weather, without much trouble or expense.

In conclusion, I beg to add that these evils may be removed without much expense; but as, under the order of the House, I do not think I should suggest any alterations, I have not done so, but have confined myself to reporting the facts and conditions as I find them. I am prepared to point out to the proper authorities such alterations as I believe would remove most of the evils which I have enumerated, or to state them fully in another part, should the House desire it.

SALE OF THE LATE MR. PROUT'S SKETCHES.—This collection may be said to have comprised the working tools of this eminent artist; consisting of sketches made during his various tours on the Continent, ranging over more than thirty years of his artistic life. The drawings were principally in pencil, and were much distinguished by extreme accuracy and general truthfulness, having been finished with great care on the spot. The collection was sold by Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson, of Wellington-street, and produced in the total the large sum of £1788 11s. 6d.

THE APPROACHING GENERAL ELECTION.

MR. DISRAELI'S MANIFESTO.

THREE months ago, it was foreknown that a dissolution of Parliament would take place during the present summer. The Protectionists had, somehow or other, slipped into power; not because they were wanted or inevitable, but because it pleased the defeated Lord John Russell to recommend to the Queen a Ministry that he thought could not stand, rather than one that had a reasonable prospect of vitality. But the opponents of Free Trade having, under this memorable patronage, and by a remarkable combination of events, achieved a position to which they were not constitutionally entitled, unless they appealed, from a Parliament opposed to them, to the constituencies that might perchance prove favourable, it was generally expected that the appeal would not be delayed, and that the question, placed before the country for its final decision, would be the honest one of "Corn Laws or no Corn Laws?" "Protection or Free Trade?" But gradually this belief has worn itself out. There is to be a dissolution of Parliament, though there is in reality no great question left for the constituencies to decide. The Ministers of Protection have ceased to be Protectionists. The hot friends of a bread tax have become the cold friends of Free Trade. Lord Derby has "eaten his words," with much butter and honey and other disguise; and Mr. Disraeli has performed the same operation with the daring and nonchalance that suit his genius. In fact, the "game" of Protection is "up." Mr. Disraeli has informed the electors of Buckinghamshire, and through them the whole world, that it is "too late" to attempt the restoration of the Corn Laws; that "the spirit of the age tends to free intercourse," and that "no statesman can disregard with impunity the genius of the age in which he lives." These, it will be confessed, are brave words—not the less brave because they are a severe condemnation of the honesty or the wisdom of the course pursued for the last six years by the eminent person who uses them, and by the colleagues with whom he is associated. But this being the case, and these being the sentiments of the Ministry, the country will naturally feel desirous to know upon what other questions its verdict is to be sought at the long-promised dissolution. The mere question of confidence or no confidence in the particular men who happen to be in office is not sufficient. Indeed, that particular point, were there no other, is decided against the Ministry by the Ministry itself, which stands convicted, on its own confession, of a fruitless and unwise opposition to the spirit of their age and country.

There is no disposition, as far as we can discover, in any section of politicians, or among any class of the community, to bear with undue, or indeed any, harshness or severity upon the chiefs of the Protectionist Ministry for changing their opinions. No one hunts them to death, as they would have hunted Sir Robert Peel. No one accuses them of treachery. Even the few farmers who are sincerely of opinion that it is a good thing to tax the people's bread, and that the panacea for all sublunary evils is corn at eighty or a hundred shillings a quarter, look with bewilderment rather than with anger upon the speeches and manifestos of their friends in office. If any cry reaches the public ear from that quarter, it is a cry of parental alarm, like that raised by a hen who has sat upon a duck's egg, when the alien offspring takes to the pond instead of the dunghill. All other men and parties are glad that a truth long evident and palpable to the clear intellect of the country has dawned upon the minds of its opponents; and are willing to acquit Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli of all other offence but ignorance. Such an offence is for the most part atoned for as soon as it is frankly avowed; and the Ministers have had, and will have, all the advantage due to their contrition, even although it be tardily expressed.

Mr. Disraeli, the tongue and brain, if not the head, of the Ministry, is evidently aware that Lord Derby cannot appeal to the country on merely personal grounds. Having given up the Corn Laws, and with them their sole tangible and honest claim to the position which they occupy, the Ministers have been compelled to raise one or more issues, which the constituencies may try. In

THE ROYAL HUNT CUP. THE EMPEROR'S VASE. THE QUEEN'S CUP.

[illegible] to the electors of Buckinghamshire, Mr. Disraeli has [illegible] first time informed the nation what those issues are to be. [illegible] is seven—the mystical number of old times—and a number still sacred among the rabbis and teachers of that Hebrew race of which Mr. Disraeli is so distinguished a scion. To quote the words of the Minister himself, they are—

1. Whether the country will maintain a Ministry formed on the principle of Conservative progress.

2. Whether it will terminate for ever, by just and conciliatory measures, the misconceptions which have too long prevailed between producer and consumer, and extinguish the fatal jealousy that rankles between town and country.

3 Whether our colonial empire shall be maintained and confirmed.

4. Whether the material development of Ireland shall at length be secured

5. Whether such alterations as time and circumstances may appear to justify and require in the construction of the House of Commons shall be made in that spirit of revolution which has arrested the civilisation of Europe, or in the spirit of our popular though not democratic institutions.

6. Whether the Church of England shall still remain a national Church.

7. Whether the Crown of England shall still be a Protestant Crown.

These are the seven questions that the country will have to decide. We have placed them in the order in which Mr. Disraeli has placed them, and have merely marked them for convenience of reference, We presume they have the sanction of Lord Derby and the other colleagues of the right honourable gentleman. Without wishing to throw ridicule upon the Minister or upon the Ministry, the critic who has such a string of questions may well exclaim, that—

> Although to laugh were to be scant of grace,
> Yet to be grave exceeds all powers of face.

The third, fourth, sixth, and seventh questions are so utterly gratuitous and irrelevant, as to suggest a doubt whether Mr. Disraeli has not caught the habit of solemn joking from Lord Derby, and whether a "sell" is not attempted on the credulous men of Buckinghamshire, if not on a wider circle.

> Because thou art virtuous,
> Shall there be no more cakes and ale?

Because Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli shall, some day or other, be turned out of office, shall not our colonial empire be as safe as when they sit on the high stools of Downing-street? Because Lord John, and all the Russells, Greys, and Elliotts, may come back again, is the material development of Ireland to be nothing but "a fallacy of hope?" Is there nothing real in this world but Benjamin Disraeli? Because Sir James Graham may probably replace the present Chancellor of the Exchequer in the leadership of the Commons, and because Lord John Russell, transformed into a very respectable and useful Peer, may take the place occupied by the Earl of Derby in the Lords, shall there be more reason to fear for the nationality of the Church, and for the Protestantism of the Crown, than there is under the happy auspices of the Earl of Derby? There surely needs no dissolution to decide such questions. The Ministers might almost as reasonably have enlarged their issues to three times seven, as to have included these in their mystical and mystifying programme. Why did they not ask the opinion of the country whether the Union between England and Scotland were to be maintained? whether London were still to continue the metropolis of the empire? and whether Queen Ann te as undubitably defunct as historians have represented?

The first, second, and fifth of Mr. Disraeli's propositions are of more practical importance, but they are Lord John Russell's propositions even more than they are his. The principles of Conservative progress and of acquiescence in Free Trade embodied in them, are the principles upon which the late Ministry acted, and in defiance of which no Ministry or party would ever dream of governing this country. The only difference we can see between the present Government and that which, either under the leadership of Lord John Russell, Sir James Graham, or any other able and tried member of the Legislature, might be called upon to replace it, is, that while Lord Derby, Mr. Disraeli, and their colleagues coldly acquiesce in Free Trade as a fact which it is not desirable to extend, but too late to disturb, all other statesmen would endeavour to extend its principles by giving it their hearty and uncompromising support.

The country, however, will reject all the extraneous and irrelevant issues which Mr. Disraeli says it will have to try. In due time it will choose between men who grudgingly and ineffectively support a great object of national policy which they formerly condemned, and men of greater experience and higher character, who would not only adhere to the same principle, but give it the benefit of a co-operation both enlightened and cordial.

If Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli could only blot from remembrance their own past acts and words, they might form no undistinguished and no inefficient members of such an Administration as the country requires. No one wonders at their present opinions; but most people wonder why, with such opinions, and with such a programme of policy, they consent to retain office.

THE ASCOT RACE PLATE.

NEITHER of the three Ascot prizes for the present year precisely takes the form of "vase" or "cup," although they are conventionally so termed in the race lists. They are highly artistic figure groups or impersonations from three of England's greatest poets, and have been very judiciously selected. Their forms are given upon the preceding page.

THE ROYAL HUNT CUP consists of a tazza, supported by a birch or fir tree, beneath which is a group from the poem of the "Russian Fugitive," by Wordsworth, the incidents of which were originally related by Peter Henry Brere, in his entertaining "Memoirs." The point of the subject is from the following lines:—

> The faintly creature took the march,
> And toward the island fled,
> While plovers scream'd with tumult Lars
> Above his antler'd head.
> Then, as saw; and, as with fear,
> Shrank to her dwelt;
> The deer-mate deer rushed on, and near
> Their lurked covert fell.
> Across the marsh, the game in view,
> The hunter followed fast,
> Nor paused til, o'er the stag he blew
> A death-proclaiming blast.
> Then, resting on her upright mind,
> Came forth the maid "In me
> Behold," she said, "a stricken kind,
> Pursued by destiny!"

The pathetic subject has been beautifully designed by Mr. Alfred Brown, and admirably executed by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell.

THE EMPEROR'S VASE consists of a lofty candelabrum, with a group most artistically designed and modelled by Mr. E. Cotterill, from Scott's "Thomas the Rhymer," to illustrate the following passage:—

> True Thomas lay on Huntly bank;
> A ferlie he spied wi' his e'e,
> And there he saw a lady bright, come riding down by the Eildon tree.
> Her shirt was o' the grass-green silk, her mantle o' the velvet fyne.
> At ilka tett of her horse's mane hung fifty siller bells and nine.
> True Thomas he pull'd off his cap, and louted low down to his knee.
> All hail mighty Queen of Heaven, for thy peer on earth I never did see."

The prize has been exquisitely wrought by Messrs. Garrard, goldsmiths to the Crown.

THE QUEEN'S CUP is a group from Spenser's "Faëry Queene," and illustrates these verses:

> As the knight was pricking on the plaine,
> Ne'd in mightie armes and silver shielde,
> Wherein old dints of deepe wounds did remaine,
> The cruel markes of many a bloody fielde;
> Full jolly knight he seem'd, and faire did sit,
> As one for knightly giusts and fierce encounters fit
> And on his louthly steed more white than snow;
> Yet he much whiter, but the same did hide
> Under a vele that wimpled was full low,
> As one that inly mourn'd, so was she sad;
> And by her in a line a milke-white lambe she lad.

This piece, also, has been designed and modelled by Mr. Cotterill, and wrought by Messrs. Garrard, and is a very charming group.

ASCOT HEATH RACES.

Tuesday, June 8th—Ascot Heath Races, and nine acts in the drama How picturesque the mise en scène! The stands—the Royal—the Grand, and that, the professional rendezvous, the Stewards' shine like summer palaces; while around on every hand spreads a holiday encampment of tents, infinite in number and variety. And then, how orderly is all the festival! How prodigal of good has Providence been to the people by whom it is celebrated; fair courtesy marks their intercourse. Here are costumes rich and rare—everywhere is comely comfort and decent sufficiency. Riot there is none. How is it that well-meaning men will suffer themselves to be prejudiced against such a nationally popular tryst as a well-regulated race-course? By noon the character of the pageant began to manifest itself. The show of equipage was such as England only can exhibit. The lavish array of well-dressed rabble was "prodigious." Every minute added to this "wealth of nations;" and, as attention stood on tip-toe, watching for the cynosure of the day, ye saw that the Royal tryst of past and pleasant years was, indeed, itself again. "All was gentle and aristocratic," as, at a little after one o'clock, the glitter of the courtly cavalcade was espied in the distance. The ceremonial was precisely on the principle of its predecessors. Up the course it swept leisurely, in all the pride, pomp, and circumstance of its peerless appointment. The imperial party occupied a brilliant train of carriages, characteristically led by the Master of the Buckhounds, and flanked by attendants in gorgeous attire of gold and scarlet. How majestically the matchless coursers paced!—how luxuriant their condition!—how complete their comparison! Hark to the chorus of welcome that rings forth heartamuse! The Queen salutes her friends. For an instant the relations are forgotten, and love and cordiality have changed places with reverence and—the subject. The Royal Princes, sire and son, shared and partook of this good cheer. May it be the token of a future as gracious and as full of wholesome promise!

It would seem superfluous to premise that all arrangements for such an occasion were perfect. One of its most grateful features was its unmistakeable pleasure character. Business—at least as the rule, rude and all-engrossing—was no longer the order of the day's sport "Fair women" lauded the steeds for their symmetry and silken coats; and "brave men," for the nonce, did not deal with "the colours of the riders," as substitutes for those common tintings rouge et noir. The bell has rung, the course is clear, and her Majesty, with the Infants of Spain at her side, has stood forward to witness the racing—four events—the Trial Stakes, won without an effort by the Duke of Richmond's Officious; the second year of the Third Triennial Produce, for three-year-olds, won similarly by Songstress, the winner of the Oaks; the third year of the Second Triennial Stakes, for four-year olds, won, in a very close race, by little Midas; and the Ascot Derby, won by Convulsion cleverly; the favourite, the unlucky and unkind Red Hind, being thrown down close to home, by a dog that ran under her feet. The great issue of the day was duly paraded. For "The Gold Vase, given by her Majesty," there appeared at the post—post varios casus—a field of eight. Of this lot the pride of place in the odds was accorded to Frantic—"a mad world, my masters." Of the issue, it merely remains to record that a three-year-old, little known to fame—whose owner is Baron Rothschild, and whose parents are Phlegon and Marinella—won, as the judge declared, "very cleverly by a length." At this crisis of the sports the courtly train departed from the course in the order of their coming. The weather might have been a little more propitious, but the sprinkling of the silver summer shower is, after all, far more tolerable even to the toilette of Ascot, than an incrustation of that which poor L. E. L. called "mud in high spirits." The Ascot Stakes, a squeeze of a handicap relish as since said, succeeded, and a strong body of horses mustered at the weight. Buckthorn, of whom we profess to know nothing, save that he was beaten in the four races that he ran last year, was the favourite; while the winner was Lucio, only out and beaten once last year. Now, they are both three-year-olds, and Buckthorn carried 15 lb. more than Lucio; but wherefore this deponent sayeth not. True, he has a notion that might be urged pro—but the plea must be overruled. A sweepstakes, won in a match with Elspeth by Stella, in a canter; and a couple of walks over, closed the catalogue. The afternoon waned heavily with clouds.

> The evaporation of a joyous day
> Is like the last glass of champagne without
> The foam which made its virgin bumpers gay;
> Or like a system, coupled with a doubt;

and not without some misgivings, that, in the energetic exodus towards Slough (where the quatrain was indited), the noble bard was misquoted.

Wednesday, we read in the almanack calendar for June, "Last quarter, 9 day, 15m. past 3, afternoon"—the point of chronology announced by our watch at these instant presents!

> The de—'s [that is to say, the deuce is] in the moon for mischief!

Was there ever such a day as this since the date to which Deucalion is referred? Did it ever "wet" like this, about midsummer, in Cork, or Connaught, or, in short, anywhere else, before? Imagine fourteen fat people—or stout, if you prefer the expression in a "bus," and every one of them as saturated with fluid as a sponge that has been fished up from the bottom of the sea, where it was lying since the beginning of time. Tell the conductor there's a brace too many inside, indeed! Do you mean a brace of trout? Could any terrestrial creature exist outside for five minutes without the assistance of a diving apparatus. The sports of the Circus Maximus used to be diversified with aquatic spectacles; what a pity it is an aqueous match had not been organised for the 9th of June at Ascot Heath! It is scarcely necessary to premise that the attendance was as indifferent as the weather. The amusement began with the Coronation Stakes, for which three ran, and of which the filly by Ion out of Exotic was the winner in a very severe race. Hobbie Noble having walked over for the Albany Stakes, the Royal Hunt Cup was put on the scene with a fleet of three-and-twenty. Ephesus was the favourite, and he won easily by two lengths. What a surge of mud they threw up—"apparent rari nantes"—here they came, swimming like good 'uns. The first year of the Fourth Ascot Triennial Stakes, for two-year-olds, induced half-a-dozen to try their hand at the dirt. It was a fine finish, the Riever first, beating Chedder on the post by a neck. Barcelona was allowed to walk off with an over for the Queen's Guineas, and the Fernhill Stakes were extinguished. They came off in a quartet, led by Vaultress, who won by a dozen lengths. A Fifty-pound Plate, handicap, was upon the list, the winner being Mr. Williams's Mara. It was a relief, the release from that amphibious entertainment

Thursday, and this is the Ascot Cup day—the four des jours for bravery, beauty, and all that makes the heart leap for delight. Is it such as this among the dryads that wilohm consorted with the witless weaver? Does it bloom as bright as then in the glamourised dale that fringe Victoria Water? Does the torrent fall fast and furious over the emerald meads of Swinley? London has put on the livery of November; the yellow fog is abroad, and the streets are winter thorough. Thus fared it as we set our face towards Paddington station of the Great Western, en route for Windsor and its adjacent revels.

The ensemble of the ground was all eloquent of disastrous fortunes. The show of carriages was ruefully under the lowest average even of an intermediate day; and promenade on the course, of course there was none. When the Royal cortège was seen sweeping up the straight mile the rain was falling fiercely, and thus it continued, with some ten minutes intermission for the Queen's departure, till the racing was over. Then the clouds broke, and the sun shone out, and the evening was lovely. The betting was very simple and fair, if not very good. It began with a Fifty Sovereigns Sweepstakes for three-year-olds, won by Ben Nevis. Then came the Visitors' Plate handicap, won in a cleverly-ridden race by Harpsichord, to which succeeded the Windsor Forest Stakes, run a match between Flury and Sally—won by the former. It was now the turn of the Emperor of Russia's Plate. This splendid prize brought nine to the post. The issue was hollow almost as a walk over. Almost as soon as they got off, Joe Miller went to the front, made his lead better every furlong he went, was never approached, and won in a canter by two lengths. The Black Doctor was second, Robbie Noble third, Little Harry fourth, Voltigeur fifth, and the Indian Warrior sixth. The other three did not pass the post. The appearance of the jockeys at scale told the economy of the race. Little Mann, who rode Joe Miller, was as clean as if he had stepped out of a bandbox; and all the others looked as if they had stepped out of a scavenger's cart. For the New Stakes—the two-year-old race of the meeting—ten went; and, after a fine race, Hybla won by a head, Prevention beating Fug Orrock by a like distance for second place. The St. James's Palace Stakes was run a match between Daniel O'Rourke and Alcorau, and won by the former very gallantly; and Gladiole having carried off the Fifty Pound Handicap Plate for all ages, the last was run out. Daniel O'Rourke met with an accident in his van on the way to the course, which cut one of his hips severely, but no serious mischief was done. Thus ended the most unpropitious Cup day in the modern annals of Ascot.

Friday, technically known as the "off day" of the meeting, stood towards it on the present occasion in the literal acceptation of expression. There was little to attract, and less to interest. Let us not spoil a sparkling spectacle by loitering for the inodorous death of its illumination Farewell, fair Ascot! The sultry influences did not smile upon thy pleasant pageantry as liberally as they might, indeed; but hath not hope its cloud, and joy its tear?

The following is a list of the running:—

THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.—OLD MASTERS.

THE collection of works by deceased masters, opened to the public on Monday last, is unusually rich in variety, and on many accounts highly interesting; and the directors, in a note preceding the catalogue, make a handsome and well-deserved acknowledgment of the liberal manner in which the proprietors have come forward to contribute to so gratifying a display. Perhaps it would be better if, as the study of art progresses, and its vo'aries increase, some attempt at selection and classification were made when preparing exhibitions of a similar kind; it being somewhat perplexing to find crowded together in two rooms of moderate dimensions works in every style historical portrait, landscape, genre, of every school—Italian, Spanish, Flemish, French, English; and of every period, from Fra Bartolomeo and Perugino to Wilkie and Collins. We make this observation more by way of suggestion than of complaint, and shall be glad if it lead to the formation of two or three exhibitions of old masters, instead of one, in the course of the year.

Amongst the contributors to the present collection are her Majesty, who sends three works by British artists—two of Collins, and one of Sir William Devonshire, and the Duke of Wellington, and Sutherland; the Earls of Derby, Amherst, and Albemarle; Messrs. F. Perkins, Halford, Roberts, Fuller, Maitland, &c. Amongst the gems in the rooms are two Murillos, "St. Francis at Devotion," and "St. Francis in Ecstacy" (exhibited by Mr. Perkins); "Belshazzar's Feast," by Rembrandt (exhibited by Lord Derby); "The Ripore," by Albano (exhibited by Mr. Halford); "Our Saviour Crowned with Thorns," by Morales (exhibited by Sir Woodbine Parish); "A Legendary Subject," by Velasquez (exhibited by Mr. Whatman); two Holbeins, and several Wouvermans, Cuyp, Mieris, Hobbema, &c. We will go into a more detailed notice on an early occasion.

CAPTURE OF AN OUTLAW, NEAR ALLAHABAD.—(See the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for May 10.)—A superb sword has been presented by her Majesty the King of Oude to Mr. Dunlop, of the Bengal service, in acknowledgment of his gallantry and judgment in the recent capture of the outlaw Nundhoo Lodha. This weapon is a fine specimen of Eastern manufacture; the blade is from Ispahan, of a peculiar water, and valued at 1000 rupees. The medallions in the belt are embossed with the arms of the King, and all the mountings are in gold

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE.—It appears by a return recently printed, that in 1848 the Customs produced, deducting drawbacks and repayments (without deducting the charges of collection), £22,593,377; the Excise, £18,043,704, the stamps, £8,765,091; and the assessed taxes, £3,350,216 (omitting the property and land tax): making £47,772,449. In 1849 the several taxes amounted to £47,648,816; in 1850, £47,363,508; and in 1851, £46,775,821. In 1848 the taxes repealed or reduced amounted to £5,565,568, and £64 imposed; in 1849, £388,798 were repealed, and none imposed; in 1850, £1,310,151 were repealed, and £4300 imposed; and in 1851, £2,679,864 were repealed, and £618,180 imposed. There was an increase of £1,120,607, compared with the preceding year; in 1849 the decrease of actual produce was £123,633; in 1850, £285,308; and in 1851, £589,887. In 1848 the average price of wheat was 50s. 0d. in 1849, 44s. 2d.; in 1850, 40s. 1d.; and in 1851, 38s. 6d.

FATAL AND DESTRUCTIVE FLOODS IN GERMANY.—From Berlin, the Prussian capital, under date the 5th inst., we learn that the districts of Mulhausen and Heiligenstadt have been visited by a great calamity. The bursting of a water-spout caused such a deluge that the Unstrut rose in the waters of the Unstrut and other streams, that not only is the whole harvest of the present year destroyed, but the fields are covered with stones and sand to such an extent that it will be impossible to bring them into cultivation for years to come. In one quarter of an hour the Unstrut rose 16 feet above its usual level. The loss of life is not yet known, but it is feared it is considerable. In Dingleadt 12 bodies have been found, and 19 persons are missing. In the district of Mulhausen above 20 persons are reported as having been drowned, and between 20 and 30 more are supposed to have shared the same fate. The roads are everywhere destroyed, whole herds of cattle and sheep have been lost, and bridges have been completely swept away that scarcely a stone of them remains. The full extent of the loss of life and damage to property has not yet been ascertained.

During the past week, a fine fox-hound, was chasing some cats in a barn, near Westbourne, by pulling their tails, one of them turned upon him and bit his thumb; and soon were the effects of the violent inflammation ensuing therefrom, that he died within eight hours.

A report of the House of Commons shows that the estimate of the expenses to be incurred in making the improvements under the Pimlico improvement Bill now before Parliament, is stated at £30,000

The planters of Cuba have entered into an agreement with the English house for the importation of 8000 Chinese labourers, who will be apprenticed for eight years, and receive four dollars a month each for their service.

A basket of strawberries, grown in the open air, at East Linton, was exposed for sale on Monday, in Edinburgh. They ripened five days earlier than last year

The exhibition of the works of the students of the several schools of ornamental art, recently opened at the department of practical art, at Marlborough House, has been closed to the public, having been visited by several thousands of persons. The works will be forthwith returned to the local schools, in many of which, as at Cork, Birmingham, &c., they are wanted for [illegible]. In order to complete the cases for the museum of ornamental manufactures, and prepare the rooms for study and drawing, the museum has been closed to the present. The course of Mr. Owen Jones's lectures on true and false principles of design, however is not interrupted by these arrangements

Mr. Roebuck is so seriously ill as to create no small anxiety as to the result on the part of his friends. He has, we are sorry to learn, been visited by a paralytic affection, which, at any rate for the present, entirely unfits him for attending to business of any kind.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Government of Louis Napoleon has been especially active this week in manifesting its hostility to the Paris and London press. We have elsewhere recapitulated and commented upon the fact of his quarrel with the Constitutionnel, and its proprietor and principal writer.

With reference to the London daily papers, the blow has been aimed at them through the persons of their correspondents in Paris. The Morning Chronicle, Daily News, and Advertiser are the papers menaced; and, according to the official intimations given to the representatives of these journals, the Government has resolved not to tolerate any longer what is declared to have been a system of personal attack by these newspapers on the Prince President, either in letters or leading articles; and should there be a repetition of the offences complained of, even in the shape of leaders, the correspondent of each of these papers in question was informed that he should be expelled. So far, no warnings have been addressed to the correspondents of any other London paper. The correspondent of the Daily News gives the following account of his interview on the subject with M. Latour-Dumoulin, at the Ministry of Police, whither he had been summoned on Tuesday last:—

The director of the press at the ministry of police (M Dumoulin), lately a writer in the Bulletin de Paris, a lithographic organ of the Elysée, is a young man of about thirty, of prepossessing appearance and address. He received your correspondent with that ease and politeness of manner which is a strong characteristic in many of the leading persons employed in the service of the present Government. He proceeded to state the motives of his present communication, which must be regarded as an official notice of the French Government, and is, therefore, of the highest importance as affecting the relations of the two countries. The French Government had observed attentively, since the 2d of December, the attitude of the English press, and regretted to perceive that many of the London newspapers were not only hostile to the present Government, but outrageous towards the head of the State. Now the French Government did not ask for support at the hands of any foreign newspaper, it did not wish even to deprecate opposition; but it was determined not to allow the person at the head of the State to be treated with outrage and insult, and his name to be dragged through the mire (traîné dans la boue). It was not only in the letters of the correspondents that this offensive manner of mentioning the person of the Prince Louis Napoleon was practised, but also in the leading articles. But in either case, for the future, the correspondent will be held responsible, inasmuch as it was only fair to suppose that he furnished the false news on which the insulting "appreciations" contained in the leading article were founded. Your correspondent was then given to understand that, if either the Paris letter of the Daily News, or the leading articles of that paper, contained any expressions outraging the person of the Prince President, he would be considered as the responsible person, and be forthwith expelled from France. It was found that this measure did not suffice to put an end to the practice of insulting the head of the French State in the English press, it would then become the duty of the French Government to deliberate upon what further measures would be necessary. This is the sum and substance of M. Latour-Dumoulin's communication to me this afternoon, and I presume that another correspondent of the English press, whom he has likewise seen, has received a similar warning. He adds that the Government was anxious to afford every facility to English correspondents for sending correct news; it would even have no objection to communicate at times important documents which it could not permit to be published in France. For instance, the Count de Chambord's letter, although the Independance Belge was seized for the publication of it, would have been published without difficulty to an English newspaper. These and other civil offers were made politely by M. Latour-Dumoulin, who appointed himself of his own accord to see with no want of civility; but his ultimatum was, that the Government could not accept the theory of the irresponsibility of correspondents."

The Château d'Eu was seized by the local functionaries on the 6th inst., in virtue of the decree of January 22. The officers of justice knocked and demanded admission, which was refused by the steward of the Duke of Nemours, who had given him peremptory orders not to open the gates. Forcible entrance was then obtained, the object of which was to prevent the sale of the furniture announced to be sold in two days by command of the Duke.

M. Barthelemy Saint Hilaire, of the College of France, has refused to take the oath.

Captain Kleber, sentenced to death by court-martial for the affair of the 13th of June, which was commuted to imprisonment for life, has received a pardon from the Prince President, and been set at liberty.

UNITED STATES.

Advices from New York to the 26th ult. state, that at Washington the Senate, in committee of the whole House, had agreed to the amendment in the Deficiency Bill giving 33,000 dollars a trip to the Collins line of steamers, with the proviso that it shall be in the power of Congress at any time after the 31st of December, 1854, to terminate the arrangement for any additional allowance therein provided for, upon giving six months' notice.

The arrival at New York of Mr. T. F. Meagher, one of the persons who was expatriated in 1848, in consequence of having taken part in the attempted Irish insurrection in that year, is announced.

The Kossuth excitement having daily more interesting, at the near approach of the time for holding the conventions for the nomination of candidates. Both parties were to make their choice next month. It was not expected that anything important would be done by Congress, particularly in the House of Representatives, until after the various national conventions of the several states shall have decided who are to be the candidates for the Presidency. Philadelphia had expressed itself most enthusiastically in favour of Mr. Fillmore, the present occupant of the supreme chair; but even his supporters now begin to think they have lost ground by delaying their efforts, while their opponents have been busy canvassing and "stumping" for months past. At Boston Mr Webster had addressed the people on the 24th. He was well received, and his position in the Presidential contest is characterised as highly respectable

On the 22d and 24th ult. the House of Representatives was engaged in the discussion of measures for the suppression of Indian hostilities in the various federal dependencies. It was agreed that some such measure should be placed at the disposal of the inhabitants of New Mexico, Oregon, Texas, and California; but some members suggested that it would be a far better plan to station a sufficient number of properly equipped dragoons in those countries, not only to keep the Indians under subjection, but also to compel the hordes of white desperadoes to obey the laws. It was also said that the Indians are not by any means the only savages who murder and plunder the natives.

From Texas we learn that robberies and murders were increasing to such a frightful extent in the neighbourhood of the Rio Grande, that Americans as well as Mexicans were flying to the interior of Mexico for protection. The numerous outlaws who left the States and took up their abode in Texas prior to her admission into the Union were said to be leagued with Mexican bandits for the purpose of plunder; hence the horrible butcheries which were so frequent.

Kossuth had gone to Niagara Falls for a few days, to recruit his health. The Governor of Boston had disbanded the Roxburgh Light Guards after refusing to turn out as a party of a military escort to the Hungarian Chief on the day of his reception in Boston. Only 1500 dollars were raised for Kossuth in Albany.

SOUTH AMERICA.

Under date May 6, we learn that the President of the Republic of New Granada had issued a message to the Executive and Legislature relative to the Flores expedition against Equador. By this message it appears that, owing to a treaty of peace, offensive and defensive published between New Granada and Equador in 1851, the one power is at all times bound to render military and pecuniary aid to the other in case of foreign invasion. To this end the President has proclaimed that there be raised in New Granada, either by loan or forcibly, the sum of 16,000,000 reals (equal to 2,000,000 dols.), and, further, that 20,000 men should be called to serve under arms to assist the sejoorning republic. The President declares his intention to oppose Flores and all countries rendering him aid, and accuses Peru of fitting out two vessels, and, moreover one, to take part in the expedition. He further states his belief that Flores is merely endeavouring to carry out his revolutionary movement of 1846, and that the object of the present revolution is to re-establish a monarchical government on the South Pacific coast under the old Spanish rule.

From Lima (Peru) we learn that the Peruvian Government had, at the latest date (April 22), issued a decree against the Flores expedition, directing the prefects of the different provinces to take all possible precautions to suppress the preparations for and to this invasion.

The recent overthrow of Rosas in Buenos Ayres, it is expected, will lead to a speedy resumption of mercantile affairs between Chili and the Buenos Ayrean provinces adjoining the frontier. Already purchases for this quarter have been made in the Valparaiso markets.

WEST INDIES.

The advices from Jamaica by the usual monthly steam communication still mention the continued ravages of the smallpox in various localities of the island at the latest date (May 15). The increased mortality arising from this loathsome disease prevailed especially among the poorer classes, who suffered to an appalling extent in consequence of their inability to procure the necessary attendance, medicines, and nourishment. In the city of Kingston there had been several fatal cases. The measles had also made their appearance, and several cases had been reported. The weather, which had hitherto been exceedingly sultry, accompanied with a great drought, seemed about to change, and a little rain had fallen, creating hopes of an improvement in the public health.

The fever was on the decrease at Demerara.

The accounts from Barbadoes are of the most satisfactory character, not alone as regards the present sugar crop of the island, but also of the prospects of that now on the ground, and to be reaped next season.

The Trinidad papers record the decease of the recently installed Roman Catholic Archbishop of that island. This prelate was greatly regretted by the Roman Catholic population throughout the colony.

From Mexico we learn that at Vera Cruz, on the 9th of May, a telegraphic despatch addressed to the British Vice-Consul was received from the capital announcing that the city was in a state of revolution; the details of the outbreak have not, however, reached us.

AUSTRALIA.

According to the latest accounts from Victoria (Port Phillip), which come down to the third week in February, matters were assuming a very unsatisfactory character there. The scarcity of water, in consequence of the prevalent drought, rendered it impossible to work with advantageous results at the Mount Alexander gold fields: and, in the absence of general success, the most serious outrages were becoming frequent. The demand for protection on the part of the well-disposed seems to have been urgent but the Government; instead of meeting it by sending a small but well-organised band of constables at any cost, are described as having irritated the people by doing nothing except suffering an impression to get abroad that they were disposed to rely upon an expected arrival of soldiers The receipts by the last escort from Mount Alexander had been 14,000 oz.

New and richer discoveries, however, had just been made, which had drawn the miners from the capital (Melbourne). The Aberfoyle had sailed on the 10th of February with 40,272 ounces of gold, which, at the London price of £4 per ounce, gives a value of £161,088; the Northumberland had also sailed for London with 2181 bales of wool, and the Syrra with 1749 bales.

From the New South Wales district the accounts describe a steady yield of gold, although, owing to the Turon and Ophir deposits being still flooded, it failed to show the increase which might have been anticipated. The amount brought by the escort and mail was 10,039 ounces for the week ending 14th February, and 5385 ounces for that ending 21st February, the total value being about £60,000. The largest sums obtained at present were from Braidwood, and an instance is mentioned of a single individual getting 130 ounces in one day. Sofala and Meroo were the next places in point of importance, while from the Turon and Ophir districts the contributions were altogether insignificant. The subsidence of the waters, however, was expected soon to take place, and the belief was that large results would then be reported. The price of gold had recovered, and had reached 67s. 2d. per ounce, but there was subsequently a reaction to 65s. 6d., the banks having ceased to make advances. Among the recent departures of shipping had been the Regina, with 10,268 ounces of gold, and the Wandsworth, with 20,808 ounces, the total value being about £100,000. Up to the latest date the aggregate shipped from Sydney amounted to £819,953.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE

By the monthly mail screw steam-ship Hellespont we have intelligence to May 2, from which it would appear there is very little prospect at present of the close of the war with the Kaffirs, for we find that they had at that date raided throughout the Amatola, and had gone back to the Waterkloof, where Macomo was in command, and had been joined by a large number of Hottentot rebels. The Kaffirs showed still a spirit unsubdued in all their rencontres with our troops, and fought with as much fierceness and energy as ever. It was reported that Sir Harry Catheart, however, would soon tell powerfully upon them. He had directed that the cattle of the Kaffirs should not be captured, but destroyed. One of the most important actions of the few previous weeks had been the capture of the principal chief of the hostile chief Stock, who had been known to have sought to corrupt some of the friendly chiefs. They had been brought to King William's Town, and had been ordered to be hanged by General Cathcart, and the gallows for that purpose had been erected, and appeared to have been regarded with terror by the Kaffirs

General Cathcart had met with an accident by a fall from his horse, and had injured his head, which had disabled him for a few days. He had quickly recovered, however; and on the 28th of April was to leave King William's Town for Fort Beaufort, to attack the Kaffirs and Hottentots in the Waterkloof on the 29th, leading and directing the troops in person. As Macomo's force was very considerable, the action was expected to be a very severe one. The troops were generally healthy and in high spirits.

A correspondent at Cape Town, writing under date of May 2d, says:—"General Cathcart is proceeding with a degree of determination and energy that will very soon, I have no doubt, bring matters on the frontiers to a termination."

Mr. Montague, Secretary to the Government, has come home in the Hydaspes, on sick leave, and it is thought will not return to the colony. Mr Southey, Civil Commissioner of Swellendam, is to do the duty of Mr. Montague during his absence.

MEAGHER, THE EXILE OF '48.—The New York Courier and Inquirer gives the following account of the escape from Van Diemen's Land of Mr. Meagher, whose arrival at New York is noticed in another place: "For some years previous to February last arrangements were in progress, by which, if successful, the exiles, nine in number, were to be taken from Van Diemen's Land and brought to our shores In January the arrangements were completed, when it was found that in consequence of their residing so far apart (some ten miles), it would be impracticable to get them all off at one time, and their friends, though reluctantly, were obliged to confine their operations to effecting the release of Mr. Meagher, as his position gave him peculiar advantages. Everything being in readiness, early in February Mr. Meagher sent his 'parole of honour' to the magistrate, with the promise that he would consider himself bound by it for two hours after its delivery, and no longer. On receiving it the magistrate gave immediate orders to the constable in Bothwell (where Mr. Meagher resided) to arrest him without delay. This the constable refused to do, stating that he was himself an Irishman, and would do nothing to hinder Meagher's escape. This placed the magistrate in a position somewhat unpleasant, as there was not another officer within twenty-four miles. He, however, mounted horse, and proceeded to the nearest point, for the purpose of bringing back an officer to take charge of Mr. Meagher, who waited for his return until the time promised had expired, after which he took horse and proceeded in an opposite direction, in which course he is said to have travelled as fast as his horse could carry him, for over 100 miles, on to the point where his friends had another conveyance in waiting. After reaching Pernambuco, he is said to have been taken on board the brig Acorn, on the 23d of April, and by her brought to this port."

MAILS FOR THE FALKLAND ISLANDS.—The following notice has been issued by command of the Postmaster-General:—"Mails for the Falkland Islands will hereafter be made up at this office on the morning of the 5th of every month, for conveyance, by the Brazil packet, to Monte Video, from whence they will be transmitted by a sailing packet, provided under a contract which has been entered into between her Majesty's Government and the Falkland Islands Company. Letters for the Falkland Islands will be liable to the usual colonial packet rate of 1s. when not exceeding half an ounce in weight, and 2s. when not exceeding an ounce, and so on; and this postage must be paid in advance, or the letters cannot be forwarded. Newspapers will be conveyed free from charge."

The Royal West India Mail Steam-Packet Company purpose making Jamaica their chief coaling depôt abroad, instead of the present one, St. Thomas; because larger quantities of coal can be stored, and greater facilities exist for coaling steamers at the former island than at the latter. The large steamers will, therefore, run between Southampton and Jamaica. This arrangement, in connexion with the branch line of steamers which the West India Company are about to put on between Jamaica, Savannah, and Chagres, will be of very considerable benefit to Jamaica.

The Cape of Good Hope and India Mail Screw Steam-Packet Company, it is stated, do not purpose that their vessels shall call at Southampton for the present.

A small property sold on Tuesday, in the Encumbered Estates Court, Dublin, consisting of a freehold in the county of Longford, of 240 acres, yielding a net income of £220 a year, was purchased for £3860, by Dr. M'Cann, of Parliament-street, London.

MR. DISRAELI AND HIS CONSTITUENTS.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has issued an address to his constituents, the electors of Buckinghamshire, which appears to have been drawn up with all the care of a State document.

Mr. Disraeli begins by observing of the present aspect of affairs, that—

> The occasion is critical, and it is as well to disentangle, from the misrepresentations of ignorant or interested persons, what is really at stake
> In 1842, Sir Robert Peel, at the head of the Conservative party, converted a considerable and continuous deficiency in the public revenue into a surplus, by the imposition of an Income-tax, which also permitted him greatly to mitigate our tariff.
> These measures realised all the success which the Conservative party anticipated from them. In the course of four years £7 000,000 of Customs duties were repealed, without materially diminishing the revenue derived from that branch, and no domestic interest in the country suffered from the change
> The principles on which these alterations were effected were the removal of prohibitions, the reduction of duties to such a scale as admitted "fair competition" with domestic produce, and the free admission of all raw materials.
> I had the satisfaction of voting for these measures in company with those gentlemen who now honour the present Government with their support.
> Since the four years, closing with 1845, during which the Conservative party carried those wise and beneficial measures, two great changes in our commercial system have taken place—the free introduction of foreign corn and of slave-grown sugar.
> The first of these arrangements was not originally contemplated in the commercial policy of Sir Robert Peel, for he opposed the repeal of the Corn Laws within a few months previously to his abrogating them. When he recommended the second, it was to meet an emergency; and he stated to Lord George Bentinck, in my hearing, that he believed that repeal would not materially affect the prices of agricultural produce.
> The admission of slave-grown sugar was not approved of by Sir Robert Peel.
> These two measures, unlike the preceding ones, have occasioned severe suffering among the producing classes which they affect. The distress of the agricultural classes has been admitted, announced, and deplored from the Throne, under the advice of a Whig Ministry; and the consequences of the alteration of the sugar duties were so disastrous to our free producing colonies, that, within the short space of the passing of the act of 1846, a Whig Ministry also found it necessary to modify their own measure.
> The sufferings of the agricultural and colonial classes have arisen from their being subjected to unlimited competition with foreign labour on equal terms with the rest of their fellow-subjects. Those unequal conditions result in great measure from the peculiar imposts and the vexatious regulations to which our agricultural and sugar-producing industries are subject.
> The same precipitation which attended the repeal of the protective duties on corn and sugar accompanied the repeal of the Navigation Laws. Even the proposers of that measure now admit that "our shipping interest, exposed to severe rivalry, is subject to burdens and restrictions which impede its prosperity."

With respect to any remedy for their grievances which the agriculturists might be led to hope for in the shape of Protection, the right hon. gentleman has taken care to be especially explicit, in stating that all expectation of a recurrence to that exploded system is utterly vain and futile; for he says that—

> The time has gone by when the injuries which the great producing interests endure can be alleviated or removed by a recurrence to the laws which, previously to 1846, protected them from such calamities. The spirit of the age bends to free intercourse, and no statesman can disregard with impunity the genius of the epoch in which he lives.

This very unequivocal abandonment by the Protectionist leader in the Lower House of those principles of fiscal and commercial policy with which his name and his party have been hitherto identified, is sought to be made palatable to his followers by the following:—

> But every principle of abstract justice, and every consideration of high policy, connect that the producer should be treated as fairly as the consumer, and intimate that when the native producer is thrown into unrestricted competition with foreign rivals it is the duty of the Legislature in every way to diminish, certainly not to increase, the cost of production
> It is the intention of her Majesty's Ministers to recommend to Parliament, as soon as it is in their power, measures which may effect this end.

One of the soundest means, among others, by which this result may be accomplished is a revision of our taxation. The times are favourable to such an undertaking; juster notions of taxation are more prevalent than heretofore; reforming ideas are stirring, which have rendered new generations ripe for reliance, and altered the complexion of the fiscal world; and the possibility of greatly relieving the burdens of the community, both by adjustment and reduction, seems to open in the future.

But nothing great can be effected by any Ministry unless they are supported by a powerful majority in Parliament.

> After referring to the measures which the present Ministry have passed during their tenure of office, the right honourable gentleman proceeds to observe, with respect to the prominent questions of the day, of a religious and educational character, that—
> The time of the House of Commons has been much occupied of late by a discussion whether the management of the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth should be a question of legislation. Without prejudging the question, her Majesty's Ministers have felt it their duty to support such an inquiry. We have been anxious to subdue the heat of religious controversy, and to deal impartially with all her Majesty's subjects, whether in communion with the Church of England or the Church of England; but we cannot sanction an opinion now in vogue, that since the act of 1829 the Constitution of this country has ceased to be Protestant. By the act of Settlement, our form of Government is that of a Protestant Monarchy; and it is our belief that the people of this country are resolved so to maintain it, not only in form, but in spirit
> Various measures have been devised for the extension and improvement of the education of the people; and, among others, a measure was proposed by an intelligent community, during the present session of Parliament, to the principles of which we could not be opposed. Yet the principle in the present diversity of religious opinion which seems to be just, is that of encouraging the voluntary efforts of the several religious bodies by grants of public money in proportion to the extent of their exertions. These efforts have been made. In asserting for all this universal right, we claim for the Church, the national depository of sacred truth, that the freedom of her efforts in the cause of education should not be fettered by regulations and restrictions which are not required to afford security for a due application of the public funds.

THE PROTESTANT ALLIANCE.

The first annual meeting of the association formed in accordance with the resolutions passed at the great meeting held at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, on the 25th of June last year, for the purpose of resisting the encroachments of Popery, took place in the same building on Saturday last. The chair was taken by the Earl of Shaftesbury. Amongst those who were present were the Earl of Cavan, Lord Roden, Honourable and Rev. B. W. Noel, Rev. Hugh Stowell, Charles Fewen, Esq., M.P., Mr. O'Malley, Q.C., Col Alexander, Sir C. E. Eardley, Bart., Rev. Dr. Scoresby, Hon. A. Kinnaird, M.P., Sir W. Verner, M.P., Rear-Admiral Harcourt, &c.

The noble chairman stated that the report of the association having been read, the following resolution, moved by Mr. Bevan, and seconded by the Earl of Roden, was unanimously agreed to: "That the report now read be received and published, and under the direction of the committee; and that, having heard with satisfaction the results of the efforts of the Protestant Alliance during the past year, this meeting pledges itself to enhance upon the blessing of God, to endeavour in every possible way to deepen and extend that spirit of union amongst Protestants which alone can enable them effectually to resist the machinations of Rome."

Mr. Thompson, a deputation from Scotland, moved the second resolution:—"That this meeting, being fully persuaded that British Christians are becoming increasingly alive to the encroachments of the Church of Rome, and that the national repugnance to the endowment of Maynooth has been strengthened by the late discussions concerning it, desires to reiterate the firm and persevering demand of the Protestants of Great Britain, that the Maynooth Endowment Act be repealed, with a due regard to existing interests—that all national encouragement and support given to Popery be discontinued—that rank and precedence be not conceded to Romish ecclesiastics—and that all conventual establishments be subjected to inspection and control by law." Mr. O'Malley, Q.C., having seconded it, it was also agreed to.

On the motion of Sir C. Eardley, Bart., the following resolution was carried with acclamation:—"That the recent aggressions of Popery on the Continent of Europe, the persecutions suffered by foreign Protestants, and the insults offered to British subjects by the authorities of Governments under the influence of Rome, have aroused the indignation of British Protestants against Popery as an engine of tyranny and despotism, and have increased their abhorrence of it as a system of superstition and idolatry; and that this meeting, therefore, would extend, as far as possible, the sympathy and support of British Christians to those who are persecuted for the cause of the Gospel, and would use every legitimate effort to promote religious liberty all over the world."

Thanks having been voted to the noble chairman, the meeting separated.

It is stated that the Right Honourable David Boyle, late Lord Justice-General, and President of the Court of Session, to whom her Majesty offered the title of Baronet on his retiring from office, has respectfully begged liberty to decline the dignity.

The total number of British ships trading between the United Kingdom and the East Indies and China, which entered inwards in 1849, was 602, with tonnage 314,833; and cleared outwards 605, with 303,400 tonnage. In 1850, entered inwards 648, with 335,252 tonnage; and cleared outwards 647, with 337,631 tonnage. In 1851, entered inwards 689, with 365,675 tonnage; and cleared outwards 680, with 358,976 tonnage.

OPENING OF WEST HARTLEPOOL NEW DOCK.

TUESDAY week, the 1st of June, was "made glorious" at West Hartlepool" by the public inauguration of the extensive New Dock at this rapidly-increasing port, near the south-eastern extremity of the county of Durham. No port in the kingdom, we believe, has advanced so rapidly as West Hartlepool; and it owes its unprecedented progress in an eminent degree to the spirit, enterprise, and perseverance of R. W. Jackson, Esq., the respected and able Chairman of the Dock and Harbour Company, and of the Stockton and Hartlepool Railway Company. The harbour and dock accommodation at West Hartlepool now amounts to 66 acres; and such is the prospect of increased traffic to and from the port, that it is in contemplation to even make more new docks, and to effect other improvements that may make the Bay of Hartlepool a complete harbour of refuge on the north-east coast. Quoting from a public announcement before us, we may add: "a most direct and convenient line of railway communication is completed by the Leeds Northern Railway between the West Harbour and Docks and Leeds, and Leeds, Bradford, Huddersfield, Manchester, and all the manufacturing towns of the West Riding of Yorkshire and South Lancashire making the distance to Leeds 72 miles from the West Harbour and Docks, which are situated on the open sea, and have no river navigation. Powerful steam-boats for passengers, merchandise, and cattle, in communication with Leeds, Manchester, and the manufacturing districts of England will sail weekly each way between West Hartlepool and Hamburg, Rotterdam, Antwerp, and Scotland."

The following is an outline of the important works already completed at West Hartlepool:—

The West Harbour has been enlarged from 13 acres to 44 acres: the first dock contains 8 acres; the second or new dock 14 acres; total, 66 acres; and capable of receiving 500 sail of ships at one time.

The lock entrance to the new second dock from the harbour is 60 feet wide, which is available for a large class o steam-vessels.

The depths of water in the West Harbour are:—Neap tides, 14 to 15 feet; spring tides, 19 to 20 feet. Ships will always be afloat in the docks with 23 feet of water if required.

The Graving Dock (leading out of the new second dock) is of the following dimensions:—Length, 320 feet; width of entrance, 60 feet; breadth of bottom, 37 feet; ditto at top, 72 feet; height from the bottom, 21 feet.

The workmanship is throughout excellent. The immense blocks of stone of which the walls are built, the ponderous iron gates, and the engineering skill displayed in the whole construction, are worthy of admiration.

The opening was fixed for the 1st of June, that being the anniversary of Earl Howe's naval victory fifty years since. It was also the day upon which the former dock was opened. The weather was a little showery, but not to the inconvenience of the vast multitude who thronged from all parts of the county to witness the imposing ceremony. Not less than 25,000 people were present, the greater portion of whom had been brought by railway. The town presented the appearance of a fair, and the people were clad in the gayest holiday attire.

The preparations for the opening were very effective. The vessels in the older portion of the harbour and in the bay all had their colours hoisted—some, indeed, were almost covered with flags; innumerable union jacks, banners, and colours floated from different public and private edifices; and added to these were the charms of music, and, at stated intervals, the loud-mouthed voices of a number of carronades. The shops of the town were closed, and the day was kept as a complete holiday.

The Dock was formally opened at about three o'clock, when a salute of twelve cannon was fired. The procession commenced from sea, and moved in the following order through the 60 feet entrance into the new Dock.

1. The Company's Lifeboat, manned by sixteen fine looking fellows, pilots of the West Dock and Harbour. They rode gallantly through the opening, with steady stroke, amidst the almost deathless silence of the multitude, who looked upon these fine fellows as "bravest of the brave." They had rescued sixty-one of their fellow-creatures from death amidst the storms of the ocean, risking their own lives in the attempt. After rowing round the Dock, they took their station in the middle, stood up, and gave three hearty cheers, which were heartily responded to by the multitude.
2. The Company's harbour steam-boat West Dock, with officers of the Company.
3. The steam boat Pilot, with the Master and Brethren of the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.
4. The ship Vulcan, towed by the Company's harbour steam-boat Ranger, entering to load for Hamburg, and having the Chairman, Directors, and friends on board.
5. The ship Victory, towed by the Company's harbour steam-boat Hercules, and entering to load for Hamburg.
6. The Niger, towed by the Royal Victoria, and entering to load for Hamburg.
7. The ship Leo, towed by the Royal Albert, and entering to load for London.
8. The ship Remembrancer, entering to load for Hamburg.
9. The screw steam-ship Shamrock, plying between West Hartlepool and Hamburg.
10. The screw steam ship Ann, plying between West Hartlepool and Rotterdam.
11. The ship John and Richard, entering to load for Cronstadt.
12. The ship La Venus, entering to load for France.
13. The Atalanta, entering with a cargo of corn from Hamburg.
14. The schooner yacht Giana, R.Y.S.—R. Ward Jackson, Esq.

Followed by numerous steam-boats and other vessels, with parties from Newcastle, Sunderland, Stockton, and other ports.

Immediately after the ceremony of opening, lunch was served in a commodious marquée erected for the purpose, almost immediately in front of the Dock Office. About 400 gentlemen accepted the invitation of the Directors. Ralph Ward Jackson, Esq., presided on an elevated platform which ran along from end to end of the marquée—the other tables being placed in front of it, and at right angles to it. On his right sat Thomas Constable, Esq., chairman of the Leeds Northern Railway; and on his left, G. H. Chappel, Esq., director of the London and North-Western. There were among the company many eminent merchants, bankers, and manufacturers, from Leeds, Bradford, Manchester, and other places, the brethren of the Trinity-house, Newcastle, &c. The choir consisted of Messrs. Hemingway, Kaye, Martin, Barker, and Barker, jun., and after each toast they sang in a very excellent and effective manner. The wines, supplied by Mr. W. Graham, jun., of Stockton-on-Tees, were of excellent quality.

Well may it be said of Mr. Jackson and his coadjutors, "That whilst they feasted all the rich, they ne'er forgot the poor;" for after the festive proceedings which we have just recorded, nearly a thousand labouring men, excavators and others, who had been employed in the construction of the Docks, were bountifully entertained in the pavilion. Later in the evening there were a ball at the Athenæum, a display of fireworks, and other demonstrations of rejoicing.

On Wednesday, the wind, which began to blow from the south on the preceding day, brought up to the Bay of Hartlepool several hundreds of vessels that had been detained in Yarmouth Roads, Burlington Bay, &c.; and the scene presented in the harbour and bay was one of animated magnificence. We believe that no less than two hundred vessels entered the Docks, where they found ample accommodation for loading and unloading their cargoes.

The New Docks have two entrances—one 60 feet wide, from the old dock; and the other 60 feet wide, from the harbour. These entrances are provided with dock-gates of a novel construction, which has been recently made the subject of a patent. The peculiarity consists in their being made entirely of wrought-iron plates, in the form of a water-tight caisson, by which the constructive principle of the Britannia Tubular Bridge is applied, and the greatest strength is secured by the smallest expenditure of materials; and the gates being at the same time made hollow and water-tight, are buoyant, and move with the greatest ease when being opened or shut. They have been executed by Messrs. Simpson, of Pimlico, from the designs of the Dock Company's engineer; and our Sketch shows them in the act of being opened, a part of one gate being represented as cut off, to show the internal construction.

MR. GOULD'S COLLECTION OF HUMMING-BIRDS IN THE ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS, REGENT'S PARK.

THIS celebrated collection, which added so extensively to the attractions presented by the Zoological Society to their myriad visitors during last summer, has been recently re-opened on a new site, with the manifest improvement of no extra charge being made to the public for admission to it. The liberal spirit in which this change has been effected evinces a true desire, both on the part of the Society and of Mr. Gould, to meet the increasing taste of all classes for the cultivation of natural history, and therefore deserves our warmest commendation. The career of Mr. Gould has secured for him a place in the history of zoological literature which entitles him to a place in our gallery of portraits.

Mr. John Gould was born at Lyme, in Dorsetshire, on the 14th of September, 1804. At a very early age he evinced a strong desire for the study of nature; a desire which, we presume, may be termed innate, since no favourable opportunity presented itself by which it was called forth, neither had any inclination of the kind been manifested by any of the immediate members of his family. The interval between the 14th and 20th years of his age was spent under the fostering care of the late John Townsend Alton, Esq., at the Royal gardens at Windsor, where a taste for botany and floriculture was added to his previous bent for zoology. Shortly after this he was induced to remove to London, as a field likely to afford a wider and more successful scope for his studies.

In the early part of 1830 a fine series of birds from the hill countries of India came into his possession. As this was the first collection of any extent which had been sent to this country from the great Himalayan range, most of the species comprised therein were new to science; and for this reason Mr. Gould was advised by the late Mr. Vigors to attempt the delineation and description of one hundred species, under the title of "A Century of Birds from the Himalaya Mountains." This advice was followed, and the first part of a work, from the appearance of which dates the commencement of Mr. Gould's career as an ornithologist, was published on the 1st of January, 1831. The success of this work was far greater than could have been anticipated—so much so, indeed, as to induce Mr. Gould to commence another of a much more extensive and important character on the Birds of Europe, illustrated in 450 plates, forming five folio volumes. During the progress of this latter work the author's attention was directed to the South American group of Toucans, mainly from the circumstance of a living example being then in the possession of his friend Mr. Vigors. The study of this group induced him more than once to visit the principal museums of central Europe, in order to acquire the requisite information for a "monograph of the Ramphastidæ." This being finished, he published a similar monograph of the Tropenidæ. These various works having been completed, Mr. Gould, in the spring of 1838, left England for Australia, for the purpose of studying the natural productions of that country, of which previously so little had been made known; the result of his visit being the acquisition of a vast amount of most interesting information which has been duly laid before the public in "The Birds of Australia," in seven folio volumes, comprising figures and descriptions of upwards of 600 species, 300 of which were either new to science or very imperfectly known. Another result of his visit is the work on the Mammals of Australia, now in progress; and which, judging from the portion we have seen, bids fair to be a fit companion to the Birds, at present the most valuable and original of Mr. Gould's varied publications.

JOHN GOULD, ESQ., F.R.S., THE ORNITHOLOGIST.—FROM A LITHOGRAPH BY MAGUIRE.

From the commencement of his career as an ornithologist, Mr. Gould's attention was especially directed to that lovely group, the Trochilidæ, or hummingbirds; but the late Mr. George Loddiges, of Hackney, being at that time engaged in adding to his fine collection, Mr. Gould surrendered the subject in favour of his friend, presuming that at some time or other he would be induced to favour the world with the result of his investigations: premature death having, however, prevented Mr. Loddiges from doing this, if, indeed, he ever contemplated it, Mr. Gould has been induced to resume his study of the subject, and to form the unrivalled collection now exhibiting to the public in the Gardens of the Zoological Society in the Regent's Park. The accompanying Engraving represents the interior of the elegant building erected for their reception, as it appeared in 1851: it has since been slightly altered, to afford greater facilities for the immense number of visitors who now have access to the collection. We give, also, the exterior of the building as it now appears. We must not omit to mention that Mr. Gould is now engaged in illustrating this very exquisite group, in a style commensurate with their beauty: a recently-discovered process having enabled him to represent their metal-like brilliancy, as well as their rich and varied hues, in a manner which must be seen to be duly appreciated.

That the study of natural history, particularly of ornithology, is far greater than is usually admitted, must, we think, be evident when we find that the support conceded to Mr. Gould's publications has been such as to enable him to produce, by his own unaided efforts, a series of works, of which we have only enumerated a part, unrivalled for their extent and beauty. The list of the subscribers, with a copy of which we have been favoured, comprises indeed many of the crowned heads of Europe, the greater portion of her public libraries, and an immense number of the nobility and gentry.

The Portrait is copied, by permission of G. Ransome, Esq., from the Ipswich series of portraits of living scientific men.

The building in which the humming-birds are placed, and which forms the subject of our first Illustration, adjoins the Green Walk which leads from the Tunnel towards the Egyptian House, and that division of the Society's Garden in which the stricter, the stands, the lamppost, and other Artistic animals are crowded together, in such profusion as really astonishes when we take into consideration the difficulty of obtaining them in the first instance; and of preserving them in health within so limited an area in a climate which is so thoroughly unnatural to them.

The whole state of the establishment exhibits a continuance of the vigorous spirit of improvement which has made the Society celebrated throughout Europe; and rich as their collection was before, we are happy to observe that the additions which have been made to it since the close of last season are neither few nor unimportant. There is no period of the year at which the Gardens are more delightfully verdant, nor more abundant in colour, than at the present moment, when the hawthorns have not yet faded, and the rhododendrons are in the full luxuriance of bloom.

week, the fact that the President, in defiance of justice and of law, as well as of public opinion, has effected a forcible seizure of the Château d'Eu, the property of the Orleans family. The pertinacity with which he outrages common decency as well as justice, in his onslaughts on the property of the Princes of Orleans, is a peculiar trait in the President's character. His conduct seems prompted by vindictiveness, rather than by policy; though why he should be vindictive towards a family whose father twice spared his life when he had legally forfeited it, is not explicable to ordinary minds or by ordinary reasoning.

THE case of Mr. Feargus O'Connor merits notice for public, far more than for private, consideration. To preserve society from the dangers consequent upon the personal liberty allowed to a furious madman, would seem to be a matter of police rather than of any other form of law; but, from want of the necessary authority on the part of the police, and in the absence of a friend to take the proper precautions in behalf of this lunatic, a very considerable risk has been incurred, not only by every gentleman in the House of Commons, but by the public in the streets and usual places of resort. It has long been evident that the unfortunate member for Nottingham is labouring under a dangerous lunacy, and his freaks have alternately aroused the laughter, the pity, and the indignation of those who either heard of, or were spectators and victims of them. It is, therefore, fortunate that the House of Commons has at length committed the maniac to custody before life was lost. It seems, however, to be a defect that the police should not be allowed to stand in loco parentis or in loco amicorum in such cases, at this. For two or three months this unfortunate gentleman has been at large, though notoriously and dangerously insane. Had it not been for the offended dignity of the House of Commons, it is probable that he might have so continued until some fatal catastrophe had been the result. If it be not worth the while of the friends and relatives of Mr. O'Connor (we suppose he is not destitute of both) to incur the expense of a writ de lunatico inquirendo, it is surely worth the while of society to take precautions against such perils as are consequent upon the liberty of madmen. The present incarceration of the unfortunate man is purely accidental and exceptional. If the House of Commons were dissolved to-morrow, its powers to keep him in custody would expire, and he would be again let loose, in all probability, more furious than before. We trust, however, that immediate measures will be taken, independently of the House of Commons, to prevent such a result, and that a safe asylum and proper medical care will be immediately provided for this unhappy individual. It is these that he requires, and not the "durance vile" which the Serjeant-at-Arms has afforded him.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

The Queen and the Prince Consort have been dispensing a regal hospitality at Windsor Castle during the past week, visiting the Ascot racecourse on Tuesday and Thursday, and on each day giving magnificent banquets in St. George's Hall to Royal and distinguished guests in the evening.

The Court arrived at Windsor Castle from Buckingham Palace on Monday. Her Majesty and the august party were escorted by a detachment of light dragoons to the terminus of the Great Western Railway, at Paddington, and took their departure by a special train for Windsor, where at the railway station the Queen was received by a guard of honour of the Grenadier Guards, with the band of the regiment.

On Tuesday the Queen and Prince Albert, with the Court, went to Ascot races. The august party quitted the Castle at five minutes past twelve o'clock, in six open landaus and four, and two open pony carriages and four, attended by numerous equerries in waiting. The first carriage conveyed her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess de Montpensier. In the evening her Majesty gave a grand banquet to a numerous party of distinguished guests. The following were present:—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess de Montpensier, the Duchess of Atholl, the Duke and Duchess of Montrose, the Duke of Cleveland, the Duke of Wellington, the Duchess of Sutherland, Monsieur and Madame Van de Weyer, the Spanish Minister, the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter and Lady Mary Cecil, the Marquis of Bath, the Marquis of Abercorn, the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, &c.

On Wednesday the unfavourable weather prevented her Majesty leaving the Castle.

On Thursday the Queen and the Prince, with the Court and a large party, again visited Ascot. The royal cortège consisted of eight carriages and four, with postilions in state scarlet liveries, and numerous outriders on horseback. The Royal party returned to the Castle at ten minutes past five o'clock. In the evening the Queen gave a grand dinner in St. George's Hall, to a circle of upwards of 50 guests. The table was decorated with vases, candelabra, ice-pails, and tureens of gold plate, and opposite the Queen's seat was placed the St. George's candelabrum. At each end of the hall were two lofty buffets, on which were displayed a magnificent selection of gold shields, salvers, cups, vases, tankards, and ornaments, the centre ornament of each buffet being a Goodwood Cup, won by Fleur de Lis (the property of his late Majesty, King William IV.) two successive years—1829 and 1830. Her Majesty had afterwards an evening party.

The Countess of Desart has relieved the Marchioness of Ely in her duties as Lady-in-Waiting to the Queen.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary visited his Royal Highness the Duke of Kent on Saturday, at her residence, Clarence House, St. James's. In the evening, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, accompanied by the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary, honoured Her Majesty's Theatre with her presence. Lady Penny Lord in waiting on the Duchess of Kent, and Lady Suffield and Baron Knesebeck attended the Duchess of Cambridge.

ANNOUNCING MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—It is understood that arrangements are arranged for a matrimonial alliance between the Right Hon. H. Labouchere, M.P., and the amiable and accomplished Lady Mary Howard, youngest sister of the Duchess of Sutherland.

SIR JAMES MATHESON, BART.—In the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of Saturday last, under the head of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, it is stated that Sir James Matheson, M.P., was prevented from attending in consequence of severe indisposition. We are happy to learn that this is not the case, the honourable Baronet having been absent from town on electioneering business, in the north of Scotland.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Vice-Admiral of the Red Robert Jackson died a few days since. The gallant officer saw much service, and was at the landing at Egypt. By the death of this officer, Rear-Admiral Hyde Parker, C.B., the senior Lord of the Admiralty, becomes Vice-Admiral and Captain Superintendent of Haslar Hospital; Sir W. E. Parry becomes Rear-Admiral; and Commander Bruce, the present Commander-in-Chief on the coast of Africa station, is now the senior Captain for promotion.

NEW GUNS FOR THE SERVICE.—Two nine-pounder guns with six-pounder bores, it is to be cast, and then rifled similar to the new rifle now in use, to see if they will fire the shots with more rapidity and certainty than those in present use.

A number of workmen at Woolwich have commenced laying the blocks under the same slip from which the Agamemnon, 90, was launched the 22d ult., for the purpose of immediately commencing the building another 90 gun screw steam ship of war, a sister vessel to the Agamemnon, and to be named the Edgar. The blocks are already laid down that half the entire length of her keel, and her timbers are in progress of being converted at the saw-mills.

The following is a return of the number of persons serving under the several denominations and ratings respectively of pet y officers, able seamen, ordin ry seamen, landsmen, and boys, on board her Maj sty's ships and vessels of war on the 1st day of January, 1852:—Petty officers, 4431; able seamen, 11,118; ordinary seamen, 4634; landsmen, 108; boys, 4765: total, 24,919. No bounty whatever is at present payable to seamen for entering the naval service. The bounty paid to privates of the marine corps on enlistment, 2l 3s 17s 6d. The period of enlistment in the Royal Marine corps, twelve years.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE LADIES' CHARITY SCHOOL.—On Wednesday, at Stationers' Hall, there was an innovation on our standing public dinner arrangements, that, we trust, may become the rule, and not the exception. Some 150 ladies and gentlemen were seated in the same board, to celebrate the 150th anniversary of the admirable institution in John-street, Bedford-row, which, under the superintendence of a ladies' committee, provides education, clothing, and maintenance for 51 girls, from all parts of the United Kingdom, whether orphans or not, from eight up to the age of fourteen years; and to make that effecting scene was to be to witness the procession of these interesting children, with their mistresses, round the room, receiving the kind and benevolent regards of the company. A lady write the dinner realised the many scenes, with the children sang in unison in touching style. The appeals on behalf of the school were ably and eloquently enforced by Joan Masterman, Esq., M.P., the chairman; Sir Charles R. Wels, Bart., Sir James Duke, M.P., the Rev. Canon Dale, Mr. Booker, M.P., Mr. Masterman, jun., Mr. Christy, M.P., Mr. J. Venn, Alderman Hooper, &c. There were also present Alderman Cubitt, M.P., Alderman Carden, Sir J. Hodgkinson, Sir J. Shaw, Mr. Butterworth, Mrs. Somes, Mr. J. Somes, Mr. G. Roby (the hon. secretary, Miss Roby, the zealous lady secretary, &c. The donations and subscriptions amounted to £936 15s., amongst which were Miss Burdett Coutts, £100; the Goldsmiths' Company, 10 guineas; the Ironmongers' Company (who liberally also gave the use of their hall), 10 guineas; Mr. Booker, M.P., 20 guineas. The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. Hobbs, with Mrs. Anderson, Messrs. Lockey and Hodges (of the English Glee and Madrigal Union), assisted by Miss Emma Phillips, a young and promising vocalist, the daughter of Mr. H. Phillips, and by Mr. T. Young the counter-tenor. The grace, Rosa's piquant madrigal, "Down in a flowery vale," Mr. John Bull's version of the National Anthem, Dr. Whitfield's glee, "Bird of the wilderness," were excellently rendered. Mr. Harker's voice, as the toastmaster, was [illegible]. We shall give an Engraving of this delightful meeting next week.

ST. MARK'S HOSPITAL.—The anniversary festival of this hospital, which was founded in 1835 for the cure of fistula and other diseases of that nature, was held on Monday, at the Albion Tavern, Aldersgate-street, Mr. Thomas Burrell, M.P., presided, in the absence of the Lord Mayor, who was prevented from attending in consequence of a sudden domestic affliction. Among the company present were Sir Benjamin Hall, Bart., M.P., Sir Peter Laurie, Sir Robert E. Parry, J. Masterman, Esq., M.P.; Henry Heare, Esq., Frederick Salmon, Esq., the surgeon to and founder of the hospital, &c. In order to show the benefits derivable from the institution, it is only necessary to state that in the past year 363 patients had been treated, of whom 322 were discharged cured, and that the total number received since the foundation of the hospital has been 7068. The list of subscriptions announced contained, among others, the following:—The Lord Mayor, £10 10s.; J. Masterman, Esq., M.P., £10 10s.; Messrs. Hoare and Co., £21; the Auxiliary Society of Retired Patients, for the building fund of a new hospital about to be erected, £212 10s.; £212 for the general fund, £31 10s.; W. C. Jones, Esq. (second donation), £105; Matthew Uzielli, Esq. £52 10s.; F. Cazenove, Esq., £21; Mrs. Neale, £21; Sir C. Burrell, £10; G. Hogarth Foster, £31 10s., &c. The total of subscriptions received exceeds £1250.

ST. MARY'S HOSPITAL, PADDINGTON.—On Saturday last the anniversary dinner of this hospital took place at the London Tavern, the Earl of Carlisle in the chair, supported by Dr. Grossett, the warden, and the Misses Motte, J. Elerton, Esq., R. Lambert Jones, Esq.; Rev. A. Campbell, and about 200 other gentlemen. The amount of subscriptions announced was about £3300.

BEER TRADE SOCIETY'S ASYLUM.—The foundation-stone of the proposed asylum which the members of this metropolitan association are about to erect at Peckham was laid on Wednesday, by the Right Hon. Lord Monteagle, F.R.S. The ceremony was commenced and concluded by a short prayer, offered up by the Rev. J. G Stone, M.A., incumbent of St. Mary Magdalen, Peckham. An address was read by Mr. Bishop, which stated that the asylum was intended for aged and deserving members of the Beer Trade but one. The company afterwards repaired to a cold collation, provided by Mr. Wolff, of St. Paul's Churchyard, and the remainder of the day was devoted to a festival in honour of the occasion.

THE FRENCH REFUGEES.—On Tuesday evening, at nine o'clock, a soirée, the proceeds of which are to be given to the refugee fund, was held at the Literary Institution, John-street, Tottenham court-road. Mr. Robert Le Blonde having been called to the chair, read a letter from Viscount Goderich enclosing £10, from M. Mazzini a letter enclosing £1, also letters from Ledru Rollin, Mr. T. Duncombe, M.P., explaining the causes of their absence. A few more preliminary remarks, and the address of the benefit Society at the meeting to rise their efforts for the support of the refugees now in this country. M. Louis Blanc addressed the meeting in English, and spoke in feeling terms of the sufferings endured by the French refugees, and declared that as long as they were by the difference of their language. Having expressed his gratitude for the kindness which his countrymen had experienced, M. Louis Blanc gave way to M. Lefeuil, M. Cadet, and other speakers, the proceedings terminating at a late hour.

DEPARTMENT OF PRACTICAL ART.—On Saturday last Mr. Owen Jones delivered the first of a morning course of four lectures on the leading principles in the decorative arts, in the theatre of the department, at Marlborough House. He discoursed upon the general principles which have prevailed all persect verses in the decorative arts in all [illegible] showed the close connexion which has ever existed between the arts and architecture. He next described the disordered state of the decorative arts at the present time, and the bad consequences, and he now proved the general want of knowledge of the subject on the part of the public, by contrasting the works of art with much happiness and originality of illustration, that art education was indispensable to all classes.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF CHEMISTRY.—The eighth annual general meeting of the above institution was held on Monday, in the laboratory of the college, Oxford street; Benjamin Oliveira, Esq., F.R.S., in the chair. The report showed that the number of students at present on the books was 200. The number entered for the present session is much larger. It is proposed to erect a large lecture-hall at the college. The meeting rendered its best thanks to J. Hoffman for his services, and voted him one of the annual prizes for prosecuting his experiments to an analysis substances. The balance-sheet showed an income of £1188 1s. 2d., including £548 2s. students' fees; and the expenditure was £1077 8s. 10d., leaving a balance in hand of £110 0s. 1d. The debts were £403 15s. 3d. A vote of thanks having been passed to his Royal Highness Prince Albert as patron, and thanks having also been given to B. B. Cabbell, Esq., the treasurer, and to the chairman the business terminated.

ROYAL BOTANIC GARDENS, REGENT'S PARK.—The second exhibition of American flowers took place at these gardens on Saturday last. The great attraction of the day, in respect of flowers, was the collection of rhododendrons and azaleas, which, though not yet fully in bloom, presented a beautiful. The fragrance of the different flowers in bloom was delicious. Amongst the company present were the Duke of Norfolk, the Duke of Beaufort, the Earl of Stamford and Warrington, Lord Ashburton, Lord Dover, Lord Dowding, Lady March, Sir R. I. Murchison, Major General Bourchier, the Bishop of Chester, Lord Binney, Lady Desart, Lady Adela Norton, Lord Shelburne, &c. The exhibition held on Wednesday was, in consequence of the unfavourable weather of the day, very thinly attended. The usual number of prizes was awarded.

LIBRARIES FOR THE WORKING CLASSES.—Upwards of 100 of the parishioners of St. Martin's-in-the-fields met at the Vestry Hall, H. Hall, Esq., on Wednesday evening, to inaugurate the establishment of a library and reading room for their use, in the building of the Northern Schools, Castle-street, Long-acre. The rev. gentleman was supported by the Rev. Sir Henry Dowley, Vicar; Ingestre, Sir Walter James, Bart., the Rev. T. Jackson (canon of St. Paul's Cathedral), and several other clergymen and gentlemen. After the company had partaken of refreshments, the vicar delivered an appropriate address on the course of which he announced a valuable collection of books from her Royal Highness Prince Albert, a donation of £5 from the Lord Bishop of London, and Hubers expressing sympathy and countenance from the Earl of Carlisle, Viscount Goderich, Lord J. Russell, &c. &c. It was proposed from the New Palace-yard of 100 feet, and the clear distance from the bridge, supposing it to be 70 feet wide, to the Speaker's house would be 120 feet. Mr. Walker mentioned that Messrs. Cubitt and Co. have offered to build a temporary bridge in one year.

VENTILATING AND LIGHTING THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—The second report from the select committee on the ventilation and lighting of the House of Commons contains the following suggestion:—"As regards future improvement, the entire responsibility of ventilating and lighting the House and its appendages should be confided to one competent person, under the direction and superv sion of the Board of Works, and with a view to secure proper attention to any complaints that may hereafter arise, a committee shou d be named at the commencement of each session, to confer with the Board of Works upon any measures that may appear necessary to remove such complaints."

NEW RIVER COMPANY.—The committee on the Metropolis Water Bill have passed the preamble of this bill for improving the supply of water, the expense for making the several works for which is estimated at £276,350

FIRE IN LAMBETH.—On Wednesday morning, between two and three o'clock, a fire, attended with the destruction of property valued at some thousand pounds, suddenly burst forth from a long range of premises situate between Bonnett-street and Stamford-street, Blackfriars-road. The principal building was occupied by Mr. Saxton, a timber merchant. In spite of the most strenuous exertions of the firemen the flames were not entirely extinguished until an advanced hour of the morning. The premises in which the disaster commenced were all but gutted, and a great number of those adjoining were seriously damaged.

THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH COMPANIES.—On Wednesday, the Parliamentary committee, of which the Right Honourable Lord Dalkeith is the chairman, declared that the president of the British Electric Telegraph Company's Bill had been proved.

METROPOLITAN SEWERS COMMISSION.—It is stated that the Lord Chancellor has appointed Richard Jebb, Esq., of Old-square, Lincoln's-inn, as chairman of the commission. This gent eman is a near relative to Lieutenant-Colonel Jebb, R.E., Surveyor-general of Prisons.

FIRE AT MESSRS. CLOWES'S PRINTING-OFFICE.—On Thursday a destructive fire occurred on the extensive premises of Messrs. Clowes, the well-known printers, in Duke-street, Black riars. The flames were first discovered on the premises to the right of the entrance gateway, in Duke-street, at about ten minutes past one, and immediately after the workmen had left for dinner; and so rapid was the progress of the fire, that in less than ten minutes from the commencement the whole of the large block of buildings was enveloped in flames. On the premises destroyed was a large quantity of paper in reams, and the whole of the printed stock of the firm, comprising several extensive works ready for binding. There were also destroyed the six hydraulic presses, valued at nearly £2000. In one of the rooms was also a large assortment of type, which has been irretrievably damaged. It is impossible to estimate the loss by the conflagration, the books in sheets forming a large amount, and which it will be impossible to replace without great loss of time. We are happy to add, that by the timely aid of nine engines the fire was confined to the block of buildings in which it originated. The premises were insured in the Sun, Royal Exchange, Phœnix, and Westminster offices.

A MISERABLE HABITATION.—On Wednesday an inquest was held at the Cottage of Content Tavern, Lock's fields, Walworth, on the body of Sarah Byerley, aged five weeks, the child of a married woman, who, with a family of a wife and four children, had occupied as a habitation for the last five years a caravan, now standing in a cow-yard in Lock's-fields, for which he paid 1s. 6d. a week rent; their chief food being dry bread and tea, with meat occasionally upon Sundays. The deceased was found dead on Tuesday morning by the side of her mother, who had put her to bed on the previous night apparently in good health. It was stated at the inquest that the residence of the poor persons was not even fit for swine. Verdict, "Natural death." Proceedings are being taken to indict the owner of the caravan.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—The births registered in the metropolis for the week ending Saturday, June 5, were—Males, 814; females, 742: total, 1556. The deaths during the same period were—Males, 525; females, 478: total, 1003. The increase on the previous week, in which the number was only 883. A comparison of facts in the last two returns shows a increase in some epidemic complaints: namely, measles, which rose from 15 deaths in the preceding week to 23 in the last; diarrhœa, which rose from 13 to 20; typhus, in which the numbers were respectively 38 and 49; whilst scarlatina increased from 41 to 63. Pneumonia also rose from 45 to 58; whilst the mortality of bronchitis was stationary. Positive suddenness seems to be a remarkable feature in 19 to 130 cases. In the last week 40 persons died from smallpox, 32 being children, and 8 of 15 years of age and upwards. Five of the sufferers had been previously vaccinated: their ages were 6 months, and 5, 15, 30, and 35 years.

METROPOLITAN OBSERVATIONS.—At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean height of the barometer in the week was 29·687 inches. The weather was cold, the mean temperature of the week having been only 52·6 deg., which is 5·7 deg. below the average of the corresponding weeks of ten years. The mean daily temperature was below the average on every day of the week, and the extent of this depression varied from 9 deg. on Sunday to 4 on Wednesday, and from 6 deg. on Tuesday to 2 on Saturday. The wind blew generally from the south-west and south; and the amount of rain that fell in the week was 0·16 inches.

OXFORD BATHS AND WASH-HOUSES.—SERIOUS ACCIDENT.

On Monday the public baths and wash-houses which have recently been completed in Oxford were opened to the public, and the event was commemorated by a meeting of the committee and subscribers, within the walls of the establishment. P. Duncan, Esq., of New College, who had given about £1200 towards the carrying out of this undertaking, attended to assist at the ceremony of the opening of the establishment and was accompanied by the Vice-Principal of Saint Edmund Hall, the Rev. Richard Lynam, Mr. Alderman Hedley, Mayor, Alderman Butler, Mr. Thorp, Warburton, Brownlow, [illegible] and several other influential parties. Mr. Duncan, in the course of his address to the meeting, offered another donation of £500 towards the liquidation of a debt of £750 that was owing by the establishment.

A melancholy accident, however, occurred, to mar the satisfaction which the event of the day was calculated to diffuse amongst the inhabitants of the city. In about a quarter of an hour after those preliminary proceedings had been finished, a great crash was heard, when it was discovered that the hot water tank had fallen, and that the tall brick shaft on the walls adjoining were thrown down, presenting a desolate heap of ruins upon the very spot where, but a few minutes before, the founders and supporters of the new undertaking were congratulating themselves on the successful termination of their labours. A boy named Burchell was instantaneously killed, and the stoker, Wordsworth, was so severely injured that he died shortly afterwards. About five or six other persons who were employed about the place were more or less injured by the falling of the ruins.

An inquest on the bodies was opened on the following day, before Mr. Brunsden, the city coroner. George Williams, superintendent of the Oxford Waterworks stated his belief that the accident was occasioned by the want of water in the hot water-tank, and that steam [illegible] of cold water than the weight of the cold-water cistern above it. Assuming that to be the case, he said that the natural consequence would be to burst the hot-water plank, and that was what would, in all probability, have occurred in the present instance. The cold pipes in the hot-water cistern had been tested with 23 lb pressure last week for two hours. The inquest is not yet concluded. The parties who were injured are progressing favourably.

STEAMBOAT COLLISION AND LOSS OF LIFE.—Intelligence was received on Tuesday of a steamboat collision having occurred, about two o'clock on Sunday morning, between the Clyde screw steam-ship, belonging to the Caron Company, and a coaster named the Beehive, on the steamer's recent trip from the Thames to Grangemouth, which resulted in the foundering of the smaller vessel and the loss of three lives.

RAILWAY COLLISION AND LOSS OF LIFE.—On Tuesday afternoon, William Walker and John Walker, married men, residing at Brigg, were killed. In consequence of a collision that took place on the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway. The accident was occasioned by the breaking of the piston-rod, disabling the engine of a ballast train which left Grimsby for Sheffield. At the end of the train was a passenger carriage, containing several persons, amongst whom were the two above named, who alone remained in the carriage after the breaking of the rod. Before the luggage train which was in front could be signalled of the danger, a collision took place, which resulted in the destruction of several of the carriages, and the loss of the two lives referred to.

FORCE OF HABIT.—A rather curious instance of the force of habit occurred on Saturday last, at the Custom-house, in the case of a gentleman of one of the workmen employed there. It appears that the men engaged in fixing up the interior of the houses have been in the habit of jumping in and out of the gallery through the front windows, assisted by ropes and pulleys; but recently, however, this favourite way of entrance and exit had been closed, having been filled with large pieces of plate glass. On Thursday (last week) the gentleman referred to, unmindful of the fact, in his [illegible] to the interior of the companions, very coolly took a spring, and cleared the window in fine style, carrying with him in his progress £15 worth of glass. On alighting, he rose by looked like a man making for a crown, and the astonished expression with which he stared at the havoc he had made by his gymnastic exploits would have formed a subject for the pencil of Wilkie.

The Egyptian Government has just concluded a new treaty with England for transit of despatches. From the 1st of July next, the English Post-office will deliver to the Egyptian Government at Alexandria despatches from Great Britain and other countries for India, by which they will be carried in the shortest time by the Egyptian Government steamers and its agents. The despatches from Suez to Alexandria will be carried in the same manner.

A few nights ago an explosion took place in a railway carriage upon the Dublin and Cork line, which, though occasioning great consternation amongst the passengers, was fortunately attended with no serious consequences. It was occasioned by the ignorant ignition of a quantity of detonating blasting powder. Mr. Bruce, a pyrotechnist, was conveying to the Cork Exhibition with a view to act play of fire-works at the opening of the building. [illegible] cautions subsequently made at a police court by one of the passengers, who resulted in Mr. Bruce being fined in the sum of £5 in consequence of his to answer any charge that may be preferred against him.

On Saturday afternoon, about three o'clock, some excitement was created in the Stock Exchange by the appearance of [illegible] endeavouring to permit a City detective of the name of Storey to enter the building, for the purpose of apprehending a young man of respectable connexions who had robbed his employers of considerable property. Immediately upon the arrival of Mr. Storey (street) of a considerable sum of money, and who had taken refuge within the Stock Exchange. After some expostulation with the secretary, who [illegible] him that the gentleman [illegible] search; but in the meantime the offender had escaped by some other entrance.

WINDSOR CASTLE, FROM "THE SLOPES."

WINDSOR CASTLE, FROM "THE SLOPES."

Most of our readers have doubtless seen in the Court Circular (the gossip of the Court at Windsor) the pithy announcement that the "Queen and Prince Albert walked in the Slopes" on such and such a day, without knowing particularly in what part of the Park the Slopes are situated, or what they are like. Our Engraving shows a view in the Slopes, which are on the shelving side of the hill on which Windsor Castle is built, or more definitively on the northern side of the hill, as it is only on this side that the hill rises abruptly, being laid out in walks running in all directions, now skirting the side, and anon winding about. Here are some of the most charming "bits" of scenery it is possible to imagine concentrated in a comparatively limited spot. The trees are of the most luxuriant growth, and of every species, their branches almost sweeping the grassy sides of the hill; and in sunny corners there are little alcoves surrounded by clusters of rich flowering shrubs; whilst seats placed at points where the finest views are to be obtained, invite attention, and indicate the reason of their being in such spots. From the northern terrace the casual visitor to Windsor looks over a great part of the Slopes; in fact, the tops of the tall trees growing in the Slopes under the terrace walls are the foreground to the exquisite view obtained thence over the finely-wooded Home Park, the river to Eton College, and the wide expanse of country beyond. From the shady walks in the Slopes there are many lovely little glimpses of the country, the rich foliage of the trees serving as natural frames to the beautiful little pictures; and looking up the Slopes, the ivy-clad old walls and the tall towers of Windsor Castle are here and there to be seen amidst the foliage, and enhance the beauty of the spot with admirably picturesque effect. Such a glimpse of the Castle is the subject of our Engraving, which represents an angle tower, near the Elizabethan portion of the edifice, and the varied character of the paths is indicated by those shown in the View. The Slopes are continued, in their picturesque character, towards Frogmore, and are everywhere exquisitely laid out. They are, however, not open to the public, but are portions of the Castle demesne set apart for the exclusive use of her Majesty and the Royal family.

In olden times the Slopes were laid out in terraces, a fragment of which still remains. At the foot of the hill, three of the Protestant martyrs in the Marylan persecutions, Parsons, Festwood, and Filmer, were burnt. An engraving of this martyrdom occurs in Fox's "Martyrs," and in it the terraces are plainly indicated, though then there were no trees clothing the hill side. Within the last two or three years great improvements have been made in the scenery of the Slopes, by cutting away some of the trees, and adding to the picturesqueness of the place; and a small stream has been carried at the foot of the hill, winding in an easy though artificial water-course.

RACING SWORDS IN WINDSOR CASTLE.

In the days of our ancestors, in addition to tankards and cups given as prizes at races, there were various other inducements held out for the winner; amongst them were swords, and in the Armoury at Windsor Castle are two silver-hilted broadswords, won at some races in Scotland somewhat more than a century since. We have engraved the hilts of the swords, which are of remarkably good design and character.

THE SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH BETWEEN ENGLAND AND IRELAND.

In our Journal of last week we described the accomplishment of this most desirable means of communication between England and Ireland by an electric telegraph wire stretched across the Channel from Holyhead to Howth. We now give some additional details, with illustrations, of the interesting work.

Very little notice of the intentions of the projectors of this undertaking was given to the public, the Company prudently awaiting the completion of their project before they gave it publicity. At the same time it was known to some public departments and a few individuals. The Admiralty had been applied to for a steamer and an officer to assist in laying down the line; the Prospero, with Lieutenant Aldridge, R.N., had been ordered round to Holyhead from Pembroke; and the Company had requested Captain Beechey, R.N., to assist them by his advice and long experience in the Irish Channel, and to superintend the laying down of the wire in the proper direction.

The rope forming the submarine communication is rather less than an inch in thickness, and contains only a single copper wire for the transmission of the electric fluid: this is enclosed in a double gutta percha tube, and surrounded with twelve galvanised iron wires, which completely protect it from chafing upon the bottom. The length of line actually required was not more than fifty-nine statute miles; but the experience of the Dover and Calais operation had shown that some additional line would be necessary; and, accordingly, eighty miles of it was put on board.

The gutta percha tube had been manufactured by Mr. Samuel Statham, of the Gutta Percha Works, Wharf-road; and the wire by Mr. Newall, of the Iron Wire Manufactory at Gateshead. The weight of the wire when complete was about eighty tons, or a ton per mile.

The whole was embarked on board the Britannia steamer, at Whitehaven, and arrived at Holyhead early on the morning of the 29th of May last.

It was the intention to have run the line across the Channel at once, as everything conspired to favour the project: the weather was fine, the tides (of great importance) were weak, the Prospero and the officers had arrived, and nothing seemed wanting; but, on examining the wire, which had been hastily put on board, it was found that part was defective and would require to be cut out, and also that part of the line required to be re-coiled; it was, in fact, determined, before any attempt was made to lay it down, that every part should be thoroughly tested afresh, so that it was Monday evening, the 31st, before everything was finally prepared. On that evening the continuity of the wire was tested by passing a shock through the whole of the line and discharging a cartridge of powder. The explosion was instantaneous, the fluid passing through the whole length of the coil of wire as it lay piled up in the hold of the vessel—a distance of 401,280 feet—in an instant.

Everything was now ready; but the delay had driven off the time to the approach of the spring tides, which run very strong in the Channel and it was doubted whether the line could be let out sufficiently fast to allow of the vessel making the passage without a great waste of line; and with such a tide, and so small a rope, it was obvious that a check, from the line getting entangled or other impediment, would have broken the cable and been fatal to the measure for that time at least. Much anxiety was in consequence felt; but, after a consultation with Captain Beechey, it was determined to proceed.

Accordingly, at two o'clock in the morning of the 1st of June the steamers started and anchored for awhile off a small bay close under Holyhead Mountain, whence the submarine line was to be connected with the line on shore: this was soon done, and at four o'clock the steamers commenced their interesting course across the Channel—the Prospero, with Captain Beechey and Lieutenant Aldridge on board, leading the way; and the Britannia following close in her track.

At the end of ten miles it had been determined to compare the distance actually gone over with the length of line that had been run out, and if the quantities were not very disproportionate to continue the route; but, if otherwise, the attempt was to be abandoned until after the springs were past. Accordingly signals were exchanged, and it was with no small degree of delight found that, in this ten miles of distance, only twelve miles of line had been expended. The next comparison was 16 miles distance to 20 miles of line; the next, 25 to 31; then 47 to 55. In this manner the comparisons were kept up, the position of the vessel being accurately determined by the measurement of angles between peaks of mountains known to the officers in the Prospero as points which had been determined by the Ordnance survey; the length of line veered out on board the Britannia being registered by a machine attached to the wheel by which it was let out, as shown in the Engraving.

The day was fine, the country on the Welch coast was still in sight, when the Wicklow hills and the land at the back of Dublin and Howth rose above the horizon, and at a little after eight o'clock in the evening the vessels reached their points of destination off Howth pier, having accomplished their task in sixteen hours, during which time they had passed through three tides nearly, viz. two floods and one ebb: but so successfully had these streams been evaded, that the length of line veered out was only 66 statute miles to 59½, the real distance as the crow flies. The average rate of the vessel, therefore, was four statute miles per hour; the greatest depth of water passed over was 84 fathoms.

As the vessels neared Howth, the cheers of the people on the pier welcomed their arrival; and the completion of the undertaking was confirmed by a cannon on board the Britannia, at Howth, being fired by means of the wire from Holyhead; and to apprise the Admiralty of the success, the following message was telegraphed across the Channel:—

Dublin.

From Messrs. Newall and Co. to the Duke of Northumberland.

The submarine telegraph is completed, with the aid of Capt. Beechey and Lieut. Aldridge. Thanks to your Grace.

Thus was accomplished this most ardently wished for communication which was but yesterday, as it were, considered of doubtful practicability And it compels us to remove from our minds much of the doubt we have hitherto entertained as to the possibility of effecting that far greater undertaking, the communication between the continents of Europe and America, which we one day hope to see completed.

From the position of the Britannia off Howth, the wire had to be carried on shore, and connected with the land line from Howth to Dublin for which purpose a thicker wire was used than that across the Channel. When done, and the whole line thought to be complete, and the parties were about to rest from their arduous labours on the following day, it was discovered that the continuity was by some unaccountable means destroyed, and no message could be passed either way between Dublin and Holyhead. The wire to Howth was tested, and found perfect; and on severing the part at the ship, the submarine continuity was also fortunately found perfect; so that the defective portion evidently rested between the ship and the land line, but where, was wholly uncertain; the line between the two places had therefore to be entirely taken up, and examined bit by bit. At last the defective part was discovered, and it appeared to have been occasioned by a spade being driven against the line while burying it in the trench. The labour which this little bit of carelessness, or perhaps ignorance, occasioned, is beyond description, but will be conceived when told that it took a whole day to remedy. All is now happily right, and the telegraph will be open to the public as soon as the necessary arrangements with the various lines in connexion with it can be effected.

The annexed Sketch exhibits the steamers laying out the line when off the lighthouse of the South Stack, which projects from the foot of Holyhead Mountain.

BUILDING AT CORK FOR THE NATIONAL EXHIBITION OF THE ARTS, MANUFACTURES, AND MATERIALS OF IRELAND—(SEE NEXT PAGE)

THE CORK INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION.

(From our own Correspondent.)

BEFORE our paper reaches the hands of our readers, this Exhibition will have been opened in due form by the Lord-Lieutenant, and the good citizens of the "beautiful city," as it is called par excellence, with many a stranger from the surrounding districts, will be crowding its hills; upwards of 4000 season tickets having been sold within four days

The Exhibition is held in the Corn Exchange, a new building. The entrance, or Northern Hall (the C rn Exchange proper), entered from the quays, is 76 feet square and 50 feet high, divided into nave and aisles, the nave rising into a species of clerestory, with elevated side lights. This fine apartment contains in var ous glass cases all the fine texture articles, damask, linens, tabinets, crochet, embroidery, &c.; and here also a tabinet and velves loom are in full operation, showing the process of weaving those articles. From this hall ...s a noble arched entrance, twenty feet wide, descending by the steps into one of the finest rooms in Europe, the Fine Arts Hall, 145 feet by 53 feet, in the centre 65 feet high; it has an arched roof in one span, with laminated timber girders, and a continuous top light in the centre, 8 feet 6 inches at each side. The extreme end is circular, where is placed a noble organ, and an orchestra to contain 200 performers—the latter temporary, to be removed after the first day's performance of the ode. The view from the Northern Hall of this beautiful room, when filled with sculpture and painting, will be beautiful. The united length of these rooms seen at one time is 221 feet, running north and south. Running east and west, adjoining the North Hall, and crossing the Fine Arts Hall, is a transept 320 feet long, by 30 feet wide; adjoining which to the south at each end are halls, each about 130 feet by 80 feet—in all six great halls for the various purposes of the Exhibition, with committee and refreshment rooms, and various offices attached, spacious courts, &c

The Exhibition Building, filled with the various objects of art and industry, now presents a brilliant coup d'œil. The splendid arch of the dome, with its moulded cornice, adorned with shields and banners, supported on retiring columns backed with crimson drapery, overshadows a lengthened perspective of beautiful statuary, gems of art, gushing fountains, and gorgeous fabrics, whose converging lines from floor, wall, and ceiling, meet and concentrate on a magnificent organ

At the rear of the Exhibition Building, and adjoining the southern street, are the Banquet-hall, the Reception-room, &c. The Banquet-hall, which is capable of entertaining five hundred persons, is 80 feet by 70 feet, and 40 feet high, beautifully decorated, and having nine splendid glass lustres to be lighted with gas

The vestibule, which is of a circular form, looks like a splendid eastern pavilion, adorned with rich pink and white hangings, mirrors, and furniture en suite. This, with the great reception-room and ante-room, form a suite of apartments. The vestibule leads into a well proportioned and spacious drawingroom, of a conical form, which is decorated with lively brilliant colours, after the Parisian mode, and "contrives a double debt to pay;" for it serves the double purpose of an ante room for the guests at the banquet, and a supper and promenade-room during the ball. The cornices are ornamented with shields, and vases of flowers, are placed in the niches. It leads by an easy approach and decorated archway into the Banquet-hall and Ball-room. The latter apartment is fitted up with decorations in the French style, of the richest description. The walls are hung with drapery of white and yellow bands, with a showy cornice of the same material. The supporting pillars bear narrow longitudinal stripes of purple and white, and midway from the ground a graceful trophy of arms, shields, and banners forms a striking ornament. The kitchen department reminds one of the olden times; the roasting grate alone is twelve feet long, with hot hearth, charcoal stoves, platform for kettles, &c.

Cork is like a bee-hive—full of life, expectation, energy, hustle, and business; a great impetus has been given to trade; human industry is awake and active.

ARRIVAL OF THEIR EXCELLENCIES THE LORD-LIEUTENANT AND THE COUNTESS OF EGLINTON.

CORK, Wednesday Evening.

Shortly after four o'clock this afternoon, their Excellencies the Lord-Lieutenant and the Countess of Eglinton arrived here by special train on the Great Southern and Western Railway from Dublin, accompanied by a numerous suite and a large number of ladies and gentlemen, amongst whom we observed Lord and Lady Bective, Colonel Campbell, private secretary to his Excellency; Captain Thesiger, aide-de-camp in waiting; Admiral Montgomery, comptroller; Lord Talbot de Malahide, Sir E. Msodonnel, chairman of the company; Sir G. Hudson, Bart.; the Lord and Lady Mayoress of Dublin; Dr. Harrison and E. L. Foote, Esq., hon. secretaries of the Dublin society; Alderman Gresham, and T. N. Gresham, Esq., members of the Dublin committee; W. Dilke and H. Cole, Esq., members of the executive committee of the Great Exhibition of 1851; Herbert Ingram, Esq.; S. C. Hall, Esq.; J. C. Deane, Esq, the hon secretary of the Dublin committee, who has exerted himself most strenously and successfully to ensure the success of the Exhibition; C. P. Roney, Esq.; O. Binger, Esq., superintendent of the Chester and Holyhead Railway, &c.

The train was driven by Mr. George Milne, the engineer-in-chief of the company, and the general arrangements were under the management of the efficient superintendent of the company, Mr. Ilberry.

A very elegant saloon carriage formed out of one of the ordinary carriages of the company, which are remarkable for their excellence and accommodation—had been prepared for the accommodation of the Lord-Lieutenant and suite, by Mr. Coslett, the superintendent of the company's carriage works at Inchicore. The interior of the carriage was elegantly fitted up with sofas, &c, the prevailing colours being blue and gold, and on the exterior were emblazoned the Royal arms and those of their Excellencies and of the company.

At the various stations along the line there were a number of people assembled; but scarcely a cheer was heard until the arrival of the Viceregal party at the Limerick Junction, where a very handsome luncheon was provided by the directors of the railway for his Excellency and suite. After a short stoppage the train proceeded on its route to Cork, where his Excellency and the Countess were received by the Earl of Bandon, Lord Bernard, the Mayor and corporation of Cork, and an escort of military. His Lordship, with the Countess and suite, having been handed to an open carriage, drawn by postilions, a procession was formed, and proceeded through the principal streets of the town, by which the party had a good opportunity of observing alike the poverty and wealth of the "beautiful city." His Lordship, the Countess, and suite then proceeded to the Cork station of the Cork and Bandon Railway, en route to Castle Barnard, the seat of Earl Bandon, where a grand display of fire works was to take place in the evening.

In order that two of the most refining of arts—music and poetry—should not go unrepresented in an Exhibition in which the arts form one of the main attractions, an ode to be sung at the opening, replete with harmony and poetic feeling, has been written by J. F. Waller, Esq.—better known by his writings in the Dublin University Magazine as "John Freke Shaipby," and set to music by Dr. Stewart, conductor of the Dublin University Choral Society. This ode will be sung by 200 voices, principally composed of members of the last-named society, and the Dublin Ancient Concert Society, who have kindly volunteered their services. Copies of the ode, elegantly bound in scarlet morocco and gold, have been forwarded from Dublin for presentation to her Majesty and Prince Albert about the time it is being executed in Cork; and elegantly-bound copies in green and gold were presented to their Excellencies the Lord-Lieutenant and Countess Eglinton on entering the railway carriage, and other copies in blue and gold were also presented to the other distinguished visitors. The music, which is enclosed in a beautiful emblematic border, bears the arms of Cork, and the motto, "The darkest hour is that before the dawn."

The line was through a beautiful country, and we could not fail to notice with gratification the large amount of excellent stock visible along its course.

It is a matter of deep regret that Sir Thomas Deane, Vice-chairman of the executive Committee, who has personally superintended the arrangement of the Fine Arts department, will be prevented from taking part in the ceremony of opening by a severe attack of the gout.

(NEXT week we shall illustrate in a supplementary sheet, with several Engravings, this important industrial gathering, accompanied by a full report of the proceedings.)

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

REPRODUCTIVE PAUPER EMPLOYMENT

The EARL of ELLESMERE presented a petition from the inhabitants of Manchester on the subject of the present system of poor relief, and praying for the Introduction of a system of productive labour for paupers. The noble Earl presented the petition out of respect to his neighbours, but did not wish it to be supposed that he was a supporter of its decisions.

Lord MONTEAGLE said that the question raised in the petition was one very popular with those who took only a one-sided view of it; but in his opinion nothing could be more injurious to the interests of the community, than the course suggested by the petitioners. His objection to their plan of converting the workhouses into a species of manufactories. It was most unjust to the honest and industrious and self-supporting labourer, whom it exposed to the most unfair competition with a set of paupers, who must at any rate be supported at the public expense. Such a system of supporting the poor in workhouses, hospitals, and asylums had depreciated the rate of wages in this metropolis to a great, and, he might even say, an unnatural extent.

After a few words from the Earl of DONOUGHMORE, the petition was laid on the table

The report on the amendments on the Burghs (Scotland) Bill was agreed to after some conversation between the Earl of MINTO and Lord REDESDALE.

RAILWAYS IN CANADA

Earl GREY took an opportunity of declaring his regret that the Government had terminated the negociations which had been going on with a Canadian legislature, respecting the formation of a railway from Halifax to Quebec, and asked whether it was the intention of Ministers to lay before their Lordships any additional correspondence on the subject?

The Earl of DERBY said that the project submitted to the Government, and the only one, he was given to understand, which the Canadian legislature would consent to, was very different from the one which had been originally proposed, and by no means so well calculated to develope the resources of British North America. He thought, therefore, that the Government would not be justified in recommending to the British Parliament to guarantee so large a sum as £3 per cent thereon, without receiving in return some corresponding advantage to the British empire. He should offer no objection to the production of all the correspondence upon this subject.

After a short conversation the matter dropped.

In reply to a question from the Duke of Newcastle, the Earl of DERBY said that Ministers had no intention to change the Upper Chamber of Representatives at the Cape of Good Hope into a nominee instead of an elective assembly.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The House had an early sitting. The Speaker took the chair at noon.

THE STATE OF THE WEST INDIES.

On the question of the report of the Committee of Supply,

Mr. BERNAL called the attention of the Secretary for the Colonies to a subject of great importance. Personal considerations had hitherto withheld him from pressing the state of the West Indies upon her Majesty's Government, because, not being one of its supporters, he was unwilling to do anything having the appearance of a wish to put the position of those colonies had now become serious, if not to be felt considerably, to bring it under their notice, and therefore asked what steps her Majesty's Government contemplated taking in order to provide them with a proper supply of labour?

Sir J. PAKINGTON said, as no notice had been given of the question, he could only give to it a general answer. No one could be more painfully alive to the condition of those islands than he was, but he felt that that condition had been mainly brought about by the policy adopted by this country in the year 1846. Her Majesty's Ministers had stated, on coming into office, that they did not think they could introduce any measure during the present session of Parliament with reference to the West Indies. He had, however, given directions that the necessary information should be prepared without delay, in order that he might immediately devote his attention to the subject, to ascertain what relief could be afforded.

The report of the Committee of Supply was then brought up and agreed to.

The House then again went into committee of supply on the Civil Service Estimates, which occupied the remainder of the morning sitting.

The House adjourned from 4 to 6 o'clock.

In the evening sitting,

RAILWAYS IN CANADA.

In reply to a question from Sir H. Verney, Sir J. PAKINGTON entered into some explanations respecting the letter of Mr. Hincks, which appeared in the Times Journals on the 31st of May, and said he only showed that there was no foundation for the censure thrown upon the Colonial Office by Mr. Hincks in reference to his reception and treatment as one of a deputation from Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, to draw the attention of the Government to the propriety of aiding the formation of a railway in those provinces.

In reply to a question from Lord J. RUSSELL, Lord STANLEY said that a protocol had been signed by the five allied powers with respect to Neufchâtel. There could be no doubt that Prussia had certain rights to Neufchâtel under the treaty of 1814, which France had recognised.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in pursuance of his promise in reply to Sir James Graham on Thursday night, proceeded to state the views of the Government with respect to the business of the session. He referred to the letter which the statement of the right hon. Baronet had produced upon the House, and proceeded to show that nothing whatever in the letter justified that the public business was not in a most satisfactory condition. The Law Reform Bills, to which the right hon. Baronet had adverted, had, three of them, since Thursday, passed through a most important stage, and two others had passed the House altogether. There was no material opposition anticipated to the passing of those which remained, and he believed they would be easily passed without interfering with the length of the session. With respect to the colonial bills, on which the right hon. gentleman had so strongly dwelt, he had to observe that the New Zealand Bill had since Thursday gone nearly through committee, and the Irish Encumbered Estates Bill and the Irish Colonial Bill would occasion but little delay, for it consisted of only two clauses. The Bishopric of Quebec Bill also consisted of only two clauses, and was very unlikely to meet with any opposition. The Metropolitan Water Bill, also, he hoped to pass, for it had been referred to a select committee, where its provisions should be so sifted that he did not anticipate any serious opposition to it in its amended shape. The Metropolis Buildings Bill was not of so imperative a character and he would therefore move that the order of the day for the second reading should be discharged. The right hon. Baronet had said that there had to take 200 votes in supply, but since Thursday they had made such progress in committee of supply that he believed there were only 19 votes now remaining to be taken. The Navy Pay Bill and the Patent Law Bill, he also thought there would be little difficulty in passing; and it was to be remembered that the latter had already passed the other House of Parliament. There were two bills referred to by the right hon. Baronet with regard to Ireland—the Valuation of Land Bill, and the Whiteboy Acts Consolidation Bill. With respect to the first of these bills, he thought it very important, and so little likely to meet with opposition that he would proceed with it. The latter bill, however, he would not press. The Poor-law Board Continuance (Ireland) Bill, and the Encumbered Estates (Ireland) Bill, he also thought of importance; and though he heard that it was intended to offer opposition to the Crime and Outrage (Ireland) Bill, believing it to be a necessary measure, he should be prepared to meet that opposition. The bill consisted of only one clause; and with a...the zeal of its opponents, and making all due allowance for their powers of eloquence, he did not think they would be able to defeat it. Having thus shown that there was no ground for the assertion of unsatisfactory a state as Sir J. Graham had represented it to be, the right hon. gentleman concluded by stating that he did not feel himself justified in recommending the withdrawal of any of the bills referred to by the right hon. Baronet, with the exception of the two he had named.

The order of the day for the second reading of the Metropolitan Buildings Bill was discharged.

THE MILITIA BILL.

On the order of the day for the third reading of the Milit a Bill,

Mr. HUME moved as an amendment, that the bill be read a third time that day six months

Mr. MACKINNON seconded the amendment.

After a short discussion the House divided, and the numbers were—For the amendment, 148; against it, 220: majority, 72.

The House again divided, and the numbers were—For the amendment, 148; against it, 178: majority, 30.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved the omission of the 18th clause, giving power to the Government to apply the ballot.

Mr. WALPOLE opposed the motion.

The House divided, and the numbers were—For omitting the clause, 142; against it, 187: majority, 45.

Sir DE LACY EVANS moved an amendment to the effect that it should not be lawful to resort, in time of peace, to the system of ballot or compulsory enlistment for the militia

The House again divided, and the numbers were For the amendment, 82; against it, 178: majority, 96.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

NAVY PAY BILL

On the motion of Mr. STAFFORD, the bill was read into committee on this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD said that by the present bill the pay of seamen of the Royal Navy was never to be more than three months in arrear, instead of six. The latter arrangement was unpopular with the seamen, and contrasted unfavourably with the practice in the merchant service. The provision for six months' arrears was passed as a precaution against desertion, and as such it was now found to be unnecessary, since the condition of the seamen of the Royal Navy had been so much improved

The clauses were agreed to, and the House resumed.

The Poor-law Board Continuance (Ireland) Bill passed through committee.

The Passengers Act Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Corrupt Practices at Elections (No 2) Bill was read a second time

Lord J. MANNERS obtained leave to bring in a bill to continue and amend the Metropolitan Sewers Act.

Sir J. TROLLOPE obtained leave to bring in a bill to explain two acts of the 12th and 13th years of the reign of her Majesty, concerning the appointment of overseers and the authority of justices of the peace to act in certain matters relating to the poor in cities and boroughs.

Adjourned at 10 minutes past 1

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Militia Bill was brought up from the Commons, read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Tuesday next.

The London Necropolis Bill was read a second time.

EXTRADITION OF OFFENDERS FRANCE.

The Earl of MALMESBURY moved the second reading of the Surrender of Criminals Bill, the object of which was to carry into effect the articles of a convention entered into by the Governments of England and France, for the mutual surrender of persons accused of crimes and offences (political offences excepted) for trial in the country to those crimes and offences were committed.

The Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Brougham, Lord Campbell, and other noble Lords expressed their approval of the measure, but objected to the new principle which it introduced, making the mere warrant of the foreign authorities and the proof of identity, without any proof of guilt, or even the slightest suspicion of guilt, sufficient evidence for the surrender of persons who had placed themselves under the protection of British law.

The Lord CHANCELLOR said he felt there were difficulties surrounding the subject, but he would be willing in committee to make any amendment which might appear to be necessary.

Lord CRANWORTH thought the bill wrong in principle, and that no alteration could render it even tolerable

After some further discussion, the bill was read a second time.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The HOUSE met at noon.

Mr. MILNER GIBSON presented a petition from the Association for the Repeal of Taxes on Knowledge, praying that the further prosecution of Mr Dickens's "Household Narrative" may be delayed until a committee has inquired why the Board of Inland Revenue has abandoned its unstamped monthly for prosecution, when so many weekly and fortnightly publications are allowed to contain news without a stamp.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE

The adjourned debate upon Mr Spooner's motion for "a select committee to inquire into the system of education carried on at the College of Maynooth" was resumed by Mr. FREWEN, who supported the motion.

Mr H. HERBERT said he found he could not move the amendment of which he had given notice; but if Mr. Spooner would not adopt his suggestion for a mixed commission, that Mr Spooner must draw his own conclusion as to the fairness of the inquiry which the hon. gentleman contemplated. He opposed the motion.

Sir W. VERNER, in advocating the appointment of the committee, alluded to what he stated was a practice of priests in Ireland, viz. denouncing persons from the altar. He referred to an instance in which a gentleman was so denounced, because it was not his pleasure or convenience to contribute to the new building by the priest. He held in his hand a house on another gentleman's property. (Cries of "Name," and "Who is the writer?") He was not going to hand the writer over to the assassin—

Captain MAGAN.—If the hon and gallant member would not give the name of the writer of the letter, the only conclusion the House could come to was that it was not true. (Cries of "Order.")

The SPEAKER called on the hon. member to retract that expression.

Captain MAGAN said he meant it in a Parliamentary sense. (A laugh)

Mr V SCULLY did not object to a fair inquiry, but he did object to an unfair and unusual one; and he thought such an inquiry should be moved by the hon member for North Warwickshire. A close and searching inquiry could take place through the medium of the visitors of the college. The hon. gentleman continued to argue in this sense from half-past one o'clock, at which time his speech commenced, as if speaking against time, until four o'clock, when, according to the standing order recently agreed to,

The SPEAKER called on the chair, and did so amidst peals of laughter at the pertinacity with which the hon. and learned gentleman held out speaking for so long a time

The House met again in the evening at six o'clock

THE PICTURE BY TITIAN RECENTLY ADDED TO THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

Mr. CHARTERIS asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if there was any truth in the report that a picture, said to be by Titian, which was recently purchased at Marshal Soult's sale at Marshal Soult's sale for £3600 was last year in possession of a London dealer, by whom it was shown to several of the trustees, who might then have purchased it for £1200?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said there was no proof that a picture in the possession of a London dealer, and said to have been purchased by Marshal Soult, was shown to the trustees of the National Gallery, and offered to them for £1200, was the picture in that gallery, undoubtedly by Titian, and which had been purchased by the National Gallery, was for sale in London recently, and was seen by a friend of his; but he was not aware that that picture had been offered to the National Gallery for £1200. But he must observe that nothing was more delusive as to the real value of a picture than the fact of its acquisition by a private individual at a particular price. He had recently seen a picture which had been sold for £2400 to a distinguished individual well known to many hon. members in that House only a few years ago for £8000. There were very few pictures of emment merit that did not find a high price in London at the very top of the scale. It was possible that the picture in question had been offered at a less sum than the trustees of the National Gallery took it at; but the country had given £2400 for it, and he believed that they had purchased a very valuable picture at a very moderate price.

THE PENDING MAYNOOTH DEBATE.

Mr. M. GIBSON wished to ask a question of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the employment of the time of this House, and the despatch of public business. They had had the Maynooth question before them, and, after a whole morning had been devoted to it, they were still as far from the termination of the debate as ever. He wished, therefore, to ask the right hon. gentleman, who was the trustee of the public for the proper application of the public time, whether he did not think it fit for him to use his influence with the hon. member for Warwickshire, to induce him to postpone all further proceedings to a more convenient season?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, that he felt his duty at present to be in unison with the statement which he had already made to the House, namely, to take care that all those measures to which the Government were bound should be passed this session, with due deference to the great consummation which they all awaited. (Laughter.) That he acknowledged was itself a difficult, though he would not say an impossible task; but he must decline, with respect to the subject of Maynooth, to undertake that which the right hon. gentleman had asked him to perform.

OYSTER FISHERIES

In answer to a question from Sir G Clerk respecting the oyster fisheries, Mr. HENLEY said he would pay every attention to the subject, and endeavour whether he could in his way to a relaxation of the law to enable parties to fish in the months of May and June without weakening the oyster, for which the law had been passed - namely, the prevention of poaching on the fisheries.

THE REV. MR. BENNETT

Mr. HORSMAN moved for a select committee to inquire into the circumstances of the institution of the Rev. Mr. Bennett to the vicarage of Frome. The hon. gentleman reminded the House, that on a former occasion, when he had brought the subject forward, the Government had promised an inquiry, but his motion had been defeated by the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there existed an ecclesiastical tribunal of appeal, and that the House of Commons could only be appealed to in the last resort. Since then he had ascertained from the Attorney-General that there was no such tribunal of appeal, more particularly in a case in which the matters complained of had occurred abroad. Under these circumstances he felt it necessary to refer the matter once more before the House, supported as he was by additional matter with respect to what had taken place at Kissingen. After describing the circumstances of the complaints against the rev. gentleman's teaching at Frome, his alleged renunciation, his sojourn at Kissangen, and the evidence of his non-attendance at the Protestant, and his almost constant attendance at the Roman Catholic worship there, the hon. member proceeded to comment on the conduct of the Bishop of Bath and Wells in instituting him, which, he said, resulted not from ignorance but the intention of perverting justice. The Bishop of London's letter to that prelate was read, in which he stated that when Mr. Bennett had left the living of St. Paul's, Knightsbridge, completely exonerated him from blame, but made the course taken by the Bishop of Bath and Wells still more censurable. That prelate was aware of Mr. Bennett's peculiar opinions about the Bible and supremacy, and, for the satisfaction of the Protestant people of Frome, if the Bishop was satisfied with Mr. Bennett's explanation, that explanation ought to have been made public. He charged the Bishop with having instituted the Rev. Mr. Bennett in a manner calculated to defeat any objection on the part of the parishioners, or any attempt at inquiry into the grave charges against that rev. gentleman. He was of opinion that the conduct of the Bishop was contrary to law as regarded the certificate required on institution, as well as on other points of equal importance. The House would, he thought, admit that he had not shown any undue wish for a Parliamentary inquiry; for the truth was, that he only sought for such an inquiry after finding that there was no other mode of redressing the parties whose cause he advocated.

Mr. GLADSTONE addressed the House in reply to the speech of the hon. member for Cockermouth, and contended that the House of Commons was not a proper arena for the discussion of such questions as Mr. Horsman was too much in the habit of bringing before it. It had long been his opinion that the law ought to have provided some means for punishing delinquent bishops, and he would gladly consider any specific proposal with that object in view, but in this case he was prepared to assert that the Bishop of Bath and Wells was not a delinquent, and that the parishioners were perfectly satisfied with what the patron had done in reference to the appointment of the Rev. Mr Bennett. The right hon. gentleman then proceeded to defend the Bishop of Bath and Wells from the charges made against him, if any could be considered, was there the slightest foundation. He called upon the House not to throw away the time cast by implication a censure upon the right rev. prelate, who deserved commendation instead of blame for his conduct in the whole transaction; at the same time he was not opposed to a strictly legal inquiry, either by a Government commission, or by a future committee of the House, but he never could assent to a motion so vague and so open to objection as that brought forward by Mr. Horsman.

Sir J. FARINGTON said that the unhappy dissensions by which the Church was torn were to be traced to those clergymen of the Church of England who had taken the same course as that adopted by the Rev. Mr. Bennett—a course tending to draw finer and finer the distinctions between Protestantism and the Church of Rome, and finally to lead many to become members of the latter Church. With these sentiments, he could not help feeling that it was a great misfortune that any patron should have given so important a living as that of Frome to a person in the position of the Rev. Mr. Bennett. He had, on a former occasion, said that the question, having been raised, must be dealt with, and from that opinion he was not disposed to recede. The law officers of the Crown had given their opinion that there was no legal mode by which the circumstances of the case, particularly as re-arded the occurrences at Kissingen, could be made the subject of inquiry. They ought to have been inquired into by the bishop of his diocese, but the Government had no power to compel him to institute such an inquiry. With respect to the motion before the House, he must say that he could not bring himself to believe that many hon. gentlemen would think that a committee of the House of Commons was a proper tribunal to investigate such a case. The law was defective, and ought to be altered; but he was strongly that it could never be advantageous to make the House of Commons an arena for the trial of a bishop, and he would, therefore, oppose the motion.

Mr. Wilde contended that the ecclesiastical law required alteration, [illegible] was not to be met about by making victims in matters of this kind, and hence nothing to be gained by any such inquiry. With respect to the case of the Bishop of Bath and Wells, he thought he had reason to congratulate the Government on their not having exposed himself to the [illegible] costs attending a writ of quare impedit.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER thought he rightly interpreted the feeling of the House, after the speeches of Mr. Gladstone and Sir W. P. Wood, in saying that it would feel very reluctant to pass, even by implication, a censure upon the Bishop of Bath and Wells, who could pursue no other course than the one he had adopted without incurring the most serious risks. The state of the law in reference to such subjects was such as could not be much longer tolerated; and, giving any specific pledge upon the subject, he would say that the reform of the ecclesiastical law should have early attention. He hoped the hon. member for Cockermouth would not press his motion to a division.

The debate was continued by Mr. Hoyle, Mr. E. Yorke, Sir B. Hall, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. E. Ellice, the Solicitor-General, Mr. Deedes, and Mr. S. Herbert.

Mr. HORSMAN hoped that Mr. Horsman would not press his motion to a division, as it would not lead to any useful result.

Mr. GOULBURN moved, as an amendment, that the inquiry should be into the state of the law respecting the institution of clerks to benefices in the Church of England.

Mr. HORSMAN repudiated the amendment.

The House then divided, and the numbers were—For the amendment, 111; against it, 198: majority, 45.

The original motion was then agreed to.

Adjourned at half past one o'clock, thirteen hours and a half having thus elapsed from the meeting of the House at noon.

MR. FEARGUS O'CONNOR.

[At the close of Mr. Horsman's speech a pause of some moments ensued. No hon. member rose to speak, and loud cries of "Divide!" ensued, when Mr. Serjeant Bayley and Sir Benjamin Hall rose together. The former having given way,

Sir B. HALL said—Mr. Speaker, I rose to order, to call the attention of the House to the conduct of the hon. gentleman (Mr. O'Connor) who sits near me. Sitting by the side of the hon. gentleman this moment, I was crying "divide," because no member rose to address the House, when the hon. member turned round upon me and struck me in the side. (Order, order.) I tell the hon. gentleman on a former occasion, that if he addressed me in the House, or subjected me to any annoyances, I should call your attention to the subject, and place myself under your protection. I now beg to do so.

The SPEAKER. The hon. member for Nottingham has been so long a member of the House, that it is not necessary for me to remind him that it is against the rules and regulations of the House for any member either to interrupt or to [illegible] with another member during the proceedings of the House. I am sorry to say that the hon member for Nottingham has of late been constantly infringing those rules and regulations. (Hear, hear.)—And the hon. gentleman on a former occasion, that if he addressed me in the House, or subjected me to any annoyances, I should call your attention to the subject, and place myself under your protection. I now beg to do so.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I make the apology to the House. I beg the pardon of the hon. gentleman for anything I said to him. (Hear, hear.) I apologise to the House. You are the best Speaker that ever sat in that chair. (Order, order.) Mr. O'Connor resumed his seat, but immediately afterwards got up, and passing along the floor, was again called to order, for interrupting Mr. Gladstone, who was speaking.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon to six o'clock

Mr. G. A. HAMILTON said that the first issue of new florins would take place next week.

EPISCOPAL REVENUES.

The Marquis of BLANDFORD moved the second reading of the Episcopal and Capitular Revenues Bill

Mr. WALPOLE said that since the bill last came before the House, her Majesty's Government had come to the determination of introducing a bill on the subject themselves; he trusted, therefore, that the noble Lord would not press his motion.

Lord EBRINGTON suggested that in any measure which might be introduced by the Government, some provision should be made in the shape of a superannuation or retiring fund for bishops who were incapacitated from discharging the functions of their office.

Mr. J. WILLIAMS said a few words to the same effect.

Sir B. HALL trusted the effect of the proposed bill would be to take out of the hands of the episcopacy and of the capitular bodies the management of ecclesiastical property altogether. He hoped, also, that means would be taken to compel bishops to visit their cathedrals. In the case of the Bishop of Rochester, he believed that prelate had never made a formal visitation to his cathedral since he had had the see. He trusted that a capitular bodies would also be compelled to render an account of the expenditure of their revenues.

Mr. HORSMAN thought the great difficulty the Government would have to encounter in Church Reform would be the opposition of the episcopal body. Ecclesiastical law fearfully embarrassed those who had to look to it for remedy of its defects to the bishops, who had proved unequal to the task; and the consequence was that the state of the Church was far behind the spirit and requirements of the age.

Mr. OSWALD agreed in much that had fallen from his hon. friend; but if the House were to intrude in spiritual matters, he did not think that any good object would be attained.

Mr S HERBERT hoped that the provision in the noble Lord's (the member for Woodstock) bill would not be lost sight of, which compelled bishops to reside in their cathedral cities. Unless it was carried out, it would be encouraging that in bishops which was universally condemned in the working clergy, viz. non-residence and absenteeism. Without entering into the various extensive questions raised by the bill, he hoped the noble Lord would accede to the proposition of the Government, and withdraw it.

The Marquis of BLANDFORD was glad to be able to accede to the suggestions which had been made; and after the conversation he had had with the right hon. Home Secretary, he would consent to withdraw the bill.

The bill was accordingly withdrawn.

COUNTY ELECTIONS POLLS BILL

On the motion for going into committee on the County Elections Polls Bill,

Mr. PACKE moved, as an amendment, that this House do resolve itself into the committee upon that day six months. He denied that the extension of the time allowing the counties to two days was conducive to bribery and corruption. With respect to the saving of expense, which had been spoken of in support of the bill, if the time were more limited, a did not think hon. members would endeavour to take advantage voters for their own purposes.

Mr. WARBURTON said the question was more for the consideration of county members than for the Government. His own opinion was, that if the noble Lord (Lord R. Grosvenor) ever ceeded in going into committee, the bill could not be brought into operation at the ensuing election, because, by the act of William IV., certain notices must be given before any fresh poling-places could be appointed, and those notices could not be given, according to the act, before the 1st general election. He thought the noble Lord was bound to give some explanation as to the means of carrying out the measure before the House went into committee.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the noble Lord (Lord R. Grosvenor) had not convinced the Government that the bill was at all necessary. If the bill could be brought into operation in June, he would not oppose it; but he thought it right to protest against legislating in the dark, and therefore he would feel it necessary to resist the motion of the noble Lord

Mr. COBDEN thought the House ought to go into committee on this bill. All the arguments against it went upon the assumption that the English people were a set who did not care for their franchise, and were never anxious to exercise it. Every argument used against the motion had been used against the motion for confining the polling in boroughs to one day. He thought the experience of boroughs went to prove that the principle was a good one, and he hoped the House would not stultify itself by rejecting a really beneficial measure

After some observations from Sir W. B. Bridges, Mr. Bouverie, Mr. W. Miles, and Mr. Oswald,

The House divided, when the numbers were—For the original motion, 166; against it, 83: majority, 84.

The House then went into committee.

Mr. I. KNLEY asked if the noble Lord would assent to the introduction of a clause to postpone the period when the bill was to come into operation until fresh arrangements could be made with respect to the polling-booths, &c.

Lord R. GROSVENOR said it was his intention that the bill should come into immediate operation.

Mr. W. MILES moved an amendment to the second clause, having for its object to postpone the operation of the bill until after the 1st of January, 1853.

Lord R. GROSVENOR opposed the amendment.

The committee divided, and the numbers were—For the amendment, 91; against it, 134: majority, 43.

The amendment was consequently lost.

The bill then passed through committee.

The Friendly Societies Bill (No. 3) went through committee pro formâ, when some alterations were inserted

The Disabilities Repeal Bill was read a second time.

The remaining clauses of the County Courts Further Extension Bill passed through committee.

The Maynooth debate was fixed for Monday next —Adjourned.

COMMITTAL OF MR. F. O'CONNOR

[Whilst the House was in committee on the County Elections Polls Bill, a scene of an extraordinary character occurred, which ended in the member for Nottingham (Mr. F. O'Connor) being committed to the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms. Mr. O'Connor, whose eccentricities had of late occasioned much annoyance to several hon. members, and no later than the previous day had called forth a reprimand from the Speaker, after perambulating the floor of the House some dozens of times, finally seated himself on the front Opposition bench, between Mr. B. Denison and Mr. T. Duncombe. Immediately on taking his seat, he proceeded to engage the latter hon. gentleman in an apparently humorous conversation, if such can be judged from his gestures and general demeanour; the hon. member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) meanwhile endeavouring to restrain him within the limits of decorum. Mr. O'Connor, nevertheless, persevered in his grotesque display of disorderly behaviour, notwithstanding the general and repeated cries of "Order;" and finally, on being remonstrated with in an apparently friendly manner by Mr. Denison, Mr. O'Connor deliberately thrust his half-clenched hand into the face of that hon member

Mr. DENISON appealed to Mr. Berna. for protection; and after some conversation it was resolved to report progress, and bring the matter as a general complaint before the House.

The House accordingly resumed, and many hon. members complained of the indignities they had endured at the hands of Mr. F. O'Connor, and the question arose as to whether he could be considered as a free agent, upon which there appeared to be a considerable difference of opinion. In the meantime Mr. O'Connor quitted the House.

Mr. ANSTEY suggested that he might be sequestered from his place in Parliament.

Mr. FITZROY complained of having been grossly insulted by Mr O'Connor.

Sir D DUNDAS and the ATTORNEY-GENERAL expressed their belief that Mr. O'Connor was sufficiently a free agent to know what he was doing wrong, and was, therefore, amenable for his conduct.

Mr. AGLIONBY was of opinion that Mr. O'Connor was not responsible for his actions.

Mr. WALLACE eventually moved that Mr. F. O'Connor be committed to the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms for disorderly conduct and contempt of the House.

Sir J. PAKINGTON seconded the motion.

The motion was carried unanimously; and Mr. O'Connor, who had in the meantime gone out of the House, was arrested in Westminster Hall, and conveyed to the prison rooms of the House.]

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Apprehension of Deserters from Foreign Ships Bill, and the Law of Evidence (Scotland) Bill, were severally read a third time and passed.

The Parliamentary Deeds Bill, the Public Works Bill, and the Industrial and Provident Societies Bill were severally passed through committee.

The General Board of Health Bill was read a second time A journal

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The House met at 12 o'clock.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

Mr. HUME, in reference to the contemplated National Gallery, suggested that Kensington Palace should be devoted to that purpose.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said there was reason to hope, from the interest her Majesty and Prince Albert took in the subject, that ere long they would have a National Gallery every way worthy of the country. He expected that early in the next session of Parliament he would be enabled to lay a plan before the House which would meet with general approbation.

SUPPLY.

The House ultimately went into a committee of supply, when several votes of the miscellaneous estimates were agreed to.

The House adjourned at four o'clock until six o'clock, when business was resumed.

KAFFIR WAR WITHDRAWAL OF EXTRA VOTE.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, in consequence of the expense of the Kaffir war being much smaller than he anticipated, in consequence of the Treasury minute that no expenditure should take place for extraordinary military establishments until the resources for ordinary military expenditure were exhausted, he had the satisfaction to inform the House that he did not feel it necessary to call for the vote of £200,000 which he thought it his duty to place before the House when he made his financial statement. (Hear, hear.)

A few more votes having been taken in supply, the House went into committee upon the New Zealand Government Bill, the consideration of the clauses of which occupied the remainder of the night, the chief point under consideration being as to the amount of compensation which the claims of the New Zealand Company, the lands of the colony entitled them to have, in case those lands were transferred upon as the bill proposed, to the sole control of the Legislature of the colony, the general impression being that 5s. per acre was a fair estimate for the claims of the company. Adjourned.

AUSTRALIAN EMIGRATION.

A numerous and highly respectable deputation, consisting of colonists, London merchants, and shipowners, accompanied by some members of Parliament, had an interview on Saturday last with the Commissioners of Emigration, in Park-street, for the purpose of urging the adoption of measures with a view to satisfy the present pressing demand for agricultural and pastoral labour in the Australian colonies, and likewise to suggest means by which its application should be regulated, so as to prevent parties emigrating at the expense of colonial funds from resorting to the gold diggings, rather than applying themselves to those other important branches of productive industry, upon the maintenance of which the permanent prosperity of Australia so much depended.

Amongst the gentlemen present were Sir William Verner, Bart., M.P.; Mr. Evelyn Denison, M.P.; Mr. Wyndham Goold, M.P.; Mr. C. De Salis, Mr. W. Walker, Major Mercer, Mr. — Nelson Smith, Mr. Learmonth, Captain Stanley Carr, Mr. C. D. Logan, &c. Mr. Evelyn Denison briefly stated the objects of the deputation, and was followed by Mr. De Salis, who explained at some length their views upon the subject of emigration.

Several other gentlemen having spoken,

Mr. Murdoch, the Chief Commissioner, having given a brief history of the gold discoveries, said that the commissioners had been able to send out in the month of December last 1900 emigrants, and that they had endeavoured since that time to keep up an equal stream; that, no other ships having been laid on, they had dispatched or chartered since the 1st of January 42 ships: that, in addition to the emigrants whom they had sent out since that date, they had at present in the offices either accepted emigrants or applications to the extent of 7000 persons, but that their great difficulty lay in procuring ships. That, in consequence of the very large unassisted emigration now in progress, there being 18 private ships in the docks in Liverpool, and 28 in London, they thought had to reach most seriously, and that, unless it fell again, the number which it refunds in the hands of the commissioners would send out would be very much reduced. That, in the hope of getting ships, the commissioners had sent home their advertisements for tenders to all the principal ports in the United Kingdom, and were endeavouring to establish a depôt in the colonies. In reference to the suggestion of requiring an endorsement from the emigrants not to apply for a gold license, Mr. Murdoch observed that he was afraid there would be some difficulty in carrying it out, but he would be happy to consider with the gentlemen who made it whether it was at all feasible to adopt it. With reference to the objection taken to female emigrants from the workhouses of Ireland, he read a despatch from Sir W. Denison, showing that some 400 young women drawn from those workhouses, and who had been in the course of last year, had soon found very considerable and well-conducted, and that, in consequence of their good conduct, many more had been applied for than the colony had received.

It was finally intimated by Mr Evelyn Denison, that it was the wish of the deputation that Mr. De Salis should confer with the board so as to arrange the details of the arrangements then suggested.

The Indian Collection, which attracted such general attention and so much admiration at the Great Exhibition, has been put up to auction this week at the Mart in the City. The sale commenced on Monday, and was generally well attended, the biddings being pretty brisk for the various articles of curiosity and vertu with which the collection abounded. The auctioneer is Mr. Norton, of the firm of Hoggart, Norton, and Trist. The second part of the sale will be resumed after the lapse of a few weeks.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

LONDON UNION IN CHURCH MATTERS.—On Tuesday a meeting of the members of the National Society who were favourable to the resolution of the annual meeting of the National Society in 1849, claiming "full freedom to constitute schools upon such principles and models as are both sanctioned and recommended by the order and practice of the Church of England," was held in St. Martin's Hall, Long-acre. The attendance was very numerous. The Rev. Cyril Page took the chair, and stated that as the meeting was only a consultative one, he had to request that members of the press would retire. The chairman stated that he felt called upon to intimate to the meeting that those who were favourable to the resolution of the annual meeting of the National Society, in 1849, were parties only invited to attend that meeting, and thus all other persons were intruders. Upon this intimation being made, the two reporters who were present immediately left the hall.

THE NATIONAL SOCIETY AND THE CATECHISM.—At a numerous meeting of the committee of the National Society, held on Tuesday, a memorial from Mr. Keble was laid before the body, praying for an inquiry into the alleged instances of the violation in Church schools of the fundamental principle of the society, which provides for the universal use of the Church Catechism in the schools in connexion with it. The following resolution was passed by a majority of 13 to 5:—"That the bishops of the several dioceses be requested to ascertain, if they think fit, through the diocesan and school inspectors, or in such other way as to them may seem most expedient, what is the practice of the schools in union with the National Society within their dioceses as to teaching the Liturgy and Catechism of the Church."

FRENCH PROTESTANT LITERATURE SOCIETY.—On Wednesday night the first public meeting of this society was held in the Cadogan Institution, Sloane-street, Chelsea. Major Jervis occupied the chair. The object of the society was to provide divine worship for the numerous of French refugees and others now in London, similar to that provided by the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noe, in Charles-street, Long-acre, the establishment of schools for the children of the refugees, and a refuge for the Catholic priests, from Poitou, on embracing Protestantism. The Rev. M. Emilien Frolaud, pasteur of the Reformed Church of Bagneres de Bigorre, gave an interesting account of the progress of Protestantism in France, and M. Daguars detailed fully the objects of the society.

ECCLESIOLOGICAL SOCIETY.—A committee meeting of this society was held on Saturday last, and was attended by Mr. Luard (in the chair), Mr. Chambers, Mr. Dickenson, Mr. France, Sir J. Harrington, Rev. T. Helmore, Rev. G. H. Hubbard, Rev. H. L. Jenner, and Rev. E. Webb. Several gentlemen were elected members. Many presents were received, and various applications for advice and for pecuniary aid were considered. A grant of £5 was made towards the preservation of the Early English Abbey Church, Reculver. Conclusion that the committee were satisfied that the works would be superintended by a trustworthy architect.

THE BISHOPRIC OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.—By a blue book just printed at the instance of Mr. Horsman, M.P., it appears that, independently of the income derivable from the see of Gloucester, the Bishop holds a canonry in Westminster Abbey, of the yearly value of £1800, and also enjoys the proceeds of the vicarage of Almondsbury, annexed to the see, which yields an income varying from £800 to £800 per annum. The gross income of the see in 1838 was £6,665, and the net income £5921. The net income for the eleven years from 1840 to 1850, both inclusive, has averaged £7000 per annum. The new palace of the Bishop, at Stapleton, has cost £23,627 5s. 9d.—viz. £11,729 11s. 10d. for land and expenses, and £11 897 9s 11d for house. The sources from which this expenditure has been defrayed are thus stated:—Bristol Palace fund, £7684; Carn estate sold, £3987; Hereford Great Farm, £6922, North sack, £4565; profit on Exchequer Bills, 293; Episcopal fund, £1074

EXCLUSIVE PRIVILEGE OF EPISCOPAL PATRONAGE.—The London Gazette has published the approval of the Queen in Council to a scheme for an exchange of patronage among several (sixteen) of the Bishops. It is compulsory upon all those who were not in possession of their seats on the 24th March, 1836, and it would appear that all the others concerned, with the exception of the Bishop of Winchester, have consented to the alterations having effect henceforward. The Bishop of London has also reserved his rights for two livings. The following abstract has been made: viz. Canterbury takes 3, gives up 4; London takes 3, gives up 56; Winchester takes 1, gives up 29; Bath and Wells takes 0, gives up 12; Ely takes 0, gives up 18; Exeter takes 0, gives no 47; Gloucester and Bristol takes 11, gives up 8; Hereford takes 0, gives up 14; Lichfield takes 12, gives up 7; Lincoln takes 1, gives up 18; Norwich takes 36, gives up 0; Oxford takes 40, gives up 5; Peterborough takes 33, gives up 0; Rochester takes 14, gives up 15; Salisbury takes 3, gives up 12; Worcester takes 32, gives up 3. Total taken, 238, total given up, 238.

PRESENTATIONS AND APPOINTMENTS.—The following preferments and appointments have recently been made:—Ireland: The Rev. Thomas F. Ingoldsby, to Newdegate, Surrey; the Hon. and Rev. A. Byron, to Corton Denham, near Sherborne; the Rev. E. Warter, to Adlington, near Chichester, Worcestershire; the Rev. B. L. Keene, to Bentley, in Suffolk. The Rev. W. Bryans, to Tarvin, in the county of Chester.

TESTIMONIALS.—The following clergymen have recently received testimonials:—The Rev. Edward Hamilton: The Rev. E. Warter, late tutor and president of St Magdale'n's College, Cambridge, from his late pupils; the Rev. A. Christopherson, from the parishioners of Lancaster, on his departure; the Rev. C. Jones, curate of Ovenavon, from the congregation, on returning; the Rev. J. Morgan, curate of Ovenavon, from the Welsh parishioners, on his departure; the Rev. W. Blood, from the Rev. Mr. Hinksman, Clifton, and also from some friends at Plymouth; the Rev. Jas. Andrews, from the villagers of Newark, near Peterborough; the Rev. T. Wolstencroft, St. Bartholomew's, Norfolk, from his friends, on his promotion; the Rev. C. Cudd, late rector of Letheringsett, Norfolk, from the parishioners; the Rev. W. Ackworth, from the inhabitants of Rothley, Leicestershire. The Rev. W. Fisher, M.A., curate of Hartlip, Kent, from his communion service, from the churchwarden, W. Bland, Esq., and Mrs. Bland, of Hartlip-place, in token of their esteem.

THE ISLAND OF LEWIS.

In our Journal of April 3 we took occasion to point out the fortunate position of the Island of Lewis, in comparison with others of the Hebridean group; which is borne out by the following particulars of the capital of this more favoured spot, and the well ordered picture of its port presented in the Engraving upon the next page.

The Island of Lewis is the most northern of the Hebrides, lying in 58° north latitude. It is surrounded by the Atlantic on the south and west, and by the Pentland Firth on the north-east. It is in the county of Ross, and divided into four parishes, viz. Loch, Rig, Barvas, and Stornaway: it contains nearly 440,000 acres, from the late Ordnance survey; and has a population, according to the late census, of 19,694.

The island is intersected by many arms of the sea, and is of a very irregular figure; the coast in general is very bold and rocky, especially about the head lands, and abounds with numerous caves. The moors are abundantly stocked with game of all descriptions, with the exception of partridge and pheasant. Deer are very numerous. The rivers and lakes are plentifully supplied with salmon and trout. Numerous shooting lodges are dispersed through the island for the accommodation of sportsmen, who annually visit it as a part of Britain; and are amply repaid for the abundance of game, the fine pure air, and the bold and grand scenery.

Stornaway, the subject of the present Sketch, is the capital of the Lewis. It is built on a rock or point of land from which it derives its name: "Stronglingh" (the point of passage signifying "point of the bay" which has been converted into Stornaway. It has increased from a few scattered houses to the size and importance of a considerable town. The population of Stornaway, which amounted to 2,000 in 1831, and in 1841 to 3033, showing an increase of 2547. It contains a branch of the National Bank of Scotland, three superior inns, assembly-rooms; an Episcopalian, Established, and Free Church; gaswerks, good and convenient houses; also a patent slip, which is very useful, as a large number of vessels are annually wrecked on the coast, in which there is the island is very deficient; with the exception of a few in a sheltered glen near the castle, there are none to be met with in Lewis. Within the last few years the demesne and other parts of the country have been largely planted, and appear to thrive; but the sea air is a great enemy to all vegetation. The island was thickly wooded at one period, as numerous large trunks have been dug out of the moss at a depth of 14 feet. According to tradition, the Norwegians, to monopolise the timber trade, set the wood on fire.

There is a weekly communication between Stornaway and Glasgow by a steamvessel, established at the cost of Sir J. Matheson; the mails are conveyed across the Minch by a sloop to Poolewe.

There is a fair or market held here annually for the sale of cattle; also horses, and all agricultural exhibitions, for which prizes are distributed.

The island, with few exceptions, is the sole property of Sir James Matheson, Bart., M.P. for Rossshire, from whose benevolence the condition of a large community has been greatly improved during the late failure of the potato crop and the consequent famine. Sir James has exerted himself to the utmost in giving employment and supplying the wants of the starving population. Extensive works have been set on foot, roads made, bridges built, large tracts of moorland fenced in and drained, and substances unfit for the shelter of Christians have been taken down and new ones erected. A new system of agriculture was also introduced. Upon the whole, the face of the country and a large majority of its inhabitants have undergone a marked and improved change by this truly philanthropic measure.

REPORTED BURIED TREASURE NEAR POONAH.

A STRANGE interest is attached to the ruin shown in the accompanying Illustration, from a sketch by a Poonah Correspondent. It represents the remains of one of the Palaces of the once celebrated Pushwa Bajee Rao, who died a short time ago at Bhitoor, on the Jumna, the place of his exile since the period of his subjection in the year 1818.

The Palace is situated near Wannooree, a small hamlet at the south-east extremity of the military cantonment, which lies about a mile and a half to the south of the city of Poonah, in the Deccan. Within a few days of the date of our Correspondent's letter (March 12), this spot had become an object of much attraction to the camp community, in consequence of a rumour that a discovery of the large amount of five crores of rupees, a sum equivalent to five million pounds sterling, had been made among the ruins.

The report, though exaggerated, was not without some foundation; for it appears that a native, of about sixty years of age, called upon the superintendent of bazaars and police, and offered (on condition of his receiving a reward of two thousand rupees) to point out a spot where, on digging, coins of various descriptions, amounting in all to the enormous sum above stated, would be discovered.

Very little credence was, as may be imagined, given to the native's story; but the earnestness of his manner, and his request that the reward he asked should only be given him on the supposed "treasure trove" making its appearance, induced the superintendent of bazaars and police to dispatch a party of police peons, under a trustworthy naique, to take charge of the ruins until proof of the deposit of the treasure be obtained by its discovery on the spot indicated, for the effecting of which some measures have been taken; but, when our Correspondent wrote, nothing in the shape of the circulating medium of the East, or valuables of any kind, had been found.

Although it appears rather doubtful whether anything will be discovered, it is still probable that the sanguine native may have had good cause to suppose the ruins would prove another El Dorado; for, doubtless, the wily old Pushwa, like the generality of Brahmins, considered his treasures safest when secretly buried in the earth within the precincts of his favourite residence.

FATAL BALLOON DESCENT NEAR OLDHAM.

A LAMENTABLE aëronautic accident occurred on the evening of the 2d inst., near Oldham, which was attended with loss of life. It appears that Mr. James Goulston, who, under the name of Giuseppe Lunardini, had made several balloon ascents at Cremorne and other places, was engaged to ascend at Bellevue Gardens, near Manchester. In consequence of the heavy rain, he was recommended by the proprietor of the gardens and several other persons present to defer his trip; but many of the spectators expressing an opinion that the affair was a hoax, and it was never intended that the balloon should ascend, Mr. Goulston said, that, rather than disappoint the public, he would make the ascent. He was to have taken up with him a companion, but, owing to the car and netting of the balloon absorbing so much water, this became impossible. With only two bags of ballast, Mr. Goulston slowly rose from the ground, and almost immediately passing into a dense cloud was lost to the spectators in the Gardens; and almost at the same instant there was a heavy fall of rain. The balloon took a north-easterly direction, and passed over Gorton, Fairfield, Buckley Hill, Holden Clough, then over Lees (adjoining Oldham), and passing the boundary between Lancashire and Yorkshire, it passed over Springhead, and then on to Stone Breaks, a hill running nearly N. by E., and opposite Fairbottom Valley. Saddleworth and Austerlands are situated at a very short distance to the north-east, Stone Breaks being about eight miles (as the crow flies) north-east from Bellevue Gardens.

FATAL BALLOON DESCENT NEAR OLDHAM.

The balloon was not seen after leaving the Gardens until it reached Springhead, which place and Lees it passed over at a very low altitude. A man standing at his door at Springhead saw the balloon at about half-past seven, when he perceived Mr. Goulston in the car, standing up and pulling a string he then stooped down, apparently for something at the bottom of the car. It was at that time raining heavily. The balloon had passed Springhead, when the grapnel, which was hanging out, struck one of the stone walls (which in this part of the country are used as fences to divide the fields), and the consequent jerk threw the aëronaut out of the car: he was caught by the netting, which entangled his feet, and he hung head downwards. The balloon in the meantime passed across a field, along which the grass was in many places torn up, probably by the hook of the grapnel. On coming to the next wall, the head of the unfortunate aëronaut must have dashed against it, for there were marks of blood upon the stones, a portion of the wall being also knocked down. The balloon then passed over the next wall, and blood was also seen on it; it then passed over a quarry, and was driven against the corner of a house, where the aëronaut doubtless received his fatal blow. The balloon then swung round, but was arrested by some men who had just come up, or it would probably have crossed the Mill-brook valley. The feet of the aëronaut were completely entangled in the cording by which the car was fastened: the unfortunate man gave one gasp after he was taken from the car, but no other sign of life. The balloon had scarcely lost any of its gas, and could only be restrained by one of the men making a rent in it with his knife, through which the gas escaped.

An inquest was held on the body on Friday afternoon, when a verdict of "Accidental death" was returned.

SCENE (THE LAST) FROM SCHILLER'S PLAY OF "DON KARLOS," AT THE ST JAMES'S THEATRE.

GERMAN PLAYS.—ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.

To the "Egmont" of Goethe succeeded the "Don Karlos" of Schiller. The latter long and complicated drama was performed on Saturday to her Majesty and a full and fashionable audience, with an amount of applause that demonstrated the number of points contained in the dialogue and action. The celebrated speeches of the Marquis de Posa (Herr Emil Devrient) told with surprising effect; and the manner in which Herr Grans impersonated the impulsive Prince himself was interesting and graceful. Herr Kuhn was Philip the Second, and in the make-up of the character was as perfect as he had been in that of Alva. The persecuting Duke also appears in this tragedy, but was confided to an inferior artist. Frau Stolte was the poor suspected Spanish queen, while the princess Eboli was portrayed in a lively and engaging manner by Frau Flindt. The tragedy itself is all but the greatest of Schiller's productions, only indeed excelled by the "Wallenstein," which would be received with delight in England. The Marquis de Posa is the creation of the poet's brain—the friend of Karlos, who, in the progress of the piece becomes its pervading spirit, and, like a chorus, interprets the sentiment of the whole. The son, suspected with his Royal father's wife, requires, in such urgent peril, the guardianship of the sincerest and most faithful friendship; but all avails not—no, even though that friend submits to duplicity for the salvation of the Prince. The dreaded meeting with the Queen-mother takes place, and, as in the illustration with which this notice is accompanied, the King and the Grand Inquisitor surprise the apparently guilty parties at their rendezvous. Here the tragedy ends—the inevitable doom being foreshadowed, as is the manner on the German stage, not executed. The curtain falls on the expressive group. The applause at the conclusion was universal. Herr E. Devrient had been several times called before the curtain; at the end the summons was repeated, when the principal artistes engaged in the piece also appeared.

On Tuesday, another drama of Schiller's was produced—"the "Kabal und Liebe." This play has been more than once compressed for the English stage, and the story of the musician's daughter sacrificed to court intrigue is familiar to the playgoer. The present performance was one virtually in extenso, and it proved to be not a little remarkable. That such an action should profitably occupy four hours, could not have happened if the acting had not been excellent. In fact, we saw more of the strength of the company in this domestic tragedy than in either or both of the preceding efforts, particularly in the female department. Fraulein Schäfer as Louise, and Frau Flindt as Lady Milford, exhibited superior talent and pathos. Love, pride, despair had each appropriate expression; and the long scenes in which these passions were developed were ably supported. Of the [illegible] as, one remembers as specimen of comic talent may be recorded: we allude to Herr Schröder in Baron von Kalb, the Court Chamberlain. Commend us to him for the stage-fop, utterly unlike any other stage-fops whatever. The man was like a machine, turning on a pivot—a timepiece of ceremony wound up, as it were, by clock-work, well mounted and jewelled, and never out of order. Herr Kuhn as Wurm was servile, cunning, fiendish, revengeful, and in all his moods the thorough artist. But it was to Herr Emil Devrient that the great effects of the play were confided. The character of Ferdinand affords ample opportunity for passion, and the actor was evidently solicitous to show that he could well ride its whirlwind and control its storm. To Herr Bernstill, also, our commendations are due, for his excellent impersonation of Miller, the outraged and bereaved father. On the whole, in a theatrical point of view, this was a most interesting performance.

It should be mentioned that these entertainments are under the direction o

MADAME DE LAGRANGE AND SIGNOR LABLACHE IN THE OPERA OF "DON PASQUALE," AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

Dr. Kuenzel, who is also the author of the prologue pronounced by Frenlein Sirolmayer, and which contained the greatest compliment to the national drama implied in the crowning with laurel the bust of Shakspeare. This well-intended compliment has not been responded to by our dramatic critics in the same spirit in which it was offered. It should have been recollected that it was the act of foreign actors, who in their high estimate of their own poets were yet desirous of acknowledging a higher of our own. This fellow feeling should have been accepted as an international demonstration; and so it would have been, had poets and artists been as wisely and well appreciated by the British public as by German audiences. Our political recognitions unfortunately absorb our moral and esthetic sympathies; we have yet to learn to live in the world of art on a familiar footing.

THE THEATRES

HER MAJESTY'S

Donizetti's very vivacious opera, "Don Pasquale," was given, for the second time, last Saturday. The Norma of Madame de Lagrange is stiff and formal, compared with the lively delineations of the Roman widow impersonated formerly by Grisi, Mesdames Tadolini and Sontag; but it is sufficiently intelligent, with the new prima donna's ladylike deportment, to be acceptable. The singing of the music incidental to the first part, if not distinguished by brilliancy, is very remarkable as regards execution. Vocalists who have acquired great fame in modern times, in the florid style, may be divided into two classes: the first comprehends those singers who have combined with ornamental passages of the greatest difficulty an intellectual, appropriate, and characteristic interpretation of the composer's text; in this category we should include Madame Persiani, Madame Cinti Damoreau, Madame Sontag, and our own Louisa Pyne. The second class includes those artistes who substitute the display of vocal exhibitions of mere vocal volubility, but who are incapable of inspiring emotion; in this category we may mention Madame Ugalde, Madame Dorus Gras, Mdlle. Anna Zerr, and Madame de Lagrange. Madame Viardot is perhaps the solitary instance of a great singer, who, since the death of her sister Malibran, has possessed the secret of shining equally in the dramatic and florid schools. The astonishing fluency and flexibility of her execution of one of Rossini's most elaborate pianoforte bravuras may be fresh in the recollection of many concert frequenters. Mdme. de Lagrange has achieved a sim lar feat by introducing, not (as has been said in music-books confessed), a new cadenza by Schiff, in "Don Pasquale." Her intonation is not so clear and firm as could be wished, and the use of the staccato and shake is also accompanied by abuses; but it is, all drawbacks heard, a very surprising display of suppleness and brilliancy, to which, assuredly, not an unprecedented effort, as it is absolutely necessary to state, in this age of critical exaggeration. On the irresistible comedy of Lablache a volume might be written every time he plays Pasquale: in Semiramide a military

He has illuminated the light-house at Meager's Beach with it, at an expense of £19 per annum, which gives a superior light, and makes a saving of £7 per annum. He can also erect lights along the shore, without expensive buildings, by raising poles and placing the lights upon them.

A Bull, or some formal document of the requisite authority, has been received in Manchester from Rome, investing the new Roman Catholic Church of St. John, Salford, with the dignity of a cathedral; and on Sunday next, Dr. Turner, the Bishop of Salford, will attend it as his episcopal church. There are only three other cathedrals in England—St. George, Southwark; St. Chad, Birmingham; and St. Barnabas, Nottingham. Very considerable decorations are to be shortly undertaken at St John's, including the gronin g of the chancel and its aisles, the erection of a marble altar and pulpit, and the filling of the window with stained glass.

At the monthly general meeting of the London Zoological Society, the report of the council stated that the number of visitors to the gardens on Whit Monday and Tuesday amounted to nearly 20,000, greatly exceeding the corresponding days in 1851 or any previous year. The most interesting births noticed in the report are a giraffe and a saucrvx antelope. The latter is the first instance of this beautiful animal having been produced in Europe

On Saturday H. R. H. Prince Albert honored the Royal Institution by taking the chair on the occasion of Professor Faraday's lecture on carbon, when he the last of a series on the non-metallic elements. For many instants, during the progress of the lecture, the theatre was illuminated by the combustion, in oxygen gas, of a somewhat expensive form of carbon, viz. the diamond! Specimens of diamond were also displayed, which had cost their admanting holders, and were invested in coke. One diamond of the series was particularly remarkable—only one end had been coked, the other being adamantine still.

A Parliamentary paper just issued states that in 1841 there were 1200 sailors and 146 steam vessels engaged in the coal trade that entered the port of London; and in 1851 there were 296 sailing and 302 steam vessels entered as engaged in the Irish trade.

The estimate of the expenses to be incurred in making the improvements under the Fisheries Improvement Bill, now before Parliament, is stated at £30,000.

By a return to Parliament just printed it appears that £11,000 was voted as applicable to the repair and re-building of the celebrated Marble Arch. The sum expended in taking down the arch was £636 18s., and with other expenses amounted to £3684 10s. 5d., leaving £6660 1s. 8d. out of the vote as applicable to the improvement of the area in front of Buckingham Palace, in St. James's Park. There was expended under the vote £5119 1s. 3d., and a further sum of £9341 8s. 4d., making the whole sum expended £11,058 11s., leaving £601 of which there was an expenditure of £2213 18s. not submitted to Parliament. There is £50,000 still applicable to the improvement and enlargement of Buckingham Palace, arising from the sale of the Royal Pavilion at Brighton.

At the Prussian Industrial Exhibition, Count Renard, a large proprietor of ironworks, exhibits sheet iron of such a degree of tenuity that the leaves can be used for paper. From the finest sort, the manufacturer sells 1000 square feet of what may be called leaf-iron from a cwt. of metal. A bookbinder of Breslau has made an album of nothing else, the pages of which turn as readily as if it were paper. As yet, however, no extensive application for this form of the metal has been found; but the manager says the material must precede the use for it. Perhaps books may hereafter be printed for the tropics on these metallic leaves, and defy the destructive power of ants and white cedar or strength of forceps. We have only to invent a white ink, and the thing is done.

LAW AND POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON AGAINST THE REV. J. E. GLADSTONE.—Sir J. Dodson delivered judgment in this case, on Thursday, in the Court of Arches. It will be recollected that the offence charged against Mr. Gladstone was to the effect that he had publicly read prayers, preached, and administered the Holy Sacrament, and performed divine offices in an unconsecrated chapel, called Long-acre Chapel, in the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, without any license from the Bishop, his previous license having been revoked by him, and contrary to the provisions of the Act of Uniformity. The learned judge went minutely into the whole case, and concluded as follows:—"I am of opinion that the facts charged in the articles are supported by sufficient proof; and I therefore admonish Mr. Gladstone to refrain from like conduct for the future—to refrain from reading prayers, publicly preaching, and administering divine offices in the unconsecrated building called Long-acre Chapel, until he obtains a license from the Bishop; and from performing any divine offices there or elsewhere in the diocese of London and province of Canterbury. And I condemn him in the costs of this suit." Mr. Tebbs, the proctor: With all due respect to the Court, we shall appeal against the decision.—The Dean of Arches: Very well; Judge will minutely into the whole case, and concluded as follows:—"I am of opinion that the facts charged in the articles are supported by sufficient proof; and I therefore admonish Mr. Gladstone to refrain from like conduct for the future—to refrain from reading prayers, publicly preaching, and administering divine offices in the unconsecrated building called Long-acre Chapel, until he obtains a license from the Bishop; and from performing any divine offices there or elsewhere in the diocese of London and province of Canterbury. medium, or fulcrum a point which Mr. Graham states to have been hitherto neglected in all attempts of this class. Again, by turning the handles attached to the ends of the apparatus, the operator can move the fins in any direction, so as to ascend or descend, move onward or backward, without the loss of either gas or ballast

Mr. Graham states that at a certain altitude there are no currents of air to contend with; and that a balloon propelled in this calm atmosphere, with such a power, could travel at a greatly accelerated speed. No springs are required to set the power in motion, as the aëronaut works the whole with treadles.

The accompanying Diagram shows the interior of the case attached to the hoop of the balloon, in which is contained the machinery that works the fins. A and B are the wheels by which the apparatus is set in motion: a rope passing over them gives to each a separate action; and the ends of the rope being again passed through two holes immediately under the wheels, and fastened to a treadle at the bottom of the car, a different motion is thus given to the machinery at each side of the wheels, and a movement communicated to the fins similar to the treading of a horse. By means of the handles at the outer sides, the apparatus contained in the case can be turned round at pleasure, and the position of the fins altered, thus enabling the operator to steer the balloon in any direction required. The machinery is worked standing. Mr. Graham has secured his invention by registration.

THE "GREAT BRITAIN" STEAM-SHIP.

THE accompanying Engraving completes our illustration of the refitting of this magnificent steam-ship. (See the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for April 3.)

As regards passenger accommodation, the Great Britain is unrivalled. The main deck, with the exception of the space necessarily left for the machinery, is devoted entirely to state-rooms—sixty-four of these in the after-part are fitted up with every care and comfort. Ladies' boudoirs are arranged on either side forward. The extreme stern is occupied by a lounging-room, from which two staircases ascend to the after-part of the main deck, the chief staircases being at the other end, close to the door of the saloon; by which means four distinct entrances are provided. Beyond a succession of state-rooms is the fore saloon. Above is the dining saloon, 50 feet by 16. In front are the capstan and stairs leading to the lower deck, where the ice-houses are arranged.

The grand saloon, 75 feet long, is on the after-part of the main deck, over the state rooms, and is tastefully decorated with paintings on glass of the armorial shields of all nations. Two ranges of tables run the whole length. Opposite the door is the pantry; and at the further end is a music-room, with an ornamental skylight, in which the deck binnacle is placed. On either side are the Captain's and chief officers' state-rooms. Behind is the smoking-room, and still further aft the wheel-house.

We have already noticed the quick passage of the Great Britain since her refitment.

LORD WILLOUGHBY D'ERESBY'S STEAM PLOUGH, AT GRIMSTHORPE.

PLOUGHING BY STEAM.

(To the Editor.)

As you have already published (p. 286, vol. XVI) a notice of the Steam Plough of Lord Willoughby d'Eresby, it may be interesting to your readers to be informed of the progress which has been made in the adaptation of such a novel and difficult application of steam power. Having had the opportunity of examining the working of the Steam Plough at Grimsthorpe, I am enabled, with his Lordship's permission, to lay the result of my observations before your readers. In the early trials a portable steam-engine was applied in the centre of the field, and its motion conveyed to a capstan fixed in the ground, on which a rope was coiled. To each end of this rope ploughs were attached, which were drawn alternately towards the engine by steam power, and from the engine towards the hedge by horses. To dispense entirely with the horses, two capstans were next employed, one at each end of the field, and the ropes were endless, so that the ploughs were moved in both directions by steam power.

In the present improved arrangement two engines are employed, one at each end of the field, as represented in the Sketch, the capstans being attached to the engines. The ploughs are made double-ended, and are drawn alternately by each engine along the field, so that, whilst the rope is being wound upon the capstan of one engine, it is being unwound off the capstan of the other, and vice versâ. Each engine, as it is alternately idle, is moved along a temporary tramway, formed of planks laid along the side of the hedge. To prevent the rope dragging in the furrow, six small wooden frames are dropped into the furrow, and provided with rollers over which the rope runs. Two ploughs are arranged together, each turning a furrow of nine inches. With a field 180 yards long between the engines, the ploughing of each furrow is 18 inches wide occupies 2½ minutes, the ploughs moving at rather less than 2¾ miles per hour. Allowing for the time lost in shifting the plough, this gives 4 acres per day at the present slow speed, which I see no difficulty in increasing to 4 miles per hour, when the men, who are only agricultural labourers, shall have acquired greater dexterity in managing the engines and ploughs.

To produce this result there are required two men to drive engines, four to shift ploughs and engines, one to hold plough, and three boys at trucks, and 7¼ cwt. of coke. Taking the wages of men and boys at 12s. per day, and the coke at 8s., or total 20s., the cost per acre will be 5s., which is about one-half the cost of ploughing by horse-power, with the advantage of doing it in half the time. In estimating, however, the pecuniary advantages of steam-ploughing, it must be viewed in connexion with a general system of farm machinery.

To such of your readers as desire to judge for themselves of the value of this invention, I recommend a visit to Grimsthorpe, where Mr Scott, who has charge of the Steam Plough, informs me it may be seen at work on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday in each week. The farm can boast of a stud of four beautiful portable engines, constructed by Mr. Goodi, of Swindon; two of which are at work, either for Lord Willoughby's own use or that of his tenants, thrashing, grinding, sawing timber and stone, making gutters and fences for the cottages, &c. The nearest stations to Grimsthorpe are Spalding, Peterborough, and Stamford.

In conclusion, I may express my conviction that all those preliminary difficulties, which, from the expense attending their removal, deter most persons from experiments of this class, have been overcome, and that the Steam Plough is now a "great fact," which may be taken up with advantage by our agricultural engineers, who have in this case no patent right to pay for. I am, sir, your obedient servant,

THE INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION AT CORK.

IT was a happy idea to institute in Ireland an Exhibition of the products of Irish Industry; nor was the choice of the beautiful and hospitable city of Cork, as the scene of this industrial gathering, by any means less happy than the original idea of the promoters. Every visitor of Ireland—and it has been said with truth that in every new visitor Ireland receives a new friend—is strongly impressed with the contrast presented by the agricultural and the manufacturing districts of that long-suffering country. Where the people depend solely upon agriculture, the land is covered with roofless tenements, deserted villages, untilled fields, and a squalid, half-famished, and degraded population, who fly from it as fast as ships can be found to carry them across the Atlantic, or who remain at home, either miserable and broken-spirited, or miserable and revengeful. On the other hand, where the people depend wholly or in part upon manufactures and commerce, the mud hovel is replaced by the brick and slated cottage—decent garments are seen instead of the most pitiable of all rags, the rags of the Irish cottier—the faces of the people are bright with the proverbial good-humour and joyousness of the national character—and the appearance of the country is as cheerful and flourishing as that of any part of England or Scotland. In fact, the want of manufactures has been one of the unhappily too numerous, and perhaps the greatest of the, causes that have produced the sufferings of a land for which nature has done so much and man so little. All that Protection afforded to Irish in common with British agriculture, failed to protect or feed the people; and it was mainly the misery of that portion of the country and its agriculturists, as all the world know, which compelled the late illustrious Statesman, whose loss we yet deplore, to follow, as Mr. Disraeli is now doing, the spirit of the age, and to establish Free Trade as the only possible alleviation and remedy for their sufferings. Had it not been for trade and manufactures, the condition of Ireland, wretched as it was prior to the year 1846, would have been still worse; and had it not been for Free Trade, the state of the country, bad as it has been subsequent to that memorable epoch, would have been far more deplorable and disastrous;—a visible darkness without a ray of hope. Protected agriculture, and the scantiness or absence of manufactures, brought Ireland to the verge of ruin. Free Trade and free industry, and scope for both, will yet restore her to her right place, unless religious and political squabbles should unhappily defeat the work. We hope, however, for better things. As the Mayor of Cork aptly reminded the Viceroy, the country has indeed passed through a severe ordeal of calamity and privations; and it is impossible to read the account of the proceedings, and to reflect upon the good feeling which pervaded all classes, as well as upon the highly creditable display of objects of art and industry which the Exhibition presented, without believing that the worst has passed. Every Englishman, as well as every Irishman, will cordially join in the wish expressed on the occasion, "that the Exhibition may prove the commencement of an era of cheering contrast to the years that have gone by, and that it may be followed by the results which its promoters had in view—the more profitable development of the resources of Ireland, and the triumph of the skill and intelligence of her people."

Among the more prominent objects exhibited as proofs of the ingenuity and proficiency of Irishmen in the industrial as well as in the fine arts, were machinery, carriages, agricultural implements, furniture, carved woods, paper, porcelain, and the staple textile fabrics for which Belfast and the north of Ireland are unrivalled. In addition to these, the genius of Irishmen for sculpture was ably represented by the works of Hogan and Macdowall—familiar to all the visitors of the Crystal Palace, where they previously played no mean part in stimulating and administering to the love of the beautiful. And if Ireland made particularly manifest on this occasion a fact which none denied, that her sons are well qualified to run in the great race of competition with the skilled workmen of the world, it is more for the hopefulness of the occasion than for the greatness of the present results, that the Exhibition assumes a character of national importance.

There are two distinct and yet related branches of manufacture for which Ireland is peculiarly well fitted, and for which her soil and climate, as well as her water power, offer the most admirable facilities, that would, if properly developed, and left free to the vivifying influence of English capital, and to the energies of the population, suffice to eradicate, by no slow process, the moral and physical evils that always attend upon semi-starvation. The one is the manufacture of linen, the other is the scarcely less important manufacture of paper. The first can scarcely be said to have attained its proper growth, or to employ a quarter of the people that it might employ, were the cultivation of flax better understood by Irish farmers. The second can scarcely be said to exist at all, though, were it not for the operation of the Excise laws, that prevent the manufacture of agricultural refuse into paper, many thousands of persons of both sexes, now the tenants of the palatial workhouses, or no less palatial lunatic asylums of Ireland, might be employed as contented and well-fed labourers. But public attention has lately been strongly drawn to both of these great branches of industry, and in due course of time there is reason to believe that they will meet with favour and encouragement, not simply at the hands of capitalists and of the Government, but at those of the owners and occupiers of the soil. By degrees the estates of Ireland will fall into the possession of solvent proprietors, who will find it their interest, as well as that of their tenantry, to introduce and stimulate the cultivation of flax, for the double purposes of the linen and of the paper manufacture; in which case we may expect the south of Ireland to become as happy and flourishing as the north, and the wild and desolate west to wear a smile of prosperity which shall rival that of the now more favoured east. When the land shall be intersected with railways, as it speedily will be—when the submarine telegraph shall be daily at work in conveying the tidings of business to be done—when Galway and the ports of the west shall be the packet stations in direct and immediate communication with the western world over the Atlantic—and when the subtle agency of electricity shall bring Galway and New York within five minutes of each other, as they must and will be brought before many years shall elapse—we may expect that not even the annual emigration of hundreds of thousands of stalwart and willing men, and—what is far worse—not even the political feuds and religious animosities of ages, will prevent Ireland from assuming her true position—that of an integral part of Great Britain, her equal in worldly wealth, as well as in freedom and intelligence.

Such, at least, are the hopes that may not irrationally or oversanguinely be formed of the future condition of Ireland, when she shall finally recover from the prostration of energy with which long years of calamity have afflicted her. Of this happy consummation the signs at the present time are neither few nor feeble. The Cork Exhibition is important as being the last and most striking of these signs, but it is far from being the only one. With a little more confidence on the part of capitalists—a confidence which is fast growing—Ireland will be raised from the condition of a purely agricultural, to that of an agricultural ,manufacturing, and commercial country. She will then rise in the scale of nations, and her name will no longer be synonymous with turbulence, misgovernment, and misery.

COLOSSAL STATUE OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON, JUST ERECTED AT EDINBURGH.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

COLOSSAL BRONZE EQUESTRIAN STATUE OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON, AT EDINBURGH.

THE citizens of Edinburgh have this year appropriately commemorated the anniversary of the Battle of Waterloo by the inauguration of a splendid Statue of its illustrious hero

This great work of art, which we engrave upon the preceding page, has just been placed in front of the Register-House, Edinburgh, and forms one of the most striking objects in that romantic and beautiful city. The Statue is colossal in dimensions, measuring nearly 14 feet in height; and, together with the pedestal, which is of Aberdeen granite, rising from the ground about 25 feet. The bronze weighs nearly 12 tons. This is by far the most perfect sculptured work ever produced in Scotland, and will serve to extend and perpetuate the fame of the already eminent sculptor, Mr John Steell. It also derives additional interest from its being the first bronze statue ever cast in Scotland, and from its having been executed in the artist's own studio, under the immediate superintendence, as was the practice of the celebrated Chantrey.

Us he most other bronze statues, in this the different parts are not riveted together, but fused—an improvement attended by considerable labour and difficulty. The only parts of the horse which touch the pedestal are the hind feet and the tail; and, accordingly, in order to preserve the balance, great skill was required in apportioning exactly to each part its proper weight of metal. We believe the only other equestrian statue in a similar posture is that of Peter the Great, at St Petersburgh, where the difficulty is chiefly overcome by the not very appropriate introduction of a serpent, upon which the horse is trampling, and which not only strengthens the hind legs, but projects far behind, and serves as a bal nce.

The Statue represents the Duke mounted on his charger, and issuing orders i the reins lie loose on the neck of his plunging steed; in one hand he holds them and his plumed hat, and with the other points commandingly to a distant part of the field. The time of life selected by the sculptor is that in which the character and intellect of the Duke have stamped themselves in fullest vigour upon his countenance—apparently between forty-five and fifty, nearly approximating to the Duke's age in his crowning battle. His head is bare, and closely covered; and the shortness of the somewhat crisp and wavy hair dep ys the well-turned contour of the head and the bold firm features of its face. In his younger days, as Lady Hester Stanhope once said to us, the Duke possessed the charm of beauty in no common degree; but the Statue embodies more of the comfortable firmness of resolve, which so peculiarly characterised his maturity.

The steed, it will be seen, is in a rearing position, and in a state of high excitement; his dilated nostrils, expanded eye-balls, and startled mane embodying the description of the war-horse in Job. The likeness of the Duke is admirable; the draping chaste and effective; and, while the habiliments and accoutrements of a Field-Marshal are faithfully depicted, the military cloak is arranged in a manner to secure a continua..on of flowing line, and to render the bald trimness of the modern costume less observable. We beg to congratulate the artist on his success, and the metropolis of Scotland on the possession of this noble memorial of the hero of Waterloo.

The Statue was announced to be inaugurated, with grand Masonic ceremony, on the 18th (yesterday); and the event was to be celebrated by a public dinner at the Hopetoun Rooms.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

ADDISCOMBE MILITARY COLLEGE.—On Saturday last the chairman and a large body of the directors of the Hon. East India Company proceeded to Addiscombe, to receive the usual half-yearly report of the progress of the students. Amongst the distinguished visitors were Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, the Marquis of Normanby, the Marquis Camden, the Earl of Carlisle, Lord Frederick Fitzclarence, Lord Gough, Lord Montcagle, Lord De Ros, &c, and a large number of military officers of both services. The following prizes were awarded:—First Class.—Mr. A. M Innes, in fortification, military surveying, first-class drawing, and the gold Pollock medal. Mr. H. F. Hancock, second prize in mathematics, second in fortification, military drawing, and civil drawing. Mr. E. W. Kingsley, prize in fortification, first prize for general good conduct (a splendid artillery sword). Several other prizes having been awarded, the greater part of the company adjourned to the house of the Lieutenant-Governor, where a sumptuous luncheon was provided, and the proceedings of the day terminated.

THE MILITIA ESTIMATES.—In a Parliamentary document recently printed there is a report from the Select Committee of the House of Commons appointed to prepare the militia estimates for the year ending the 31st of March, 1853. The estimate of the charge of the disembodied militia of Great Britain and Ireland from the 1st of April, 1852, to the 31st of March, 1853, both days inclusive, is £386,715—£255,515 for Great Britain, and £1,400 for Ireland. The sum provided in 1851-52 was £403,700. The cost of raising and training 50,000 men for England and Wales in the current year is thus made up. For bounds and recruiting charges payable on enrolment and after one year's service, £50,000; for pay and exercise, £74,200; clothing for non-commissioned officers and men, £63,700; beer money, marching money, and contingencies, £3,000; for pay, allowances, and clothing of officers, £39,700 for disembodied allowances of pensioners, &c., £7,000; for pay and allowances of subaltern and other staff officers, £3,000; for pay and allowances of officers of militia; making £355,515 as the charge for England and Wales in the year end ng the 31st of March next

THE ROYAL MARINES AT WOOLWICH.—The Lords of the Admiralty have placed Captain Hewsey and Lieutenant Swain, of the Woolwich division, on permanent half-pay, owing to the events which led to the late assault and subsequent courts martial in which those officers figured as the principals.

THE ARMY AND NAVY.—Mr. Hume has obtained a return (not printed) relating to the number of all ranks in the army, and also the force of the Royal navy from 1st Jan. to 31st July. In 1838-39 the total of the land and sea force was 138,182 [illegible] was employed [illegible] and in 1851-52 [illegible]

ROYAL NAVY SCHOOL, NEW CROSS.—[illegible] presided on Tuesday, at the School [illegible] in the chair. Of the visitors, many were [illegible] Sir John Ross, Admiral Moyne, Admiral Price, Captains Holdrook, O'Callaghan, Marrett, King, Cornwall, Jay, Boys, Wilson, &c. The President having opened the proceedings with a suitable and congratulatory address, the examiners' reports were read. From these it appeared that the state of education, seamanship, and religious, in the institution was most satisfactory. The usual number of prizes was then awarded.

The Edinburgh, 56, Captain Hewlett, at Portsmouth, is now taking in her powder and shells. On her trials on the 5th ult. along the measured mile she far surpassed in speed all other screw line-of-battle ships. In six runs she averaged 8½ knots; but for the first four at full steam she made an average of 9 knots. She makes 72 or 74 revolutions when either of the corresponding speeds of her class, and consequently her speed is superior by 1½ knots. Maudslay and Field are the makers of her machinery.

The Vulcan iron troop steam-ship, at Portsmouth, Commander Von Donop, is fitting up with coal, &c., and six months' provisions and stores, being ordered to prepare for the embarkation of four companies of the 60th Regiment for Australia: these she takes to Melbourne; the remaining two companies will be conveyed in some other ship for Port Phillip.

Letters from the Mediterranean announce the visit to Palermo of the Archduke Maximilian, brother to the Emperor, in the Volta frigate. Before he left the French fleet arrived, consisting of six sail of the line and four steam-frigates. They remained a week, during which the two Admirals and all the superior officers were splendidly entertained by his Excellency the Viceroy and the Earl of Shrewsbury. On leaving, they sailed for Tunis. The English fleet was expected soon.

On Saturday last the second flower-show this season of the Horticultural Society took place at their gardens, Chiswick. In consequence of the unsettled state of the weather, there was but a scanty attendance of visitors on the [illegible]. The [illegible] of flowers was early in the day considerable. The [illegible] awarded as follows. For best collection of 20 stove or greenhouse [illegible] Mr. Bause, gold Banksian medal (Mr. [illegible] gold Banksian medal. For best collection of 12 stove or greenhouse plants, in collections of [illegible] gold Banksian, Mr. Gaines; silver Banksian, Mr Carson. Stove or greenhouse plants, in collections of six plants not exceeding 30 inches in diameter: gold Banksian, Mr. May; gold Banksian, Mr. Ingram. For exotic orchids, in collections of [illegible] Bause; gold Knowlian, Mr Franklin; gold Banksian, Mr Williams. For orchids, in collections of 12: gold Banksian, Messrs. Veitch; silver ditto, Messrs. Robinsons. Exotic orchids, in collections of 10: gold Knowlian, Mr. Carson; silver gilt, Mr. Woolley. For single specimens: gold Banksian, Mr. Smith, Orpington. For roses in pots, in collections of 12: gold Banksian, Mr. Terry; gold Banksian, Messrs. Lane. Cape heaths, in collections of 10 (entirely distinct varieties): no gold Banksian, Mr Smith; gold Banksian, Messrs. Collinson.

On the 31st ult., 37 veterans, remnants of the French army under the Empire, met at the banquet at Vico, near Mondovi (Piedmont). Their ages collectively gave a total of 6246 years, making an average of 64 years and half or nearly five months. The Cistercian monks of the place placed their cellar at the disposal of these living relics of a stirring period, and the band of the National Guard of Mondovi played at the banquet.

A Cambridge town-councillor having refused to pay a levy of sixpence a week for watering the street, twenty-four of his neighbours subscribed the amount in farthings, and made him a present of it, intimating that the subscription would be continued weekly so long as [illegible]

The British fleet [illegible] Admiral Sir Charles Rowley (who is to arrange with the Government of Portugal about the [illegible] at Madeira by command of Sir Charles Bullen), with the [illegible] to return at Easter to the Mediterranean [illegible]. It is stated, however, that Urquiza, the President of the Argentine Republic, has evinced an anxious desire to meet the wishes of the British and French Governments, and that we may reasonably hope that the waters of La Plata will soon be opened to the traffic of the world.

The Fremantle Park Estate (freehold), consisting of a domain of 149 acres of exceedingly fine land, with a splendid mansion, was on Tuesday sold by private contract to Mr. Sampson Payne, of Southampton. The estate is situated within a mile of that borough, and was for many years in the possession of the late Gen. Sir George Hewett, and is now occupied by the present Baronet. The purchase-money (including the timber) is somewhere near £20,000.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The "vexed question" of the confiscation of the Orleans property in conformity with the organic decree of the 22d of January last, has again been mooted in public in the form of an appeal to the Council of State against the recent decision of the Tribunal of First Instance of the Seine, declaring the competency of that tribunal to take cognizance of the legality of the organic decree of confiscation. The question has thus assumed the shape of a contest between the executive and the judicial powers of the State. The arguments were heard on Tuesday last.

The Court consisted of the Committee on Disputed Questions (Section du Contentieux) of the Council of State, and of ten additional Councillors of State selected by the Government from the other sections of the Council. The names of the latter are MM. Tourangin and Sum, of the section of Legislation; MM. J. Boulay and Charles Giraud, of the section of the Interior; MM. Vieillefroy and Wasse, of the section of Public Works; MM. Aboard and Villeman, of the section of War; and MM. Charlemagne and Vuitry, of the section of Finances. M. Baroche, Vice-President of the Council of State, presided. The appeal was founded on the ground that the edicts of th. Prince President during his dictatorship, having the force of law, cannot be questioned by any legal tribunals.

M. Leon Cornudet, the member of the committee appointed to report on the question, presented his report, the reading of which formed the opening of the proceedings. There are three descriptions of property involved in the sweeping provisions of the confiscation decree:—1. The property of Madame Adelaide, bequeathed by that Princess at her death to members of her family; 2. The property bought by Louis Philippe when Duke of Orleans and when King; 3. The apanage of Louis Philippe when Duke of Orleans, as Prince of the blood Royal of the realm. Should M. Cornudet has arrived at in his report is, that no question or conflit can be raised with regard to the competence of the ordinary tribunals touching the seizure of the first two descriptions of property; that is, that these tribunals are unquestionably competent; but that touching the apanage, such conflit can be raised. The question is, therefore, partly favourable to the executive power, and partly to the judicial. The dictatorial decree of 22d January is recognised as legally effective with regard to the confiscation of the apanage, but it was declared that it was not in the Senator's power to bar the jurisdiction of the tribunals affecting the other kinds of property enumerated.

M. Paul Favre, the principal advocate for the Orleans family on the occasion, addressed the court in support of his client's case, with great clearness, for upwards of three hours. He contended that the decrees of the 22d of January, 1852, were neither a law nor a political act. They could not be considered a law, for a law could not have a retroactive effect; and nothing that was done by the decrees of the 22d of January could prevent Louis Philippe from having been proprietor on the 7th of August, 1830, of the possessions comprised in the act of donation, and now confiscated by the decrees of January 22—if such were really the case. Neither could it be said, if the heirs of Louis Philippe were the real possessors of these domains on the 21st of January, that, for anything contained in the decrees of the 22d, they had ceased to be the possessors of the property on the 23d. Then it could not be said that the decrees were a political act; for the terms of the decrees themselves plainly indicated that they were not so, by saying that the Government reclaimed property which had devolved on the State, in virtue of the advent of Louis Philippe to the throne. The decrees of the 22d of January were, therefore, nothing more nor less than a claim put in by the State to the possessions of Louis Philippe when he ascended the throne; and, as such, the question was clearly a proper one to be submitted to the ordinary tribunals of justice. M. Favre then alluded to the rights of other parties over the properties in question—rights which were unquestioned, and which could not be annihilated by the decrees of the 22d of January, or by any other act of Government. He declared that if the proprietors of land and other immoveable property trembled while waiting for the decision of the Council of State on this important question, it was not because they did not consider themselves sufficiently strong, but because they considered the question

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE CALEDONIAN BALL.—This annual festival in aid of the funds of the Scottish charities of the metropolis took place on Monday at Willis's Rooms, when a numerous gathering of the aristocracy was assembled. The ladies patronesses were the Duchess of Somerset, the Duchess of Buccleuch, the Duchess of Athol, the Duchess of Montrose, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Marchioness of Abercorn, the Marchioness of Aylesbury, the Countess of Fowis, the Countess of Airlie, the Countess of Rosebery, the Countess of Bradford, the Countess of Eglinton, Lady Willoughby d'Eresby, Lady Carrington, Lady Strangford, Lady Clarieris, &c. Their efforts on the present occasion were most successful, and the drooping funds of some of the oldest charities in the metropolis will obtain valuable assistance from the funds realised on Monday night.

THE ROYAL GARDENERS' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—The ninth anniversary festival of this institution was held on Monday, at the London Tavern, when a sumptuous dinner was provided; Clear as Dickens, Esq., in the chair, supported by H. T. Hope, M.P.; Sir John V B Johnston, Bart., M.P.; Sir William Paxton, &c. About 130 gentlemen sat down to dinner. In aid of the present Sir William Paxton furnished the pineapples, the largest weighing 5lb. Grapes were furnished from the gardens of the Marquis of Aylesbury, the Marquis of Lansdowne, and Mr. Spencer. Sir Joseph Paxton acknowledged the toast of the evening, and, in doing so, adverted to the circumstances attending the design of the first Crystal Palace, and to the new edifice about to be erected at Sydenham, which he represented as an edifice which would be far more magnificent in its appearance. The secretary made the first report of subscriptions, among which we recognised those of the Duke of Devonshire, 20 guineas; the chairman, 5 guineas; Sir Joseph Paxton, in addition to many other subscriptions, 10 guineas; Henry T. Hope, Esq., M.P., 10 guineas, in addition to many other donations; Sir Brook Bridges, 10 guineas; Sir J V. Johnstone, 5 guineas, and 1 guinea annually; W. P. Bathe, Esq., London Tavern, 5 guineas; Westminster Brewery, 10 guineas; Robert Hanbury, Esq., 10 guineas; Sir W Jolliffe, 10 guineas; Truman, Hanbury, and Co., 10 guineas, &c.

WESTERN JEWISH GIRLS' FREE SCHOOL.—The fifth annual public examination of the pupils was held on Monday, at the rooms, 20, Dean-street, Soho-square, in the absence of Mr. Alderman Salomons, the chair was filled by Mr. Reuben, the treasurer. Among the company present were—the Chief Rabbi, the Baroness de Rothschild and the Baroness Meyer de Rothschild, the Misses Rothschild, Mr. Bravo, of Jamaica, &c. The school, it appeared, is a means of elucidating disease is so well known, the Council of the College have acted meritoriously in conferring this honour (the first professorship of Histology in Britain) on the author of the privileged first work upon Cellular Chemistry.

THE LIBRARY OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—The report from the standing committee on the library of the House of Commons was printed on Wednesday last. In October, and corporate Seal of the Houses of Parliament by order of the House be annually compiled and prepared from time to time for publication

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—The births registered in the metropolis, for the week ending Saturday, June 12, were—Males, 692; females, 622: total, 1314. The deaths during the same period were—Males, 448; females, 448: total, 896; showing a trifling decleusion of mortality from the previous week. By the official report it appears that on the table of fatal cases, the class of zymotic or epidemic diseases numbers 266 cases, which nearly corresponds with the corrected average; tubercular diseases, including phthisis, 181 cases; diseases of the organs of respiration, 110; which is also near the usual amount of the season. In the week that ended by the previous returns was reported as having been fatal to 79 persons. In the week ending 22d May, 50 deaths were referred to it; in the next week, 49; and in each of the two following, also 49. Pneumonia exhibits a decrease, having been fatal in the last few weeks to 42 and 43 persons respectively. Amongst the 21 complaints of which the epidemic class is composed, scarlatina and small-pox last week produced the greatest number of deaths, the former having been fatal in 45 cases, the latter in 36. None of the victims in small-pox were of 15 years of age and upwards: and, with regard to five, whose ages were respectively seven months, and 2, 22, 26, and 27 years, it is stated that vaccination had been previously performed.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean height of the barometer in the week was 29 475 in. The mean temperature of the week was 54·9 deg., which is 4·2 deg. below the average of the same week in ten years. On Tuesday it was 59·5 deg. on Monday, after which it fell till it was only 49·3 deg. on Saturday, or 10 degrees be ow the average The wind blew from the south-east on the first two days, and generally from the south-west afterwards. The amount of rain which fell in the week was 2·63 in. More than half the whole amount fell on Wednesday.

FATAL COAL-PIT ACCIDENT.—A melancholy accident occurred on Monday morning last, at one of the coal-pits in Messrs. Dunmock and Co.'s Bunker's-hill Colliery, Bilston, soon after the men had assembled at the works. It appears that a man who has the care of the furnace which is placed in one of the underground ways, to prevent the current of air passing directly from the bottom of one shaft to the other, and to force it through the whole of the workings. By some means or other, such a communication of the mine was made that the furnace was extinguished, and consequently the accumulation of explosive gas went on from the Sunday morning till the time of the accident the next morning; and as the first couple of men were going down the work, unsuspicious of danger, the immense accumulation of highly explosive gas suddenly ignited from the unprotected candles carried by the men, and this communicating with two casks of blasting powder, which unfortunately happened to be deposited in some part of the pit, these two casks simultaneously exploded, surrounding the unhappy colliers in one sheet of fire, causing the death of five, and inflicting serious injuries upon 17 of the workmen who were below. Four of five horses that were in the pit at the time of the accident only one was brought up alive, though seriously injured.

ACCIDENT AT SEA TO THE MAIL SCREW STEAMER "THE QUEEN OF THE SOUTH."—On Thursday morning information was received at the Admiralty Post Office, that the above vessel, which sailed from Plymouth on the 15th inst., with mails for the Cape of Good Hope, Mauritius, and Ceylon, India, Ascension, Sierra Leone, and Cape de Verd, had sustained damage at sea, and had been obliged to put back to Plymouth for repairs.

A collision took place in the Kilsby Tunnel, on the North-Western Railway, about eleven o'clock in the forenoon of Monday, in consequence of a coal train from Rugby to Birmingham running into a ballast train from Birmingham, which immediately preceded it, the presence of which in the tunnel had not been signal ed to the Rugby train. The driver and stoker of the coal train, perceiving the train ahead of them, jumped off immediately after the collision had shut off his steam and reversed the engine. A frightful collision, however, took place, by which a man named Williams, a plate-layer employed on the line, was killed, his back having been broken in two or three places; and 6 other plate-layers, who were standing on some of the trucks of the ballast train, were more or less injured

The Rev. Mr. Fitzpatrick, a Roman Catholic clergyman, was drowned near Donnycarnick on Friday last, while bathing.

The Telegraph (Dublin newspaper) states that Mr. Badeley, the eminent Englis. barrister, has been received into the Catholic Church.

It is said that Victor Hugo's intention is to take up his residence in the neighbourhood of England or in Jersey, and to devote himself exclusively to literary labours. It is not generally known that he is almost as skilful with his pencil as eloquent with his pen. A batch of his drawings at the sale of his effects last week, in Paris, excited keen competition.

Upwards of £30,000 weekly have been lost in wages during the fifteen weeks' strike by 20,000 skilled operatives, or £450,000 in all. It is a moderate calculation to which places the loss of profit and the fines from the employers at the same amount, in all nearly a million sterling has been deducted from the fund for the payment of wages, by the agency of those whose great aim was artificially to raise wages.

From a return for Parliament just printed, it appears that in the year ended the 5th of January last there were 9,008,428 gallons of wine imported, and 7,974,657 gallons of spirits. In bond, on the 5th of January, there were 18,145,149 gallons of wine, and 8,165,783 gallons of spirits.

Amongst the items of the Chinese news received by the overland mail, mention is made of the trial of twelve men of the late ship Herald, for the murder of Captain Lawson and others on board, in the Straits of Anjeer. Ten of them were found guilty and condemned to death.

In the Encumbered Estates Court in Dublin, £186,000 was privately offered for the purchase of the extensive estates in Galway of the late Thomas Barrowell Martin. The chief commissioner, Baron Richards, postponed his division upon this offer until next Monday

The Vimiera, which has just arrived from Sydney (being ninety-four days from her passage), has on board about 70 passengers from the diggings. Among the passengers landed from the Vimiera was Mr. Fairfax, the editor of the Sydney Morning Herald, who has come for the purpose of purchasing steam-printing machinery, and engaging compositors, &c., for the service of that paper.

An accident of a most serious character occurred on the Aylesbury branch of the London and North-Western Railway, near the Cheddington Junction, on Friday week. An extensive amount of sun blisters on the rails, the train passed down a slight embankment, and forcing its way through a hedge rolled over into a ditch. All the passengers escaped injury, except a lady and child, who were severely bruised. George Allen, the guard of the train was killed, the train having gone over him. He has left a widow and four children. The stoker was also injured, but not to any considerable extent. On Wednesday an inquest was held on the body of Allen, when upon the evidence of several medical death and the following statement by the jury: "That in satisfactory reason appearing in the evidence for the ongine going off the rails, the jury are unable to come to any other conclusion than that there was some defect rebelled with the rails or the sleepers in the GRAND DINNER AT THE MANSION-HOUSE.—On Wednesday the Lord Mayor gave a sumptuous entertainment to the prelates and a great number of the other ecclesiastics of the Church, upon their return from St. Paul's after the sermon in aid of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, preached by the Right Rev. the Bishop of Michigan. Covers were laid in the Egyptian Hall for upwards of 300. The Bishops of Michigan and Western New York were amongst the guests as a deputation from America.

BOTANICAL GARDENS, REGENT'S PARK.—Owing to the unfavourable state of the weather on June 9th, the public were on Wednesday invited to pay a sort of commutation visit to these gardens, for the purpose of inspecting the rhododendrons, azaleas, kalmias, &c., which were still blooming in undiminished beauty. The assembled company was very numerous. The show was enlivened by the bands of two or three regiments; and if the flowers that are usually looked for by the lovers of nature were absent, the enjoyment of a fine afternoon and an animating scene made up for them

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN BANKING COMPANY.—On Tuesday the annual meeting of this company was held at the establishment in Old Broad-street, City. Mr. E Divett, M.P., took the chair. It appears from the profit and loss account to the 31st of May, that the balance of undivided profits is £24,511 9s. 3d. In conformity with the deed of settlement and charter, the usual amount of 10 per cent (£2151) on the nett profits has been transferred to the reserve fund, which, with the interest on this former amount, will now stand at £23,151 10s. 10d. The nett profits after these deductions will be £19,360 9s. 5d., from which the court of directors recommend for the ensuing year, a dividend of six per cent per annum, and a further amount on account of profits for the year of 1½ per share. The report having been unanimously adopted, and a resolution founded thereon agreed to, the meeting was made special for increasing the capital of the bank from £200,000 to £300,000, for which the sanction of the Lords of the Treasury had been obtained. The resolution for the increase of capital passed, and the meeting adjourned.

TRIBUNALS OF COMMERCE.—On Wednesday a meeting of the friends of the bill introduced for the establishment of Tribunals of Commerce was held at the London Tavern, for the purpose of appointing a sub-committee to promote the object of the association. Mr. Montagu Gore, M.P., in the chair. Resolutions were adopted in accordance with the object of the meeting.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS.—Mr. John Quekett, the accomplished microscopist, has just been appointed Professor of Histology to the Royal College of Surgeons of England; and, as it is principally to Mr. Quekett's indefatigable exertions that the museum of that establishment owes a means of elucidating disease is so well known, the Council of the College have acted meritoriously in conferring this honour (the first professorship of Histology in Britain) on the author of the privileged first work upon Cellular Chemistry.

THE LIBRARY OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—The report from the standing committee on the library of the House of Commons was printed on Wednesday last. In October, and corporate Seal of the Houses of Parliament by order of the House be annually compiled and prepared from time to time for publication

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—The births registered in the metropolis, for the week ending Saturday, June 12, were—Males, 692; females, 622: total, 1314. The deaths during the same period were—Males, 448; females, 448: total, 896; showing a trifling decleusion of mortality from the previous week. By the official report it appears that on the table of fatal cases, the class of zymotic or epidemic diseases numbers 266 cases, which nearly corresponds with the corrected average; tubercular diseases, including phthisis, 181 cases; diseases of the organs of respiration, 110; which is also near the usual amount of the season. In the week that ended by the previous returns was reported as having been fatal to 79 persons. In the week ending 22d May, 50 deaths were referred to it; in the next week, 49; and in each of the two following, also 49. Pneumonia exhibits a decrease, having been fatal in the last few weeks to 42 and 43 persons respectively. Amongst the 21 complaints of which the epidemic class is composed, scarlatina and small-pox last week produced the greatest number of deaths, the former having been fatal in 45 cases, the latter in 36. None of the victims in small-pox were of 15 years of age and upwards: and, with regard to five, whose ages were respectively seven months, and 2, 22, 26, and 27 years, it is stated that vaccination had been previously performed.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean height of the barometer in the week was 29 475 in. The mean temperature of the week was 54·9 deg., which is 4·2 deg. below the average of the same week in ten years. On Tuesday it was 59·5 deg. on Monday, after which it fell till it was only 49·3 deg. on Saturday, or 10 degrees be ow the average The wind blew from the south-east on the first two days, and generally from the south-west afterwards. The amount of rain which fell in the week was 2·63 in. More than half the whole amount fell on Wednesday.

FATAL COAL-PIT ACCIDENT.—A melancholy accident occurred on Monday morning last, at one of the coal-pits in Messrs. Dunmock and Co.'s Bunker's-hill Colliery, Bilston, soon after the men had assembled at the works. It appears that a man who has the care of the furnace which is placed in one of the underground ways, to prevent the current of air passing directly from the bottom of one shaft to the other, and to force it through the whole of the workings. By some means or other, such a communication of the mine was made that the furnace was extinguished, and consequently the accumulation of explosive gas went on from the Sunday morning till the time of the accident the next morning; and as the first couple of men were going down the work, unsuspicious of danger, the immense accumulation of highly explosive gas suddenly ignited from the unprotected candles carried by the men, and this communicating with two casks of blasting powder, which unfortunately happened to be deposited in some part of the pit, these two casks simultaneously exploded, surrounding the unhappy colliers in one sheet of fire, causing the death of five, and inflicting serious injuries upon 17 of the workmen who were below. Four of five horses that were in the pit at the time of the accident only one was brought up alive, though seriously injured.

ACCIDENT AT SEA TO THE MAIL SCREW STEAMER "THE QUEEN OF THE SOUTH."—On Thursday morning information was received at the Admiralty Post Office, that the above vessel, which sailed from Plymouth on the 15th inst., with mails for the Cape of Good Hope, Mauritius, and Ceylon, India, Ascension, Sierra Leone, and Cape de Verd, had sustained damage at sea, and had been obliged to put back to Plymouth for repairs.

A collision took place in the Kilsby Tunnel, on the North-Western Railway, about eleven o'clock in the forenoon of Monday, in consequence of a coal train from Rugby to Birmingham running into a ballast train from Birmingham, which immediately preceded it, the presence of which in the tunnel had not been signal ed to the Rugby train. The driver and stoker of the coal train, perceiving the train ahead of them, jumped off immediately after the collision had shut off his steam and reversed the engine. A frightful collision, however, took place, by which a man named Williams, a plate-layer employed on the line, was killed, his back having been broken in two or three places; and 6 other plate-layers, who were standing on some of the trucks of the ballast train, were more or less injured

The Rev. Mr. Fitzpatrick, a Roman Catholic clergyman, was drowned near Donnycarnick on Friday last, while bathing.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The South American mail brings accounts, dated May 5, from Monte Video, from which we learn that the River Plate political matters still remained undecided and unsatisfactory; the only news of importance being that Urquiza had acknowledged the independence of Paraguay, in the name of the Argentine Confederation.

From Rio de Janeiro (Brazil), under date May 15, it is stated that the yellow fever had revisited that city and was making fearful ravages. Out of a ship-load of recruits from the Azores, 270 in number, all had died of the yellow fever except 37; out of the 17 workmen who went out in the last packet to the New Gas Company, 6 are now living

At the date of the last advices from Brazil (May 15), a political change had taken place in the Brazilian Ministry. Marinus is now Minister of the Interior; Raymos, Justice; Natconcellas, Marine; Pauline, Foreign; Secundin, War, Torres, Finance.

The Danish Government has refused to acknowledge, and has pronounced null and void, all the loans, whether forced or voluntary, contracted by the provisional Governments which administered the affairs of Schleswig-Holstein since 1848, and until the restoration of the authority of the sovereignty in the Duchies. This act has produced a great sensation, as the Government of the Stadthalterschaft was recognised by the Frankfort Diet, and the bonds which it created during its provisional sway was considered at Hamburgh as legitimate as any upon the Bourse.

The dissensions in the interior of the Danish Ministry have led to the retirement of Count Reventlow-Criminil, the Minister for Holstein, and representative of the policy of conciliation.

The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer Madrid has been siezed by the Custom House authorities at Southampton, in consequence of a large quantity of tobacco having been found concealed on board of her.

Information has been received by the police that some expert thief had contrived to purloin a plate-chest, the property of Sr. John Pringle, containing about £1000 worth of plate, from off the roof of a cab, whilst conveying Sir John's luggage from the Waterloo railway station to 239, Maida-vale, Paddington. The plate has a crest of St. Andrew's cross, and motto, "Cornat ides."

The customary anniversary dinner of the noblemen and gentlemen educated at the Harrow School took place on Saturday last at the Thatched House. Among the company present were the Viscount Newport, Lord Hopetoun, Mr. Wodehouse, M.P.; Mr. Thomas Conolly, M.P.; Mr. M. Portal, M.P.; Viscount Hinton, and Sir Robert Peel. M.P.

A few days since, as a bull was rushing in a furious manner through the streets of Spain, in France, a soldier belonging to the 4th Carabineers stood courageously in the middle of the street to stop the animal. The moment the bull came within reach he seized it by the horns, and by a quick and vigorous movement turned it over on the ground, and held it there until it could be properly secured.

The total income on account of northern lighthouses for the year 1851 was £192 13s. The expenditure within the same period was £191 19s. 6d., leaving a surplus of £14,765 17s. 6d. From this there is to be deducted, excess of expenditure in 1850, £21,332 10s. 10d., which leaves a balance at the close of 1851 of £6606 13s. 8d

The Jubilee Committees for the Great Exhibition have reported that the total value of all the articles exhibited (exclusive of the Koh-i-noor diamond, the worth of which is altogether of a capricious description) did not exceed £12,000,000. It was supposed at the period that the value was not under £12,000,000.

Sir David Brewster has discovered and placed it beyond doubt that the diamond in the Queen's possession, and which last summer figured so prominently in the Great Exhibition, is not the genuine Koh-i-noor that belonged to the Great Mogul. It is a very fine diamond, however, and as the one which Shah Soojah surrendered to Runjeet Singh as the real "Mountain of Light."

Besides the works mentioned which were destroyed by fire last week on the premises of Messrs. Clowes, printers, in Duke-street, Blackfriars, the entire impression of a new edition of some of Mr. Murray's hand-books, and a large portion of the forthcoming edition of Dr Young's miscellaneous works, edited by the Dean of Ely, have been involved in the general destruction, together with the whole of the plates belonging to an important work which Mr. John Leitch was preparing for publication.

On Monday last a monster fish of the whale species was killed on a bank in Morecambe Bay, opposite Fel. It had been left by the tide in 3 feet 6 inches of water, and the creature was so large that a boat full of men with most difficult matter to despatch it. Ultimately the throat was cut, when it bled to death. Length of the fish 12 feet 8 inches; girth, 8 feet 4 inches. On dissection a quantity of fish, called by the fishermen "sea grass," was found, and a cannon-ball was also found, showing that an attack by firearms had some time previously been made upon it.

A paper mine was discovered last week, at Tankardstown, county of Waterford, on the estate of Mr. Barnal Osborne, which, from all appearances, exceeds anything of the kind yet witnessed in this country. The lowest eastmate of the lode is £60 per fathom, whilst, according to others, the value of the lode is double that amount.

Owing to the abundance of money, one of the principal discount houses in the City has not only signified its unwillingness to receive any fresh deposits at 1 per cent, but has declined to continue the deposits amounts at that rate even in existing cases. In one instance a sum of £50,000 was thus refused.

The advices from Sydney by the Vimiera, with the announcement that (including £55,000, which she has herself brought) a total of £304,000 worth of gold was exported from that port alone in the first month of March, was produced a strong impression, the actual evidence afforded by such shipments being far more powerful than any written details

On Saturday last notice was issued at the Lord Great Chamberlain's Office, that the admission of the public to view the state apartments at Windsor Castle will be resumed. Tickets of admission may be had gratis, on application at Colnaghi and Son's, Charing-cross; Moon, Gracechurch-street; and of all the principal printsellers.

A return just printed shows that there was a decrease of £57,418 in the expenditure of the poor in the half-year ending Lady-day in the present year, when compared with the half-year in the preceding year. In the last year given the total expenditure was £1,649 647.

Mr. Hugh Fleming, secretary to the Manchester Commercial Association, has received a consignment of six bales of cotton, per Bolaig Crone (Laing master), from Dominica, one of the most eastern islands of the West Indies, being samples of new plantations started there in consequence of the failure of the American crop, so sensibly felt last year. The cotton is of a good colour, long staple, and well suited to the wants of the trade in this district.

A charter of incorporation has been granted to the English and Irish Magnetic Telegraph Company. This line of the company across the Channel, which is to establish a connexion between the Home-office in London and the Castle on Dublin (ed Portpatrick and Donaghadee), is expected to be laid down at about mid-summer.

By a return just issued it appears that the value of wrought iron and copper, and of machinery exported to the foreign West India Islands, to Brazil, and to the foreign West Indies and Brazil jointly, in 1851, was £185,711.

As Mr. George Thompson, the extensive iron and coal-master near Wrexham, was riding a few days ago across the Minera branch of the Shrewsbury and Chester Railway, a train came up, and the buffers of the engine struck the pony, which, with his rider, was thrown to a considerable distance. Mr. Thompson was so seriously injured that he never recovered consciousness, but died in about six hours. He was in his 73rd year.

On Monday morning, about one o'clock, a fire broke out in Two Swan-yard, Bishopsgate, on the premises of M. Lenaburg, wood and ivory turner. The engines speedily arrived, and a plentiful supply of water being obtained, the fire was extinguished by two o'clock, but not before a serious amount of damage was done, the roof and upper floors being entirely consumed. The owner was insured

The Daily News says, that the mode adopted by the present Government for making places or rather vacancies for their friends, in various public offices, has been this:—They have raised the superannuation allowance—giving the whole income after a certain number of years, whereas before only three-fourths was given—with a view of at once inducing all who can claim superannuation to retire

The total quantity of cheese imported into the several ports of Great Britain in the year ended the 5th of January, 1852, was 3,338,981 cwt. Of the quantity, 54,395 cwt. were from the United States. The total quantity of foreign European cheese exported from the United Kingdom in the same period was only 4094 cwt. The return does not state the amounts of cheese the manufactured about £750, besides £100 in donations; making a tota. of £850,

EXPOSITION OF THE SOCIETY OF HORTICULTURE, IN THE CHAMPS ELYSEES, AT PARIS.

EXPOSITION OF THE HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY OF PARIS.

PARIS has its Société d'Horticulture, the objects of which are nearly the same as those of our own Horticultural Society. The Parisian Society aim at improved garden culture, especially of vegetable substances for food and employment in the arts, fruit-trees, &c. The society grant prizes, distribute medals, exhibit plants, shrubs, flowers, &c.; and publish monthly a journal on gardening, entitled "Annales de la Société d'Horticulture. The accompanying Illustration represents the Society's Exhibition opened in the Champs Elysées on Friday, the 11th inst. The shrubs and flowers are very tastefully arranged, and the intersecting walks judiciously laid out: in the centre is a fountain of classic design, from which rises a female figure; and sculpture is placed elsewhere in the conservatories, which are provided with elegant candelabra, lanterns, &c., for night exhibitions.

French horticulture has advanced much of late years. Some dozen years since it was truly observed, "In France, gardening has never been in a very flourishing condition: it is true that great quantities of vegetables are raised for the market, that the fruits of France are justly celebrated for their excellence, and the flower-markets of Paris are well supplied; it is also true that numerous excellent works on gardening have been written in France; but for the quality of their fruit the French are chiefly indebted to their climate, for the abundant supply of their vegetable market to their peculiar cookery, and for the excellence of their written works rather to the ingenuity of a few clever men than to the general habits of the community."

The handsome Exhibition Building before us is evidence of this advancement of horticulture in France, and its successful ministration to the delights of the capital.

LOSS OF H.M.S. "BIRKENHEAD."

THIS lamentable catastrophe, which occurred on February 26, has already been illustrated in our Journal; but the present Engraving possesses additional interest and accuracy from its being drawn from the instructions and under the eye of one of the survivors of the wreck who reached the shore by swimming. It shows the situation of the vessel on Danger Point, immediately before she went down, at two o'clock in the morning. By the falling of the funnel upon the deck at that moment, many of the soldiers on board were killed; blue lights were also burnt as signals of distress, by means of which were discerned the objects here represented; and the Engraver has succeeded in correctly imparting the peculiar effect of the Artist's drawing. It is, indeed a melancholy picture of destruction.

LIEUT. McKILLOP'S PLAN FOR STOWING LIFE-BOATS.

THE annexed Diagrams represent a simple and novel plan (exhibited lately at the Earl of Rosse's soirée) of stowing life-boats on the outsides of paddle-boxes, and thereby ensuring a more certain and expeditious mode of lowering the boat towards the water than can be effected in the old system of carrying boats over the wheels of paddle steamers.

Lieut. McKollop (the inventor) has had the gratification of receiving a letter of thanks from the Admiralty for his suggestions, and numerous approvals from seamen and others qualified to judge of the merits of a plan which he has given to the numerous steam-packet companies, for the benefit of the public.

THE LADIES' CHARITY SCHOOL.

IN our Journal of last week we described the celebration of the Jubilee of the above excellent Charity, by a dinner in Stationers' Hall, which we now engrave.

The origin and progress of this School is one of the most interesting narratives of "the Charities of London." A few pious ladies, deploring the neglected state of the female children in their own neighbourhood in the City, and anxious to have them instructed in religious and useful knowledge, resolved to unite their efforts for this purpose, and each engaged to contribute quarterly a small sum towards the payment of a school-mistress, on the understanding that she was to provide a suitable place in which to teach the children sent to her. Every lady contributing had the right of presenting a child, and was required to certify the same to be a proper object for charity. Thirty ladies each sent a girl for instruction; and thus, on the 9th of June, 1702, was opened the Ladies' Charity School.

As the School became known beyond its immediate neighbourhood, other ladies residing in the City of London joined its supporters; and girls were admitted from distances until fifty-one completed the number received.

Sir Humphrey Mackworth was one of the earliest gentlemen subscribers: he was one of five who originated the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. The Ladies' Charity School did not, however, receive assistance from that Society, which was very active in forming and aiding the establishment of parochial schools about this period. Mrs. Melmoth, the wife of another of the Society's early founders, took an active part in the management of the affairs of this School.

So early as the year 1749, the charity obtained the patronage and support of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Bishop of Oxford advocated its cause in 1753; and the Rev. W. Romaine, in the following year, preached on its behalf in the Church of St. Sepulchre, Snow-hill, in which parish the School was founded, and remained for a period of 145 years. The School-house is now No. 30, John-street, Bedford-row.

The original design, when subscriptions were first solicited, was to give education and clothing; but it soon appeared that the improvement of the children, notwithstanding great care taken in their education, was far below the hopes and expectations of those who had promoted the undertaking; and the cause of this was traced, in great measure, to the ignorance and negligence of their parents. The subscribers then resolved, on the 16th of April, 1755, to take into the school-house four of the eldest girls; and from time to time, as the funds would permit, to provide for the admission of all the children; and, with this additional benefit of the provision of a home for the children, the sphere of the School's influence was greatly enlarged.

The minute-books of the proceedings of the School have been regularly kept from its commencement, and they contain singular entries. In 1763, the neighbourhood of the school-house was the scene of the now historical imposture the "Cock-lane Ghost," and in the minutes of that date is an entry stating that the ladies of the committee censured the schoolmistress for her credulity, and "desired her to keep her belief in the article to herself."

Mrs. Thrale took an active interest for many years in the School, contributing two guineas a year to its funds; and Dr. Johnson, writing to her, says, "Whatever reasons you "have for frugality, it is not worth while to save a guinea a year by withdrawing it from a public charity."

Dr. Johnson was a warm friend and admirer of the School, and continued a subscription of two guineas a year till his decease; he also obtained a sermon on its behalf from Dr. Shipley, the Bishop of St. Asaph. The School afforded Johnson the hint for his story of "Betty Broom," in the "Idler." Mrs. Anna Williams, who resided for so many years with him, also took great interest in the little Institution. Writing to a friend, Johnson says, that her death (which took place in 1783) "has now made my house a solitude: she left her little substance to a charity-school." This was the Ladies' Charity School: her property realised £257 14s.; her own portrait, and two engravings of the great lexicographer, are kept at the school-house, as grateful memorials.

The first Royal Patroness of the School was her Royal Highness the Princess Charlotte. Her kindness and condescension in noticing and speaking to each child as she passed before her is still remembered.

Her Majesty the Queen, when Princess Victoria, and her august mother, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, consented to become patrons; and the School remains, which as a ladies' charity school it should do, under the patronage of the highest lady in the land.

The celebration of the 150th anniversary of the School contributed nearly £1000 to the funds; and thus the same spirit which actuated "a few pious ladies" to found the School in the year 1702, has influenced and directed their descendants, in this Jubilee year, 1852; so that from this period may be dated an extension of its utility, and a greater prospect of its permanence.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE ballet-divertissement produced on the 24th ult., for the rentrée of Mdlle. Carolina Rosati, has been performed nearly every night since its first representation. Rosati has a pretty pas de fascination with her lordly lover, in which she coquettes with and teases the sexagenarian lord of the manor with infinite piquancy and grace; her grand pas with M. Mattia is marked by some daring and graceful steps. The rustic beauty awards her hand to the peasant beau, and is crowned Queen of the Fête des Rosiers. M. Gosselin, the inventor of the ballet, has employed the capabilities of Rosa, Esper, Lamoureux, and Allegrini very advantageously; and Nadaud's appropriately choregraphic music adds to the success of the ballet.

BADEN-BADEN.—Season of 1852.—The hot springs of Baden-Baden have for centuries been classed among the most efficacious and frequented in Europe The town, situate in the centre of the Grand Duchy of Baden, in a fertile valley, is surrounded with romantic forests, and replete with interesting and beautiful ruins Roads, opened through all parts of the forests, present, at every step, views the most picturesque. The pure air of the locality, even in the midst of a severe winter, and intermittent fevers, hypochondria, and hysterical affections are cured with wonderful rapidity. The vapour of the hot springs, and numerous emanations of the pine forests, are an admirable specific for consumption. The temperature of the springs is 34 degrees of Réaumur. The comforts of the hotels, and of the lowest St egrees. Dis Trinkhalle (a vast oatil ashion) where they drink the waters Dis Ludwigsbad, Dis Conversation Saal, Dis Theatre, and Dis Casino are the principal minera. wasses of Europe. Those of Baden-Baden are very agreeable to the palate. A pp ied externally they conquer rheumatic and gouty affections. Baden-Baden enjoys serious fa.. ous agreeable spring or great richness The bathing establishment connected with the Trinkhalle, is replete with every requirement of the most fastidious. The cold (or douche) bath has been greatly enlarged. A gondolera has been brought from Switzerland with a load of 80 goats, which feed on the hill close to the source in extract. The experience of many years and a series of well established cures, have caused Baden-Baden to be considered the highest resource. A Russian vapour-bath has been erected by the Government over the principal springs, and the natural distillation from which is 35 degrees. The comforts of the hotels, the cheapness of living, the elegance and variety of its amusement, have ea ablished Baden-Baden as the first bath of Europe or the world. The magnificent saloons of the Goats de Conversation was opened on the 10th of May, and a costly ball, fête, and concerts have organ An unrivalled orchestra performs in the great in oon and on ter promenade the compositions of the most illustrious masters and those unchen ing wa tzes which the German musicians play so well. The season will end on the 31st of October, and during the last month the chase will unite the brilliant society as in former years. of which the ma ves do not unworthy From London to Baden-Baden the journey is made without fatigue, and at a moderate expense, via Belgium and the banks of the Rhine. From Paris to Baden-Baden the journey is made in 30 hours which will be reduced to 16 or 18 from the 15th of August next. A railroad unites Baden-Baden with al parts of Germany and Switzerland

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 19, 1852.

THE Parliamentary debates during the present session, and more especially during that period which has elapsed since the installation of the Derby Ministry, have been singularly devoid of interest; and now that the existence of the Parliament approaches to its close, that little interest grows gradually less. The subject of the Militia, which proved the downfall of one Ministry, merely proved to the other an occasion for useless talk, and has finally reached the Upper House, amid a very general apathy. The Maynooth debates have been even more wearisome, and infinitely more unprofitable. They have consumed much time, excited some exasperation, placed many influential persons in positions from which they would gladly have escaped, and blown into something like a flame the embers of a religious animosity which it would have been good policy to have allowed to expire. But the Parliament is blasé and indifferent. It has done its duties and is sealed; and, with the exception of an occasional chuckle of delight when Mr. Disraeli, or any other enfant Protecuonist, admus designs for the indefinitely that Free Trade is in accordance with "the spirit of the age," it comports itself with the easy carelessness which is natural to public bodies whose powers approach their termination. Not even a laboured attack upon the policy and no-policy of the present Ministry, by the head of the Ministry which it replaced, could excite much interest in that moribund assembly. Lord John Russell, who as chief of her Majesty's Opposition manifests a vigour that might have retained him in power had he been so inclined, except at the commencement of the session, was favoured with two strong points on which to attack the present Ministry—the singularly unhappy management of Foreign Affairs by the Earl of Malmesbury, and the glaring abandonment by Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli of those principles of commercial policy which placed them in the position they occupy. But, either from his Lordship's injudicious mixture of both of these subjects in one attack, or from the disinclination of the House to listen to debates that could have no other result than the expenditure of a certain quantity of time and breath, the really excellent speech of the ex-Prime Minister produced no effect. We believe, however, that the House generally is delighted to get rid of such familiar topics as the public debt, and the sinking fund, and to turn to the case of Mr. Masher, and the subsequent negotiations with the Tuscan Government, will very seriously damage the character of the Ministry. It has often been alleged as a reproach against the people of this country, that they neither sufficiently understand nor take a proper interest in the affairs of the continent of Europe; but it never has been alleged against them with such truth, that they were not jui tly sensitive of the national dignity and honour. If is scarcely possible for any English gentleman, whatever his party opinions may be, to read the diplomatic and other correspondence connected with the Mather case, to avoid coming to the conclusion that Lord Derby has been peculiarly unfortunate in his choice of a Foreign Secretary. Not only a want of dexterity, but a want of conduct in introducing his extraordinary bill for the extradition of foreign offenders be more likely to increase the public respect the liberality of our legislation. Under such circumstances, in which the Administration might have made itself strong in the public estimation, without doing violence to its own recorded opinions, and without damaging itself among any section of its own supporters, it was that of Foreign Affairs. The most ordinary tact and attention, to say nothing of the higher principles which should guide the conduct of statesmen in the intercourse between nations, would have saved the Earl of Malmesbury from the mistakes which he has committed. And the flagrant character of his Foreign Secretary While the result would be beneficial, the contrast between the two Administrations would be edifying. Lord John Russell sacrificed his Foreign Secretary because he was too clever; the very opposite cause would justify our present Premier for taking a similar step.

UNDER the operation of the great system of commercial and fiscal reform, of which Adam Smith was the first great exponent, and the two lamented statesmen, Huskisson and Peel, the last great instruments, it has been the good fortune of successive Governments in this country to reduce the burdens of taxation. Year after year oppressive imposts have been abolished or modified, without ultimate loss to the revenue; and year after year the prospect of the removal of still existing burdens, like the evanescence upon paper, soap, &c., has become more encouraging. The main task reserved for British statesmen is that of reducing taxation, and the problem to be solved is how to free the industry of the nation in the most effectual manner, without impoverishing the State in its corporate capacity. Difficult as the task may be, it is not a hopeless one, as all recent experience shows; and our present Chancellor of the Exchequer has a noble object of ambition "looming in the future," to make him cling to office, not for its honours or its patronage, but for its glory. Very different, however, is the case with our nearest neighbour—a country protected against the trade of the world by its hostile tariff, and against the supposed evil designs of its neighbours, and of its own people, by its immense standing army. The Government of France has just refused to reduce by one-thirteenth that formidable body of 400,000 men. It will not disband 30,000 soldiers, which it cannot afford to keep, but it has resolved to impose upon the property, income, and industry of the people taxes which more fortunate England is busily engaged in removing, with the consent of her best statesmen, to remove. There certainly can be no other objection to taxes upon horses, dogs, carriages, and alcohol than that which applies to taxation in general. In all civilised countries there must be taxes, and those upon luxuries are as little obnoxious as any taxes can be. But the French Government will, no doubt, protected against the supposed evil designs of its neighbours, and of its own people, by its immense standing army. The Government of France has just refused to reduce by one-thirteenth that formidable body of 400,000 men. It will not disband 30,000 soldiers, which it cannot afford to keep, but it has resolved to impose upon the property, income, and industry of the people taxes which more fortunate England is busily engaged in removing, with the consent of her best statesmen, to remove. There certainly can be no other objection to taxes upon horses, dogs, carriages, and alcohol than that which applies to taxation in general. In all civilised countries there must be taxes, and those upon luxuries are as little obnoxious as any taxes can be. But the French Government will, no doubt, cause the English paper-manufacturers to bestir themselves, and cause the English paper-trade to flourish, as soon as the French are about to relinquish it. With English paper free, and French paper taxed, not by us but by themselves, the French manufacturers will soon see the ruin of a line branch of industry. Surely it would have been much better for Louis Napoleon to have done without the soldiers!

THE "GREAT BRITAIN."—This leviathan screw-steamer is about to be transferred to the "Eagle line" of Australian packets, belonging to her present owners, Messrs. Gibbs, Bright, and Co., of Liverpool. She is announced to leave that port for Melbourne, Port Philip, on the 31st of August next. She will carry three classes of passengers—upper saloon, 70 guineas; fore saloon 40 guineas; second cabin, 30 guineas. The Great Britain will have accommodation for about 1000 passengers.

ENGLISH DEBTORS IN FRANCE.—The English debtors now in the prison of Clichy have addressed a petition to the President with a view to obtain a reversal of the application of the law of Fredric, relative to the contrainte par corps, more in accordance with the Code Napoleon. Absolutely all of Englishmen to a sudden arrest, without process or judgment, and to a subsequent imprisonment for debt, altogether averted by their French fellow-prisoners. The petitioners also call attention to the Code Napoleon, which declares that all foreigners are amenable to and debtors of the law courts touching the contrainte par corps. The Code Napoleon declares explicitly, that in matters of debt foreigners shall be treated as Frenchmen are treated in the countries to which the foreigners respectively belong.

CORK AND BANDON RAILWAY.—On Thursday a meeting of this company was held at the new offices in Gracechurch-street—F. T. Mackreth, Esq., in the chair—when it was resolved to raise a preference stock of £48,000, at 5½ per cent. in perpetuity, to meet the liabilities of the company, and £80,000, at 4 per cent., as a first preferential stock, to liquidate the debenture debt. In the course of the proceedings, Mr. Winckworth referred to the statement of the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, of his Lordship's desire to promote the extension of railways in Ireland, and expressed his full conviction of the sincerity of his Lordship's views on the subject.

NATIONAL VACCINE ESTABLISHMENT.—It appears, by the report of the National Vaccine Establishment, presented to Parliament, that, in the course of the year 1851, 218,643 charges of lymph have been supplied by the National Board, being an ex. ess of 29,262 beyond those of 1850. The cases reported to the board as having undergone vaccination were 131,595, besides 11,584 vaccinated by their stationary vaccinators in London. The board express their regret that the public have still a disinclination, generally speaking, to avail themselves of vaccination, and again assert that the restriction of the protective power of vaccination to any age or to any term of years, is an hypothesis contradicted by experience, and wholly unsupported by analogy.

THE Geographical Society of Paris has awarded two large silver medals to the Rev. Dr. Krapf and Mr. Rebmann, missionaries of the Church Missionary Society, for the discovery of a snow mountain in Eastern Africa, about south of the line, named Mount Kilimandjaro. Dr. Krapf also discovered a number of other mountains, and another range about two degrees northward, where he has given the name of Mount Kenia, which discovery of another mountain still loftier—Mount Kenia, which appears to be the Mount Arangos of Hoking, otherwise named the Mountain of the Moon.

We understand that the Government have taken means to prevent by our naval power any efforts that may be attempted by American adventurers against the Virgin Islands.

F. J. Carter, to Kingston; the Rev. [illegible] to St. Mary's, Lincoln; the Rev. [illegible] to Sproughton, Suffolk.

TESTIMONIALS.—The following clergymen have lately received testimonials of esteem and regard:—The Rev. C. Hiscins, from the Beddington Sunday-school teachers and district visitors.—The Rev. H. Owen, senior curate of St. Martin's, Birmingham, from the congregation; the Rev. Mr. Baling, headmaster of Wye College, from his pupils; the Rev. S. Arnott, from his parishioners; the Rev. S. S. Gower, from his congregation; the Rev. J. R. Errington, vicar of Ashburn, from his congregation; the Rev. M. Mant, from the inhabitants of Chard, on his giving up the curacy; the Rev. B. R. Mainprise, from his friends, on his promotion; the Rev. T. H. Phillips, of Pontnewynydd, on his promotion; the Rev. W. J. Crenton, incumbent of Draycott, from the children and teachers of the Sunday and week-day schools.

THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.—On Saturday last, the address to the Lord Bishop of the Diocese, from the clergy and deanery of Gloucester, agreed to at the Archidiaconal or Gloucester's visitation, was presented to his Lordship at the palace, Gloucester, with the signatures of forty-one clergy of the deanery attached to it. The Bishop received the deputation with [illegible] and two addresses were presented to the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

ST. JAMES'S CHURCH, GRAVESEND.—The church erected on the site at the western entrance of the town, the gift of the Earl of Darnley, was consecrated by the Bishop of Rochester a few days ago. The sermon was preached by the Archdeacon of Rochester, and the collection at the offertory, for the building fund, amounted to £78. The church contains 827 sittings, 327 of which are free. Its total cost is £3400, towards which the Church Building Commissioners granted £300, and the Church Building Society £280. The Rev. John Joynes, of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, has been appointed incumbent of the church.

NEW CHURCHES.—The charges and expenses paid by the Commissioners for executing the Acts of Parliament for promoting the building of additional churches in populous parishes from the 25th of March, 1851, to the 25th of March, 1852, amounted to £4,837 15s. 7d.

On Trinity Sunday the Rev. J. R. Errington, vicar of Ashbourn, in the county of Nottingham, was presented by the congregation, at daily prayer in the parish church, with a lectern and a handsome folio Bible, handsomely bound in purple morocco. The lectern is from a design in the sixth part of the "Instruments Ecclesiastic," and in every respect harmonises with the early style of architecture of the chancel in which it is erected. It is intended for use at the early daily service.

CURIOUS DISCOVERY OF STOLEN PROPERTY.—A quantity of jewellery, of the value of £700, which had been stolen from the shop of Mr. Howard, jeweller, of Market-street, [illegible], on the morning of the 18th of May, was discovered on Monday [illegible] the chief constables of police, buried in the ground near [illegible], though, about four years from that town.

SHOCKING ACCIDENT.—At a late hour on Saturday night last, Mr. Bell, an aged gentleman residing at Bridland of Perth, having walked upon the Scottish Midland Railway near Perth, was run down in the dark by a luggage train, and instantaneously killed. His head was completely cut off, and his limbs were scattered in different directions.

ELECTION INTELLIGENCE.

BEDFORD.—An "open-air meeting" was held at Bedford on Monday night on the Market Hill, for the purpose of hearing an address from Mr. Anstey, the popular candidate, who has nearly concluded a most successful canvass. The address was well received.

BELFAST.—A deputation from the friends of Lord Castlereagh have proceeded to London to wait on Lord Castlereagh, with a requisition, signed by 800 electors, requesting him to accept the candidature for the borough.

BODMIN.—Dr. Mitchell, a gentleman who has long resided in Bodmin, has been solicited, and has consented, to come forward. There are now, therefore, six candidates still in the field for this borough.

DOMFRIESHIRE.—Mr. Hunter has retired from the contest for this county, and the field is clear for the sitting members.

EDINBURGH.—There is little doubt that Mr. Macaulay will be returned, whoever may be the other man. At a meeting of the Edinburgh Liberal registration committee was held on Monday, when the proposal to bring him forward without requiring from him a canvass or even an electoral address was unanimously adopted.

ENSBURY.—Mr. Wakley has resigned all pretensions to the future representation of Finsbury, on the ground of ill-health and pressure of parliamentary engagements. He is opposed by a great body of electors to submit Mr. Macaulay to stand as a candidate at the approaching election. It was the general feeling of the meeting that Messrs. Duncan and Sidney Smith, as well as Mr. Macaulay, deserve to stand, Mr. Charles Dickens is spoken of as a gentleman deserving of the consideration of the electors

HARWICH.—Captain Warburton, R.A., at present in command of the Artillery at Leamington, has been waited upon by some of the electors, acquainting him with a resolution passed at a meeting held at the King's Head Inn, on Thursday week, inviting him to come forward as a candidate for the representation of their borough. He has accepted their invitation, and has commenced in active canvass upon Liberal principles

HERTFORD.—There are four candidates in the field. Lord Valentia, who was late [illegible] for the borough, is in the interest of the Marquis of Salisbury, has [illegible] by voting in defiance of his pledges. Mr. Hargreaves has withdrawn his support from the noble Lord, and brought forward Mr. Charles Dimsdale as his representative, who has been canvassing the county on Protectionist principles. [illegible] Mr. Dimsdale's address to the Hertford Mercury and Mr. Thomas Chambers. The former has issued an address which has satisfied the Liberal party that he will be a strenuous supporter of progressive measures of reform and retrenchment. Mr. Thomas Chambers, who is well known and popular in the town, has declared his intention to oppose all return to protective duties and to advocate an extension of the franchise and other measures of reform and retrenchment.

HULL.—Two Conservative candidates, Mr. J. Bramley Moore and the Hon. Charles Leanox Butler are now fair y in the field. The opposing candidates are Mr. Clay and Lord Goderich.

MALTON.—Mr. J. E. Denison is again likely to represent this borough, but Mr. Childers retires to make way for a scion of the house of Wentworth.

NEW ROSS.—The contest between Sir Thomas Redington, Mr. Lucas, and Mr. Garvin Duffy bids fair to be an exciting one in the borough of New Ross On Sunday last, when Sir Thomas reappeared there to resume his canvass, their arose such a mob riot from Mr. Duffy's party, that the police and military were called out to quell it.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY.—Mr. GLADSTONE.—The following letter from Mr. Gladstone, M.P., addressed to the Rev. Mr. Greswell, of Oxford, has been published:—"6, Carlton-gardens, June 11, 1852. My dear Mr. Greswell,—I am obliged to you for having drawn my attention to two statements which have been recently put into circulation on the authority of a highly respectable Baronet—statements which, if left to be [illegible] without contradiction in the manner, would have caused but little notice. The first of these statements is this:—'That Mr. Gladstone's views on their relations to Church and State have, since 1847, undergone a change little anticipated by his Oxford supporters, many of his best friends regretfully admit.' The second is 'That the abolishment of the Church connexion with the State is necessarily involved in the legitimate development of the principles he now advocates.' I likewise thank you for not having called upon me to notice one or more unworthy insinuations current on the same authority, and contained in a document of somewhat later date. With regard to the two propositions above cited, and to your intention upon them, I have to observe, that no attempt is made to sustain them by any reference to what I have spoken, written, or done, that no one of these 'best friends' is known to me or to any friend whom I have been able to consult, that the principles of which I am now the advocate are the very same that I avowed, and for the avowal of which I was not sparingly assailed, in 1847; that I am aware of no incompatibility between the principle of full religious freedom and the maintenance of the national Church in connexion with the State, to both of which I am now, as ever, cordially attached; that, in regard to the last of these objects, it is the change in my convictions which is imputed to me has occurred. I should not ask or look for it to the author or this circular to announce it to the world; and that, whether the question be or be not an open one for others, it can, in my judgment, be no open question nor one easy to answer for conscientious men in the University of Oxford. In short, I disown and repudiate both these allegations emphatically, and in all their parts I remain, my dear Mr. Greswell, most sincerely yours, W. E. GLADSTONE. Rev. R. Greswell."

READING.—The new candidates for the contest has created here, in the person of Mr. Augustus Newton, 58, Carzon-street, Mayfair, and formerly of Stud ey, near Ripon. He declares in favour of Free Trade in its fullest extent, household suffrage, vote by ballot, triennial Parliaments, and "thorough reform" in general.

SURREY (EAST).—Mr. Antrobus, jun., who sat as an out-and-out Protectionist for the county from 1841 to 1847, when he sat Mr. C. Rumble resigned the field to Messrs Locke King and Alcock without a contest, is about to contest the seat on Free-trade principles.

The Earl of Winchilsea has intended to start Lord Maidstone (the son of the Earl of Winchilsea, and the rejected of Newark) for the representation of Westminster.

LUNACY AMONGST THE MARRIED AND SINGLE.—It has been ascertained, that, amongst 411 male patients admitted into the Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum, there were 170 married, 208 single, 29 widowed, and 8 not ascertained. Amongst 606 female patients admitted, 260 were married, 385 single, 109 widowed, and 12 not ascertained. These facts may be taken in addition to the many existing proofs of the tendency of "single blessedness" to foster insanity, especially among the female sex.

Lord Eglinton, in reply to an address from the Town Council of Maryborough, [illegible] Mr Sharman Crawford, [illegible] of her Majesty, said, in the name of her Majesty, [illegible] the deepest regret, but, at the same time, unwilling to [illegible] to the propriety of this course his Excellency is pursuing, that he feels himself constrained to refuse the prayer of your petition in favour of Mr. Smith O'Brien and the other State prisoners, and to state that, under existing circumstances, the Lord-Lieutenant cannot recommend them to her Majesty's favourable consideration."

The ex Queen Marie Amelie has caused to be presented to Mr. E. T. Way, of Dover, by the hand of Genera. Dumas, a diamond pin, as a testimony of her gratitude for the kindness shown by the people of that place to herself and family during their residence there. Mr. Way has received [illegible] from General Dumas, [illegible] of the Queen, [illegible] the pin [illegible] Mr. Way's family [illegible] Mr. Way [illegible] Mr. Way [illegible] Mr. Way

THE ASSUMPTION OF THE VIRGIN."—PAINTED BY MURILLO.—PURCHASED FOR THE LOUVRE FOR 586,000 FRANCS (ABOUT £23,400), AT THE SALE OF THE SOULT GALLERY.

THE MURILLOS FROM THE SOULT GALLERY.

THE sale of the Soult Gallery, which took place in the last week of May, at Paris, and occupied three days, forms an important epoch in the history of art, and a singular and not very creditable episode in that of the Peninsular War. Soult and Sebastiani, by the fortune of war, became the two rapacious plunderers of art in Spain: Grenada, with its Alonzo Canos, falling to the lot of Sebastiani; and Seville, with its Murillos, and Morales, and Zurburans to that of Soult. Plunderers we say, for as plunder simply were these glorious works viewed by the conquerors, who, with catalogue in one hand and sword in the other, removed them from walls for which they had been painted, and which the artists vainly flattered themselves they should adorn for ever. How much their new possessors valued them, except in regard to "what they would fetch," may be judged from the fact that by neither of them were their collections designed to descend as heirlooms to their respective families, but were jobbed about for sale upon every favourable opportunity which presented itself. Sebastiani, in 1814, the period of the "Restoration," offered the entire of his pickings -seventy-three pictures—to the Prince Regent of Great Britain, for £10,000; which very reasonable sum being refused by our Government, he afterwards got rid of them in detail in the course of his lifetime. That Soult retained his gallery till his death, was only because he did not find a purchaser who would come up to his price. Mr. Buchanan, in his "Memoirs of Painting" (8vo., 1824), states that "The Marechal Soult, Duc de Dalmatie, knowing that the author of these pages had formerly made several most valuable acquisitions of works of art in Spain and Italy, and latterly had purchased the collection of M. de Talleyrand, in France, communicated to his in April last, that he felt disposed to part with his pictures as an entire collection, if the same could be disposed of in that manner." Mr. Buchanan adds, that he represented to the Marshal the difficulty of disposing of an entire collection in that way, but stated the probability of eight celebrated Murillos being purchased for England, if the Marshal would fix a separate value upon them. This, after much difficulty, the Marshal did in a note, which also set a price upon three other capital pictures in the collection; and with this note "Mr. Buchanan immediately returned to England, for the express purpose of communicating the same to his Majesty's Ministers, and impressing on them the importance of such an acquisition, these magnificent pictures being already known to every connoisseur as the chefs-d'œuvre of that great master." What the price demanded for these invaluable works was, Mr. Buchanan does not state, and properly so, we think, as the offer was at the time of his writing under deliberation—if, indeed, it was ever deliberated upon at all. There can be little doubt that the sum was much below what they have since been sold for, and below what they were worth; for works of the highest class, as models for study, are priceless in a national collection of pictures. That the offer was not entertained was the more remarkable and the more reprehensible, as it came at a time when we had just rejected the opportunity of acquiring four of the finest Raffaels in the world—four which had formerly belonged to our Charles I., and the re-obtaining of which would in a peculiar degree have been interesting and creditable to the artistic feeling of the country. Such is the miserable parsimony of a tasteless Government in all that concerns the intellectual progress and enjoyment of the people. Or, still more indefensibly, shall we impute it to a selfish feeling on the part of those who constitute government, that, while they do not grudge large prices for pictures for the exclusive adornment of their saloons, they cannot admit of a parity of interests and tastes with the profanum vulgus in matters of this kind.

RESIDENCE OF MURILLO.

Of the eight Murillos specially referred to by Mr. Buchanan, the following account, in his words, will be read with interest:—

1. "Le Paralitique—Christ Healing the Lame in the Temple."—This picture consists of five figures of the size of life, and is composed in a grand and noble manner. The principal character is full of dignity and expression; and in point of sublimity of conception, is equal to the best works of Ludovico Caracci, while in colouring it surpasses anything of the Bolognese school. The middle space of the temple, and the distance, contain many figures about the proportions of those generally introduced in the compositions of Nicholas Poussin, and they possess all the fine drawing of that master. Various groups of figures are distributed with great taste and judgment, and with the most correct perspective, throughout the picture. The keeping and harmony of the whole composition are perfect, and it has always been esteemed by the best connoisseurs as one of the most important works in historical painting.

2. "The Prodigal Son Received by his Father."—This is one of the richest compositions of the master. It consists of nine figures of the natural size, painted with a power and brilliancy of colouring only to be found in the works of Murillo, who has united in this picture the splendour of the Flemish with the solidity and correctness of design of the Italian schools. The figures are full of character, and each sustains his part. This picture is also a most important work of the master

3. "Abraham Receiving the Angels."—The composition of this picture is of great beauty. It represents Abraham, who kneels, with extended arms, to receive the three angels who come to visit him. He is attired in the Eastern costume, his head elegantly dressed with a white turban, and the whole figure, which is most graceful and full of pathos, is certainly one of the finest and most expressive characters which exists in the whole art of painting. The figures are of the natural size, and the picture itself is clear and brilliant.

4. "The Angel relieving St. Peter from Prison." This picture affords a fine example of the extent to which clair-obscure can be carried. It is a piece of ll umination founded on the principles of Correggio, and rivalling the magical effects of colour adopted by Rembrandt. Besides the two principal figures, some others are seen asleep in the deep shades of the background, which, however, serve as accessories to the composition.

Regarding these four capital works, a variety of opinions exist as to their relative merit, some giving the preference to "Our Saviour in the Temple," as being the more important subject; others to "The Prodigal Son," as being the fuller composition, and for its very rich and exquisite colouring; while the beautiful figure of Abraham, in the third picture, secures the sufferings of many admirers. It may, however, with great truth be said of them generally, that no one can appreciate sufficiently the talents of this master without having seen his works of this superlative class.

"The Virgin surrounded by Angels"—called "La Vierge de la Conception." This picture, for its great beauty and extreme brilliancy, has been generally considered as the chef d'œuvre of Murillo. The Virgin is clothed in white, with a blue drapery thrown over the left shoulder, and is surrounded by groups of angels in the most playful and beautiful attitudes, painted with a wonderful clearness and transparency; the painting shows the master had evidently had in contemplation to rival the best works of Correggio. The dimensions are 8½ feet high by 6 feet broad, French measure

"The Virgin and Child in Glory, surrounded by Angels"—This picture is of the same fine quality as the preceding, and the groups of boys are most beautiful. It possesses great brilliancy, and has a rich and powerful effect. The upper part of the Virgin, with the Child, was cut out of the picture while in Spain, and the space filled up with a copy of that part of the picture. The size is 9½ feet high by 6½ wide.

"The Nativity of the Virgin," formerly in the Cathedral of Seville.—This picture has always possessed a very high reputation. It is composed of many figures, and is painted on the principles and in the manner of Correggio's works. A broad mass of light is thrown across the picture, and produces a rich and brilliant effect: the shadows are very transparent, and are principally in demi-tint. The figures in this picture are of the size of small life. Its dimensions are 11 feet in length, by 6½ feet high, the top being of an oblong form.

"St Isidore," a character represented in adoration.—This picture has a powerful effect, and is painted in his best manner. It is said to be the portrait of an Archbishop of Toledo. The size is 6½ feet high by 4½ wide.

We now come to the sale—the pounds, shillings, and pence—noting by the way the fact stated by Mr. Buchanan, that, at the time of the treaty for the purchase of the works above referred to, an English gentleman made an offer of 400,000*l.* for the four first-named in the above list—an offer which was not accepted

The grand prize of the sale was the picture styled "The Conception of the Virgin," No. 57 in the catalogue, and No. 5 in the above list; and which was purchased for the Louvre for 586,000 francs, or about £23,400—the largest sum, perhaps, ever given for a single picture. That it fetched the enormous price is not surprising, when we find that the heads of three Governments—those of France, Spain, and Russia—and one English Marquis competed for it. In this work we think it may fairly be said that Murillo rivalled Correggio himself, whose peculiarities are thus spoken of by Webb, in the "Beauties of Painting," in which, without exaggeration, he applied to the work before us:—

> The clearness and transparency of his colouring are inimitable, and stop at it as exact medium in which lies the purity and perfection of taste. Thus he reached in delineating the forms of angels retiring and melting in surrounding ether; they seem the inhabitants of heaven, crayoned in splendour, pellucid in glory: their clear and animated tints breath a divinity; they float in air like the forms of a passing cloud; they drop from the skies like rain, through an April sun.

But, after all, with all respect for the compilers of catalogues, we may venture to ask why this picture is called the "Conception of the Virgin" (except from the fact that the subject was so favourite a one with the artist), and whether it might not with more propriety be described as the "Assumption of the Virgin?"

Of the other Murillos, the principal fetched the following prices:—"The Ravages of the Plague," 20,000 fr.; "The Miracle of St. Diego," 7,600 fr.; "The Flight into Egypt," 21,000 fr.; "The Nativity of the Virgin," 80,000 fr.; "The Repentance of St Peter," 5500 fr.; "Christ on the Cross," 2100 fr.; "St. Peter in Prison," 151,000 fr.; "Jesus and John—Children," 51,750 fr.; the last two being purchased for the Emperor of Russia.

MINUTES OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION.

The following document, printed by order of the House, June 14, is the paper which has formed the subject of a conversation in Parliament lately:—

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 12th day of June, 1852.—By the Right Honourable the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education.—

Whereas by a Minute of this Committee, dated the 10th day of August, 1839, certain regulations were made respecting the payments of Church of England schools, according to portions of the Parliamentary clauses, as settled in pursuance of the minute of the Committee of Council on Education, dated 28th June, 1839, and of the subsequent minutes of agreement between the Committee of Council and the committee of the National Society for promoting the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church throughout England and Wales:

Resolved, that it shall be optional with the promoters of such schools, in applying for aid from the Parliamentary grant towards the cost of the buildings, to adopt the following paragraphs in the Clauses A, B, C, and D, either as they stand at present, or with all or any of the alterations shown in the margin. And in case any difference shall arise between the minister and curate and the committee of management hereinbefore mentioned respecting the proposal to be made in the school, not being the Sunday-school, or the religious instruction of the scholars attending the same, or any regulation connected therewith, or the expulsion of any boy, the use of which may be objected to on religious grounds, or the dismissal of any teacher from the school on account of his or her defective or unsound instruction of the children in religion, the minister or curate, or any member of the said committee, may cause a written statement of the matter in difference to be laid before the Bishop of the diocese within which the school shall be situated, a copy thereof having been previously communicated to the said committee or minister or curate, if they or he shall not have been parties or privy to the making of the statement respectively; and the Bishop may inquire concerning, and determine the matter in difference; and his decision of the Bishop in writing under his hand thereon, when laid before the said committee, shall be final and conclusive in the matter. And the committee of management for the time being is hereby expressly required to take all such measures as may be necessary for immediately carrying the said decision into complete effect. And in case any difference, other than and except such difference as last described, shall arise in the committee of management, the majority thereof (being not fewer in number than one-third of the whole of the committee) may make request in writing to the Lord President of Her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council for the time being, and to the Bishop of the diocese wherein the said school shall be situated, and thereupon the said Lord President may nominate one of the inspectors of schools appointed as aforesaid to be an arbitrator in the matter in difference, and the said bishop may nominate one of the beneficed clergymen of the said diocese to be another arbitrator in the said matter. And if the said arbitrators so nominated as aforesaid shall not be either one of her Majesty's justices of the peace, being a lay member of the Church of England, as another arbitrator. And in case they shall not forthwith select such third arbitrator within the space of thirty days next following their first meeting, the archbishop of the province within which the said school shall be situate and the said Lord-President may jointly appoint such third arbitrator. And the three arbitrators so nominated as aforesaid shall, inquire concerning the last-mentioned matter in difference, and the award in writing, under the hands of the said arbitrators, or of any two of them, when laid before the said committee, shall be final and conclusive in the matter. And the committee of management for the time being is hereby expressly required to take all such measures as may be necessary for immediately carrying the said award into complete effect. And it is hereby ordered that if the said bishop or the said inspector, upon any such reference as aforesaid, shall direct or award that any master, mistress, or teacher in the said school shall be dismissed, such direction or award, when a copy thereof shall have been served upon the said master, mistress, or teacher personally, or by the same being left at his or her place of abode, or at the school aforesaid, addressed to such master, mistress, or teacher, as the case may require, shall operate as a dismissal of the said master, mistress, or teacher, so as to prevent him or her thenceforth from having any interest in his or her office, or in the said school or premises, under or by virtue of this deed, and so as to disqualify him or her from holding thereforth any right or interest under this deed, by virtue of his or her previous or any future appointment.

* Except on other moral or religious grounds

† Provided that it shall be lawful for the minister or curate as aforesaid to exclude such boy or to suspend such teacher pending such reference as aforesaid to the bishop.

BRUCE CASTLE SCHOOL, TOTTENHAM.—The annual distribution of prizes to the Bruce Castle School took place on Tuesday, in the presence of a large assemblage of visitors; Chevalier Bunsen, the Prussian Minister, presided on the occasion. The prizes were awarded for general good conduct, diligence, and perseverance, and consisted, which were delivered to the boys by his Excellency, who accompanied each presentation with a few appropriate remarks, calculated to impress the spirit of diligence, punctuality, and steadiness.

The Morning Herald says:—"We have heard that the present competition between Birmingham and Wolverhampton and Birmingham and Shrewsbury occasions a loss of something between £15,000 and £20,000 per annum to the London and North-Western Company. This loss is comparatively nothing to that sustained by the Shrewsbury Companies, whose gross weekly receipts are, we hear, some £2400, is absolute ruin."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

[JUNE 19, 1852.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

MAYNOOTH.

The Earl of WINCHILSEA gave notice that next session he should move for a select committee of inquiry into the moral and religious principles of the system of education at the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth.

SHREWSBURY AND CHESTER RAILWAY.

Lord BEAUMONT moved the suspension of the standing order No. 185, in the case of the Great Western Railway, the Shrewsbury and Birmingham Railway, and the Shrewsbury and Chester Railway (Amalgamation) Bill. The question to be decided by the House was, whether there should be only one means of communication between London and the Mersey—between London and Ireland. Whether all the traffic between these points should be confined to the one single means of communication in use at present, and so a monopoly in their respect be created in the possessors. The House, by sanctioning that principle, would act contrary to former decisions, creating the Birmingham and Shrewsbury and the Shrewsbury and Chester Railways. The Shrewsbury and Chester Railway had, after long competition, been obliged by the conduct of the North-Western Railway, to seek the alliance of the Great Western Railway; and a bill to that effect was accordingly before the House. If this bill passed, there would be two complete lines to the Mersey and Ireland. The bill had been unanimously adopted by the House of Commons, but it was stopped in the House of Lords by the operation of the "Wharncliffe" standing order, which rendered it requisite for all amalgamation bills to have the consent of four-fifths of the shareholders before they could pass the Standing Orders Committee; and the object of his motion was, that the rule of the House in this respect should be dispensed with.

A discussion of considerable length took place, which ended ultimately in the motion being negatived without a division.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

The subject of the management clauses of the Committee of Privy Council of education was again referred to by the Marquis of Lansdowne, which led to some explanations from the Earl of Derby, who expressed his desire that the merits of the whole case as to the recent minute, which gives certain advantages to Church of England schools that they did not possess before, should be discussed.

EXTRADITION OF OFFENDERS (FRANCE).

The Earl of MALMESBURY, on the part of her Majesty's Government, withdrew the Surrender of Criminals (Convention) Bill.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS.

On the motion for committing the Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill,

The Earl of DERBY objected that the bill allowed an investigation into alleged corrupt practices in any borough to be instituted on a vote of the House of Commons, instead of by an address to the Crown, concurred in by the House of Lords. He also intimated that he should move amendments exempting counties and universities, and limiting into consecutive elections to cases where the bribery was practised continuously, and excepting those where a pure election intervened. He should also oppose that provision which placed treating on the same footing with bribery.

In committee, the noble Lord's first amendment, requiring the assent of the House of Lords to the issuing of any commission of inquiry, was carried, after discussion, by 78 to 34 votes.

Another division was taken against the provision which classes bribery and treating together, and Lord Stanley's amendment was carried by 68 to 35 votes.

Some other bills on the paper were forwarded a stage.

Adjourned at a quarter-past twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The House met at twelve o'clock.

NEW MEMBER.

Lord MANDEVILLE took the oaths and his seat for the county of Huntingdon.

ENNISKILLEN ELECTION

The SECRETARY AT WAR read a letter of explanation from General Thomas in reference to the charge brought against him of employing his influence as the military officer in command to coerce the vote of a pensioner at the late Enniskillen election, in which canvassing the men on behalf of Mr. Whitneide was admitted, but the alleged intimidation was denied. He (the gallant Secretary) considered General Thomas had acted with imprudence, but that he had not been guilty of military intimidation.

RAMSGATE HARBOUR.

The Ramsgate Harbour Bill was further considered. On the question of fixing a day for the third reading,

Mr. HUDSON complained of the grievances endured by the shipping interest from the exaction of tolls from vessels passing Ramsgate, and moved that the bill be read a third time that three months.

After some discussion the House divided, when the bill was lost by 120 to 28.

SUPPLY.—RAJAH BROOKE.

The rest of the day up to four o'clock was occupied with the consideration of the remaining items of the miscellaneous estimates in Committee of Supply, including the grant for the pay and equipment of the new militia force.

The Labuan vote gave rise to some discussion on the subject of a dispute between Sir J. Brooke and the Eastern Archipelago Company, consequent on impediments thrown in the way of the company by the Rajah.

Secretary Sir J. FAKINGTON intimated that legal proceedings were pending on the subject.

Mr. S. HERBERT quoted from public documents distinct charges of improper interference on the part of the Rajah.

Mr. F SCOTT animadverted on the anomalous position of Rajah Brooke—as a foreign rajah, a British consul, a foreign proprietor, and the governor of a British colony, all at the same time.

In the evening sitting,

MR. FERGUS O'CONNOR.

Mr. J. BERK presented a petition from the sister of Mr. Fergus O'Connor, praying that the unfortunate gentleman, an honourable case of mind, be liberated from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and transferred to a lunatic asylum.

On the motion of Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, a committee was ordered to be appointed to inquire into the truth of the allegations in the petition, and report thereon to the House.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. J. A. SMITH asked the Secretary for the Home Department whether it was the intention of the Government to advise the issuing this year of the Queen's Letter in aid of the National Society, and, if so, at what period of the year such letter would be issued?

Mr. Secretary WALPOLE said the issue of the Queen's Letter depended on an application being made to him by the Archbishop of Canterbury. No such application had been made. He would not anticipate the minute of council for the alteration of the management clauses should be laid on the table forthwith.

METROPOLITAN CATTLE MARKET

In reply to a question from Mr. G. C. Lewis, Mr. Secretary WALPOLE said that 70 acres of land near Copenhagen fields had been purchased by the Corporation of London, for the formation of a metropolitan cattle market, and negotiations were going on for the purchase of more.

The order of the day having been moved for the report of supply to be brought up,

A conversation took place between Mr. Goulburn, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Horsman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Solicitor-General, relative to the constitution of Mr. Horsman's proposed committee on the institution of the Rev. Mr. Bennett to the vicarage of Frome.

THE COLLEGE OF MAYNOOTH.

Mr. MONSELL rose to put the questions to the secretary of the Treasury under this late Government (Mr. C. Lewis). On Friday last he had asked the Secretary of State why the annual grant for the repairs of the College of Maynooth had been left out of the estimates for this year; and the answer he received was, that the late Government did not think the College for that purpose; and, secondly, whether the late Government gave any direction for the omission of the annual grant to that college before they went out of office

Mr. G. C. LEWIS replied that the late Government had no intention of omitting a grant for the repairs of the buildings of Maynooth College from the estimates, and that, had they continued in office, such a vote would have been proposed.

Mr. HENLEY intimated a probability of the introduction of a bill next year to prevent the evasion of the Joint-Stock Act.

MR. MATHER.—POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Lord J. RUSSELL rose, in pursuance of notice, to call the attention of the House to the case of Mr. Mather, and generally to the present state of public affairs. He recapitulated the circumstances of Mr. Mather's case, dating the circumstances of the outrage, and the state of the negotiations when the present Government came into office—the conflicting accounts of Mr. Mather, supported by Florentine witnesses and the Austrian authorities; and, after referring to the vacillating conduct of Lord Malmesbury, who, in writing to Florence, described the outrage as a wanton and unprovoked assault, and in his despatch to Vienna called it a mere accidental occurrence, commented on the injury to the national character which must result from making questions involving the national honour matters of mere pecuniary consideration. The only individual who appeared to have behaved well was Mr. Hatfield and Mr. Scarlett, who, having received specific instructions, was told that he had taken a course as much opposed to his instructions as to sound reason. He entered his protest against a course of action which he felt must degrade the Government of England in the eyes of Europe; but, adopting Lord Derby's language in reference to the late Government and the affairs of Greece, he would impress on foreign nations the fact that the Foreign Office was not England. Turning to the conduct of the Government at home, he adverted to the studious concealment of their policy, the contradictory views expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the House of Commons and the Prime Minister at the Mansion-house, by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and the Solicitor-General, who appealed to their constituents on Protection principles, and those of their number who put forward the "big loaf." He reminded the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the landlord party, who talked of compensation, that the Corn Laws were not imposed for the good of the landed interest, but for the national advantage; and when the national advantage was shown to be the other way, there was no ground for continuing them or granting compensation. He complained that Ministers had occasioned unnecessary differences by raising expectations of interference with the existing systems of national education in England and Ireland—with the Maynooth endowment, and other subjects. By having no settled opinion, but promising to re-open every question, they were offering a premium to agitation; but it would be for the country to decide whether they could place confidence in a Government which had no principles of its own.

Lord STANLEY defended the conduct of Lord Malmesbury in the Mather case, and explained that the word "accidental" in that noble Lord's despatch was meant to imply that the attack had nothing in it of a national character, though undoubtedly it was most unprovoked and brutal in its nature. He entered into considerable explanation to show that the claim for compensation only was made against the Tuscan Government, and not against Austria. If the demand had been made upon Austria, it would have been a recognition of the Austrian occupation of Tuscany, which England never had yet done, and one far to increase the power of despotic government in Europe. He denied there was anything of principle in the question of compensation—it was a mere matter of personal injury, involving no national insult, and, so considered, Mr. Mather's first demand of £6000 was unreasonable; and the reason Mr. Scarlett's acts had been disavowed was not because he had taken a smaller sum, but because he had disclaimed the principle of the responsibility of Tuscany.

Mr. B. DENMAN regretted that Lord J. Russell had mixed up the case with the general imbecility of the present Government. The convention under which the Austrian troops occupied Tuscany exempted them from the control of the Tuscan authorities, and to make them amenable only to the Austrian Minister at War, and it was the peddling, huxtering spirit with which Lord Malmesbury had applied to the Tuscan Government that the unsatisfactory result was owing. No contrition had been expressed by Austria, and so far from the officer who committed the outrage having been punished, he had received the congratulations of the Austrian army, and he and Lord Malmesbury were regularly toasted at their mess. The outrage on the petty officer at Leghorn had never been satisfactorily explained; and, with Lord Malmesbury at the head of the Foreign-office, Cave Romanos sum was but an empty boast. He thought a vote of censure was due to Lord Malmesbury, for having disgraced this country in the eyes of continental Europe.

The Marquis of GRANBY referred to a number of statistics to prove the depression of the agricultural and the shipping interest under Free Trade. He also endeavoured to show, by deducting the decrease of production from the increase of imports, that the consumption of wheat had fallen off by 400,000 quarters in a year. If Protection were not restored, the peculiar burdens pressing upon agriculture must be lessened.

Lord PALMERSTON thought that all discussion on the subject of Protection was a mere waste of time, for the principle was dead, and its requiem would be sounded at the next election. With respect to the case of Mr. Mather, he had read the papers with anything but satisfaction, and could wish, for the honour of the country, that they were for ever buried in oblivion. In a case of this kind the first step should have been to ascertain the facts, then the guilty parties, after which the Queen's Advocate should have been consulted—a course which appeared to have been taken. An outrage had been committed in a most cowardly manner upon a British subject, and he thought, as responsibility was the companion of power, the Austrian Government should have been applied to in the first instance, and the Tuscan Government, which should not be made the scape-goat of Austria, which was the real offender. He was very much interested in the independence of Tuscany, and it behoved the Government to look to the state to which a great number of the Italian states were reduced. The system of government in the Roman and Neapolitan states was so tyrannical, so violent, and in every respect so odious, as to make the Government of those states a nuisance to Europe. He had to remind the Government that the Austrian troops were to be withdrawn from Tuscany, and the French troops from Rome, in the month of May. That month, however, had elapsed, but these troops had not been withdrawn; and the Government should earnestly direct its attention to the subject, with a view to the preservation of the balance of power in Europe.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, when Lord John Russell attempted to contrast his own Foreign Secretary with the Foreign Secretary of the present Government, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) must be allowed his own opinion, although the noble Lord the member for Tiverton was a much higher authority upon matters like this than the noble Lord the member for the City of London. He complimented Lord Palmerston for the tone and temper in which he had spoken, and then proceeded to contend that there was no inconsistency in the expressions made use of in reference to this outrage by Lord Malmesbury in his dispatches. For his own part, he believed Austria would have been very glad if she could have applied to her for redress, for it would at once have been an acknowledgment of her supremacy in Tuscany. That the fairest portion of Europe should be subjected to foreign tyranny must be, of course, painful to every one, and it must be the common wish of all that it might ere long be restored to a more fitting position. The right hon. gentleman then proceeded to reply to the other charges made by Lord John Russell against the Government, and closed an animated speech amidst very general cheering.

Lord D. STUART charged the Foreign Office with having pandered to Austria at the expense of this country and Mr. Mather.

The discussion was terminated by the motion for reporting the supply votes being affirmed.

At two o'clock in the morning an attempt was made to bring on the adjourned debate on the Maynooth grant, which was met by a determined stand by the Irish members; and, in consequence, a further adjournment took place.

The House adjourned at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

SCOTCH BURGHS.

The Scotch Burghs Bill was read a third time, and several amendments proposed by Earl Minto were agreed to without discussion.

THE MILITIA BILL.

The Earl of DERBY moved the second reading of the Militia Bill.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE supported the second reading of the bill, which, under the circumstances of the times, he thought a necessary measure for the protection of the country.

The Duke of WELLINGTON, in supporting the bill, said the force which would be raised by its means would not certainly be the first instance he all that was desired, for undisciplined troops could not be raised to expectations formed of them from their numerical force. What was required at present in this country, however, was an efficient peace establishment for internal defence, so as to have the disciplined troops to meet any emergency which might arise. He recommended the House to adopt the measure in this view, and the ultimate result would be that they would have a large force as an addition to our regular army.

Earl GREY opposed the bill, which expressed his belief that the measure would prove a failure, upon account of the hardships it involved, whilst it would interfere with recruiting for the regular service.

The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH was glad that there was a necessity for the measure, and explained some expressions which he had used upon a former occasion that had been the subject of considerable misapprehension.

The bill was then read a second time.

On the motion of Lord COLCHESTER, the Turnpike Trusts Arrangements Bill was read a second time.

On the motion of the Duke of NEWCASTLE, the Kennington-common, &c., Improvement Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Schools Sites Acts Extension Bill was also read a third time and passed.

On the motion of Earl DESART, the Scotch Mile for Flax (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.

A select committee was nominated on Baron de Bode's petition.

The Earl of HARDWICKE, on presenting a petition from C. S. Mayes, Elman and other eminent agriculturists of Sussex, respecting the assessment of the Property-tax, said that a clause had been introduced into the Property-tax Bill last session permitting farmers assessed under schedule B to come before the Commissioners and prove their actual profit. It now appeared that this right of appeal was limited to farmers who had taken their farms from Michaelmas to Michaelmas, and did not extend to those who had taken their farms from Midsummer to Midsummer. The intention of Parliament was that, so far as related to the latter class of farmers, defeated, and the petitioners appealed for a remedy. He hoped his noble friend at the head of the Government would make inquiries on the subject, and would see whether the Lords of the Treasury had not the power to interfere and order the right of appeal to be further extended.

Lord BERNERS supported the prayer of the petition.

The Duke of RICHMOND said that was the first time that he had heard of the injury done to the gentlemen alluded to by his noble friend by that which must clearly be a technical error in the act. He would undertake to make the earnest inquiry, and see whether there would be in his power to afford any relief without the necessity of an application to Parliament.

After a few words from the Duke of ARGYLE, the petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Adjourned at ten minutes past ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The House had a mud-day sitting, the Speaker taking the chair at one o'clock.

THE MAYNOOTH DEBATE.

Mr. ANSTEY wished to ask the member for North Warwickshire when he intended to resume the debate on the Maynooth grant, which had by mutual consent been adjourned over the previous night.

Mr. SPOONER intimated that the debate had not been adjourned on the previous day with its consent at first, he having voted against the adjournment; but, as he understood, it was the intention as a division was to be made (cries—Oh!)—and as evincing clearly the opinion of the House, and, therefore, he did not intend to take any further steps in the matter. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. ANSTEY supposed the hon. member meant to move that the order be discharged.

Mr. SPOONER could say nothing about that.

The SPEAKER intimated that the orders did not remain on the order book.

Mr. ANSTEY said the House would understand that the hon. member for North Warwickshire abandoned the whole concern. (A laugh.)

Mr. W. Williams, Mr. Elliott, Mr. H. Herbert, Mr. Magan, Captain Scobell, Colonel Thompson, and other honourable members protested against any such interpretation as that made by Mr. Spooner being placed on the motion for the adjournment of the House and the resulting division.

Mr. MUNTZ defended the course taken by Mr. Spooner, and called on the opponents of the motion, if they were not afraid of inquiry, to assist in bringing on a division.

Mr. KEOGH defended the Irish members from the charge of insincerity in desiring the continuance of this debate. The fact was, that the insincerity was on the side of the Government, and he would, with the permission of the hon. gent., show this to be the case. The Government had sent candidates to Ireland, and in many instances had supplied those candidates with money or with letters of introduction. He could mention, for instance, that the Secretary for Ireland had assisted one of the candidates in this way, and the House might form some opinion of the sincerity of the Government when he told them that their candidates pledged themselves, at public meetings, to support the continuance of the Maynooth grant, and vote for the repeal of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. A noble Lord, a member of this House, had been sent over to contest Dungarvon, and in his address he distinctly stated that he was favourable to the Maynooth grant, and opposed to the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. Now, he wished to ask the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland whether he had not furnished the candidate with letters of introduction—money he did not want? Again, the county of Waterford was being contested by Mr Hutchinson, who was supported by all the influence of the Government, and in his first address he stated that he was in favour of the Maynooth grant, and ready to vote for the repeal of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. This address he issued in the morning, but he afterwards saw a clergyman of the Established Church, and an address came out in the afternoon without the passage to which he referred. (Hear, hear.) The fact was, the document was a mass of insincerity, and the session of 1853 would prove as unsatisfactory to their misguided supporters as the session of 1852.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL was quite willing to answer the present question of the hon. and learned member. The speech which they had just heard from the hon. and learned member was only another illustration of the deadly hostility which he entertained to all Governments; but with regard to the accusations which it contained, he begged to state that he entirely denied them. (Hear, hear.) He had never supplied any candidates with either letters or money, while his official duties would not at all permit the time to write their addresses. (Hear, hear.) As for the noble Lord who was a candidate for Dungarvon, he had not the honour of his acquaintance, neither had he ever spoken to him; but, nevertheless, he must be permitted to state that he could see no inconsistency in a gentleman being a supporter of Lord Derby's Government, and yet not prepared to withstand the Maynooth grant or vote in favour of the continuance of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. (Hear, hear.) For his own part, he should have voted for the motion of the hon member for North Warwickshire, and he would take that opportunity of publicly announcing that he was not prepared, without further inquiry, to vote for a repeal of the Maynooth grant.

Mr. R. OSBORNE thought the conduct of Ministers in reference to this question could only be described as an organised hypocrisy. If the House had any regard to its own character, it would discharge the order.

Mr. BERESFORD thought the House had heard more than enough of the Maynooth question for the present session. The best course they could take was to dismiss it, and proceed to the business that remained to be done.

Mr. BOUVERIE resumed the Government: that they had only themselves to blame for the frequent renewal of the discussion.

After some further discussion the question was allowed to drop.

On the motion of Mr. BERESFORD, the Militia Ballot Suspension Bill was brought in CRIME AND OUTRAGE BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL for IRELAND moved for leave to bring in a bill for a continuance of the Crime and Outrage Act. He considered the simple fact that the number of agrarian outrages in Ireland had increased the simple fact since 1847, when the act first passed, up to last year, as a sufficient and sufficient justification for his motion. He proposed to continue the act to the 31st December next.

Mr. LAWLESS declared his intention to avail himself of all the forms of the House for the purpose of defeating the measure.

After some discussion, in which Mr. F. Scully, Mr. S. Crawford, and Mr. Anstey took part,

Mr. KEOGH said, he had formerly supported this measure; but the circumstances of Ireland had become so altered, that he was guilty of no inconsistency in now voting against it.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER thought there was no inconsistency in the course pursued by the hon and learned gent eman, if he considered the circumstances of Ireland to be so changed as no longer to call for such a measure as the one before the House. As to the remedial measures, the present Government had had no opportunity as yet of bringing them forward, and with respect to the present act, they found it expiring that persons were awaiting their trial for offences against it—and it therefore became necessary to prevent the hon. and persons must be discharged. They only proposed to continue the act until the 31st December, in order to give an opportunity of considering it in the next session of Parliament.

The House divided and the numbers were—For leave to bring in the bill, 140; against it, 19: majority, 121.

The bill was then brought in and read a first time.

The House then adjourned from five until seven o'clock.

At the evening sitting,

BRITISH SUBJECTS EXPELLED FROM THE AUSTRIAN DOMINIONS,

Mr. ANSTEY rose to move the following resolution:—"That this House, recognising the undoubted title of the Queen's subjects resident in foreign countries to the continual protection of her Majesty, in respect of their liberty, property, and other personal rights, and considering that, in the case of the Rev. Messrs. Wingate, Smith, and Edward, arbitrarily expelled from the Austrian dominions in the month of January last, with their wives and children, under circumstances involving great sacrifice of property and other hardships to the sufferers, these rights were violated, and that no redress has been hitherto obtained for the violation, is of opinion that the case is one calling for prompt and earnest measures on the part of her Majesty's Government." The hon. member having detailed the circumstances of the expulsion of the missionaries from Pesth and Lemberg, and the personal suffering and hardship thereby occasioned to themselves and their families, contended that the case had been utterly neglected by the Foreign Secretary and the Earl of Westmoreland, our Ambassador at Vienna, and that the Government were bound to apply to it the same principles on which they had acted in the case of Mr. Finlay, at Athens. The hon member was proceeding with his remarks when a "count-out" took place on the motion of an hon member.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon to six o'clock.

THE "COUNT-OUT."

Mr. ANSTEY complained of the "count-out" of the previous evening, stating to be a fact that there were members sworn on special service to say that the house had been grossly violated in that neighbourhood. He was resolved, however, that the provisions of the law should be enforced.

THE LOST STEAM-SHIP "PRESIDENT."

Mr. H. BERKELEY said that a wreck had been cast upon the coast of Banff, which was by many people supposed to be that of the President steam-ship; and he wished to know from the Secretary to the Admiralty if any steps had been taken to ascertain the fact?

Mr. STAFFORD said that a person had been sent down by the Admiralty, and he had taken the soundings of the wreck, which had been subsequently sent to the principal shipbuilders in the kingdom. Reports had been received from some of them, but others had not as yet been answered. There was reason to believe, however, that the wreck was not that of the President.

THE PROCLAMATION AGAINST ROMAN CATHOLIC PROCESSIONS.

Mr. KEOGH drew attention to the proclamation which appeared in the Gazette of the previous evening, against the appearance of Roman Catholic priests in their sacerdotal robes; and asked if it was intended to insert this proclamation in the Dublin Gazette, so as to give the same publicity to it in Ireland as in England. He also wished to ask if it was their intention to direct the Attorney-General for Ireland to prosecute the priests in that country for doing that which they had been allowed to do by every Government since 1829, without any interference?

Mr. WALPOLE said, that two months ago the Government heard of a procession in Ireland in which a Roman Catholic bishop took part, and they sent a friendly intimation to the bishop, pointing out to him the statute of the 3rd and 4th of George IV., and expressing a hope that he had so acted without any intention of violating the law, otherwise it would be the duty of the Government to put it in force. Since then he had not heard of any repetition of the offence in Ireland, and, therefore it was not the intention of the Government to give a special warning by publishing the declaration in the Dublin Gazette, unless a similar occurrence should take place. He had, he added, not, as Mr. Keogh assumed, last dormant; but it had come to the knowledge of the Government that Roman Catholics in this country were going to renew those processions and pilgrimages, which had been discontinued for many years, by marching from village to village with banners and emblems of their faith, in honour of the Virgin Mary; and the procession had taken place, wh on moved for four miles along the high-road, consisting of 100 persons, with banners, emblems, crucifixes, and ... He could not question in saying that such a procession must give ... annoyance to others of her Majesty's subjects; and the Government the ... right to prevent such a violation of the law, in which instance danger actually ... sisted of a breach of the peace. If the law in this respect were not to be observed. Its violation must ... surely bring down punishment on those who, after this warning, wilfully infringe it.

The County Rates Bill passed through committee.

The adjourned debate on the Bishopric of Christchurch (New Zealand) Bill was resumed by Mr. ADDERLEY, who said the bill, which had already passed the House of Lords, had for its object the division of the diocese of New Zealand into two dioceses, Bishop Selwyn finding that the increasing population of the colony rendered it impossible for one prelate to perform efficiently its episcopal duties.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS asked if the bill would entail any expense on the public?

Mr. ADDERLEY.—Not one farthing.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL supported the bill, thinking a new Bishop was indispensable in New Zealand. Before that could be done, the resignation of Bishop Selwyn must be made in conformity with his patent. He had resigned a portion of his patent with a view to his becoming the Bishop of Christchurch; but this being deemed insufficient by the law officers of the Crown, the present bill became necessary to legalise that resignation

Mr. HEYWOOD moved as an amendment, the adjournment of the debate.

After a few observations from Mr. ANSTEY, Sir J. PAKINGTON, and Mr. HUME, the House divided, and the numbers were—For the adjournment, 31; against it, 110: majority, 79

Mr. HUME then said he would divide the House on the principles of the bill.

The House then divided, and the numbers were—For the second reading of the bill, 111; against it, 34: majority, 77.

The bill was accordingly read a second time.

Sir DE LACY EVANS moved the second reading of the Vestries Bill, the object of which was to enable the four joint parishes of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, St. George, Bloomsbury; and St. Margaret, and St. John, Westminster, to adopt Hobhouse's Act.

The bill was opposed by the Attorney-General, Mr. Henley, and Mr. Walpole; and supported by Mr. T. Duncombe and Mr. Hume.

On a division, the second reading was negatived by a majority of 86 to 26.

MR F. O'CONNOR.

The committee appointed to consider the case of Mr. F. O'Connor reported that the medical testimony taken established the unsoundness of that gentleman's mind; and the House, according to the wish of his sister, agreed to his discharge, with a view to his being confined in Dr. Tooke's private asylum at Chiswick.

Mr. ANSTEY moved the committee on the Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill (No. 2).

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL opposed the bill, which he said could never have got to its present stage had attention been called to it.

On a division, the bill was negatived by a majority of 65 to 16.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

ROYAL COMMISSION.

The Royal assent was given by Commission to the following bills, viz.—Stamp Duties (Ireland) Continuance. Turnpike Roads (Ireland), Proclamation for Assembling Parliament, Laws of Wills Amendment, Registration of Births, Deaths, and Marriages, Apprehension of Deserters from Foreign Ships, Law of Evidence (Scotland), Public Works, Kensington Common, &c., Improvement; Belfast Custom House. Sixty other bills, of a local and private nature, also received the Royal assent.

The Lords Commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Salisbury, and Earl Fortescue.

CASE OF MR. MATHER.

Lord BEAUMONT gave notice that he would, on Monday next, call their Lordships' attention to the correspondence that has already taken place in reference to the outrage committed upon Mr. Mather in Florence.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS (CRIMINAL JURISDICTION) BILL.

Lord WODEHOUSE moved the second reading of this bill, which was strongly supported by Lord CAMPBELL.

The Bishops of SALISBURY and OXFORD severally opposed the measure, the former right rev. Prelate moving that the bill be read a second time that day three months.

Lord CRANWORTH said that the Bishop of Oxford appeared to think that these courts ought to exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction over laymen a principle to which he (Lord Cranworth) declared his decided opposition. He hoped that the noble Lord would persevere with his bill.

Their Lordships ultimately divided, when the bill was lost by a majority of 30 to 45

The Passengers Act Amendment Bill was read a second time.

The Copyhold Enfranchisement Bill passed through committee.

The Trustees Act Extension Bill was read a second time.

The Lunacies Bill, the second reading of which was proposed by the Earl of SHAFTESBURY, was ultimately withdrawn, at the suggestion of the Lord CHANCELLOR, who said, that, though he agreed in the principle of the measure, he thought that the subject was too important to pass without further consideration, and, inasmuch as the next session was not far distant, it would be better to postpone the bill until then, when they would have much more time to render it effectual for the carrying out its objects.

THE MILITIA BILL.

The House then went into committee upon this bill, the clauses of which, after some discussion, were agreed to.

The General Board of Health Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Turnpike Trusts Arrangement Bill, and the Scotch Mills for Flax (Ireland) Bill, were severally passed through committee. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at twelve o'clock.

THE METROPOLITAN WATER SUPPLY BILL.

After some opposition from Mr. HOWARTH and Lord EBRINGTON, this bill went into committee; but up to four o'clock, when the House adjourned, only the first clause was agreed to.

NEW SOUTH WALES

In the evening sitting,

Lord NAAS presented a petition from the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, complaining of the illiberal nature of the Constitution recently conferred upon that colony.

Sir W. MOLESWORTH having moved that the petition should be printed upon the minutes of the House,

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER complained that the petition contained expressions disrespectful to her Majesty, to whom it alluded as being simply the trustee of her own dominions. (Hear, hear.)

After a brief discussion, the motion was agreed to.

INCOME TAX.—TENANT FARMERS.

In reply to Mr. FREWEN,

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER read a circular which had been issued by the Board of Inland Revenue, to the effect that relief under the Income-tax would be afforded to tenant farmers, upon satisfactory evidence being given that the profits arising from their occupation did not amount to the sum assessed under schedule B.

THE WINE DUTIES.

In reply to Mr. Mullings, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that the Government had no intention to reduce the wine duties.

SURVEY OF THE WEST COAST OF IRELAND.

In reply to Mr H. Herbert, Mr. STAFFORD said that the survey of the West Coast of Ireland would extend to the Bay of Galway and the mouth of the Shannon.

METROPOLITAN WATER SUPPLY BILL

The House then again went into committee upon this Bill

After some discussion, the several clauses of the bill were agreed to.

THE METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS BILL.

Lord JOHN MANNERS, in moving the second reading of this bill, said that the object of it was to repeal altogether the act of 1850, and to enact, in its room, that the Secretary of State should have power to close any burial-grounds calculated to be prejudicial to the public health; and that power should be given to parochial authorities to replace such closed burial-grounds by other cemeteries out of the metropolitan districts. It further gave power to the Government to have a cemetery of its own, to be conducted by such parishes as might find themselves without any accommodation upon the closing of the burial-ground.

After some opposition from Lord Ebrington, the bill was read a second time.

The Metropolitan Sewers Bill, the Grand Junes (Metropolitan) District Bill, and the Bishopric of Quebec Bill were severally passed through committee.

The Consolidated Fund Bill, the Militia Ballot Suspension Bill, and the Militia Pay Bill were severally read a second time.

The New Zealand Government Bill was read a third time and passed.

The other bills on the paper were advanced a stage, and the House adjourned.

MR. F. O'CONNOR, M.P.—On Tuesday the committee appointed to inquire into the matter of the petition of Miss O'Connor, praying that Mr. Feargus O'Connor may be liberated and confided to the care of his sister, met at four o'clock in committee room No. 12. Present, Mr. Walpole, chairman; Mr. M. Milnes, Mr. V. Smith, Mr. O'Connor, Mr. J. O'Connell, the O'Gorman Mahon, Mr. J. Bell, and others. Dr. Tweedie and Dr. Lawrence, who have been in daily attendance on the unfortunate gentleman since his confinement, were examined on the subject-matter of the petition. Miss O'Connor having been also examined, was permitted to have an interview with her unfortunate brother, in the presence of Captain Gossell, the assistant Sergeant-at-Arms. Mr. Bell, Dr. Tweedie, and two of the messengers. No remarkable change has taken place in Mr. O'Connor, either for better or worse, during the last few days. Dr. Connolly, of Hanwell Asylum, visited him on Tuesday, and was understood to be of opinion that Mr. O'Connor's insanity is only symptomatic or incipient and that, with attention, and in a short time, he may be restored to a state of mental convalescence. On Wednesday afternoon the gentleman was discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and removed to Dr. Tooke's lunatic asylum, at Chiswick, in the care of in-pector Backeridge and a party of the A division of police

From Hong Kong (China), under date April 24, accounts have been received which notice the arrival there of the Italian chief who had headed the late insurrection at Rome, Garibaldi, from Calao, in command of the Peruvian vessel Carmen. The vessel subsequently proceeded to Amoy with her cargo of guano

On Tuesday night a melancholy accident occurred off Rotherhithe to two women and a child, who, by the sinking of a stone-barge, were drowned in the cabin before any assistance could be rendered to them. The barge belonged to Shropshire, and was waiting for the tide.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

LIEUTENANT LIVERTON DONALDSON.

THE expedition against the Burmese Empire has opened brilliantly, yet sadly. Sixteen officers, gallant and promising, have, according to the returns, been killed or wounded. Among these the fate of the Lieut. Donaldson, of the Bengal Engineers, presents a melancholy interest. This courageous young officer was the second son of Professor Donaldson, of University College, and had passed through Addiscombe College with considerable credit and distinction. On leaving that establishment, where he carried off many prizes, and was third man of his term, he received his appointment to the Engineers in March, 1851, he left for the Madras Presidency; and, upon his own application, he was transferred to Bengal. The misunderstanding with the Court of Ava then assuming a warlike appearance, he earnestly applied to be appointed on the expedition; and, as a reward for an able summary, which he drew up for the Government, of the papers left by the former expedition, he received orders to act under the command of Major Fraser. On the 12th of April the troops disembarked, and the artillery were brought to play upon the White Horse Picket. The brave Fraser seized a ladder, surmounted all obstacles, and was the first within the formidable stockade. His gallant companions, Lieuts. Donaldson and Trevor, eagerly seconded and followed him in the assault. The result to them was awfully rapid. Donaldson fell, mortally shot in the body; Trevor dropped too, severely wounded. They were both carried to the hospital. The occasional application of chloroform greatly relieved the pain of the sufferers. Lieut. Donaldson in a few hours breathed his last. He was aged twenty two at the time. His death is a loss to the Company's service, and to the people in their territory to whom his virtuous energies and varied talents might have been profitably devoted. The only consolation in this regret is the fine example—a good omen to our warlike proceedings—that Donaldson has presented of that union of refined and useful intellect with daring and cultivated courage which now so prominently and continually characterise the British officer.

MR. SCROPE DAVIES.

THE members of that band of choice spirits who were wont to share the festive moments of George IV. when Regent, in Carlton House, are fast dropping away. Lords Allan and Alvanley, Sydney Smith, Walter Scott, Beau Brummell, George Hanger, and Brummell we fancy, have sunk into their graves, one by one Death has recently carried off another of the Regent's boon companions, the gay and witty Scrope Davies; he died in Paris. Mr. Scrope Davies was a gown boy at Eton, and afterwards obtained a fellowship at King's College, Cambridge, in fact he was a senior fellow of the college at the time of his decease. He was the intimate friend of Byron, who tells a story in "Beppo" about his asking Mr. Davies how Brummell was getting on, and how they met Brummell at the door of White's Club. Mr. Davies wore a somewhat showy waistcoat of an obtrusive pattern, and Brummell chilled him for venturing to appear in such a garment. Scrope asked tremblingly what he was to do? "Go down into the country, my dear Scrope, and I hope it will blow over." Mr. Davies will be regretted by many admiring friends, although a declining state of health and advancing age had withered his wit, and prevented him from going much into society for some time past.

LIEUTENANT DORAN.

THIS was another heroic victim in the cause of honour and the service of his country at the attack upon Rangoon. Lieutenant Robert Doran was the second son of John Doran, Esq., Major in the 18th Royal Irish Regiment, by his wife Georgiana, only daughter of Robert Hughes, Esq., of Ely House. Mr. Robert Doran, in addition to his Lieutenancy, filled the important post of Adjutant in the 18th Regiment, in which his father served with distinction for upwards of thirty years. Lieut. Doran was only five days united to his wife, a daughter of the late Thomas Bracken, Esq., of Beaumont Hall, Suffolk, and of Calcutta, when war summoned him to the post of duty. He was killed at the storming of the fortified pagoda at Rangoon, during the attack of the 14th of April. The despatches announcing the fall of Rangoon and his death arrived at Calcutta together. He fell at the head of his men, cheering them on to the attack: his own daring spirit leading him to seek to be the first to plant his country's colours on the enemy's walls. He was pierced by seven bullets, and died after lingering for an hour. The night before his death this gallant young officer had written in pencil, under a waggon, a note to his wife, stating that he had just prayed to God to be spared for her sake.

GENERAL MAISTER.

GENERAL MAISTER, Colonel of the 86th Regiment, entered the army in 1796, and, in rising through the different grades to the high rank he last held, saw much arduous service. He was under the late Duke of York in Holland, in the Walcheren expedition, where he received several serious wounds, and where, during that unfortunate venture, he suffered severely from the low fever which broke out amongst our troops, and proved fatally disastrous to numbers of them. Maister afterwards acted gallantly in the Peninsular campaigns, where he was also wounded. He was subsequently entrusted by her Majesty's Government with the command of the forces stationed in the Windward and Leeward Islands, in which post he gave the fullest satisfaction to the Government, and made himself universally and deservedly liked and respected. This distinguished General died suddenly on the 18th ult., when on a visit at Wells. His remains were interred in the Minster, at Ripon, Yorkshire, where they were attended to their earthly resting-place by a numerous body of friends, all deeply deploring his loss. He was at the time of his decease in his 70th year.

NEW CHURCH OF ST. ANDREW, BUCKLAND, KENT.

THIS picturesque structure, which has undergone a complete restoration, is romantically situated in a valley near Dover, and well known to the numerous visitors to that favourite watering-place. The architecture is of the early English period, and affords the rare example of a lancet triplet at the west end. The plan of the edifice consists of a nave and chancel, both with north and south aisles, and a small vestry. A new bell gable has been erected on the evident ancient site, to replace an unsightly wooden box, containing the bells, but with no outlet for their sound. The new roof has been ceiled between the rafters, leaving the principal timbers exposed. Low benches have been substituted for high modern pews; the interesting piscina, aumbry, and sedilia, carefully restored; and the floors not occupied by the benches laid with buff and red tiles interspersed with black to form a pattern. The whole cost of the restoration did not exceed £1000, of which sum £600 was raised by rate, £80 granted by the Incorporated Society, and the remainder made up by subscriptions and the proceeds of a fancy fair held in the gardens of the parsonage-house. A lady residing in the neighbourhood has promised a stained glass window for the large window at the east end of the chancel, as a gift.

The parsonage-house, which was in a very dilapidated condition, has been likewise restored and enlarged.

The works were entrusted to the care of Mr. F. H. Wilson, architect.

NEW CHURCH OF ST. ANDREW, AT BUCKLAND, NEAR DOVER.

NEW INDEPENDENT CHURCH AT GLASGOW.

ONE of the most striking architectural reforms of the day is the rejection by Dissenters of rigid and ungainly designs for their places of worship an instance of which has lately presented itself in the erection of a new "Independent Church" for the congregation hitherto assembling in St. Mary's Hall, Glasgow.

This new Church is of the Early Decorated style of Gothic architecture, and is built throughout, interior as well as exterior, of polished Kenmuir stone. The edifice is about 80 feet long, 48 feet wide, and 55 feet high. The entrance is beneath a massive tower 20 feet square, to be surmounted by a spire 220 feet high, which, when completed (as shown in the Illustration), will present a very imposing appearance, and be greatly ornamental to the city of Glasgow. Attached to the Church is a large hall for week-day services, and a residence for the attendant. The interior fittings are of oak. The pulpit, beautiful in design and execution, is of Caen stone, supported by marble shafts, and further enriched by the same material, and at the angles are double canopies, elaborately wrought, beneath which are figures of the four Evangelists.

In a small transept is an excellent organ built by Messrs. Bevington, of Soho. There is no gallery, but the seats accommodate about 700. The architect is Mr. Emmett, of Hatton-garden, to whose taste and judgment in sacred architecture Congregationalism is largely indebted.

NEW CHURCH OF ST. MARY MAGDALENE, MUNSTER-STREET, REGENT'S-PARK.

THE Church of Mary Magdalene, recently completed from the design of R. C. Carpenter, Esq., and of which our Engraving furnishes a correct view of the interior, is remarkably well planned, and in very many points extremely novel and effective. As yet, however, the design is not fully carried out, the tower and spire and the north aisles of the nave and chancel not being erected. The west front, in Munster-street, shows but the two gables of the nave and the south aisle, with their tracery windows; but the east end, in Laxton-place, is extremely ornate in detail. The chancel window, the chief feature in this point, is an unusually noble one of seven lights, with a large traceried wheel in the head. Over the lower roof of the vestry, which is placed at the south-east of the chancel, is seen a fine window of five lights, forming the east end of the south chancel aisle. A reticulated window of four lights on the south side of the sanctuary, or eastern end of the chancel, is also seen in the south perspective of the east elevation; and the buttresses of this part of the Church being somewhat elaborate, together with carved tablets representing the symbols of the Evangelist, which are inserted in the wall under the east window, combine to produce a very rich architectural effect.

The interior of the Church, from its great size and admirable proportions, is very striking. There are five arches on each side of the nave, between the nave and aisles, each supported by four clustered columns; but there is no clerestory, a very unusual feature. The nave is 72 feet long by 26 feet wide, and is 54 feet in height to the ridge of its open-timbered roof. It is paved with small red tiles; and the seats, which are moveable, are exceedingly commodious, and are free and unappropriated for ever. The south aisle, which continues eastward of the chancel arch, is 96 feet long by 21 feet 9 inches wide and 49 feet 6 inches high: in this aisle is placed the organ, which, resting on massive stone corbels, is remarkable in its good design and originality of treatment. The organ was built by Messrs. Gray and Davison. The chancel, which is 38 feet 10 inches long, is several feet above the level of the nave, low stone walls guarding its western end. The chancel arch is very lofty. The eastern window is extremely fine, and, being filled with stained glass of the richest character, is particularly striking. In the centre, the wheel is filled with a representation of our Saviour in the act of benediction; and in the radii are figures of angels. The seven lights beneath have in them the figures of the crucified Saviour, the Virgin, St. John the Evangelist, St. James, Mary Magdalene, St. Peter, and St. Thomas. This stained glass is by Hardman. The roof of the chancel is arched, and painted a light blue, powdered with stars. On the walls of the chancel is a very elaborate and beautifully carved arcade of small arches resting on polished shafts of St. Ann's marble; and over the altar, which is covered with a plain frontal and superfrontal of red fringed with gold, is a dossel fringed with a diaper pattern in gold, and upon which, in gold of a different tint, is introduced a florated cross.

In the archway leading into the chancel aisle is a screen of open wrought iron-work, painted a bright blue, the ornamental details being enriched with gold. We should observe that these decorations of the chancel were executed by Mr. J. G. Crace, and are most beautiful and appropriate.

The stalls for the clergy and choir are of oak. The Church is lighted with gas in clusters of lights issuing from very handsome standards of brass.

The font is richly carved; its stem is surrounded by eight shafts of polished marble. It is raised on a dais of encaustic tiles, and has a pyramidal cover.

This Church, though built on a site purchased and contributed by the congregation of Christ's Church, St. Pancras, was erected at the entire cost of one founder, the Rev. E. Stewart, who is the incumbent.

CLOISTER OF ST. MARY BOTHAW.

The remains of the church of St. Mary Bothaw, the cloister whereof is shown in the accompanying Engraving were laid open by the workmen engaged upon the foundations for the new houses in Cannon-street, nearly opposite London Stone. Besides the above, a small vaulted building was discovered, composed of very massive and well-laid masonry. The cloister is constructed of strong ribs much depressed, and a chalk roof. The height from the present level is about eight feet, but the floor is encumbered by a quantity of accumulated soil. Light is admitted by a shaft on either side, near one of which is the upper part of a pointed doorway. Near these remains is the small burial-ground of St. Mary Bothaw, bounded by a fragment of the south wall of the old church, with a window bricked up, and part of a panelled tomb, containing shields, the bearings of which are totally erased, built into the wall. St. Mary Bothaw was one of the churches destroyed in the Great Fire of 1666, and not rebuilt, being annexed to St. Swithin's parish. The situation of this church, near the river bank at Dowgate, is considered by Stow to have suggested the addition of Bothaw or boat-haw, to distinguish it from the numerous churches dedicated to St. Mary, it being presumed to have been erected near a yard where boat building was carried on. "Within this church, and the small cloystrie adjoyning, divers noblemen and persons of worship have been buried, as appeareth by armes in the windowes, the defaced tombes, and print of plates torne up and carried away. There remaine onely of John West, Esquire, buried in the year 1408; Thomas Huytley, Esquire, 1532, but his monument is defaced since; Lancelot Bathurst, &c. Here lyeth the body of Lancelot Bathhurst, citizen, grocer, and chosen alderman of this honourable citie; who deceased the 27th day of September, 1594, &c. But the most memorable monument of all other there was that of Sir Henry Fitzalwine, draper, the first Lord Maior of London that ever was, and continued (by several elections) in the Maioralitie above 24 yeares. His dwelling-house remaineth yet in the parish, divided now into two or three houses. His monument can be proved to be in that church, as his armes in the glasse windowes and Grave-stones doe sufficiently shew. Besides those houses were his gift to the drapers, and they pay a quit-rent, which things are sufficient to testifie that he was not buried in the Priorie of the holy Trinitie within Aldgate (now called the Duke's Place), as formerly hath beene avowched by Mr. Stowe; but that there his body resteth, in undoubted hope of a joyfull resurrection. Such as make any doubt hereof, may be further satisfied in the Drapers' Hall." So says the editor of Stow, 1633; but it may be remarked that he errs in assigning the title of Lord Mayor to the first chief magistrate of the city.

The church of St. Mary Bothaw appears to have been of considerable antiquity, certain lands and houses specified as lying on the north side of it having been granted in the year 1167, by Wibut, the prior, and the convent of Christchurch, Canterbury, to one Ernis and his heirs for ever, in consideration of an annual payment of ten shillings in money, a towel of the value of eight-pence, two pitchers at six pieces of money, and a salt-cellar at four, which were to be delivered to the prior's steward for the use of his house. The patronage of this rectory, which is one of the peculiars of the see of Canterbury, was retained by the convent of Christ Church until the Suppression, when it came to the Dean and Chapter of that see, in whom it has ever since remained, and they present alternately with the Salters' Company.

The strength of the remains above mentioned will probably entitle them to be used as cellarage for the new buildings, in which case they will be cleared out; but, should this not be the case, a very little labour would suffice for their further investigation, when it is possible that monumental remains, &c. might be found of interest sufficient to justify the research.

THE CAMBRIDGE ASYLUM.

The foundation-stone of the Asylum at Kingston, intended for the reception of soldiers' widows, was laid on Tuesday by his Royal Highness Prince Albert—an event of considerable interest to the military profession, and which was honoured by the presence of numerous ladies and gentlemen. Archways adorned with laurel, and displays of flags, distinguished the line of approach. The Coldstream band also was on the ground, and with their animating music added to the gaiety of the scene. At four o'clock his Royal Highness arrived, and was received by the Mayor and Corporation of Kingston, the clergy, the Bishop of Winchester; General Sir Howard Douglas, Bart., the chairman of the Committee; Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. Augustus Liddell; the Committee and officers; who preceded his Royal Highness to the spot. Immediately on reaching the ground the Royal standard was hoisted, and the band played "God save the Queen;" after which the children sang the 46th Psalm, and the Bishop of Winchester offered up the appointed prayer.

Sir Howard Douglas then addressed his Royal Highness, observing that no one could doubt that the inspirations in which the idea of the Asylum originated would now be realised. It was a monument, he added, to the memory of the late Duke of Cambridge; and was considered by a meeting of gentlemen well acquainted with his virtues and his benevolence, the most appropriate that could be founded in his honour. The fund then collected had been appropriately converted to this purpose. The site of the Asylum had been granted by the present Duke, and the amount to be expended in building had been collected within about £200, the subscriptions now exceeding £3500. Objections, Sir Howard stated, had been taken to the institution on the score of its encouraging matrimonial connexions among the army; but provision, he said, was already made for their accommodation in barracks; and this he considered a sufficient answer, particularly when we reflect that the institution was calculated to have a moral effect, and to raise the moral position of the soldier. The Duchess of Cambridge had subscribed towards the object the sum of £100; and her daughter, the Princess Mary, another sum of the like amount. Sir Howard concluded with requesting his Royal Highness Prince Albert to lay the stone.

His Royal Highness having graciously replied to this address, proceeded to deposit in an aperture in the stone a glass vase, containing a scroll commemorative of the object for which the Asylum was erected, and some coins; after which the trowel was presented to the Prince, who, having adjusted the mortar, the stone was lowered to its place, and the level and bevil were correctly applied, whereupon his Royal Highness completed the work by giving the three usual blows with the mallet. Three cheers were then given by the children, who also sang the 100th psalm.

Mr. Henry Pownall then addressed his Royal Highness on the part of the Committee, complimenting him on his habitual disposition to do good, and alluding to the blessings which soldiers' widows would invoke upon him, adding gratitude to their loyalty. The Bishop then pronounced a blessing, and the Mayor and Corporation having approached his Royal Highness with a dutiful address, the Prince replied:—

Mr. Mayor and gentlemen,—I thank you very sincerely for the hearty and flattering welcome which I have received from you. It has given me the greatest pleasure to accept your invitation on the present occasion, and to testify my sympathy with the objects sought to be attained by this institution, my respect and affection for the memory of him whose name it is to bear, and my cordial concurrence in the hope that the results may be such as would have been most pleasing to the genuine kindness and benevolence of his disposition.

This speech was received with loud cheers. The National Anthem was then sung, and the proceedings terminated.

The portion of the Asylum founded on Tuesday will be 200 feet in length and will contain 40 inmates; the entire edifice to accommodate 160. The materials are red and white brick, with stone dressings; the style, Elizabethan. Each inmate will have a separate dwelling, with other conveniences. The architect has taken care to preserve the beautiful cedars in front of the centre of the site. A fountain is also there, which, being in a dilapidated condition, will be repaired. The site is in Norbiton Park, the property H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge. Mr. Thos. Allom is the architect, and Messrs. Lock and Nesham are the contractors.

KING'S COLLEGE HOSPITAL.

King's College Hospital was established in the year 1839, with the twofold object of affording practical instruction to the medical students of King's College, under their own professors, and of ministering to the necessities of the sick poor of a large and destitute population in the very heart of London. These important objects have been hitherto accomplished by the temporary occupation of the workhouse formerly belonging to St. Clement's parish. The accommodation thus afforded has long been altogether inadequate; and the first stone of a new and more commodious structure has just been laid. The portion of the building to be first erected consists of the south front and east wing, comprising the out-patient department, the operating theatre and chapel, the dispensary and laboratory, and wards for about 90 patients. The building, which, from the fine signs of Thomas Bellamy, Esq., will be eminently light and airy, and well provided with every convenience. The principal stories will be 15 feet high: the remainder, including the basement, 14 feet. The wards are to be very spacious for the number of beds, which will in no case exceed 12 to a ward. The least cubic space for patients will be 1800 feet; the greatest, 2500. The arrangements for practical teaching are to be on the same liberal scale. Besides the large theatre already mentioned, which is to accommodate 300 pupils, there will be a second theatre of smaller size; a museum, which is completed, but will contain a large and convenient waiting-rooms for the students. The style of the building is the same throughout, every façade having been equally studied. The entrance, the entrance-hall the great staircase, the theatre, and the chapel are all likely to be very effective. The building will receive air and light from two open courts. The ventilation will be by opposite windows and open fire-places, without artificial aid, which, with such ample space, may well be dispensed with. Unusual pains have been taken to secure in every part of the building a free movement of air, and a liberal supply of light. The new Hospital, it is hoped, will not prove unworthy of this age of modern dwellings and buildings of all kinds, and will certainly be a valuable addition to our public structures devoted to purposes of benevolence.

On Thursday the ceremonies of laying the foundation stone of the new building took place under a spacious marquee 120 feet by 80, erected by Mr. Benjamin Edgington. The seats in the marquee were all covered with crimson cloth, the ensemble forming a magnificent amphitheatre, the greater portion of which was filled with display-dressed ladies. By half-past one in the 21 Coldstream Guards, led by Mr. G Cooke, performed various airs prior to the commencement of the proceedings, and added much to the gaiety of the scene. In the absence of the Earl of Ellesmere from indisposition, the ceremony of laying the foundation stone was performed by his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury; and amongst the company present we observed the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Lichfield, the Earl of Dartmouth, Sir T. Baddeley, Bart., W. Cotton, Esq., and the Rev. W. W. Ellis, rector of St. Clement Danes; the Rev. J. R. Major, D.D.; the Rev. J. Davar, chaplain of the Hospital; J. J. Pocock, Esq (who gave £500 to the Hospital); the Rev. Archdeacon Hodson, Master of the Temple; F. G. Sambrooke, Esq.; Major Moore, E Wigram, Esq.

On the Archbishop of Canterbury reaching the ground, the Old Hundredth Psalm was sung by the children of the adjoining St. Clement Danes, under the direction of Mr. Hullah, who conducted the musical arrangements. Dr. Jelf then read an address from the committee to the Archbishop, on the nature and object of the day's proceedings, and setting forth the constitution of the charity. The Bishop of London next advanced near the stone, and read a devotional service appointed for the occasion. The stone was then raised, and a brass plate, containing the following inscription, inserted therein: "The first stone of this building, designed by Thomas Bellamy, Esq., for the president, vice-presidents, and governors of King's College Hospital, was laid on this spot, immediately adjoining the site of the temporary building used as an hospital since 1839, by his Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, visitor of King's College, London, on Thursday, June 17, 1852, being the 13th year of the reign of her Majesty Queen Victoria, patron of the Hospital. 'Blessed is the man that provideth for the sick and needy.'"

The usual ceremony consequent having been gone through,

The Archbishop said: "This foundation-stone is plaid in faith and hope to the glory of God and desire for our zeal." Amen."

The civil dren of the schools then sang the first three verses of the 43d Psalm, and the Bishop of London read three prayers invoking the blessing of God on the undertaking; after which the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London briefly addressed the assembly

The Bishop of London, as chairman of the council, observed that in this Hospital there was a combination of sound knowledge of every kind with that which was best of all—the knowledge of the precepts of their holy religion. The motto of the Hospital was "wisdy and holly p" and, from the high character of the professors attached to the Hospital, he had no doubt the principles contained in that motto would be fairly maintained.

The right rev. Prelate then prono unced the blessing, and the proceedings terminated with the National Anthem, admirably sung by the children.

LAW AND POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

JEWISH DISABILITIES.—CHUBB v. SALOMONS, M.P.—In the Court of Exchequer, on Monday this case came on for trial before the Lord Chief Baron and a common jury. It was an action of debt for £500, the sum which by means three penalties of £500 each, under the 1st George 1, c. 13, for having voted in the House of Commons as member for the borough of Greenwich, without having first taken the necessary oaths. The 13th section of that act provides that no action shall been brought against the defendant by a solicitor's clerk of the name of Miller to recover one penalty, which resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. In the present action was alleged by the plaintiff's counsel that the form of the was collusive. On the part of the defendant, however, this allegation was denied in the strongest terms. Mr. John A. Smith, M P., and Lord Marcus Hill, M.P., were severally called as witnesses in support of the plaintiff's case; but, having pleaded their privilege as members of Parliament, the Court decided that they could not compel them to give evidence against their wishes. The Lord Chief Baron, in summing up, gave it as his opinion that on y one penalty could be recovered under the present record. He said he did not consider that the entries in the journals of the House, put in by the plaintiff's counsel, could be received as evidence; neither did he think that the proof of the defendant having been in the House of Commons, and having voted, was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to a verdict; the jury thought the plaintiff had proved the facts of the case, then he was entitled to their verdict; but, if not, they ought to find for the defendant. The jury, after about five minutes' deliberation, returned a verd ct for the defendant. The trial occupied the Court two days.

MISS CATHERINE HAYES v. BEALE AND OTHERS.—In the Vice-Chancellor's Court on Saturday last, an application was made on behalf of the plaintiff for an injunction restraining the Union Bank of London, its ag nts and officers, and one of the defendants, Mr. John Chapman, the public officer of the bank, from paying to another of the defendants, Mr T. F. Beale, the music seller, of Regent-street, any part of the moneys of Miss Hayes (about £3000) in the possession of the Un on Bank. The motion sought also to restrain Mr. Beale from carrying on further proceedings in the Lord Mayor's Court in London against Miss Hayes, or against the Union Bank, and also to restrain Mr. Beale from further prosecuting an action brought by him against Miss Hayes in the Superior Court of New York, in America, and from bringing any other action against Miss Hayes or any other person. The agreement between her and Mr. Beale, dated the 30th of April, 1851. The proceedings arose out of an agreement entered into between Miss Hayes and Mr. Beale in Nov., 1850, whereby she gave to him a month's benefit at Her Majesty's in the United States during the following year (1851); and the transfer of Beale's original contract with the lady to Mr. John Henry Wardwell, of New York Vice Chancellor Sir T. Parker decided that another friend of Beale's, whom the plaintiff was a purely legal demand. He was grand jane entitled to pursue all the remedies that resulted from that demand, partic larly as the plaintiff had shown no sufficient grounds to the contrary, and he therefore declined to make the order prayed for BETTING-HOUSES.—At the Mansion House police office, on Monday, Sir Peter Laurie said he had received a great number of communications upon the sterling evil of betting-houses, to which the active interposition of the magistrates of the metropolis was so urgently called. He read one as an illustration of the essence of the whole series. It was as follows:—"276, Regent street, June 10, 1852. Sir Peter Laurie,—I am glad to see from the newspapers that you have taken that frightful evil, betting-houses, in hand. Unless something is done speedily for our protection, all those who, like myself, employ young men in their business (who of necessity must be entrusted with large sums of money) will be inevitably ruined by the robberies to which these young men must have recourse, to pay their losses at the e dens of infamy. As a proof that I have been seriously harmed by betting-houses, I have in my pocket a memorandum of tickets, &c. (one of which you will perceive is for £72 12s 6d.), that I took from the box of my apprentice, who acknowledged it to be his; and I now find that one of my errand-boys, fourteen years of age, is so addicted to the same vice, and of course is also on the high-road to ruin. I remain, sir, yours most respectfully, JOHN SIMPSON." . . . . . The tickets inclosed particularised the horses betted upon, and the money staked, and told ont the strongest inducements to those who have any way of getting money together for the purpose of making their fortunes. Amongst the cards were found some bearing invitations for ladies to visit the betting-rooms. . . . . Sir Peter said he could be successful, place it to your own liberality. Commissions executed to any amount. Money had out with the best men. Charge 10 per cent. on the winnings—free if the horse does not win. If you wish to back a horse from William Chifney's list, no percentage is charged." "'Tip' for all races run any week, 2s. 6d." "Subscription list.—One guinea upon all information upon steeple-chases and flat races up to Epsom Oaks, 1852." In all the tickets it was stated that the bets were payable the day after the race.

William Henry Willes, Esq., has been appointed by the Inns of Court lecturer on the branches of the common law which are not included in constitutional law, the law of real property and conveyancing, devises and bequests.

The Glasgow, Leeds, and other northern newspapers complain that the battle-ge-horse nuisance has reached their respective localities.

THE PROGRESS OF LOCOMOTION.—It is understood that a contract has been entered into by the directors of the London and North-Western Railway Company with Messrs. Fairburn, of Manchester, for the construction of a number of "express train" engines, which have been designed by the company's locomotive engineer for the attainment of high speed. It is fully expected that these engines, which Messrs Fairburn have undertaken to complete in four months, will run from Euston-square to Birmingham, a distance of 113 miles, with loaded trains, in two hours.

MUSIC.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

At the seventh concert, last Monday night, the symphonies were Mozart's, in G minor, and Beethoven's, in D, No. 2: the overtures were Weber's "Oberon" and Rossini's "William Tell." It would be a "three-to-d to" to enter into details of the magnificent execution of these fine works under Costa's superintendence. The minuet and trio of Mozart's work, which is scarcely inferior to the "Jupiter" one, was rapturously encored. Herr Pauer's classic, intelligent, and forcible reading of Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat, and Mr. Cooper's correct and vigorous rendering of Spohr's violin concerto, also in G, must be emphatically commended as first rate dep sys of mind and mechanism. The vocal gleanings were by the falsity attendant upon carrying a Welsh rarebit meeting, anything but unexceptionable. Despite of Madame Castellan, Gardoni (whose engagement at Her Majesty's Theatre expired on Saturday), and Herr Formbs, the unaccompanied trio from Meyerbeer's "Robert" was dismally sung; Madame Castellan was out of voice in Spontini's air from "Cortez;" and Formes was more than usually coarse and boisterous in Weber's air. The best displays, by Madame Caste lan and Gardoni, were the very clever and dramatic duo from Costa's opera, "Don Carlos," and the "Favorita" romance, sung by Gardoni.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.

On Monday Mr. G. A. Osborne, the pianist and composer, gave his annual matinée, at the Hanover-square Rooms. His new sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, in which he was associated with Piatti, was greatly and deservedly applauded. As in all Mr. Osborne's chamber compositions, while he preserves the classic forms, there is a delightful flow of melody. The interpretation left nothing to be desired. With Sivori he performed his duo for piano and violin, the part for the latter composed by De Beriot; and some elegant single pieces, "L'Esperance," "La Rêverie," and "Evening Dew," executed. Mr. Osborne's reputation as a writer and executant. Miss Louisa Pyne was to have been the vocalist, but it is with the deepest regret we announce she was struck with paralysis on the morning of this concert, over which a cloud was thrown by the distressing intelligence. Miss Messent replaced Miss Pyne at a short notice, and sang very nice y scena, "The Lord of the Castle," by Osborne.—At the fifth meeting of the Musical Union, on Tuesday, the vamping-up of Venicamps of Tartini's "Sonata del Diavolo" created a marked sensation, especially in the final movement in two-four time, in which the sustained shakes seemed other to frame conditions call from the player the most powerful and most marvellously-experienced violin st. Tartini, who died in 1770, declared that he founded this sonata on a dream, in which he heard it Diavolo play the violin in masterly style. When he awoke he attempted to write down what he regarded it as far inferior to the demoni c performance. Herr Pauer cleverly played Mozart's Fantasia in C minor, Op. 11, and Mendelssohn's Prelude Fugue, in Op. 35 i and, with Bazzini, Beethoven's Trio in B flat, Op. 97, which was rendered with Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat, Op. 87, finely rendered by Vieuxtemps, Pollitzer, Ourry, Webb, and Piatti. M. Sczeeley, the pianist, presented his second matinée on Tuesday, at the Queen Anne-street Rooms, with the operation of Blagrove, Bottesini, Paque (violoncel o), Maffei (cornet-à-piston), Messrs. Hi l and Ley; Mdlle Hermann and Miss I. Rosenhagen.—Messrs. Mellon, R S Pratten, and Hausmann (members of the Royal Italian Opera orchestra) gave a morning concert on Tuesday, at the Hanover-square Rooms Mr Mellon, as leader of the ballet, and as musical director of the Haymarket and Adelphi Theatres, is well-known. On the present occasion his Ms Overture in A minor, the encore for which he so modestly declined, places his reputation as a compo ser in no ordinary light; it is beautifully conceived and full of vigorous writing. As a conductor, Mr. Mellon takes high ground: he directed the symphony in A, of Mendelssohn, with poetic and artistic intelligence; his beat is clear and decided; and he has the invaluable qualities of coolness and anticipation. Mr. R S. Pratten's tone and execution in his own flute concertanch, in which there were some pretty ideas nicely scored, and Mr. Hausmann's clever playing of his own andante, and rondo, were highly appreciated by the auditory. Mr. Edward Bache, a young and untried composer, a native of Birmingham, made a very favorable impression on the first movement of a new pianoforte concerto, although he was very nervous in its performance, he seems to be thinking for himself in his themes and treatment thereof a new path for himself in these days of imitation and plagiarism Sivori, Mrs. Sims Reeves (in place of Miss Louisa Pyne), Mdlle. Jetty de Treffz, and Staudigl assisted in this very interesting programme.—Mr. Dodda gave a matinée on Wednesday at the Queen Anne-street Rooms.—Mr. Brinley Richards' third performance of classical and modern pianoforte music took place on Wednesday night at the Hanover Rooms, in the presence of a numerous and fashionable audience. He played his own clever pieces "The Vision," "La Preciosa," and "A Moonlight Serenade," besides works by Beethoven, Chopin, Heller, F. Hiller, Mendelssohn, Mozart, and Macfarren. Miss Dolby was encored for her ballad singing of "Mi Lardar' charming me ody, "The Blind Girl's Address to a Rose." Mdlle Jetty de Treffz was called upon to repeat an air by Mendelssohn. A posthumous pianoforte duo, by the late Mrs. Anderson, aided by Sig. Arditi, Frœhn, Jaell, Mr. Goddard and Mr. B. Richards Mdme. Macfarren, the Misses Birch, Mr Swift, Sainton, Piatti, and Bottesini assisted in the programme.—Mr. Maguire, who also played, aided by Sig. Arditi, Frœhn, Jaell, Mr. Goddard Schimen instrumentalists; and Mdme E. Garcia, Mdme. Macfarren, Misses Ley and Hi l, Mr. Wrighton, M. Hdor, and Signor Ca cagno, vocalists, had a matinée on Wednesday, at the Hanover-square Rooms.—Mdlle de Lozano, the accomplished Spanish singer, gave her annual morning concert on Wednesday at Wilde's Rooms, with the assistance of Miss Herman, Mdme. Garcia, M. Demmuck, Signor Pilotti, Herr Kithe, and Herr Standigl.—Among the many fêtes that took place, Signor Antonio Rovedino met his friends and patrons, for whom the programme provided thirty pieces, including the names of Mdme. Clara Novello, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Belletti, Herr Formes, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Hobbs, Mrs. Reeves, Benson, Lawler, and Herr Standigl. Mdlle. Clauss, Messrs. T. Wright, F. Mori, and Richardson, Piatti, and Bottesini.—Mdme Verdavainne, the gifted pianiste, aided by Mr. Kuhe as accompanyist, M. Prumier, Mr. Ap Thomas, Mr. C. Severn (contrabasso), Mr. Aylward (violoncello), Mr. R Blagrove (viola), and Messrs. H Blagrove and Clementi (violins), and by Mdme. Clara Novello, Mdme. Lemaire, Miss Lascelles and Cecilia Barclay, and Mr. F. Bodda, gave a morning concert, on Thursday, at the Hanover square Rooms. A concert by Bertini, a quintett by Onslow, and Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata, were included in the scheme.—Mrs Arthur Stone, the vocalist, had a matinée on Thursday, at the Queen Anne-street Rooms, with the aid of the Misses Birch, Miss Bassano, Mdme Falcon-Bockholtz, Messrs. Thorpe, Reed, and Weiss, Charles Standigl, Herr Pauer, Messrs. G. Case and J. Thomas.—Miss Bunfield Williams, a clever pianiste, had a morning concert yesterday, at the Hanover-square Rooms: the programme also specified the names of Sainton, Mr. John Thomas, Miss Emily Bassano, a concertinaist, M. Tourrasi, Mdme. E. Garcia, Mdme. Lemaire, the Misses Mascal, Miss Bassano, Miss Messent, and Miss Mary Watson, with M F ton and Mr. S. Saanan as accompanyists.—Herr Molique, the violinist-composer and violinist, resumed his highly-interesting concerts of ch mber-music, last night, at the Queen Anne-street Rooms: he assisted in the cluded a Ms Sonata in E minor, played by himself and Hallé, and his own quartuor in B flat major, Op. 42, with Mellon, Hill, and Piatti; Spohr's duetto for two violins in D major, Op. 67, with Hallé, and Carl Crompulli's Scratches, are now in better working trim; and as the gallant Captain acquires experience, he will term his "Notes," no doubt, to better account; his flute playing was admirable, and the pianoforte and violin touches of his quivre present him in the light of an accomplished amateur.—The interesting monthly performances of the School of Indigent Blind took place on Wednesday A concert in aid of Miss Hindmarsh, a clever pianiste, who has been disabled from following her profession, owing to an accident to her hand, was given at Highbury Barn, on Tuesday, when the following artistes kindly afforded their services:—Madame E. Seguin, Miss Messent, Rebecca Isaac, Lowe, Weiss, Brougham, Hayes, Constable, Rafter, Crichton, Mrs. A. Newton; Messrs. Rafter, Tedder, Frazer, Weiss, Drayton, F. Chatterton, Demmuck, Richardson, Harper, and S. Sa anan (conductor).—On Wednesday, at St. Martin's Hall, there was an interesting performances of choral music, by members of Mr. Hullah's first upper singing school, including works by C. Tye (1540), J. Weldon (1710), J. S. Bach (1790), Wilbye, Sir John Stevenson, &c. Opera was given by the living composers the c ever Miss Macirone, Mr. Henry Leslie, the accomplished amateur; M. Charles Gounod, the rising French composer; W. Dyce, and Oliver Yorke.—On Saturday, at the Queen Anne-street Rooms, the new "Union," Miss Louisa Pyne was replaced by Miss Eliza Birch, the other singers being Miss Dolby, Messrs. Swift, Francis, Land, and Bodda, who sang glees and madrigals by Greene, Gow, Horsley, Pearsall, Webbe, Knyvett, Beale, and Morley.—The Beethoven Quartett Society had its sixth and last meeting of the ninth season at the Queen Anne-street Rooms, on Wednesday night. The scheme comprised Beethoven's Quartett No. 3 in A, Op 18, and Mendelssohn's No 3 in D, Op. 44, executed by Vieuxtemps Pollitzer, Hill, and Rousselot; S. Bach's Ciaccona, No. 2, played by Vieuxtemps and Beethoven's sonata in A flat, Op. 110, performed by Mdlle. Nissen, a pianiste of repute from Paris.—Messrs. Bunfield presented the fourth and last of their series of "Recitations Musicales," on Thursday morning, at Willis's Rooms, including in the programme many of their own compositions and arrangements. Mr. W. R. Binfield and Mr Augustus are pianists; Mr. H. Binfield and Miss Louisa play the harp; Miss Margaret performs on the concertina, and Mr. Will am Binfield is a vocalist.

THE MUSICAL FESTIVALS.—There will be four meetings this year—the first will be the Oxford Commemoration Festival, under the direction of Sir H R. Bishop, on the 22d, 23d, and 24th instant, at which Madame Clara Novello, Mdlle. Cruvelli, Miss Messent, Mr. Sims Reeves, Herr Standi..and Mr. ...ohn, Miss Williams, Messrs. Lockey and Phillips (of the English Glee and Madrigal Union) are engaged. The second gather ng will be at Birmingham, under Costa's direction, on the 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th of September The third festival will be that of the three choirs at Hereford, under the direction of the organist of the Cathedral (Mr. Townshend Smith), on the 14th, 15th, 16th and 17th of September. The concluding congress will be the Norwich and Norfolk Festival, under the pitonage of Jules Benedict, on the 21st, 22d, 23d, and 24th of September. Two new oratorios (Dr. Bexfie d's "Israel Restored," and Mr. Pearsall's "Jerusalem") will be produced at Norwich, and Mendelssohn's "Lorely" at Birmingham.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

Bellini's "Sonnambula," owing to the indisposition of Signor Calzolari, was substituted, on Saturday night, for "Ernani," but on Tuesday Verdi's masterpiece was given for the third time, the brigand hero being depicted by Signor Belletti in a first-appearance at this establishment. He has a tall commanding figure, and a very powerful chest voice, but as an actor lacks intelligence, and as a singer has little taste and less refinement Belletti was taken prematurely from Italy to sing at the Grand Opera in Paris; and his translatia..tic travels have certainly not improved his style. Tenors, however, of the class to which Belletti belongs, even if that class be not the first, are of use, if not of much value in a theatre, and as the Italian Opera is very strong at present, a lasting powers is exacted. In the concerted pieces of "Ernani," requiring immense physical exertion, he successfully vied with Mdlle Cruvelli's Ernani. The latter appeared in it for the first time in the second act, in which each singer has a different subject, the energetic prima donna, Bettini, and Belletti, who sings so admirably the part of Gomez de Silva, were earnestly applauded. In the third act, the finale of which is also splendidly rendered; the imposing largo in E minor, with Cruvelli's thrilling tones, of the third act, and the concluding trio, won the accustomed plaudits. Thursday was included in the Coronation, and Donizetti's touching sequel was announced for the third time, with Mdlle de Lagrange, Calzolari, Ferranti, and Lablache. Last night was devoted to the annual benefit of Signor Puzzi, a notice of whose varied programme will appear in our next impression.

The arrival of Signor de Bassini, the great famed barytone of Italy, who has been lately delighting the Viennese amateurs with his acting and singing, will be looked for with much interest: his name is underlined in the bills. Rossini's "Otello" is in active preparation for Cruvelli's early essay of the gentle Desdemona; and the opera of "Candida," by the reigning Duke of Saxe Coburg-Gotha, brother of Prince Albert, a work which has been performed with great success in Germany and Belgium, will also ere long be produced for Rosati, by Mr. Geo Gawrges, is in active rehearsal. As Count Rosi, the husband of Sontag, who is still enchanting the amateurs in Munich, has been in town, the arrival of the Teutonic prima may soon be anticipated. Notwithstanding the positive assertions that Mdme. Otto Goldschmidt (Jenny Lind), who was present at the meeting of the Musical Union, at Willis's Rooms, has declined all engagements for the present season, there are some parties expressed that she will appear for a few nights on the boards of her Majesty's Theatre, to renew former triumphs.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Bellini's "Puritani" was repeated for the third time on Saturday night. On Tuesday the first act of "Norma" was given, Grisi being glorious as usua.; and this was succeeded by the revival of Donizetti's melodramma giocoso, "L'Elisir d'Amore," since the period of his production of the rival libretto, by Signor Paul Romani, at Mitchell's Opera Buffa, at the Lyceum, in 1837, when Ronconi's brother, S. Ronconi, was the Belcore; Signor Caltone a charming tenor, now no more, the Nemorino; Signor Bellini, Dulcamara, and Signora Giannone, Adina, the "Elisir" has maintained its position in the répertoire; but the weakest cast ever heard in London was that of Tuesday; it had not been for Ronconi's great doctor, the performance must have proved a total failure. Mdme. Bosio, as Adina, ought never to have been presented in that part as the successor of Viardot and Mdme. Castellan, Adrian was to substitute for Mario, and Bartolini was truly a most sto id representative of Belcore after the vivacious Tamburini, Mdme Bosio has a pure Italian style of singing, but there is no timbre in her voice, the execution, though by no means of accomplishment too limited to be successful. Galvani will require much re-schooling before he can be presented as a tenor in a theatre in which there are Mario and Lamberick: and Bartolini, with a superb voice and considerable flexibility that he can scarcely do the simplest scale. Ronconi was the life and soul of the opera, a struggled arduously to make his associates act up to him; but it was vain, and the "Elisir," perhaps for the first time, with the finest orchestra and chorus in the world, and with Costa as the accompanyists, went off on the whole very flatly, affording additional evidence of the care and judgment required in the engagement of new artistes in establishments at which the musical public have become habituated to lyric ability and grauds of the highest order

For the extra night, on Thursday, Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia," and the three last fourth acts of "I Martiri," were the entertainments. Spa.'s first air in preparation with Mdme. Castellan, Lamberick, Ronconi, and Formès in the cast; and it is stated that Julien's new opera, "Pietro il Grande," will speedily follow.

DRURY-LANE.

The announcement that Madame Clara Novello would appear at this theatre on Monday evening, as Amina, in the English version of the "Somnambula," the Times hints that Mrs. Sims Reeves's performance was to have been given, attracted a very full audience; additional interest being created by the return of Benedict after his transatlantic trip with Jenny Lind, and after circumstances of domestic affliction that entitled him to the sympathies of all under the deepest sympathy. A small but efficient band, with Tolbecque as leader, and a select chorus from the Royal Italian Opera, had been engaged, and Benedict's entrance as conductor was hailed with much cheering. The reception of Madame Clara Novello was of the most flattering kind, but the applause warmed into a fervor before the opera was terminated. Her acting was simple, natural, graceful, touching, and essentially delicate and sensitive. There were no spasmodic efforts to render Amina a tragic heroine, and the singer was screaming exercises to distort the melodies of the composer into ear-splitting bravuras. Madame Clara Novello employed the noble soprano organ with which nature has gifted her, and which is one of the best voices in the world, to interpret the composer's pleasing melodies with truly sympathetic sentiment and feeling. The audience heard, in fact, a voice, and not an instrument, and wherever the text was embellished, thoroughly artistic was the appropriate way in the embroidery. This truly musician-like mode of treating the music of Amina made its way irresistibly to the hearts of the delighted hearers; and never did the rondo finale excite greater rapture, and produce a more genuine and spontaneous demand for its repetition, followed by a special ovation at the fall of the curtain. If national opera had any chance of revival, what a treasure would English art have in Madame Novello as the prima donna! We presume that one of the Italian establishments in London will eventually carry off the prize, if the possession of one of the most exquisitely toned voices be considered as an essentia. quality for a leading vocalist.

The "Somnambula" was followed by Gay's "Beggar's Opera," in which Mrs. Sims Reeves appeared as Polly, and Mr. Sims Reeves as Captain Macheath.

LYCEUM.

A new farce, entitled "Very Suspicious," was produced here on Saturday last. The turning-point of the play is a will, precluding a widow from having a second husband. The lady, however, marries secretly a Colonel Stanley (Mr. Belton); but the parties interested in the reversion pay them an uninvited visit, in order to ascertain the state of the case They pronounce it very suspicious and, at length, by the mutual complicating among in one another's presence, claims to have obtained the desired proof. At this juncture a second will is found whilst, revokes the Lacsi clause in the first; consequently, the Colonel and his lady have the ultimate triumph. The piece is by Mr. Dalgrave Simpson, and was moderately successful.

PRINCE'S.

On Monday, on the occasion of the benefit of Mr and Mrs. Charles Kean, a new piece by Mr. Bourcicault was produced, under the title of "The Vampire," in which the author himself enacted the part of the protagonist hero. This semi-Oriental superstition, since Byron and Dr. Polidori's use of it, has been several times manufactured into a stage; but, in all cases, the manufacture has been too apparent. In fact, it was never very prevalent, and always wanting in beauty and ideality to affect the general imagination. It is, indeed, an unclean and unpleasant one, begot on a Scandinavian mist, and has nothing whatever to please in it. Unlike "The Corsican Brothers," the success of which appears to have excited the present attempt, it wants purpose and meaning. That piece interested us by its nationality, its sentiment, though that of revenge, and the idea of sympathy which formed its basis. "The Vampire" has none of these elements, and much ingenuity has been thrown away on a subject barren of interest, and, in the hands of Mr. Bourcicault, unintelligible.

Mr Bourcicault has located the superstition in Wales, and given it an existence of 300 years, to each century devoting an act. The first act introduces to us the hero, Wardale Sevenoke Vampire, in which he dashes off a second death, being shot as he is leaving the chamber where he had deprived his victim of her life; but he obtains a promise that his body shall be laid on a mountain top on the light of the rising sun, which being done he revives to a new life of a hundred years This scene is beautifully managed, and might have gone on as spectacle to save the drama. In the second act a new story is laid out for the descendants of the same family, another poor girl surrendering "the cup of life" to the unburied and wandering corpse. Here

e new victim has a vision, in which she beholds the Vampire's former victims walk from their portrait-frames. In the third act the Vampire lopts the costume and manner of a "serious friend" and mesmerist; and we turally expected some scientific solution of the horrible mystery, in the style [illegible], but none such came. A scene here played by [illegible] ar-ey, who discovers, from the contents of an old dead-box, the identity of the vampire. was really good, and promised to bring down the curtain on a well-[illegible] sposed audience. But fate had otherwise decreed. The catastrophe is the [illegible] struction of the Vampire. The two ghosts of the ill-fated maidens of the preceding scenes rise in their shrouds and the tower falls, burying the Vampire in [illegible] s ruins. Such is the plan, rather than the plot of the piece, which, in the [illegible] stalls, mistakes reputation for accumulation. Mr. Bourdicault's acting was very satisfactory, and we shall be glad to see him in some character more pleasing as well as intelligible, and affording larger scope for the display of legitimate acting. A part like this, at best, is but a monotone, but the art which he now aspires has a Cheapside and "Surrey" which will never command an "state" nor "age within," because, like love, it is "infinite." But such wing variety implies a poetic drama, not that of the mechanist and scene-[illegible]aister.

ST JAMES'S

On Thursday the German company ventured a comparison with our best English actors, by performing the tragedy of "Hamlet, according to Schlegel's version. It is in this translation into the German that Hamlet, and the [illegible] which Hamlet enters, while the King is praying in his closet, and neglects to pay him, because he would, while thus engaged, be despatched to heaven, is omitted. Herr Emil Devrient played with more effect than usual, but in [illegible] is general styles greatly reminded us of Mr. Charles Kemble. Elevated action distinguished many of the scenes, and al. were acted with grace and power.

HAYMARKET.—Mr. Buckstone's benefit came off on Tuesday, when a very great buffo artist sported a new comedy in five acts, called "The Found-ings," the product of his own pen; the principal characters being filled by himself and Mrs. Keeley. The piece was received with roars of laughter, and has since been successfully repeated, but we are compelled to defer the plot.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

By a better understanding amongst the managers, the three Hampshire meetings take place this week; Goodwood on Tuesday, Ascot Heath Club appropriately Wednesday; Stockbridge, over the same course, the following day, and each with greatly improved lists; and Winchester, Friday. Those are the only meetings of any note, for Newcastle and Doncaster are over on Tuesday and the following days, and, unless Stilton should spoil the field, will show plenty of good and interesting sport. The only meetings besides those we have referred to will be Carlisland, on Monday and two following days; and Hampton, on Friday.

The aquatic register contains the following regatta fixtures:—Chelsea and Pulham, on Monday; Royal Harwich Club, on Thursday; and Henley, on Friday and Saturday.

CRICKET FIXTURES.—Monday: North v. South, at Lord's; an All England match, at Godalming; and match at West Wickham. Tuesday: Union Club v. Hampstead, at Kennington Oval; Kent v. Sussex, at Brighton; the Thirty-Year Kent, at Sevenoaks. Thursday: M. C. B. v. Rugby, at Lord's; Nottingham v. Surrey, at the Oval; Lansdowne v. Purton, at Bath.

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—A very small amount of business was transacted, at the undermentioned prices:—

HAMPTON RACES.

A considerable advance in the character of the stakes, a partial abandonment of heats—so long the staple of the sports in this region—the support of gentlemen who have hitherto looked upon Hampton as almost out of the pale of legitimate racing, and two entries over knowry, were the results of an improved management, and warranted the losses of the course in looking for a full and reliable meeting. On Wednesday the company was equal to the numerical average of the first day; but there was an unmistakeable falling off in rank and fashion. The sport was good.

WEDNESDAY

ROYAL MERSEY YACHT CLUB.—This club held their first match for the season on Saturday [illegible]. The race was for two o-gant pces of valuable plate, for yachts above 35 tons and under 80 tons. Time was to be allowed for difference of tonnage. The start took place a little before the hour o'clock; and the signal-gun being fired from the steamer, a fine display of nautical skill was effected by the very active manner in which the sails were hoisted, and the yachts rounded head to the wind. The Enchantress, Aquila, and Vision were under sail and backed to the Liverpool side of the river, and were closely followed by the Sealark, Surprise, Fidget, and Countance, of the second class yachts. The Bacchante became the winner by some minutes, though the time allowed was welcomed by a hearty cheer from the steamer. The handsome massive silver cup was presented, in an appropriate speech from Commodore Littledale, to Mr. B. Heywood Jones, Esq., the office of vice-commodore having ended when returned thanks to the company assembled on the quarter-deck of the steamer. The second cup prize was a massive silver salver, and was presented to Mr. Laufer, owner of the winning boat Enchantress. ROMAN CATHOLIC PROCESSIONS—ROYAL PROCLAMATION.—The following proclamation appeared in last Tuesday night's Gazette:—"A PROCLAMATION, BY THE QUEEN. VICTORIA R. Whereas by the Act of Parliament passed in the 10th year of his late Majesty King George the Fourth, for the relief of his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects, it is enacted, that no Roman Catholic ecclesiastic, nor any member of any of the religious orders, communities, or societies of the Church of Rome, bound by monastic or religious vows, shall exercise any of the rites or ceremonies of the Roman Catholic religion, or wear the habits of his order, save within the usual places of worship of the Roman Catholic religion, or in private houses, or burying-grounds thereunto belonging, and with the advice of our Privy Council, to issue this our Royal proclamation, solemnly warning all those whom it may concern, that, whilst we are resolved to protect our Roman Catholic subjects in the undisturbed enjoyment of their legal rights and religious freedom, we are determined to prevent and repress a commission of all such offences as aforesaid, whereby the offenders may draw on themselves the punishment attending the violation of the laws, and the peace and security of our dominions may be endangered. Given at our Court at Buckingham Palace, this fifteenth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand six hundred and fifty-two, and in the fifteenth year of our reign. God save the Queen."

From a Parliamentary paper, it appears that during the session, and to Saturday last, there were 136 public bills brought before Parliament, which [illegible] passed or in the course of passing through the House of Lords. Of the Government, 42 were introduced by the present Government now in progress, and 11 the late Government now in progress. There were 31 bills brought forward by private members of both Houses, and 22 had been rejected or withdrawn, leaving in the total 126.

In reference to the moors of Scotland, it is stated that at no corre[illegible]nding period for the last ten years past have the grouse been so numerous and healthy as they are at present. PRESERVED MEATS FOR THE NAVY.

The select committee appointed to inquire into the contracts, and the mode of making them, for the supply of meat provisions for the use of her Majesty's navy, from the year 1845 to 1851, inclusive; and into the rejection of preserved meats; and into the causes which have led to the receiving into the Government stores, and to the issuing for the use of her Majesty's ships on foreign service, certain preserved meats, which have proved to be unfit for human food; and into the means by which an occurrence so prejudicial to the public service may most effectually be prevented, have, pursuant to the order of the House, examined the matters to them referred, and have agreed to the following recommendations:—

Your committee, then, is of opinion, after giving the subject their best consideration, that preserved meats should be manufactured for naval purposes in the Government yards, or wherever Government shall select as the best locality for their establishment, as "the means whereby occurrences so prejudicial to the public service may be materially, if not altogether avoided, are, it is presented, in time to come." At the same time, the committee do not wish to press the execution of their recommendation too hastily upon the Admiralty; nor [illegible] would they be understood so to commit themselves as to insist upon a rigid adherence to it, since occasions may arise when a relaxation of such system may be not only expedient, but conducive to the public service. As regards the contracts for preserved meats, the general rule should be that they shall be obtained by public competition, but that the Admiralty should not be bound to accept the lowest tender.

With respect to the salted provisions supplied to the seamen of her Majesty's fleet, nothing can be more satisfactory than the evidence on this point brought under the consideration of [illegible] Your committee have [illegible] [illegible] the West Indies, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] again to occur.

Your committee cannot bring their labours to a close without some expression of satisfaction, that the country has been the means of bringing prominently before the House the care which has been bestowed by successive Boards of Administrations upon the victualling of the navy. For not only have the alterations made from time to time been the means of promoting the health, and materially adding to the comforts of her Majesty's seamen, but the public have been effected, and these benefits enlarged, without additional cost to the country.

The world-renowned Jenny Lind (Madame Otto Goldschmidt), and the celebrated Johanna Wagner, were both present on Tuesday night, at the St. James's Theatre to witness the German performances.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK

(From our City Correspondent.)

A notice having been issued by one of the joint-stock banks to the effect that on and after the 30th instant all interest will cease upon balances in the books of the institution, much discussion on the subject has been the result out of doors, and the prevailing impression is, that ere long the whole of those banking houses which is there have given their customers the advantage of interest will be compelled to adopt the same course. There is in no way surprised at this state of things, seeing that there are, at this moment, immense amounts of capital lying idle, and for which there are no profitable channels open for investment. Should the change be generally effected, we may fairly anticipate an increased demand for Consols, and, with it, higher rates

During the present week the market for the national securities has continued very steady; but, as the Transfer-books of the Three per Cents are now closed for the dividends, the actual amount of money transacted has not been large. On Monday the Three per Cent. Consols, with dividends for money, were done at 100¾; they marked the same figures on Tuesday and Wednesday. On Thursday they were 99¾ for the opening. The Three per Cents Reduced were done at 100⅜; and the New Three-and-Quarter per Cents, 102⅜ to 103. Bank Stock was 212½ to 213½. Long Annuities, 6⅛. India Bonds, £1100, were done at 86s.; and under £1000, 80s. premium. On the 8th inst. the Exchequer Bonds continued steady. On Monday, Exchequer Bills were 73s. ; on Thursday, Small Bills sold at 74s.; and June, 68s. premium.

In the Discount Market, first-class acceptances are steadily done at ⅛ to ¼ per cent. At the former rate the Bank will continue to make advances upon stock during the closing of the transfer-books. Large sums of money have been refused by the discount houses at the above rate.

We have again to report an immense influx of the precious metals.—£29,000 have arrived from the Brazils, £120,000 from New York, £380,000 from Australia, and £50,000 from Spain; although the latter is only a small remittance, owing to £21,000, from other quarters; whilst we understand that at least half a million sterling is still on passage. When we consider that at least four-fifths of the above is in gold, we may form some idea of the immense drain the Bank of England may be exhausted upon. Should the harvest in this country prove a favourable one, there is every reasonable prospect of the supply of gold exceeding £5,000,000 sterling during the present year. Should such not have been large, but about 30,000 sovereigns have been forwarded to Australia in return for bullion. The exchanges are still favourable, gold being 0.01 per cent. dearer here than in Paris. The exchanges on the United States are in favour on New York; hence, it is evident that a large and steady business is doing abroad in British manufactured goods.

The extraordinary accounts from Australia and California in references to the produce of the mines have imparted great activity to our shipping interest, and a rise of from £3 to £5 per head for passage to Sydney is now generally demanded and paid.

The exchange at Vienna having fallen 2 per cent., has given a stimulus to the New Five per Cent. Austrian Scrip, which advanced on Thursday to 82 premium. Most other foreign securities have sold to a fair extent, and previous quotations [illegible] ve been supported. On Thursday Buenos Ayres Six per Cents were marked 78 to 77; Grenada Deferred, 10, Mexican Three per Cents, 25¾; Peruvian Six per Cents, 104; to 105; Portuguese Four per Cents Converted, 60¾, 61; to 65, Portugues Four per Cents, 38, Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 104; Spanish Three per Cents, 49 to 48, Spanish New Deferred, [illegible] Austrian Five per Cents, [illegible] Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, [illegible] Dutch Four per Cents, [illegible] Belgian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, [illegible] Equador Bonds, [illegible] Mexican Three per Cents, [illegible] Venezuela Three per Cents, [illegible] Chilian Six per Cents, [illegible] Columbian Six per Cents, [illegible] Costa Rica Six per Cents, [illegible] Ecuador Deferred, [illegible] Guatemala Deferred, [illegible] Peruvian Three per Cents, [illegible] Portuguese Five per Cents, [illegible] Sardinian Five per Cents, [illegible] Sardinian Three per Cents, [illegible] Swedish Four per Cents, [illegible] Swiss Four per Cents, [illegible] Turkish Six per Cents, [illegible] Venezuela Deferred, [illegible] Chilian Three per Cents, [illegible] Equador Three per Cents, [illegible] Mexican Five per Cents, [illegible] Neapolitan Five per Cents, [illegible] Peruvian Four per Cents, [illegible] Russian Five per Cents, [illegible] Spanish Deferred, [illegible] Spanish Passive, [illegible] Spanish Three per Cents Annuities, [illegible] Swedish Three per Cents, [illegible] Swiss Three per Cents, [illegible] Turkish Four per Cents, [illegible] Turkish Scrip, [illegible] Venezuela Four per Cents, [illegible] Venezuela Five per Cents, [illegible] Belgian Five per Cents, [illegible] Belgian Three per Cents, [illegible] Brazilian Five per Cents, [illegible] Buenos Ayres Six per Cents, [illegible] Chilian Six per Cents, [illegible] Columbian Six per Cents, [illegible] Costa Rica Six per Cents, [illegible] Ecuador Deferred, [illegible] Ecuador Three per Cents, [illegible] Grenada Deferred, [illegible] Guatemala Deferred, [illegible] Mexican Five per Cents, [illegible] Mexican Three per Cents, [illegible] Neapolitan Five per Cents, [illegible] Peruvian Four per Cents, [illegible] Peruvian Six per Cents, [illegible] Portuguese Four per Cents, [illegible] Portuguese Five per Cents, [illegible] Russian Five per Cents, [illegible] Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, [illegible] Spanish Deferred, [illegible] Spanish Passive, [illegible] Spanish Three per Cents Annuities, [illegible] Swedish Three per Cents, [illegible] Swiss Three per Cents, [illegible] Swiss Four per Cents, [illegible] Turkish Four per Cents, [illegible] Turkish Six

WORDS OF THE SONGS.

THE DREAMS OF YOUTH.

[AIR—"Pray Goody, please to moderate."]

I.

Oh! youth's fond dreams, like evening skies,
Are tinged with colours bright;
Their cloud-built halls and turrets rise
In lines of lingering light.
Airy, fairy,
In the beam they glow,
As if they 'd last
Through every blast
That angry fate might blow.
But time wears on with stealthy pace
And robes of solemn grey,
And in the shadow of her face
The glories fade away.

II.

But not in vain the splendours die,
For worlds before unseen
Rise on the forehead of the sky,
Unchanging and serene.
Gleaming, streaming,
Through the dark they shew
Their lustrous forms
Above the storms
That rend our earth below.
So pass the visions of our youth,
In time's advancing shade;
Yet evermore the stars of truth
Shine brighter when they fade.

NOTES ON THE MELODIES BY SIR H. R. BISHOP.

THE DREAMS OF YOUTH.

"PRAY, GOODY, PLEASE TO MODERATE."—Among the many popular airs which were selected for the burletta of Midas, this is one of the best; and we have ample testimony for believing that it was composed by Dr. Burney, the learned writer of A General History of Music. In Some Account of the English Stage, in ten volumes, published at Bath in 1832, and ascribed to the Rev. John Genest, M.A., it is stated, "that in order to oppose the musical pieces which were performed with such success at S. A. (the Smock Alley Theatre, Dublin), Midas was first produced, in the season commencing October 1761. In ridicule of the other house (the Crow Street Theatre), it was ludicrously announced as being brought forward under the conduct of Signor Josephi Vernoni (honest Joe Vernon). It was then in three acts; but being found too long, was afterwards cut down to two." In the year 1764 this burlesque piece was brought out at Covent Garden Theatre, and in three acts, as originally produced in Dublin; on which occasion, the celebrated Charles Dibdin made his first public appearance as a singer, in the part of Momus. It was performed, however, for a few nights only; but subsequently had a longer career at Drury Lane Theatre, the principal part, that of Apollo, being ably sustained by Michael Kelly. In 1812, Midas was revived at Covent Garden with considerable success; and the present air attained a vast popularity, not only from its simple beauty, but from the peculiar grace with which it was sung by Mr. Sinclair. For a long time it remained uncertain who was the composer of "Pray, Goody," though very little doubt was generally entertained as to its English origin. It has been attributed to Dr. Arne, and with good reason; for besides being similar in its structure to some of his melodies of that class, we may take into consideration that previously to the first production of Midas, several of Arne's dramatic pieces were composed and produced by him in Dublin, and that his music had become extremely popular in Ireland. It has also been rather obstinately contested, that the air of "Pray, Goody" is one of the musical emanations of Jean Jacques Rousseau, though on what rational grounds I am at a loss to imagine. I have examined the first and latest editions of his pretty, and only, operatic drama, Le Devin du Village, but there are no traces in that work of "Pray, Goody;" and I have been unable to meet with it either in the printed collection of nearly a hundred songs, &c. composed by Rousseau, entitled Les Consolations des Misères de ma Vie, or among his thirty-four songs, in his own handwriting, deposited in the British Museum. I have also looked through several other collections, containing some thousands of old "French songs" (among which I found many that are unmistakeably English), yet I searched in vain for the present melody. But a remarkable evidence has come to light, which clearly shews that in this case no plea can be substantiated in favour of Rousseau, or any other French composer; for, in the first edition of Midas, printed in London, 1764, it is stated, that the air of "Pray, Goody," is "A Tune in Queen Mab;" a pantomime brought out at Drury Lane Theatre in 1750, the whole of the music of which, according to the assertion of Madame D'Arblay, was composed by her father, Dr. Charles Burney. Madame D'Arblay, in her Memoirs of Dr. Burney, adds, that "the music of Queen Mab, pleasing and natural, was soon popular," but

WORDS OF THE SONGS.

THE NAMES ON THE BEECH-TREE.

[Air, "Oh! how shall I in language weak.]

I.

Where are they gone, the beautiful,
The young, the fond, the free,
Who carved their names upon thy bark,
Thou lordly beechen tree?
Alas, the change! thy leaves grow green,
Thine arms are strong and bold;
But hopes are dead, and joys are fled,
And burning love is cold.

II.

'Tis sad to think, O beechen tree,
All beauteous as thou art,
That thy broad stem and spreading boughs
Outlive the human heart:
From year to year thy leaves unfold,
And woo the birds to sing,
While Hope and Passion droop and die,
And feel no second spring.

III.

Yet ah! not so: the youthful loves,
Whose fond memorials twine
Around thy girth, thou ancient tree,
Have higher life than thine.
Though dead to earth, as bygone leaves
By winds of autumn driven,
A hope divine inspires our souls;
They bloom again in heaven.

THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO.

[Air—"Thursday in the morn."]

I.

Firm as England's coast,
When the tempests blow,
Stood the British line,
And foiled the advancing foe.
The fierce Napoleon sighed to win the day;
But Wellington was calm—the master of the fray.
He saw the time had come;
Blow trumpets!—beat the drum!
And when the order flew
Like light o'er Waterloo,
And the great immortal strife begun:—
"Now be brief,"
Said the chief,
"We'll excel all the deeds we have done—
Follow me,
You shall see
How the battle should be fought and won."

II.

Ney and all his men,
Never known to fail,
Fled in sudden rout,
Like storms of rattling hail.
The old Imperial Guard—Napoleon's boast—
Dissolved before the shock of the mighty British host;
And Blucher, found at last,
Came sweeping like a blast.
The knell of France had pealed;
The Frenchmen fled the field;
The great Napoleon saw he was undone;—
"Follow me,"
Then said he;
"All is lost!—they are coming!—let us run!
Sauvons-nous!
They pursue—
And the battle has been lost and won."

III.

Thus the fight was fought,
Not for vain renown,
Not for sake of war,
Or mad ambition's crown;
But for the sake of peace, unknown so long,
To give the world repose from tyranny and wrong.
And thus for evermore,
Unconquer'd as before,
May Britain stand her ground,
And Wellingtons be found
To wave her glorious banner to the sun,
And to lead,
When we need,
Crying, "Englishmen, the strife has begun!
Follow me,
You shall see
How the battle should be fought and won!"

THE EMIGRANTS.

[Air—"When you gave me the Garland."]

I.

Farewell to thee, England! oh, land of our birth,
The pride and the glory and queen of the earth!
We sail with sad hearts to a land far away,
In search of the bread that may fail if we stay.
New faces glow bright in the blaze of our fires,
The stranger sits down in the halls of our sires.
Farewell! oh, farewell to thy beautiful shore!
England! dear England! farewell evermore!

II.

We've courage to lead us;—there's strength in our hands;—
There's wealth to be won in the far distant lands;
For us and our children are acres to spare,
And the name of our fathers forbids to despair.
There are homes in the world for the honest and free,
And kingdoms and empires to found o'er the sea:
We quit not in anger thy beautiful shore;
'Tis with tears that we bid thee farewell evermore!

III.

Farewell! oh, farewell! in the land where we go
Our heart's deep affection shall lighten our wo:
Thy manners, thy language, thy faith, and thy fame,
Shall follow our footsteps, and flourish the same;
Thy virtues shall live in the songs that we sing,
And the tales that we tell to thy glory shall cling.
Farewell! oh, farewell to thy time-hallow'd shore!
England! dear England! farewell evermore!

that her father "observed at this time the strictest incognito concerning all these productions, though no motive for it is found amongst his papers, nor does there remain any recollective explanation." The same authority further informs us, that "the music, when printed, made its appearance in the world as the offspring of a Society of the Sons of Apollo; and Oswald, a famous bookseller, published it by that title, and knew nothing of its real parentage." Many airs, ballads, cantatas, and other musical pieces, "were put forth also, as from that imaginary society; but all sprang from the same source, and all were equally unacknowledged." Madame D'Arblay has supposed, however, that as her father was at that period under articles, as a pupil, to Dr. Arne, he was not at liberty to publish his earlier musical compositions in his own name. Be this as it may, I am decidedly of opinion that "Pray, Goody" has been rightfully claimed as an English air, and that the composer of it was Dr. Burney.

THE NAMES ON THE BEECH-TREE.

"Oh, how shall I in language weak."—An air composed by Henry Carey in the early part of the last century, and that became a great favourite when, many years afterwards, it was introduced into the ballad opera of Love in a Village. This beautiful melody, with other words, beginning "Is there a charm, ye powers above," may also be found in Dr. Burney's English Collection of Songs, now in the British Museum. The name of "Honest Harry Carey" is more generally known, however, in connexion with the popular song of "Sally in our alley," which was written and composed by him; though, after making some further inquiry, there does not appear to be any reasonable authority for our supposing that Carey set that song to music a second time. The version of the air as sung by Incledon, and published in a former number of the present series of melodies, being almost the identical tune of a song called "The London Lass," and beginning, "What though I am a London dame;" the words and music of which are in Walsh's British Musical Miscellany, or the Delightful Grove, vol. i.

THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO.

"Thursday in the morn."—The spirited national song beginning "Thursday in the morn, the nineteenth of May," and entitled "Russell's Triumph, or the Memorable Ninety-two," was written in celebration of the great battle "fought and won" in 1692 by the English fleet under the command of Admiral Russell, who was shortly after that event created Earl of Orford. This song was set to music by Mr. Samuel Akeroyde, the composer of many vocal pieces that were published towards the end of the seventeenth century. The earliest copy of it I have been able to meet with is in the collection of songs called Clio and Euterpe, printed in 1758. It may also be found in The Songster's Companion, 1775; The Convivial Songster, 1782; Hyde's Collection of Songs, &c.; and Ritson's English Songs; though in Ritson's edition the air appears to have been slightly altered from the original. Another printed copy of the tune is preserved in the British Museum; the words adapted to it, however, differ materially from those which were written to commemorate Admiral Russell's triumph.

THE EMIGRANTS.

"When you gave me the Garland."—A beautiful air, composed by Dr. Arne, in 1742, for his opera of Eliza. The masques of Britannia and The Judgment of Paris, Thomas and Sally, a musical entertainment, and Eliza, an opera in three acts, were composed and first produced by Dr. Arne in Dublin. They were afterwards brought out, with various success, at the principal theatres in London; but though recommended by their purely English style, and possessing considerable merit as productions of real genius, they did not obtain an amount of public favour equal to that which had previously been bestowed on Dr. Arne's music for Milton's masque of Comus. Nor can they properly be ranked with his admirable opera of Artaxerxes, on which, indeed, the musical reputation of Arne must ever chiefly depend. It is not generally known, that in 1765 Dr. Arne produced an Italian opera, entitled L'Olimpiade, at the King's (now Her Majesty's) Theatre. Artaxerxes, however, composed in 1762, is among the latest of his English dramatic works.

THE CORK NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITION.

WE last week briefly noticed the opening of this Exhibition, notwithstanding it took place at a very late period of the week, at a distance from the metropolis of England of upwards of 400 miles; and we now give a more detailed report of the interesting proceedings connected with that important event, with various Illustrations of some of its most striking scenes. In every way the demonstration must be looked upon as most important, as evincing what Irishmen can themselves do to raise the position of their own country, when directed by two or three heads of less mercurial and more calculating quality than appears too often to belong to the natives of the Emerald Isle, and also the deep and sincere interest which the present Lord-Lieutenant takes in promoting the welfare of the country over which he has been called to preside. Himself no politician, and evidently disliking that portion of his duties connected with them, his mind and attention appear to be devoted to the consideration of how he can most practically assist in the elevation of the character of the people, by encouraging the pursuit of business for which their temperament admirably suits them.

ARRIVAL OF THE LORD-LIEUTENANT AT CORK.

His Excellency the Lord-Lieutenant, with the Countess of Eglinton and a numerous suite, left Dublin by special train on the Great Southern and Western Railway, in a very handsome saloon carriage prepared for the occasion, shortly before twelve o'clock on Wednesday; and after making a short stoppage at the Limerick junction to partake of luncheon, proceeded to Cork, where they arrived at half-past four. Upon the platform the Mayor and several members of the Executive Committee of the Exhibition, with the Honorary Secretary, Mr. Shea, all wearing their badges, awaited the coming of the train. The Earl of Bandon, wearing his uniform as Lord-Lieutenant of the county, Lord Bernard, in the uniform of the City of Cork Militia, and Colonel Hodder in that of the militia force of the county, were in attendance. Lord Kinsale was also present. The High Sheriffs of the county and city, John Courtnay, Esq., — Ballyedmond, Esq., and Francis B. Beamish, Esq., were among those who waited.

A detachment of the 40th Regiment was drawn up on the platform, under Major Valliant, as a guard of honour. Major-General Mansel (commanding the garrison) and his staff, comprising Colonel Mansel, Colonel French, Major Stewart, and Major Paget, attended. Colonel Eld was also present.

At the moment the train dashed up to the station it was received with loud cheers by those upon the platform, the band of the 40th Regiment striking up the National Anthem. The carriage in which his Excellency arrived is of remarkable elegance, and was constructed specially for the occasion. On his Excellency stepping upon the platform he was received by the Mayor, the Earl of Bandon, Colonel Mansel, and other gentlemen. Renewed cheering on the platform greeted his arrival. With his Excellency were the Countess of Eglinton, Lord Bective, Capt. Thesiger, and Dean Loughlin, of the Chapel Royal. Several of the directors of the Great Southern and Western Railway accompanied the Lord-Lieutenant's suite from Dublin. Their Excellencies then passed across the platform, the Countess of Eglinton leaning upon the arm of the Mayor. The Lord-Lieutenant and the Countess, the Earl of Bandon, and his Worship the Mayor, then entered the carriage of the Mayor, and a procession was formed, headed by a large body of the military, and followed by a number of private carriages, which proceeded through the suburb of Blackpool, where were triumphal arches, decorated with the famous Cork Blackpool ginghams, evergreens, &c., and amidst the loyal demonstrations of the people, into the city, passing over St. Patrick's-bridge (as shown in our Illustration), under the shadow of the ancient steeple of Shandon, rendered so famous in song by a local poet, and well known as "The Bells of Shandon."

Along the route thousands of people had assembled, who, notwithstanding the pitiless pelting of the rain, kept their ground.

As the procession proceeded, considerable attention was excited by an Irish piper, who had been placed in an artificial bower on the front of one of the houses in Patrick-street, to produce those thrilling strains from the Union pipes so loved by his countrymen, to greet the coming of his Excellency and his amiable Countess. This incident is illustrated by our Artist.

Military bands and troops marched along the line of the procession, from Patrick's-bridge to the terminus of the Cork and Bandon Railway, to add a charm to the scene; and the whole would have formed quite a brilliant pageant, had it not been for the rain, which now came down rather heavily.

RECEPTION AT BANDON.

On reaching the terminus his Excellency was received by Colonel Beamish, who wore his uniform of a Colonel in the Hanoverian service; T. Somerville Reeves, T. Somers Payne, W. J. Shaw, H. W. Wood, Secretary of the Bandon Railway Company, and several other gentlemen.

Their Excellencies, after the gentlemen on the platform had been presented to them, took their seats in the carriage which had been reserved for their use, and the train immediately after left the station amid the cheers of the spectators. The train then traversed the line at a very rapid rate, but shut off steam on nearing the Chetwynd Viaduct, which it crossed at a moderate pace, and thus enabled their Excellencies to judge, by its immense elevation and length, of the magnitude of this undertaking. It then slowly passed the Rallinhassig station, where a large force of constabulary was drawn up, and on nearing the town of Bandon the cheering became very general and warm. The train reached the Bandon terminus about twenty minutes after six.

Their Excellencies were received by the Marquis of Thomond, Earl of Bantry, Lord Riversdale, Bishop of Killaloe; Right Rev. Dr. Wilson, Bishop of York; and Lord Carbery.

A deputation of the town commissioners and of the magistrates and the inhabitants generally of Bandon was then presented to their Excellencies.

Mr. Sherlock next came forward to present the address of the inhabitants of Bandon to his Excellency. He said, —May it please your Excellency, as Chairman of the Town Commissioners, and also of the great influential meeting of the magistrates, clergy, gentry, and inhabitants generally of the ancient and loyal borough of Bandon-bridge and its vicinity, I have the honour to present an address to your Excellency, which I hope your Excellency will allow me the honour of reading:—

BUSTS OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE LORD-LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND, AND THE COUNTESS OF EGLINTON.—BY J. E. JONES.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY ARCHIBALD WILLIAM, THE EARL OF EGLINTON AND WINTON, LORD LIEUTENANT-GENERAL AND GENERAL GOVERNOR OF IRELAND.

The Address of the Town Commissioners, Magistrates, Clergy, and Inhabitants of the ancient and loyal Borough of Bandon-bridge and its vicinity.

May it please your Excellency,—We, the town commissioners, magistrates, Clergy, and Inhabitants of the ancient and loyal borough of Bandon bridge and its vicinity, approach your Excellency with sentiments of the most profound respect, to present to your Excellency and your amiable Countess our most cordial congratulations on your arrival in this our ancient town, and to express, through your Excellency, as the representative of our most gracious Queen, our devoted and unalienable attachment to her Majesty's person and throne.

We hail with pleasure and gratitude this visit of your Excellency for the purpose of opening the National Exhibition in the city of Cork, and we anxiously hope that, under the blessing of Divine Providence, it may prove the harbinger of the permanent improvement of Ireland, and that it may be followed by the increased prosperity and happiness of her people.

In offering this our hearty welcome, we take this opportunity of assuring your Excellency of our zealous co-operation in the promotion and maintenance of the peace and welfare of the country.

We have the honour to remain your Excellency's most obedient and humble servants,

(Signed, on behalf of the Inhabitants)

THOMAS SHERLOCK, Chairman of the Town Commissioners, and the remaining Commissioners, together with upwards of 500 other signatures, comprising the nobility, gentry, and inhabitants of Bandon and its vicinity.

His Excellency then read the following reply, which was handed to him by his secretary, Colonel Campbell:

Gentlemen,—I accept with the greatest pleasure your kind congratulations on my arrival in this ancient town, as well as the expression of your devoted attachment to the person and office of our Sovereign.

It is an additional source of gratification to me, that I am called hither on an occasion of such national interest, and I trust that it may prove to be the commencement of a long era of prosperity and happiness to the people in whose welfare I shall always hereafter take the warmest interest.

The anxiety which you express to co-operate in the maintenance of the tranquility of the country is most satisfactory, for I feel assured that, without the preservation of internal peace, no legislation can afford any permanent amelioration to the evils which have so long oppressed the energies and retarded the improvement of Ireland.

On concluding his reply, which was loudly applauded, his Excellency, the Countess of Eglinton, Earl of Bandon, and Marquis of Thomond left the station-house, and entered the carriage of Lord Bandon, which was in waiting to convey their Excellencies to Castle Bernard, the seat of the noble Earl of Bandon (a View of which we have Engraved). The carriage was drawn by four beautiful grey horses, ridden by postilions, and preceded by two outriders; and was followed by three other carriages, in which were the Earl of Bective, Earl of Bantry, Lord Riversdale, Bishop of Killaloe; Mr. Fortescue, Colonel Campbell, Captain Cust, Mr. Thesiger, A.D.C.; Right Rev. Dr. Wilson, Bishop of Cork; Rev. Mr. Sealy, and Rev. Mr. Bleakley. The deputation placed themselves at the hand of the cortege, and in this order proceeded through the South Main Street, which in various places was spanned by triumphal arches, bearing such inscriptions as "Hail to thee Eglinton," "Cead mile, failta," and "Success to Irish Industry" (a point from which our Illustration is taken). On the fronts of the houses, also, various inscriptions were placed, but not one was to be seen of a political or sectarian character. The windows and roofs of the houses throughout the line of procession were crowded with spectators, and their cheers were loud and enthusiastic—a compliment which their Excellencies repeatedly acknowledged. On reaching the borough boundary, the deputation separated from the cortege, which continued its route to Castle Bernard, amidst cheering for "Eglinton and the noble house of Bandon."

There was a large dinner party assembled at Castle Bernard to meet their Excellencies, including Earl and Countess of Bandon, Lady Harriett Bernard, Earl of Bective, Marquis and Marchioness of Thomond, Viscount and Viscountess Bernard, Earl and Countess of Bantry, Hon. Charles and Mrs. Bernard, with their two sons, Percy and Boyle, aged respectively eight and five years, who were dressed in Highland costume; Hon. Mr. and Mrs. Bernard, Coolmain; Lord Carbery, Lord Riversdale, Bishop of Killaloe, the Bishop of Cork, Colonel Campbell, Captain Cust, Mr. Thesiger, A.D.C., Colonel Alcock Stawell, Rev. Mr. Bleakly, and General Shuldham. His Worship the Mayor of Cork, and Major-General Mansel, were also invited, but sent apologies. In the evening there was a large reception of the neighbouring nobility and gentry; and a display of fireworks took place about ten o'clock in a marsh opposite Castle Bernard, and, despite the distance from the town and the unfavourableness of the situation, attracted a large crowd of spectators.

OPENING OF THE EXHIBITION.

Thursday, the day of the opening, was observed as a close holiday throughout Cork. The different public buildings, club-houses, and some of the principal shops were decorated with evergreens and flowers, and hung out gay banners. In the direction of the National Exhibition Building crowds began to assemble early in the day, and the passage of Anglesea Bridge soon became an enterprise of no small difficulty. It was arranged that, as the accommodation in seats was unavoidably limited, entrance should be given in the first instance to the ladies holding season tickets, in order that they might have an opportunity of seating themselves before the rush of gentlemen should commence, when confusion might possibly gain the mastery of politeness. This arrangement was carried out with much greater attention and ease than might have been expected.

Within the Building the eye at first caught nothing but a confused blending of bright colours of all kinds. When, after much fluttering of dresses, the greater number of the fair spectators had contrived to fill the seats, and the whole extent of the Southern Hall, or Fine Arts Court, where the visitors were arranged, could be comprehended at a glance, a panorama of the most brilliant hues might be surveyed. From the benches of the choristers around Telford's organ, through the arch dividing the hall, to the far extreme of the Northern Court, terminated by the large scriptural painting of Mr. Fitzgerald, the space was filled to its uttermost power of comprehension. The rainbow-tinted dresses of the ladies, the glittering uniforms of military and naval officers, and the robes of corporate and collegiate authorities, gave to the hall, viewed from an elevated position, the semblance of a richly-coloured picture, subdued by the relieving shade of the vaulted roof. Here and there the view was broken by the massive form of some noble statue arising from among the bright crowd. A sensation of refreshing coolness was diffused throughout the Building by the waters of the fountain which played through the day, and sent up a light spiral column of spray. In front of the organ was placed the throne, covered with dark purple velvet, designed for the reception of the Lord-Lieutenant. Around the throne were arranged the members of the corporation and of the other municipal bodies of the city, all wearing the robes of their office. The Professors of the College also attended in their robes. The members of the Executive Committee wore their appropriate badges. The General and the different officers in garrison, and the officers of the fleet now in the harbour (all in uniform) assembled, principally, in this part of the Building, and not less than 4000 persons could have been present.

At one o'clock the firing of cannon and the cheering of the multitude outside the Building announced the arrival of their Excellencies, and immediately afterwards the doors were opened, a passage made up to the throne, and his Excellency the Lord-Lieutenant, preceded by the Mayor, Mr. Shea, hon. secretary; Mr. F. P. Beamish, and several members of the Executive Committee, and followed by the noblemen and officers of his suite, with the Earl of Bandon and Lord Bernard, passed up the hall. His Excellency took his seat upon the throne; the officers of his suite, members of the committee, &c., standing grouped around him.

The "Hallelujah" chorus was admirably performed by 200 voices belonging to Dublin and Cork musical societies; and immediately afterwards Mr. Shea, honorary secretary, read the following address to his Excellency, upon the part of the Executive Committee of the National Exhibition:—

ADDRESS FROM THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

We, the Mayor and Executive Committee of the National Exhibition, on behalf of the citizens of Cork, greet your Excellency's arrival amongst us with an ardent welcome.

We recognise in your Excellency the distinguished representative of our beloved Queen, the object alike of our loyalty and our affection, and whose generous example in sustaining our humble efforts to raise the drooping energies, and to stimulate into greater activity the exertions of the Irish people, you have so nobly imitated.

We have marked with pleasure, since your Excellency's official connexion with Ireland, how anxiously you have availed yourself of every opportunity to patronise her public institutions, to promote her native manufactures, to inspire our gentry with respect for her inherent capabilities, and our humble fellow-countrymen with a just reliance upon their own industry and intelligence.

In the encouragement given by your Excellency's predecessor to the project of an exhibition in our city, which first led its promoters to venture upon calling into the design so as to embrace the arts and manufactures of all Ireland, and in the patronage since accorded by your Excellency to the matured undertaking from which so many advantages have resulted, we recognise conduct that represents, in the most beneficial manner, the fostering attributes of a ruler anxious to promote the real interests of the country.

Your Excellency's ready acceptance of our invitation to inaugurate this day's auspicious ceremonial, we regard as a high compliment to ourselves and to our fellow-citizens, and we deem the value of that compliment greatly enhanced by the presence of your amiable and distinguished Countess, to whom we offer the tribute of our thanks for thus adding grace and lustre to the opening scene of our National Exhibition.

Our country has passed through a severe ordeal of calamity and privations—let us fervently hope that the proceedings of this day may prove the commencement of an era of cheering contrast to the years that have gone by, that this National Exhibition may be followed by those results which we had alone in view, to secure, in the most profitable development of the resources of Ireland, the triumph of the skill and intelligence of her people, and that your Excellency may hereafter look back upon this scene as one with which you will feel a just pride in having your name associated in the recollection of our countrymen.

(Signed)

WILLIAM HACKETT, Mayor,
Chairman of the Executive Committee.

His Excellency then read the following reply:—

Gentlemen,—Coming to Ireland as the representative of a gracious and enlightened Queen, whose patronage of science and of arts is equalled only by her desire to promote the best interests and encourage the rational enjoyments of her subjects, I consider it an imperative duty to give my best aid to a scheme of such great national importance and utility.

To revive the energies and stimulate the exertions of the people, to teach them to rely on the genius and resources with which they are so richly endowed in themselves and in their country, to foster the industry, the results of which we see around us in such rich profusion, shall be my constant object so long as I remain among you; and most fervently do I trust that this magnificent demonstration of what Irishmen can and will do when their efforts are well directed, may prove a great and lasting benefit to Ireland. (Applause.)

I beg to propose to you, on my own part and on that of Lady Eglinton, our best thanks for the kind manner in which we have been received, and to assure you that we shall ever retain a most pleasing recollection of the courtesy, liberality, and public spirit of the inhabitants of Cork. ("Hear, hear," and applause.)

His Excellency then conferred the honour of knighthood on the Mayor.

The Recorder next read the following

ADDRESS FROM THE CORPORATION.

May it please your Excellency,—We, the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of Cork, respectfully tender to your Excellency our most grateful acknowledgments for the honour you have conferred on our city in graciously visiting it on the present national occasion.

As the representative of our illustrious and beloved Sovereign, we hail your presence amongst us, to inaugurate an undertaking having for its object the elevation and improvement of all Irishmen without distinction of creed or class, as an auspicious circumstance. The high office which your Excellency holds is ever sent to best advantage when disconnected from all party associations; it is simply regarded as typifying the imperial majesty of the Crown; and in an especial degree does it command respect where it is, as in the present instance, availed of to promote measures of public utility, and to stimulate the industrial efforts of the people.

An important part of our duty would have been omitted were we to allow the opportunity to pass without conveying, through the medium of this address, our warmest thanks to her Excellency the Countess of Eglinton, for gracing with her presence the opening of our Exhibition.

The munificent patronage which her Excellency bestows on the manufactures of her country is not one of her slightest claims to our regard. That patronage will, we hope, do much to induce others to adopt them, especially those who, like her Excellency, can ensure admiration for whatever they adopt.

Once again we beg your Excellency to accept our felicitations on your arrival in Cork, and our thanks for the kindly interest which you have taken in forwarding our National Exhibition. (Signed) W. B. HACKETT, Mayor.

His Excellency then read the following reply:—

Gentlemen,—If anything were wanting to increase the pleasure which I feel in paying my first visit to Cork on such an interesting occasion, I should find it in the cordiality with which you have received me, and the flattering terms in which you welcome me to your city.

As the representative of my Sovereign, I should have failed in the performance of my duty, if I had not given my best encouragement to the patriotic undertaking which the public spirit of your citizens has brought to such a successful issue; and, as an individual, I should have been wanting in good feeling towards you, if I had hesitated to accept the invitation which was so promptly and so kindly proffered to me.

I am fully convinced that I best consult, not only the interests of Ireland, but the dignity of my office, by keeping myself as much apart as possible from the turmoil of politics and party warfare, and that it is only by pursuing a fair and impartial course, and by acting justly and firmly to all, that I can hope to make myself respected, and to soften down the religious and political asperities which I have best the bane of Ireland. (Loud applause.)

The presentation of the addresses (a scene which we have Illustrated) having taken place, his Excellency commanded his worship the Mayor to kneel down, and conferred upon him the honour of Knighthood, him rise as Sir William Hackett.

His Excellency then said:—In the name of her Majesty Queen Victoria, and on behalf of the Executive Committee, I now declare this Exhibition opened. May it meet with all the success which the excellence of its objects so well deserves, and may the results of that be such as the best well-wisher of Ireland can desire.

Loud cheers followed this announcement, which was proclaimed to the city by repeated salvos of artillery from the troops in the Camp field.

The chorus then sang the "Inauguration Ode," composed by Mr. Waller, and arranged by Dr. Stuart. The chorus was conducted by Dr. Stuart. The following is the INAUGURATION ODE.

STROPHE a.

MAN, arise! and speed thy mission—
Labour of the brain and brow,
God assigns a high ambition;
Glorify thy Maker now.

ANTISTROPHE a.

Genius! from thy heaven-taught heart,
Bring the jewels of thy thought—
Pensive Science, keen-eyed Art,
Toil, give all thy hand hath wrought.

EPODE a.

Earth, which Deity at first
For the sin of man had cursed,
Conquer'd by his nameless will,
Yield thy treasures to his skill:
All thy bosom, all thy heart
Yield to Labour, yield to Art.
Air, lend all thy favouring wings;
Ocean, give thy hidden things;
Elemental fire inflame,
Till the stubborn ore thou tame,
Plastic to man's stern command,
As the wax to infant's hand.

WESTERN END OF CASTLE BERNARD, THE RESIDENCE OF THE EARL OF BANDON.

STROPHE b.

See with the soul the canvas glow!
See to life the marble start!
Hear from string and symphon flow,
Sounds that soothe and shake the heart!

ANTISTROPHE b.

Raise the song to praise and bless,
Raise the song with glad accord—
Good to man and happiness,
Holiness unto the Lord.

EPODE b.

Thine the fulness of the land,
Lord, we lay it at thy throne;
In the hollow of thine hand,
Thou dost hold the earth thine own
Landing these with hearts o'erflowing,
Who dost make the morn's outgoing
Evermore to give thee praise—
Lord to thee our souls we raise.
Let peace and wealth upon us smile;
Bless our Monarch—bless our Isle.

STROPHE g.

Shadows of the deep, long night,
Draping all the moonless sky,
Darkest are the coming light
Of the morning dawns on high—

ANTISTROPHE g.

Lo! they melt before the glancing
Of the radiant light advancing,
Till the glorious day arise
Lustrous o'er the reddening skies.

EPODE g.

See the sun above the hills,
All the earth with splendour fills.
Hues of beauty—shapes of glory,
Such as hard ne'er fram'd in story,
Burst upon the wondering sight—
Forms of wisdom—forms of light,
Throng the world, from slumber waking,
While the morning pæan breaking
In the vast and mellow'd voice
Of a Nation's heart unspringeth,
Till with praises Heaven ringeth,
And the Isles rejoice!

STROPHE d.

Honour to the swinging arm,
Glowing brow, and earnest heart!

ANTISTROPHE d.

Honour to the potent charm
Wizard Science gives to Art!

EPODE d.

Spirit adorable! whose will doth move
All life to be thy minister—
Spirit of Wisdom, Potency, and Love!
To thee we raise our holiest chant,
Great Primal Mind! great Primal Hand!
Artificer of all that thou hast plann'd.
The fast foundations of the beauteous world
Into the deep, dark chaos thou hast hurl'd,
What time pearl'd out the grand siderean zone.
Thyself invisible—serene—alone
And the clouds and thunders round thy throne,
Thou didst control each orb that moved along
And thou didst breathe into man's lifeless frame
The sacred breath of thine Almighty flame,
Making thy last, best work—a living soul;
Then all the sons of God, in loud acclaim,
Shouted for joy Jehovah's holy name!
And to the farthest bounds
Of space, in thunder sounds,
Creation's jubilant hymn to God did roll!

Loud acclamations followed the conclusion of the Ode, which was rendered by the chorus with magnificent effect.

Mr. Waller and Dr Stuart were then presented to his Excellency.

The Lord-Lieutenant was then conducted through the Exhibition Buildings by Mr. Shea and Mr. F. B. Beamish, who pointed out to his notice the principal statues, paintings, and objects of industrial and mechanical interest.

The ceremonies concluded with the performance of a chorus arranged to the air of Handel's Coronation Hymn for George III., the words by Mr. Waller.

After his Excellency and suite left the Buildings, they were closed for the day.

During the day a beautiful copy of the Exhibition Catalogue, bound in green morocco, and emblazoned with an appropriate motto and the name of his Excellency, was presented to the Lord-Lieutenant by Mr. J. O'Brien, of Patrick-street

THE EXHIBITION BUILDING.

The Building in which the Exhibition takes place was originally built as a new Corn-Exchange, and is admirably situate on Albert-quay, overlooking the river, and close to Anglesea-street and the main streets of the city. The exterior is of a simple rustic character, and though pleasing and appropriate, would not lead any one to suppose that so much room could be found in, or in connexion with it, as required for this Exhibition.

On obtaining admission by the principal entrance, the spectator is introduced into what is styled the Northern Hall—or, in other words, the room originally built for the Corn-Exchange—which presents an area of 75 feet by 75; and immediately below this is the Southern Hall, or Fine Arts Gallery, 145 feet long by 52; and this gallery being three steps lower than the original apartment, an advantageous view is presented of a hall 250 feet in depth, which, when filled, will have a very magnificent effect. The total area of the entrance hall—to the right of the pay-door of which, by the by, are committee-rooms, and to the left refreshment-courts—is about 6500 feet, of which about 2200 feet have been dedicated for a promenade, leaving about 4200 feet for the exhibition of goods. From this hall we are led through an archway to the Fine Arts Court, which has been erected under the superintendence of Mr. Benson, the architect, in twenty-four days. It is, as stated above, 145 feet long by 52 wide, and contains an area of 7272 feet, of which 262 has to be deducted for promenade, leaving 4800 applicable to the purposes of the Exhibition. This hall is constructed of timber, and has an arched roof, which gives it a great deal of the appearance of the transept of the Great Exhibition. It is lighted from the top by skylights, an arrangement which might be copied with advantage by many of our galleries, there not being a painting hung in a bad light, with the exception of a few behind Telford's organ, which is situated at the further end of this hall. The walls of this hall, to the height of 10 or 11 feet, are covered with red cloth, relieved by gilt pilasters; but all above displays the bare boards, with the exception of those places where the paintings occupy a somewhat elevated position. It is a pity that time did not permit of the painting or covering of these boards, as the present appearance not only gives an idea of incompleteness, but is injurious to the effect of the paintings. Running east and west, between the northern and southern halls, is a central hall, which abuts a considerable distance on either side, forming, as it were, wings to the main building. This centre hall is 526 feet long by 30 wide, and contains an area of upwards of 9000 feet, of which 3800 are allotted for a promenade, and the remainder for the display of goods.

THE EXHIBITION.

Our space will not allow us to enter with any minuteness into a description of the various articles exhibited, and we must therefore content ourselves with endeavouring to give our readers a general idea of their nature; at the same time, admitting that the display of goods by far exceeded, both in quantity and quality, all the expectations we had formed of what it was likely to be. Over the entrance-door of the Northern Hall is a painting of the "Mocking of the Saviour," as he is being led away to be scourged, by Fitzgerald, of Dublin, which shows the artist to have a proper appreciation of his subject, and considerable skill in harmonizing colours, but it appears to us to be generally too much crowded with [illegible]. In this hall there are several cases of beautiful Limerick lace, [illegible] crochet-work performed by pupils of the industrial schools at Cork, established at the time of the famine of 1846, and other schools. There are likewise in this hall some cases of stuffed birds, the electric telegraph, a press striking Exhibition medals, the Jacquard tabinet weaving machine, belonging to Messrs. Keeley and Leech, of Dublin; and the velvet loom of Mr. Jones, of the same city. These latter machines are both at work—the one in manufacturing a magnificent tablinet of green and gold, for the Countess of Eglinton; and the other in weaving a plain crimson silk velvet, of most excellent texture. It is stated that Mr. Jones wished to bring down to the Exhibition a piece of scarlet velvet he has now in hand for a lady of distinction; but the weaver objected, lest it should be spoiled by the handling of the spectators.

The centre of the Southern or Fine Arts Hall is occupied with specimens of bookbinding, jewellery, a fountain, and some beautifully carved furniture in Irish oak—all excellent in their way, and deserving of attention. But the great attraction of this hall—which has been engraved by our Artist—will be found in the paintings and sculpture, of which the display would do no discredit to many of our London exhibitions. Amongst the paintings there are many familiar to us, and, no doubt, to our readers, as household words. Amongst the most prominent are Maclise's cartoon "Vision of Justice," and one of his earliest efforts, a rough likeness of Sir Walter Scott, taken at the time of his visit to Cork, accompanied by Lockhart and Miss Edgeworth, in 1826; Danby's "Tempest;" "The Widow's Son of Nain," by Mr. Drummond, of Cork a work of great excellence, showing that a brilliant future is before the artist; some paintings by West, including that of "Chaucer reading his Poems before Edward III.;" Sir M. A. Shee's portrait of Lord Montegle; and several specimens of the style of amateur artists, including Lady Bernard, Miss Palliser, &c. Of sculpture and models there is a good display, many of the pieces being somewhat familiar to the majority of our readers, having held a distinguished position in last year's Great Exhibition, as will be seen from the following list: M'Dowell's "[illegible]. Kirke's "Origin of the Dimple" and "Ruth and Naomi;" Joseph Farrell's "Bard's Farewell" and "Wanderer;" Thomas Farrell's "Lost One" (which he has had to restore, having been shattered on its route to the Exhibition); Foley's "Youth at the Stream;" Hefferman's "[illegible]sanna," "Girl Caressing a Child," and "Hamon and Antigone," Moore's "Sleeping Child," &c. Mr. John Jones exhibits three groups, all excellently executed; but the one which will attract most attention is that of Mr. Bramley's children playing with a favourite [illegible]. [illegible]ist also exhibits six busts, the likeness in the case of her Majesty and the Earl and Countess of Eglinton being strikingly true to nature. The Exhibition also contains a variety of other busts, including [illegible], Shell, Plunket, Sheil, the late Chief Justice Benton, Cardinal [illegible], &c.; Hogan's "Father Matthew," Baxter's "Catherine [illegible]. In this hall we also observed two small glass cases, the one containing fruit and the other a dead bird, carved in wood by Mr. A. Clarke, of the School of Design, Dublin, which are highly creditable to his talents

Turning from the Northern Hall into the western portion of the Central Hall, we find an excellent display of chandeliers, glass, furniture, and a variety of miscellaneous articles. The carving of the furniture is generally of the first class; and some of the specimens of glass exhibited are scarcely inferior to the celebrated Bohemian workmanship. There is likewise in this portion of the Exhibition a curious display of stuffed birds and animals, many of which are ranged in comical groups like those shown in the German collection in the Great Exhibition last year. At the extreme west of this hall we enter the Machine-room, in which are a flax scutching machine, a steam-engine to keep other machinery in motion, and a variety of agricultural machinery; but when we left Cork, this part of the Exhibition was in very far from a complete state. Retracing his steps, and entering from the same spot the eastern portion of this Central Hall or gallery, the spectator will find himself surrounded with a collection of clocks, paper-hangings—some of which are very elegant—textile fabrics, and other articles of manufacture. Here Messrs. Atkinson and Co., of Dublin, have their loom, exhibited in Hyde Park last year, in full operation, manufacturing a piece of beautiful white poplin, enriched with coloured bouquets, combining the rose, shamrock, and thistle, for the Countess of Eglinton, from a pattern supplied by the Dublin School of Design. The house also exhibits a great variety of poplins, brocades, &c., the patterns on two specimens of which we have engraved—the larger one representing a portion of magnificent hangings with a running pattern, containing the national emblems; and the smaller a piece of poplin, with a coloured floral pattern on a dark ground. The Messrs. Atkinson, who received the gold medal last year, also exhibit a specimen of Irish weaving, executed as long since as 1738, containing an excellent portrait of George II. In this department, also, Messrs. [illegible]

HIS EXCELLENCY THE LORD LIEUTENANT'S PROCESSION AT BANDON

Brothers, of Dublin, who likewise obtained the gold medal last year, exhibit some beautiful specimens of single and brocaded poplins, a specimen of the latter of which we have also engraved. Passing on to the extreme east of this hall, we find a small room portioned off, and hung with drapery, for the exhibition of Hogan's "Dead Christ," a work of art never to be too much praised. In this room are also shown some pieces of devotional sculpture, amongst which a "Madonna and Child" will be sure to attract attention. Passing out of this gallery the spectator finds himself in another room corresponding in size with the machinery department, mainly devoted to the reception of carriages, the display of which is extremely good. In this room are also exhibited specimens of harness, some of it on life-size horses, and models of fishing, life, and other boats.

In a yard attached to the Exhibition Building there is a handsome fountain, surrounded by specimens of coal, ironstone, slate, and other minerals; and throughout the Exhibition there are interspersed some very elegant specimens, both manufactured and unmanufactured, of the marbles of Limerick, Cork, Clare, and other counties of Ireland.

VISIT TO QUEEN'S COLLEGE.

Immediately after leaving the Exhibition on Thursday, the Lord-Lieutenant, accompanied by his staff, drove from the Exhibition through the South Mall, the Parade, and the Western-road, in order to visit the College. His Excellency went through the building, inspected the museum, professors' apartments, offices, &c., and expressed his approval of the general arrangements.

About four o'clock his Excellency and suite, accompanied by the professors, proceeded to the Examination Hall, where a great number of ladies and gentlemen, who had hurried from the Exhibition in order to witness the proceedings, had assembled. The professors were attired in their official robes; a number of students were also present, dressed in their academical costume.

Sir Robert Kane then came forward and read a congratulatory address, to which his Excellency made the following reply:—

I have great pleasure in returning you thanks for the congratulations which you so kindly offer; and I beg to assure you, that among the many objects of beauty and interest with which I have been met, since my arrival in this city, none has excited my admiration, or caused me greater satisfaction than this important institution. The superiority of the system pursued, and the diversity of the branches which are taught here, render this College well worthy of the support of all to whom the cause of education is dear; and it is most gratifying to find that the intellectual progress of the pupils affords so undeniable a proof of the efficiency of the institution, and their conduct so far a guarantee of their becoming useful and honourable members of society.

It is by such institutions as these, and by disseminating among the people such an education as the circumstances of the times will admit of, that we must look for promoting the internal well-being of our country, and the future prosperity of all classes.

I rejoice that I should have paid my first visit to this college on such an in-esting occasion, where I had an opportunity of seeing in such abundance the practical proofs of the country's advancement in intellectual and social improvement.

The presentation of the professors having then taken place with the usual formalities, his Excellency returned to the Imperial Hotel.

THE BANQUET.

Shortly before eight o'clock on Thursday evening, a very elegant banquet was served in a spacious hall erected for the purpose, adjoining the Exhibition Building, 90 feet long by 53 wide. The spacious room was occupied by tables nearly its entire length. The table reserved for his Excellency and the more distinguished of the guests was placed transversely across the room, and elevated slightly above those at which the remainder of the company were placed. The walls were tastefully and elegantly decorated in colours, of yellow, white, and red, blended with much artistic taste, and decorated at intervals with banners bearing the civic emblems of the various corporate towns of Ireland. Amongst these emblems, generally illustrative of trade, commerce, and navigation, the banner of the town of Derry excited much attention by its particularly lugubrious character, the only figure appearing on it being a full-length representation of Death painted in white, and relieved by a dismal black ground. The roof was supported by ten pilasters wreathed in red and white, from which various beautiful colours were hung; and the room was lit by a number of elegantly cut and brilliant chandeliers.

Immediately over the seat occupied by his Excellency, the Cork arms were appropriately placed, on either side of which appeared the initials V. R. and other national emblems.

On the entrance of his Excellency the appearance of the banquet-room was singularly grand and imposing. The scarlet uniforms of the military, of whom a very large number were present, formed a striking and picturesque contrast with the dark blue coats of the naval officers, and the still more sombre dress of the civilians present.

The chair was occupied by the Mayor, Sir W. Hackett; and amongst the nobility and gentry present we observed the Marquess of Thomond, the Earl of Belfast, Earl Fitzhardinge, Earl of Egmont, Lord Charnwood, Lord Carbery, Lord Clifton, Lord Massereene, Lord Gort, Lord Howth, Lord Talbot de Malahide, the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor of Dublin; the Lords Bishop of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross; the Provost of Trinity College, Dublin; Sir Robert Kane, President of the Queen's College; E. B. Roche, Esq., M.P.; Sir Edward M'Donnell, Chairman of the Great Southern and Western Railway Company; Sir Duncan M'Gregor, Dublin; Sir James Pitcairn, Dublin; Major-General Mansel, commanding the southern district; Lieutenant-Colonel Bell, 1st Royals; Lieutenant-Colonel Baddely, Royal Engineers; Lieutenant-Colonel Dalton, Lieut.-Colonel Eld, 90th Regiment; Lieut.-Colonel French, Major Paget, Lieut.-Colonel Vaughan, 90th Regiment; the Hon. J. Vereker, Dublin; Admiral M. H. Dixon, Queenstown; Captain Lyons, H.M.S. Ajax; Colonel Mansel, Major Stuart, Colonel Chesney, Major Bentinck, 7th Dragoon Guards; Serjeant Murphy, M.P.; Captain Huband, R.L.I.; Captain Stuart, R.N.; Lieut. Wentworth, R.N.; Dr. Ryall, Vice-President, Queen's College; E. Griffiths, C.E., Dublin; Dr. Wylsee, Dublin; the Very Rev. the Dean of Leighlin, Very Rev. the Dean of Cork, the Archdeacon of Cork, John Courtenay, Esq., High Sheriff of the county; Colonel Brown, Dublin; the Right Worshipful Dr. Kane, Mayor of Limerick; Right Worshipful the Mayor of Dundalk, Right Worshipful the Mayor of Sligo, Captain Knott, R.N.; Herbert Ingram, Esq.; E. Pike, Bessborough; R. Mulvany, Board of Works; Thomas Hutton, D.L., Dublin; J. Lentaigne, D.L., Dublin; George Roe, Dublin; Dr. Harrison, Dublin; Alderman Andrews, Dublin; W. Fry, Dublin; James Perry, Dublin; James West, Dublin; J. Gresham, Dublin; Sir G. Hodson, Holybrook Bray, county Wicklow; J. D. Atkin, Dublin; J. Stirling, Dublin, and nearly 400 other gentlemen—almost every part of Ireland being duly represented.

At the conclusion of the dinner, which was served with true Irish profusion, not to say true Irish extravagance, "Non nobis" was sung by a body of professional choristers

The healths of her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert and the rest of the Royal family having been drunk with the utmost enthusiasm.

The Chairman gave the toast of the evening, "The health of the Lord-Lieutenant" But a short time ago it was seriously debated by Government that the office of Lord-Lieutenant should be abolished. The answer that the Irish public gave to that intention showed clearly that Ireland was alive to her own feelings and her own interests; and if any question could remain of the sentiments of the Irish people, surely doubts of all would be cleared up at the sight of so large an assemblage as was here this evening. (Loud cheers.) The retainers of the Viceroy in Dublin was the only hope that remained of keeping the landed proprietors of Ireland at home, and not in other lands. It showed that the public of Ireland were bent on keeping the representative of Royalty in their own country. As for the present Lord-Lieutenant, he had shown himself a true and loyal friend of Ireland, in his munificent and generous donation to the Industrial Exhibition. (Hear, hear.) He therefore felt confident it required no inducements from him to lead the meeting to give "The health of the Lord-Lieutenant" their warmest and heartiest response. (Loud applause.)

His Excellency the Lord-Lieutenant rose to respond, and was received with the most rapturous applause. When silence had been restored, he said—Sir William Hackett and gentlemen, I shall not trespass sincerely for the honour you have just paid me; and while I thank you for the honour which you have so kindly paid me, I trust you will allow me to include in my thanks the kind citizens of Cork whom I do not see at this table, but who received me, if possible, in equal favour with yourselves. (Cheers.) Under any circumstances it would have given me the utmost satisfaction to have visited Cork, to have interested myself in its welfare, to have made myself acquainted with its inhabitants, to have seen its beauties, to have inspected its unrivalled harbour. (Cheers.) But I need hardly assure you that it is with most particular pleasure that I find myself paying my first visit to this beautiful city upon an occasion such as this. I do indeed consider myself most fortunate that it has fallen to my lot to inaugurate an undertaking such as this—to aid in carrying out a scheme projected, and so far carried out, by the public spirit of the citizens of Cork, aided by the patriotism of all Ireland—a scheme which I feel will contribute to promote the industry and the practical science without which we cannot hope to see Ireland happy and prosperous. (Cheers.) I believe that there were many who hesitated at first to encourage the undertaking, because they feared for its failure. But were there not many who hesitated to encourage that great scheme which has astonished the world, and proved the foresight and wisdom of its Royal projector? (Cheers.) Were there not many who predicted pestilence and plague—who foresaw that London would be overcome by forebears, that it would be in flames, that even our own people would behave ill, and that, if all those evils were got over, the result would be only a monster bazaar, the novelty of which would wear off in a single fortnight. (Cheers.) I confess, with shame, that I myself was one who feared for the result. But I can only say that the first glance which I got at that mighty building relieved me from all my doubts. (Cheers.) From the first moment that our beloved Queen entered the walls of the Exhibition, surrounded by all that was dear to her, and guarded by nothing but her own true heart and the loyal feelings of her subjects, it was one continued triumph of peaceful art and civilisation. (Cheers.) And I would ask any man whom I see at this table—do you doubt the success of the present Exhibition? (Hear.) Is it true that we have not here the statues of Italy, the carving of Austria, the malachites of Russia, the porcelain of Sèvres, or the velvets of Genoa, but we have what you and I value far more, the products of our own country. (Loud cheers.) We have the marbles of Cork, of Kilkenny, and of Connemara. (Hear, hear.) We have your linens, we have your tabinets, we have your lace embroidery, we have the results of the industry of the sons and the handiwork of the fair daughters of Erin. (Cheers.) But allow me to add, that it is there that the genius of Ireland cannot accomplish, whether it be the highest effort of human ambition, or the humblest essay of talent? Does not Irish blood flow in the veins of the conqueror of the greatest emperor the world has ever seen? (Loud cheers.) Does not the blood of Ireland flow in the veins of him whose career of glory not one defeat, not one selfish act, has tarnished? (Cheers.) Did not the capacious mind of Wellesley spring from an Irish stock? ("Hear" and cheers.) Was it not Irish genius which shone in the calm and lustrous eye of Canning, which sparkled in the wit of Sheridan, which gave command to the eloquence of Burke, which lent point to the irony of Tierney, and which taught Goldsmith, the writer of nature?—(Cheers) which enabled your own Moore—(Renewed cheering)—to breathe forth words of beauty, words of fragrance, as sweet as your own harp, but nervous as the arm by which it was struck? (Cheers.) And to come to your own county, or even to your own city, was it not the genius of Cork which made Curran what he was. (Cheers.) I would ask you, does modern art own a better or a more worthy votary than Daniel Maclise? (Cheers.) Allow me also to pay a passing tribute of admiration to the nameless thousands who have contributed so efficiently to the show which we have inaugurated this day. Gentlemen, it is not by strife and party contention; it is not by religious or political dissension; it is not by outrage and murder, that the regeneration of Ireland is to be accomplished. (Cheers.) It is because of all this that misfortunes have come upon her—that so many of her sons have had to seek a refuge on other shores—that so many of her harbours are untenanted—that so much of her rich land is uncultivated. Endowed with everything that ought to make her great and prosperous, she has been miserable and poor because she has been disunited (Hear, hear.) It is by the merging of all party feeling in the one great object, your country's welfare—it is by holding out the hand of friendship to your fellow-countrymen—it is by preserving order and tranquility among yourselves, that you will see happy faces, full haggarts, and empty barracks—(Great cheering)—that you will see your harbours filled, British capital flowing in, and railway enterprise carried through every corner of the country. (Loud cheers.) Would that all Ireland could see what we have seen this day! Would that she could see the peaceful strife, the honest emulation, which Cork has given birth to! Would she could learn from those evil counsellors no longer upon her disorganisation and distress. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) I have alluded to railway enterprise, because I believe it is one of those things which conduce most to the prosperity of any country; but I believe that no country, from its peculiar circumstances, exists to which it would be a greater blessing than, if it were carried out, it would be to this country. ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) And I believe that, if the plan which emanated from the capacious mind of the greatest of God's creatures I ever met, had been carried out, we should have seen Ireland happy. (Loud cheers.) A humble follower of Lord George Bentinck—(Cheers)—I would have voted for that bill; and now, in the position which, by the favour of my Sovereign, I hold, I conceive it is my duty to encourage railway enterprise in this country to the utmost of my power. (Cheers.) I well remember that it was shortly after my arrival in Dublin, I received a deputation headed, I believe, by a gentleman whom I do not see present, but who I know is in the room (Sir E. M'Donnell), to represent to me what I humbly conceived to be a matter of great importance—the amount of the loan which was charged by the Government upon the loans which they made to railways in Ireland. (Cheers.) I was then young in political life, but still I felt strongly in behalf of the object of the deputation. Yet, strongly as I felt the justice of the cause which was then brought before me, I was obliged to give a commonplace answer; but that did not prevent me from making my representation to those who hold the purse-strings of the country. (Cheers.) And I rejoice to say that these representations were met in the spirit in which they were given, and although, perhaps, this is not the place to introduce such matters, still, as I conceive that I am about to announce a national benefit, and that this is a national assembly, I have great pleasure in stating that the Government have acceded to my request. I am authorised to state that the amount upon Government loans to railways in Ireland will be reduced to four per cent., with the option of converting them into terminable annuities. (Hear, hear.) I can only say, gentlemen, that I entirely concur in a few words which I saw in a recent address of one of my colleagues, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the claims of Ireland for assistance are irresistible (Cheers.) Gentlemen, it is not often that the representative of the Sovereign in this country has an opportunity of speaking to those whom he governs—rarely, if ever, to an assembly such as this. But I seize upon it with great eagerness, because I am acting nearer to my heart than to try and persuade the people of Ireland that I am actuated by the most earnest desire for their welfare. (Cheers.) I believe it unhappily happens that many some perhaps from mistake, but others, I fear, from malice—would endeavour to persuade you that I am desirous to injure your estates, foreign to your interests, that I am not actuated by kindness towards you. Believe me, her—because I pledge you my honour that it is the case—that I already feel affection for the warmhearted people among whom I find myself. (Cheers.) I already love this beautiful island with which I am placed under my charge, which I look upon as a trust which has been committed to me, not only as one for which I must answer to my Sovereign and my country, but one for whose evil or good fulfilment I must in the hereafter answer to my God. (Renewed cheers.) Believe me that I have accepted the trust determined to act honestly and openly, not to praise this party and cajole that, not to truckle to the one or to flatter the other with fair promises, but to preserve tranquility, and, while I maintain the liberties of the Irish people, to cultivate affection and loyalty to my Sovereign. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, whatever time I spend in this country, be assured, whether it be long, as I sincerely trust it may be, or whether it be short, I can only tell you that I shall carry away with me an Irish heart, and that I shall hereafter feel myself pledged by honour, by duty, and by love to the Irish people. (Cheers.) And, amongst the bright hours I have spent in Ireland, I shall not look with the least pleasure to those which the kindness of the citizens of Cork has afforded me. (Loud and prolonged cheers.)

The health of Her Majesty's Ministers, coupled with his Excellency, and most warmly responded to, the "Army and Navy," responded to by Major-General Mansel, Admiral Dixon, and the Marquis of Thomond; and the "Members for the City and County of Cork," acknowledged by Mr. Serjeant Murphy, Mr. Roche, and Lord Bernard, having been drunk.

The Mayor gave—"May the light of Ireland's prosperity dawn upon the hour of her darkness."

Mr. J. D. Fitzgerald, a candidate for the representation of Ennis, replied; and, having introduced into his observations a number of irrelevant and controversial subjects, altogether unfitted for a festive entertainment, was coughed down by the general good sense of the meeting.

Mr. F. B. Beamish (in the absence of Sir T. Deane) proposed the health of Lady Eglinton—a toast which was received in the most enthusiastic manner, the cheering being continued for several minutes.

His Excellency, on rising to acknowledge the compliment which had been paid his lady, was warmly greeted by the assembly. He said—Gentlemen, On the part of Lady Eglinton, I beg to return you her most sincere thanks; and I will take leave to say for her, what I most assuredly could not say for myself, that she deserves the honour that you have paid her. (Applause.) I believe I have told you before—I must have told you, because I felt it—that when the unfortunate day comes when I leave this island, I shall go away with an Irish heart—(Cheers)—but Lady Eglinton is so far superior to me, that she came here with an Irish heart—(Applause)—and I am convinced that the time she has spent here has really increased those warm feelings of affection which she has always entertained for the land of her birth. (Cheers.) I will not inflict a speech upon you, for I see you are impatient—("No, no," and cries of "Not with you")—but I wish to take this opportunity of alluding to what fell from the High Sheriff of the city. I do not regret the absence of the gentleman to whom he alluded, because it devolved upon him to propose the toast, for I am convinced that no one could have done it greater justice; but I do lament that the Governors of Lunatic Asylums in Ireland, and a gentleman to whom the High Sheriff has alluded (Sir Thomas Deane), because, in addition to the regret we must all feel at his loss upon the present occasion, we must also commiserate his feelings, when, after all the attention he has paid and the labour he has given in promoting the Exhibition which we have inaugurated to-day, he has not been allowed to witness its triumphant fruition. (Hear, hear.) In conclusion, I beg to thank you, on the part of Lady Eglinton, for the complimentary manner in which you have received her health. (His Excellency resumed his seat amid loud applause.

It being now past twelve o'clock, the company almost immediately separated.

VISIT TO QUEENSTOWN.

On Friday morning, by half-past eleven o'clock, their Excellencies and suite were in the Exhibition Building, which presented a very different appearance from what it did the previous day—the platforms at the head of the hall were removed, a greater quantity of statuary introduced, the centre occupied with bog oak furniture of most exquisite workmanship, and cases of elegant plate and jewellery—and the greatest progress had been made towards the completion of the arrangement of the goods that could possibly have been expected in so short a time.

Their Excellencies having remained about an hour and a half in the examination of the various objects of manufacture displayed in the Exhibition, at one o'clock the Lord-Lieutenant, the Countess of Eglinton, the Earl of Bandon and family, Lord Bernard, the Hon. Mrs. Bernard, with her sons Percy and Boyle in their Highland costume, and other noble families, accompanied by the Mayor, Lady Hackett, and the Committee of the National Exhibition and their families, went on board the Prince Arthur steamer, which was placed at their disposal by the River Steam Company, and proceeded down the river. As they passed along, cheering and firing appeared to be the order of the day. On arriving at Queens town, they were received with a salute of 21 guns from the Royal Cork Yacht Club battery, and cheers from thousands who crowded the hills. The Admiral put off his barge, and carried the Viceroy and Countess, the Mayor, and Earl of Bandon on board H.M.S. Ajax. He was received by a guard of honour of Marines, the band playing the National Anthem, and the "blue jackets" on the yards giving three hearty cheers. He was here presented with addresses from the Royal Cork Yacht Club, the inhabitants of Queenstown, and the Consular body of Cork. With the exception of the address of the Consuls, which we subjoin, there was nothing in the addresses worthy of recording:—

ADDRESS OF THE CONSULAR BODY.

To his Excellency, the Right Hon. Archibald Hamilton, Earl of Eglinton, Lord Lieutenant-General and General-Governor of Ireland &c. &c.

We, the Consular Body of Cork, and its dependencies, on the Festival Day of Queen and Country, her most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, gladly avail ourselves of your Excellency's visit on this auspicious occasion to present our homage and humble duty to your Excellency, as the representative of the mighty Sovereign of many realms a Sovereign whose wise and benignant policy it has ever been to draw closer by the ties of peace and mutual benefit the nations of the world; to foster and protect that free intercourse by which the bounties of Providence vouchsafed to the favoured are made common to all, and the happiness of mankind thereby extended.

We gratefully acknowledge the protection afforded by the mild and equal laws of this country, alike to the natives of foreign lands as to her own citizens.

We cordially congratulate your Excellency on the scene which now surrounds you—we hail it as the pledge and dawn of returning prosperity to this island; and, finally, we pray Almighty God that this happy promise may be realised, that your gracious Sovereign and her people may enjoy all his choicest gifts, and that to your Excellency may belong the felicity of witnessing, through many years, the prosperity of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

ALFRED MITCHELL, for the U.S. of America.
C. MARCEL, for France
N. CUMMING, for the Ottoman Porte and Denmark.
H. BARRY, for Belgium
R. L. JACKSON, for Hanover and Netherlands.
S. RING, for Hanseatic Towns.
JAMES MORGAN, for the Brazils and Central America.
GEO. N. HARVEY, for Austria, Prussia, Sweden, and Norway.
A. DEB SILVA LIMA, for Portugal.
EDWARD BURKE, for Russia.
N. G. YOUARD, for Greece.
BARTHOLOMEW O'VERLING, for Spain, Chairman.

HIS EXCELLENCY'S REPLY.

Gentlemen,—Among the congratulations with which I have been met on my arrival in Cork, there are none which have given me greater satisfaction than those which you have now presented to me.

That the friendly feelings and peaceful relations which now happily subsist between the gracious Sovereign whom I represent, and the foreign powers from whom you are deputed, may long continue, is my anxious desire, and will occupy the constant attention of the Government with whom I am associated, and I trust that the horrors of war may be long averted.

I cordially concur in the hope expressed by you that this gratifying scene may be a prelude to years of prosperity and happiness in this island, and that the bonds of peace may be more closely riveted by the national interchange of commerce, in which Ireland has proved herself, by this Exhibition, to be so worthy to bear her part.

Having returned on board the Prince Arthur, accompanied by the barges of the several Consuls in Cork, his Excellency was conveyed round the guard ship, which compliment was acknowledged by a salute of 21 guns, which was answered by a similar salute from the battery at Spike Island. The Prince Arthur then passed close to Queenstown, the crowds assembled along the shore cheering enthusiastically. The steamer then proceeded towards the man-of-war roads, when immediately the Channel fleet in harbour thundered forth a Royal salute. On nearing H.M.S. Prince Regent, Rear-Admiral Corry and Capt. Hutton came off in a barge, and shortly after the Viceregal flag was struck on board the Prince Arthur. On his Excellency stepping on the deck of H.M.S. Prince Regent the marine guard of honour presented arms, the band played "God save the Queen," and the tars cheered from the yards. After remaining on board for some time, the Lord-Lieutenant and the Countess and party returned to the Prince Arthur in the barge, and again passed round the fleet, when his Excellency was again greeted with a salute of 21 guns from H.M.S. Prince Regent. The Prince Arthur then proceeded down the river, and on arriving opposite Rostellan Castle, the tenantry, who were assembled on the ramparts, cheered, and the guns on the battery fired a Royal salute. The steamer then returned, and on passing Queenstown was again received with cheering, and H.M.S. Ajax fired a parting salute of 21 guns. On coming to Passage the Lord-Lieutenant and his Lady, the Mayor and Lady Hackett, Earl of Bandon and family returned to Cork in a special train, to which they were invited by the directors of the Cork and Passage Railway. The Prince Arthur was accompanied during the excursion by the Royal Alice, Prince, and other river steamers, all of which were crowded with passengers. His Excellency and the Countess were most prominent during the day, acknowledging the unceasing compliments poured upon them. The day in regard to weather was most auspicious.

THE BALL.

The closing festivities connected with the opening of the Exhibition were celebrated on Friday night by a grand ball in the pavilion in which the banquet of the previous evening took place, which, in addition to its other decorations, was now liberally ornamented with flowers. "Welcome to Eglinton," with the Viceroy's and Imperial crown, extending across the centre of the hall; and a raised dais, with blue and white canopy, under which were placed the chairs of State, having been raised at the southern end, and the orchestra at the north.

Shortly after 11 o'clock, the Earl and Countess of Eglinton entered the hall, and were conducted to the chairs of State, and dancing almost immediately commenced. The ball was crowded, there being upwards of 1200 people present, comprising a large portion of the rank, fashion, and beauty of Cork, Dublin, Bandon, and other places within easy reach of the Building. During the evening a great number of ladies and gentlemen were presented to his Excellency and the Countess, who retired shortly after two o'clock.

An elegant supper was served in the apartment which had served as the reception-room on the previous evening, and dancing was kept up with the greatest spirit until long after daylight.

DEPARTURE OF THE LORD-LIEUTENANT.

On Saturday morning his Excellency and the Countess again visited the Exhibition at ten o'clock, and remained there until half-past eleven, when they proceeded to view the School of Design; and from thence to the new County Lunatic Asylum, which has just been erected in a most beautiful situation on Shamrock Hill, about a mile from the city, at a cost of £70,000. The building, which is in the old English style of architecture, is arranged to give accommodation to 600 patients; and at the course of a month the patients now in the old institution, numbering 110, will be removed to it. Their Excellencies were received by Drs. White and Orpen, the Governors of Lunatic Asylums in Ireland, the board of governors, and Dr. Power, the resident physician, and having been conducted over the various apartments, were pleased to express their approval of the whole of the arrangements, the noble Lord giving his assent to its being in future called the Eglinton Asylum.

The Viceregal party, upon leaving the asylum, proceeded direct to the station of the Great Southern and Western Railway, where a special train was in readiness to convey them on their return to Dublin. The train left Cork at 20 minutes past 1, and arrived at Dublin at a quarter to 6 o'clock, a short stay having been made at the Limerick Junction station, where his Excellency and the Countess partook of luncheon.

In conclusion, we have only to return our thanks to the officials of the Exhibition and of the different railway companies, for the courtesy and attention paid not only to ourselves but to all the visitors to the Exhibition, and to express a hope, that this, the first effort for many a year of Irishmen to pull together for the benefit of their common country, may be crowned with the success it so eminently deserves.

SEEDS FOR CALIFORNIA.—We observed, ready for shipment, at the seed warehouses of Messrs. P. Lawson and Son, seedsmen and nurserymen to the Highland and Agricultural Society, a few days ago, a rather extensive assortment of all kinds of seeds in ordinary cultivation, including wheat, oats, barley, and all the cereal grasses, mangold-wurzel, potatoes, carrots, &c., filling seventy-six huge puncheons, which, we believe, it would take seven railway trucks to convey, the aggregate value being £2000. These agricultural seeds are ordered by a firm in San Francisco.—Edinburgh Evening Post

LARGE ROSE-TREE.—The extraordinary rose-tree at Buxton's nursery gardens, in the Wandsworth-road, engraved in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for vol. xvi., p. 464, is now in full bloom: it is 13 feet high, 40 feet in circumference, and bears about 3000 flowers.

MURRAY'S "GUIDE TO THE GOLD-DIGGINGS."—This little book contains an authentic account of the "diggings," with letters from the miners, and many valuable practical directions as to cooking, ship or obtaining a free or assisted passage, with hints on outfit, the whole of which will be found very useful to intending emigrants.

ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB.

THREE divisions or classes of yachts of this Club contended on Saturday last for a corresponding number of valuable prizes. The Ruby steamer had, as usual, been chartered by the Club. She proceeded to Erith with 300 ladies and gentlemen on board, where Waterman 2 and 11, the Sylph steamer, Lord Londesborough's schooner-yacht Derwent, with a distinguished party on board, the Marquis of Angleseа's Pearl, the Paragon, and a number of other gentlemen's yachts, were in readiness to accompany the race.

THE ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB PRIZES.

The prizes consisted of three handsome pieces of plate. The first, value £100, was a correct model from the original drawing of Eddystone Lighthouse, richly chased in frosted silver, upon an ebony plinth; height, 26 inches. The second, value £50, was a richly-chased Etruscan-formed silver vase, with richly-chased yachting devices. And the third, value £30, was an elaborately-chased silver tankard of Elizabethan pattern. The whole were from the firm of Hunt and Roskell, and were much admired.

The following were the contending craft:—

FIRST CLASS.—Exceeding 30 tons—Prize of the value of £100.

Name.	Tons.	Owner's Name.	Distin. Flag.
Paul ter	51	C. Brandrith, Esq	White, blue cross.
Mosquito	50	Lord Londesborough	Blue pierced white, red Maltese cross
Volante	45	John Cragie, Esq	White.
Cygnet	35	H. Lambton, Esq	Blue ground, ram's head yellow.

SECOND CLASS.—15 tons and not exceeding 30.—Prize of the value of £50.

Whisper	19	Thomas Ryddell, Esq	Blue, white, red.
Prima Donna	25	G. Coope, Esq	White burgee, yellow griffin's head.
Phantom	20	S Lane, Esq	White, red border

THIRD CLASS.—10 tons and not exceeding 15—Prize of the value of £30.

Vampire	13	G. Wheeler, jun., Esq	White, red border, bat in centre.
Vesper	11	F. Roberts, Esq	Red
Kitten	10	T. Harvey, Esq	White, blue cross
Mouse	15	G. E. Brown, Esq	White ground, mouse in centre.

Half-minute time per ton for difference of tonnage.

The distance contested by the first two classes was from Erith round the Nore Light and back; but the distance was shortened for the third class, in order to save as much time as possible

The signal was given by direction of Lord Alfred Paget, the Commodore, for the start, at 11 hours 57 minutes 12 seconds, when a cloud of canvass from the three rows of craft, so positioned as to afford a wide berth, instantly burst upon the view. It was a very excellent start, and formed as pretty a picture as could well be imagined. With a flowing sheet they spanked down Longreach, and neared Gravesend in the following order:—

First Class.—Volante leading by about 200 yards; next the Musquito and the Cygnet, and Pauline, with two of the smaller craft cracking on between them.

In the second class the Phantom and Secret were almost abreast of each other, and in the third the Mouse was giving way to the Vampire, the whole, however, being very close together. Off the Chapman Head Beacon a signal was fired for the third class to round a boat there, while the Commodore's steamer proceeded down to the Nore Light, which was rounded in the following time and order:—

	h.	m.	s.
FIRST CLASS.
Volante	3	5	45
Musquito	3	4	7
Cygnet	3	10	6
Phantom	3	10	46
SECOND CLASS.
Secret	3	13	7
Phantom	3	12	35
Prima Donna	3	16	26
Whisper	3	19	56

They here had to turn to windward against the tide; but, as the wind veered a little, they were enabled to lay up some of the reaches. They ultimately came in in the following order:—

	h.	m.	s.
FIRST CLASS.
Volante (the winner)	7	40	35
Cygnet	7	51	8
Musquito	8	0	0
SECOND CLASS.
Phantom (the winner)	8	51	20
Secret	8	19	20
THIRD CLASS
Vampire (the winner)	8	43	30
Vesper	8	51	2
Kitten	7	12	25

The plate was then presented, with the usual appropriate observations, and the Ruby returned to Blackwall and London at a late hour at night.

We annex illustrations of the Prizes.

100-GUINEA PRIZE.—The Eddystone Lighthouse, modelled from the drawings of the engineer, Mr. Smeaton. On the base is inscribed the name of the race, the club, and the winner.

50-GUINEA PRIZE.—A Vase of Etruscan form: on the body are panels containing a representation of yachting; and on the cover are the anchor and other shipping implements, grouped to form the button.

30-GUINEA PRIZE.—A richly-chased Elizabethan pattern silver Inkstand, with cover, gilt inside

The three prizes are from the establishment of Messrs. Hunt and Roskell, and are executed in their best manner.

At a meeting of the Royal Irish Academy, held on Monday evening, in Dublin, Dr. Todd exhibited some ships' papers, bearing the signature of James II., and of the celebrated Pepys, Secretary to the Admiralty at that time.

CHESS SOIREE AT MANCHESTER.

AN intimation that Mr. Staunton was paying a passing visit to Manchester on his way to the North, where he was proceeding for a few weeks to recruit his health, gave occasion for a great muster of the Chess amateurs of the neighbourhood. Although the assemblage was quite impromptu, no less than sixty gentlemen were present to testify their regard and respect for the services Mr. Staunton had rendered to the cause of Chess. The meeting took place in the large saloon of the Albion Hotel; and, in addition to the chief members of the Chess Club, was attended by Mr. Löwenthal, the celebrated Hungarian player; Major Robertson, of the 32d; Mr. Cronheim, of Halifax; Mr. Myers of Preston; Mr. Chuley, of Ashton; the Rev. J. Rose, of Stockport; the Rev. G. Perkins, Mr. Schwabe, Mr. J. Reiss. Mr. Hoyle, &c.

Play commenced about half-past four, and from fifteen to twenty Chess-boards were in constant requisition until ten o'clock, when the party sat down to supper.

The chair was occupied by Mr. Duval, the president of the Chess Club; and the vice-chair by Mr. Schuyler.

After the customary loyal toasts had been drunk with all due honours,

The chairman rose, and requesting bumpers all round, observed that it was his pleasing duty to propose the toast of the evening—the health of a gentleman who, by his long and unequalled services in the cause of their favourite recreation, both as a player and a writer, had done more for Chess than any man who ever lived—(Immense applause)—a gentleman whom it was impossible to speak or think of as a stranger; for who that knew anything of Chess throughout the world could be ignorant of the name of Staunton? (Great cheers.) It was one of our "household words." It was learnt over the board with the first moves, and it was the recognised authority in every disputed and every difficult position, from the beginning to the end of the game. There was not an amateur then present who was not acquainted with Staunton's games, Staunton's books, Staunton's notes; and they had known the great and unexpected gratification of meeting Staunton's self. (Tumultuous cheering.) He could not pass over the present occasion without an allusion to the late Chess Tournament, for which, like every other important movement in the cause of Chess, they were mainly indebted to the energy and enterprise of their distinguished guest. An ungenerous endeavour had been made by a small section of the Chess community to detract from Mr. Staunton's deservedly high repute as a player, because, in the chance-medley of that arena, he sustained a trivial reverse; but he believed he was speaking the sense of that meeting, and the sense of nine out of ten unprejudiced amateurs in Europe, in saying that, notwithstanding that casual and tomfool reverse, Mr. Staunton was still, as he had long been, the first player of the world. (Great cheering.) He doubted if there was any player who did not really believe, as he did, that in any decisive number of games the laurel wreath would still be the meed of the English champion. As, on the field of actual war, the greatest of all the immortal warriors, Wellington himself, the hero of a hundred fights (Enthusiastic cheering) did not invariably achieve a victory; so, in the mimic field of Chess, where the strife was essentially between mind and mind, our champion had upon one occasion—and only one—sustained a check. But was that temporary failure to be placed for a single instant in comparison with the long series of brilliant victories against St. Amant, Cochrane, and a host of adversaries in which the genius of Staunton proved the mastery? (Immense applause.) Mr. Duval concluded a long and eloquent speech by giving the health of Mr Staunton, the Chess Champion, which was drunk with musical honours and amid long cheering.

On rising to return thanks, Mr. Staunton was received with the liveliest demonstrations of enthusiasm. He acknowledged, in an elegant and appropriate address, the too flattering compliments which he had just had the gratified recipient. He assured the assembled amateurs that he felt a more than ordinary pleasure at finding that Manchester, which stood forth the very queen of enterprise and industry, was in no respect behind her neighbours in appreciating and encouraging what was intellectual and refined. Of what he had been of the skill and spirit of the Chess Club there, he had no hesitation in predicting that ere long it would take the lead amongst the Chess Clubs of the provinces. Another excellent admonition to the younger members on the danger of permitting Chess to engross their time and attention, to the neglect of the more important avocations of life, he concluded by a few striking remarks on the subject. He then announced that the projected match carried out by the committee in perfect singleness of spirit, with the sole object of promoting the extension of the game. For himself he might with truth say, that, regarding Chess as a mere amusement, he had not meditating it the "be all and end all" of existence, he had long before that event obtained quite as much renown, both as a Chess-player and Chess writer, as he coveted; and in incurring the expense and trouble which he had taken to carry out that undertaking, he was influenced by no feelings of personal vanity or advantage (Loud cheers)—for what he had to gain by it beyond what he possessed?—but solely with the view of turning so favourable an occasion as presented itself for the Great Exhibition presented to the account of their favourite pastime. (Great applause) From the first projection of the Tournament he had grave doubts, owing to the state of his health, of being able to take any part in the encounters, and as the time drew near for the assemblage, exhausted as he was by the incessant labour of carrying out the arrangements, and suffering from a dangerous illness, it was his anxious desire to be spared the task of playing; but he was well known to his coadjutors on the committee, and it was only in compliance with their earnest wishes that he entered his name as a competitor at all. That, under the circumstances, he was fortunate in, he lost a few games, ought to have surprised nobody; the wonder to himself was, that he succeeded in winning any. (Cheers.) He was now endeavouring to recruit his health by travel, and he could promise that, if he could not bring it to the world again, he should be ready to enter the arena, not for an indecisive contest of four or five games, like that of the tourney, but for a testing match of twenty or thirty games with any player in the world.

The Vice-Chairman, in proposing the health of Mr. Löwenthal, observed that nothing was so well calculated to ensure that permanent success which Mr. Staunton has so kindly wished and predicted for their Club, as the residence among them of some distinguished player; and he was therefore with real pleasure and satisfaction that he learned there was every prospect of Mr. Löwenthal making Manchester his abiding-place. (Great cheering.) Mr. Löwenthal had already done much for Chess in Manchester by the urbanity of his manners, not less than by his great skill at the game, had created a want which nothing but his continued presence among them could supply.

The toast was received with great applause, and drunk with musical honours.

Mr. Löwenthal responded in neat and appropriate terms, drawing a beautiful analogy between the game of Chess and the game of actual life, and comparing, with great felicity, the circumscribed powers of the Queen in the former to the limited monarchy like that of England. He would not allow the present or any opportunity of meeting a number of his Chess brethren to pass without offering the tribute of his thanks to Mr. Staunton, a name for ever identified with and to serve him as an individual, but for his indefatigable services in the cause of Chess-players generally. Long before he had ever hoped to visit this great country, long before he had ever thought of the advantage of Mr. Staunton's personal acquaintance, he played over his games with an interest and delight which he could never express: and he was convinced, then as now, that, in a match of a satisfactory length, no player living could contend successfully against him. (Cheers.)

The Chairman then proposed the health of Major Robertson, who had been unanimously elected an honorary member of their club, and whom they all knew as a player of great excellence.

Major Robertson replied with military frankness and brevity, thanking them for the honour conferred in electing him a member of their club, and for their kindness in drinking his health; and he could assure them that, while stationed in their neighbourhood, he should gladly meet them whenever duty permitted.

The Vice-Chairman proposed the health of the strangers, and made a few remarks to them for their kind attendance on so short a notice, coupling with the toast the name of Mr. Cronheim, of Haufax.

Mr. Cronheim, in returning thanks, congratulated the Manchester Club on the brilliant success of their soirée, and regretted only that the notices of the meeting could not be sent out earlier, as it would have been certain to attract a large attendance of Chess-players from Yorkshire. He trusted, now that Chess was taken up with such spirit in Lancashire, that the members of the Manchester, the Liverpool, the Preston, and other clubs would give the support of their delegates to the Yorkshire Chess Association, which would hold its meeting in Hull during the autumn of the present year; and he doubted not the clubs of Yorkshire would reciprocate the compliment with interest on all future occasions. After a number of other toasts and some admirable speeches, the party separated, all apparently well pleased with the first Chess soirée of the Manchester Club.

CHESS SOIREE OF THE HALIFAX ST. GEORGE'S CLUB.—On Wednesday week the members of this club and their friends had the gratification of meeting Mr. Staunton at Crow Wood, where that eminent chess-player and author had been staying a few days, during his visit to Mr. Cronheim, the President. A consulting committee, consisting of Mr. S. G. Thomas, Mr. W. Common, and Mr. E. Cronheim, played two even games with Mr. Staunton, who afterwards gave the odds of the pawn and two moves to Mr. Edward Cronheim, in a third game. In each of these combats a brilliant victory was achieved by Mr. Staunton, who gratified the company with some of the masterly combinations and evolutions for which his style of play has so long been celebrated. In proposing the health of his distinguished guest and friend at the supper table, Mr. Cronheim adverted to the injustice of the attempt in some quarters to depreciate Mr. Staunton in consequence of his failure in the short match with Mr. Anderssen at the recent Chess Tournament. He reminded the company how signally a similar result in the first short match with M. St. Amant had been reversed in the second and longer match, which gave sufficient scope for the development of the superior genius of the champion of England; and expressed his conviction that any future match of sufficient length for a fair trial of skill would compel the Prussian to restore to the English wreath that single leaf of laurel which he had the honour of carrying away. Mr. Staunton cordially acknowledged the compliment, and in an eloquent address proposed the health of the President, and prosperity to the Halifax St. George's Chess Club. Previous to the termination of the meeting, the secretary announced that the next anniversary of the Yorkshire Chess Association would be held in Hull in the month of October. This information was the more gratifying, from the circumstance that some doubts had been entertained as to the future meetings of that society.

OLD ANCHOR FOUND ON THE NORTH-WEST COAST OF IRELAND.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

Rutland, Burton Port, Co. Donegal.

As a fact in history it is known to many that several of the vessels constituting the Spanish Armada were lost on the north-west coast of Ireland in 1588, while returning home from their unsuccessful attempt at invasion

On this part of the coast of Donegal, where I am at present stationed, viz. immediately inside the north island of Arran, a tradition existed among the people of two Spanish ships having been wrecked here a great number of years ago. Though often having heard stories to this effect, I was disposed to give little heed to them, still a report reached me some months since of the appearance about the sand of part of the hull of a vessel, together with a number of cannon, which, it was affirmed, had been seen about fifty years before. At that time several of the guns were raised by the inhabitants and disposed of as old brass, till they were obstructed in their attempts by the sand washing over the wreck, and thus rendering any further endeavour hopeless. Upon hearing the rumour, I went to the spot mentioned, with the Coast Guard boat and crew, for the purpose of satisfying myself as to its truth; when, to my astonishment, I could distinctly perceive the remains of a very large vessel, with several cannon lying in a heap on what appeared to have been the forecastle. I made different attempts to get them up, and had almost succeeded, when either the ropes slipped off the gun they were attached to, or the sea became so rough that I was obliged to abandon them, and in the course of a few weeks they were again completely covered by the sand.

OLD ANCHOR, FOUND ON THE NORTH-WEST COAST OF IRELAND.

On a different part of the coast, but within two or three miles of the above-mentioned wreck, lies another, which there is every reason to believe was the second of those ill-fated vessels, from the fact of there being positive proof that a shipwreck has not occurred in that place during the last century, as vouched for by a very old inhabitant residing close to the spot; as well as from the appearance of an anchor belonging to the ship (a Sketch of which I send you), which I succeeded in raising. It is perfect as taken into by the water in the spots which are not immediately covered by an incrustation of sand, gravel, and stone: there is a striking peculiarity in the great length of its shank.

Notwithstanding that no cannon have appeared above the sand in the vicinity of this last-mentioned wreck, the very sight of which would at once have pronounced it the companion of the other, still, from the appearance of the anchor, the certainty of a vessel not having been lost there for the last hundred years at least, and also from the popular tradition, which proved true in the one instance, and consequently is deserving of belief in the other, there is scarcely room for scepticism as to its identity.

Such discoveries as these, which are so interwoven with the naval stories of England, surely ought not to be passed over in silence, nor allowed to sink unnoticed into oblivion; it is but right, at least, that the public should be made acquainted with their existence, and then be allowed to place what importance they choose upon them.

RICHARD HEARD,
Inspecting Coast Officer, Coast Guard.

June 12th, 1852.

PATENT SELF-ACTING SAFETY-PILL.—A model of this ingenious invention was exhibited at the Earl of Rosse's conversazione, on Saturday evening last, and excited much interest. The self-acting safety-plug for ships' boats, river barges, lighters, &c., invented by Mr. Lisabe, consists of a hollow brass box, with perforations at the top and bottom, let into one of the lower planks of a boat or boat like, in the interior as a bottom ball, with easiest room for play, so that when the boat is immersed the pressure of the external water urges and retains the ball lightly against an india-rubber seating at the top, thereby effectually excluding the upper perforations and the admission of water; while, on the boat being suspended, the ball, by its own gravity, rests upon the bottom of the chamber, and allows any rain or other water which may accumulate in the boat while in suspension to drain out through the upper perforations Provision is also made for the retention of water in boats when in the davits, as often such is rendered necessary, by the addition of a "turn-table" at the top, which, being turned round, closes the upper perforations, and retains the water in the boat. The object of this simple but important invention is to guard against the frequent casualties which occur when, in cases of shipwreck, or vessels striking on rocks, the ships' boats are suddenly lowered into the water to afford means of escape to the passengers and crew; but in too many instances the boats become immediately filled, and swamp, owing to the neglect or forgetfulness of stopping the plug-holes which all boats have in their bottoms for their drainage, while suspended along the ship's side. The patent accomplishes this important result with unerring certainty, and by its self-acting principle requires no attention; and, while it answers the object of drainage on the old method of plug-holes when in suspension, the act of immersion instantaneously closes the orifice by the pressure of the external water against the ball. The frightful sacrifice of life which took place in the loss of the Superb steamer on the coast of Jersey last September, by the swamping of the boats from the plug-holes not having been stopped, must be fresh in the minds of our readers; and it was on perusing the account of this melancholy catastrophe, that Mr. Lisabe, a gent eman long engaged in yachting amusements on the western coast, sat down, and, before he retired to rest, designed this useful invention. It has since been registered by Lieutenant Robinson, of the R.N., well known for many nautical inventions, and has been patented by Mr. Gray for the india-rubber seating for the ball. The patent plug is also of materials benefit in its application to river barges and lighters, saving all the manual labour of pumping them out, as it allows all rain and leakage water to drain off when the barges and lighters are left on the banks by the ebb of the tide. At the conversazione, also, was shown, and examined with much interest, Mr. Lundell's safety-boat, engraved in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for January 24.

NEW ELECTRIC PHENOMENON.—(To the Editor.)—I very recently witnessed, at Mr. E. Dorgan's, manufacturer of chocolate and cocoa, a new element, composed of coffee and chocolate), a most curious fact. In taking out the cho'ca paste from the tin moulds, cold and hard, it manifested an electric appearance, from which sparks were visible. Until now I could not account for the phenomenon, unless it is admitted that the cho'ca contains also electric properties, the same as in resinous or vitreous substances; but in this case there had been no friction to develope the electricity, and the moulds in which the paste had been standing for 24 hours communicated with the earth, which might facilitate the reconstitution. The cho'ca tablet has such a powerful attraction that it holds the tinfoil which serves to envelope it suspended for more that ten minutes. The tinfoil is 90 square inches in surface. I have just constructed a cho'ca electrophore, and after a friction I obtain about twenty electric sparks successively.—I remain &c., LE MOUT.—5, Bentinck-street.

ELECTRIC CLOCKS.—ALEXANDER BAIN, the Patentee, begs respectfully to intimate that his SHOW-ROOMS No 43, Old Bond-street, are NOW OPENED to the public, and that an extensive assortment of Clocks is there on exhibition, from, the simplest to the most complicated. This can be seen in motion there. Several years have been spent in maturing this invention, which is now presented in nearly a perfect state.—The time these c ocks keep is very accurate, in one instance, for eighteen months consecutively, with the loss of only one minute; and in others with a variation little exceeding a minute. Their construct on is so simple that they are not liable to derangement. Once set in motion and regulated (which may be done by any clockmaker), their accuracy of daily speaking is perpetual, requiring neither winding up, nor attendance of any kind. Clocks from one year to another The electricity required is obtained from two metallic plates sunk a few feet in the ge und, and conveyed from thence by two common wires This can be seen there especially adapted for churches, where attendance is troublesome, from the circumstance of the invention being to make one parent clock work others. However remote, regularity in a household or neighbourhood is secured, by having various clocks; all indicating the same time throughout. The price is rather under that of other clocks, from the less machinery required, and an inspection of this fresh and striking application of electricity to a practical purpose, by which the public are thus invited will, it is believed, be found interesting as well as satisfactory —47, Old Bond-street, May 14, 1852.

EXHIBITION OF THE NEW SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

THE LOST LENORE. BY E. H. WEHNERT.

MR. WEHNERT in this picture, which is exhibited at the New Water-Colour Gallery, seeks to embody the sentiment of Poe's striking little poetic romance entitled "The Raven;" a romance strangely so entitled, certainly, as it gives no hint of the wild pathos which engrosses the poet's fancy. In order to the due appreciation of the picture, therefore, it will be advisable to read the whole poem, which we accordingly append:—

Once upon a midnight dreary, while I pondered, weak and weary,
Over many a quaint and curious volume of forgotten lore—
While I nodded, nearly napping, suddenly there came a tapping,
As of some one gently rapping, rapping at my chamber door;
"'Tis some visitor," I muttered, "tapping at my chamber door—
Only this, and nothing more."

Ah! distinctly I remember it was in the bleak December,
And each separate dying ember wrought its ghost upon the floor.
Eagerly I wished the morrow; vainly I had sought to borrow
From my books surcease of sorrow—sorrow for the lost Lenore—
For the rare and radiant name whom the angels name Lenore—
Nameless here for evermore.

And the silken sad uncertain rustling of each purple curtain
Thrilled me—filled me with fantastic terrors never felt before;
So that now, to still the beating of my heart, I stood repeating—
"'Tis some visitor entreating entrance at my chamber door:
Some late visitor entreating entrance at my chamber door,
This it is, and nothing more."

Presently my soul grew stronger; hesitating then no longer,
"Sir," said I, "or madam, truly your forgiveness I implore;
But the fact is I was napping, and so gently you came rapping,
And so faintly you came tapping, tapping at my chamber door,
That I scarce was sure I heard you"—here I opened wide the door:—
Darkness there, and nothing more.

Deep into that darkness peering, long I stood there, wondering, fearing,
Doubting, dreaming dreams no mortals ever dared to dream before;
But the silence was unbroken, and the stillness gave no token,
And the only word there spoken was the whispered word "Lenore!"
This I whispered, and an echo murmured back the word "Lenore!"—
Merely this, and nothing more.

Back into the chamber turning, all my soul within me burning,
Soon again I heard a tapping something louder than before.
"Surely," said I, "surely that is something at my window lattice;
Let me see, then, what thereat is, and this mystery explore—
Let my heart be still a moment, and this mystery explore:—
'Tis the wind, and nothing more."

Open here I flung the shutter, when, with many a flirt and flutter,
In there stepped a stately Raven of the saintly days of yore.
Not the least obeisance made he; not a minute stopped or stayed he;
But, with mien of lord or lady, perched above my chamber door—
Perched upon a bust of Pallas, just above my chamber door—
Perched and sat, and nothing more.

Then this ebony bird beguiling my sad fancy into smiling,
By the grave and stern decorum of the countenance it wore,
"Though thy crest be shorn and shaven, thou," I said, "art sure no craven,
Ghastly, grim, and ancient Raven wandering from the nightly shore—
Tell me what thy lordly name is on the night's Plutonian shore?"
Quoth the Raven, "Nevermore."

Much I marvelled this ungainly fowl to hear discourse so plainly,
Though its answer little meaning, little relevancy bore;
For we cannot help agreeing that no living human being
Ever yet was blessed with seeing bird above his chamber door,
Bird or beast upon the sculptured bust above his chamber door
With such name as "Nevermore."

But the Raven, sitting lonely on that placid bust, spoke only
That one word, as if his soul in that one word he did outpour.
Nothing further then he uttered; not a feather then he fluttered—
Till I scarcely more than muttered, "Other friends have flown before—
On the morrow he will leave me, as my hopes have flown before."
Then the bird said, "Never more."

Startled at the stillness broken by reply so aptly spoken,
"Doubtless," said I, "what it utters is its only stock and store,
Caught from some unhappy master, whom unmerciful disaster
Followed fast and followed faster, till his songs one burden bore—
Till the dirges of his hope that melancholy burden bore,
Of 'Never—never more.'"

But the Raven still beguiling all my sad soul into smiling,
Straight I wheeled a cushioned seat in front of bird and bust and door;
Then, upon the velvet sinking, I betook myself to linking Fancy unto fancy, thinking what this ominous bird of yore—
What this grim, ungainly, ghastly, gaunt, and ominous bird of yore
Meant in croaking "Never more."

This I sat engaged in guessing, but no syllable expressing
To the fowl whose fiery eyes now burned into my bosom's core;
This and more I sat divining, with my head at ease reclining
On the cushion's velvet lining that the lamp-light gloated o'er,
But whose velvet violet lining with the lamp-light gloating o'er
She shall press, ah, never more!

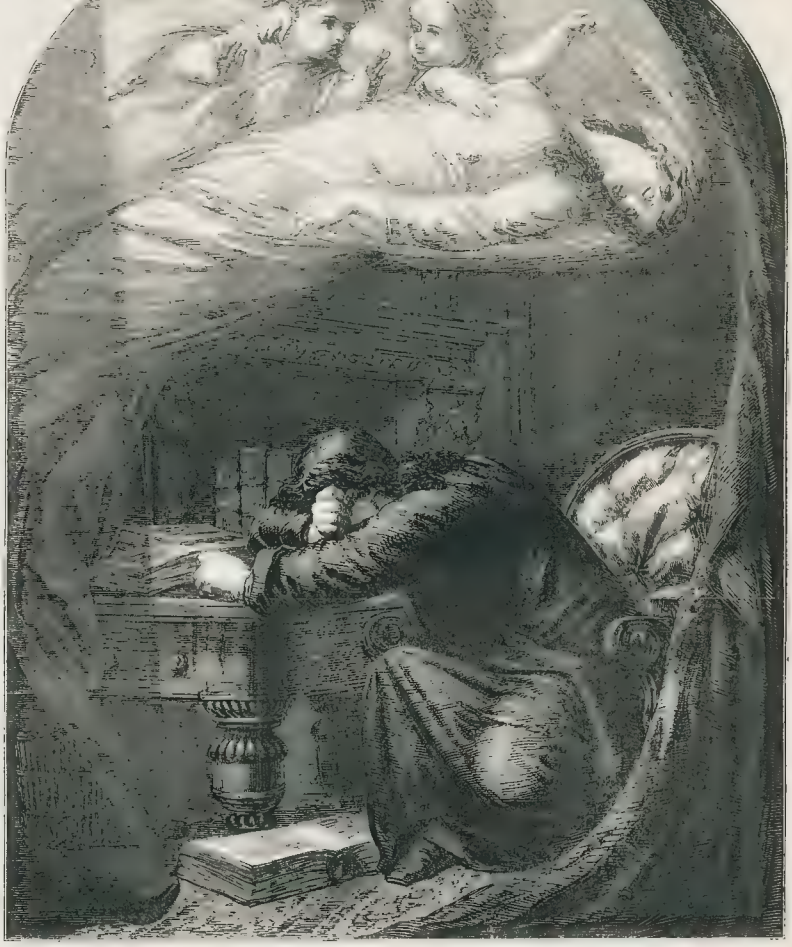
Then, methought the air grew denser, perfumed from an unseen censer
Swung by seraphim, whose foot-falls tinkled on the tufted floor.
"Wretch!" I cried, "thy god hath lent thee—by these angels he hath sent thee
Respite—respite and nepenthe from thy memories of Lenore!
Quaff, oh quaff this kind nepenthe, and forget this lost Lenore!"
Quoth the Raven, "Never more!"

"Prophet!" said I, "thing of evil!—prophet still, if bird or devil!
Whether tempter sent, or whether tempest tossed thee here ashore,
Desolate, yet all undaunted, on this desert land enchanted—
On this home by horror haunted—tell me truly, I implore—
Is there—is there balm in Gilead?—tell me—tell me, I implore!"
Quoth the Raven "Never more."

"Prophet!" said I, "thing of evil—prophet still, if bird or devil!
By that heaven that bends above us—by that God we both adore—
Tell this soul with sorrow laden if, within the distant Aidenn,
It shall clasp a sainted maiden, whom the angels name Lenore—
Clasp a rare and radiant maiden, whom the angels name Lenore?"
Quoth the Raven, "Never more."

"Be that word our sign of parting, bird or fiend!" I shrieked, upstarting—
"Get thee back into the tempest and the night's Plutonian shore!
Leave no black plume as a token of that lie thy soul hath spoken!
Leave my loneliness unbroken!—quit the bust above my door!
Take thy beak from out my heart, and take thy form from off my door!"
Quoth the Raven, "Never more."

And the Raven never flitting, still is sitting, still is sitting,
On the pallid bust of Pallas, just above my chamber door;
And his eyes have all the seeming of a demon's that is dreaming,
And the lamp-light o'er him streaming, throws his shadow on the floor;
And my soul, from out that shadow that lies floating on the floor
Shall be lifted—never more!



"LOST LENORE."—('THE RAVEN," BY E. A. POE.)—PAINTED BY E. H. WEHNERT.—EXHIBITION OF THE NEW SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS

THE RIGHT HON. WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE, M.P. FOR OXFORD UNIVERSITY.

THE subject of our Memoir, fourth and youngest son of Sir John Gladstone, Bart., a Liverpool merchant, was born at Liverpool, December 29th, 1809. In 1821 he was sent to Eton; in 1829 entered Christchurch, Oxford; and at Christmas, 1839, was made a student by the Dean at the same time with Lord Canning.

Amongst his University contemporaries were the Duke of Newcastle, Mr. Sidney Herbert, Lord Elgin, Lord Dalhousie, Lord Harris, and others since distinguished. In 1831 he took a double first class and his degree of B.A. In 1832 he went abroad, and spent some months in travelling, chiefly in Italy; and at the Reform election in the December of that year came forward for the borough of Newark as a Conservative, was opposed by Mr. Serjeant Wilde, now Lord Truro, and Mr. Hanley, and was returned at the head of the poll; the numbers being—Gladstone 886, Hanley 819, Wilde 736

Mr. Gladstone made his first speech in the House on Monday, June 3rd, 1833, in the debate on the subject of Negro Emancipation, in reply to Lord Howick, the present Earl Grey, and in which, denying the charge that increased quantities of sugar were obtained by such excess of working as increased the mortality amongst the slaves, he argued the right to compensation for the planters on the ground that the Legislature had done all in its power to make the slaves a property, but declared that it would redound to the honour of the nation and the reputation of the Ministers, whilst it would be delightful to the planters themselves, if emancipation, relieving them from the responsibility of holding slaves, were fairly and without violence established.

In the same session he spoke in the great Liverpool election case, on the Irish Church Temporalities Bill, in which, admitting that the Church had slumbered, he declared that since the Union it had done all that human power could do; that it was a great advantage to the country to have scattered over it a number of men who were gentlemen by education, and Christians by profession. He was unwilling to see the number of bishops reduced; held, that, so long as a Church was national, the nation ought to be taxed to support it; that, if the Protestant churches were to be maintained in Ireland, the maxim should be enforced. He spoke also in opposition to the proposal of Mr. George Wood, then member for Manchester, for the admission of Dissenters to the Universities.

In 1834, on Sir Robert Peel's short accession to office, Mr. Gladstone was appointed one of the Lords of the Treasury, and very shortly afterwards, on the failure of Mr. Stuart Wortley to obtain a seat, was in his room made Under-secretary for the Colonies

In the adjourned debate, March 31, 1835, Mr. Gladstone spoke in opposition to Lord John Russell's appropriation clause, arguing that there could exist no surplus revenue above what was necessary for the due maintenance of the Church; that Church property was as sacred as that of individuals. At the Reformation the established religion being changed, the appropriation of the Church property was also changed; and if a time should ever come when in Parliament the Protestant should be in a minority, he avowed his conviction that a return to the ancient appropriation would be the fair and legitimate consequence. Defeated in a division on the question on the 7th of April, the Ministry resigned on the 8th, and the Melbourne administration was formed.

Out of office Mr. Gladstone devoted himself to questions of education and colonial policy, the Church, Universities, and trade, to the untrammelling, of which he had not yet become a convert.

In 1837 he gave his support to Mr. Serjeant Talfourd's bill for the extension of the term of copyright. In 1838, published at Amiens, a pamphlet, entitled "The State in its relations with the Church;" and in the same year again visited Italy and Germany. During this period Mr. Gladstone did not confine himself to his Parliamentary duties, but was also a diligent contributor to periodicals: he published, chiefly anonymously, several political pamphlets, and a review in the Quarterly of the life of Bianco White, which deserves mention not alone for its clear and powerful portraiture of the doubts, changes and struggles of the ever-labouring mind of Bianco White, but for its perfect freedom from the narrowness of sectarian bigotry, and its sympathy with a mind made the incessant battle-ground between old faith and new reasoning.

On the return of Sir Robert Peel to office after the general election of 1841, Mr Gladstone became Master of the Mint, and Vice-President of the Board of Trade, and was sworn in a member of the Privy Council. In May, 1847, he succeeded Lord Ripon as President, and had a seat in the Cabinet. At this period Mr Gladstone's office was no sinecure. Never was a Ministry placed in more trying circumstances: commerce and manufactures seemed fast drawing toward a general stoppage: distress and discontent were spreading fast: the agitation for Free Trade gathering daily strength, and the Parliament, and the Ministry looked to at any cost to withstand the popular pressure. The reform of the tariff made this all the more difficult, as it lent power to the arguments on the popular side, and left to the President of the Board of Trade but the defence of manifest inconsistencies. How ready Mr. Gladstone was to give up the old system of monopolies, was evidenced in an able pamphlet published by him in 1844, entitled "The Ministry and the Sugar Duties," in which the whole force of fact and argument was in favour of the immediate abolition of differential duties; and an article, published about the same time in the Colonial and Foreign Quarterly, and since known to be from his pen, argued, from the fruits of changes then recently made in commercial policy, the safety of still wider change, and was a source not only of strength in arguments, but encouragement in agitation and consistent adherence to their whole care to the Free Trade party.

In the same year Mr. Gladstone took an active part in promoting the Dissenters' Chapel Bill.

In February, 1845, he resigned office; and in a speech in the course of the debate on the Address, explained that he did so from conscientious conviction that he could not, consistently with the opinions he had deliberately published in 1838, on the State relations with the Church; and which pamphlet had, in a second edition in 1841, been carefully reconsidered or well nigh re-written, to support the grant proposed by the Government to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth. Though no longer a member of the Cabinet, Mr. Gladstone was, nevertheless, consulted and very actively engaged upon the commercial measures of that year, and which constituted the second reform in the tariff. At the close of the session of 1845 Mr. Gladstone visited Germany, and did not return until the following November. He was, therefore, not present during the early period of the Repeal of the Corn Laws.

In December Lord Stanley resigned office, and Mr. Gladstone, in his room, became Secretary of State for the Colonies. He then still represented the borough of Newark, but felt it incumbent upon him to resign, in consequence of the strong opposition of the Duke of Newcastle, to whom the borough belonged, to the Free-trade measures of the Ministry, and he remained out of Parliament, until the general election of 1847. He was then invited to become a candidate for the University of Oxford, with Sir Robert Harry Inglis, and was opposed by Mr. Round, who had been one of the members for Essex. The contest was a severe one: the interest of religion, the party shibboleth being roused to the support of Mr. Round as the true Protestant candidate, against Mr. Gladstone, who was assumed to have some improved and unestablishable leaning towards something like Puseyism. He was, however, returned; the numbers being—Inglis, 1769; Gladstone, 997; Round, 824. In 1845 Mr. Gladstone published a pamphlet entitled "Remarks on recent Commercial Legislation," which, reviewing the Board of Trade and revenue returns, pointed out, that from the reduction of duties had resulted increase of revenue, large diminution of protection increase of commerce and domestic prosperity. The subsequent Free-trade measures of Sir Robert Peel had, throughout, Mr. Gladstone's most cordial support. He was a complete convert, not merely to the arguments of the opposite side, but to the facts which had sprung up as fruits of his earlier partial and cautious policy.

On the repeal of the Navigation Laws, he proposed as an amendment a system of reciprocity, but withdrew it on finding that the shipowners' friends must either have all or nothing.

In 1849 he opposed the gift of Vancouver's Island to the Hudson's Bay Company; and proposed amendments in the Australian Constitution Bill, mostly in accordance with the proposals of Sir William Molesworth

He spoke in opposition to the Government on the famous foreign policy debate of last year, and opposed the University Commissions. The session over, in the following October the health of one of his children needing change of climate, Mr. Gladstone went to Naples. He had no intention of making any public comment on the condition of the kingdom, but found silence impossible. He was horror-struck by the violation of all honour, all good faith, all common rules of justice and humanity, by the King, and the gross perjury and corruption and subornation of his Attorney-General and judges. He could not have believed that, in the present age, such infamy and cruelty—to use his own words, such "practical abnegation of Christianity"—could have had existence; but having had the facts forced upon him, seeing everywhere paid and perjured inquisitors—seeing the daily bounding down of innocent men by the hired bloodsellers of the crown—finding the prisons places of loathsome torture and slow death it was impossible for him to keep silence, and in two letters to Lord Aberdeen he exposed in all the nakedness of his iniquities his Majesty of Naples. The letters were sent by Lord Palmerston to our ministers at the several foreign courts, and their publication has, at all events, set the King upon some attempt at defence, and some little amendment of the prisons.

Last year, Mr. Gladstone published, in 2 vols. oct., "Farini's History of the Roman States."

The right hon. member married, in 1839, Catherine, eldest daughter of the late Sir Stephen Richard Glynne, Bart., of Haymcarden Castle, Kent.

THE RAILWAY NOTE-BOOK;

OR,

JOTTINGS IN THE STATION, THE TERMINUS, AND THE TRAIN.

BY ANGUS B. REACH.

PAGE V.

THERE is one more species of railway passenger to be occasionally met with in the train, and whose sentiments and character are not unfrequently set forth in such publications as profess to laud and admire the good old times, whom we propose to sketch with some minuteness, seeing that in the controversies to which he frequently gives rise, is summed up the whole pith and marrow of the question as between the ancient and the modern usages of travel. Need we say that we refer to the lover of the "good old coaching days?"

He is to be seen in many shapes. Sometimes he is a farmer, with a white top-coat and round-toed boots bearing evident marks of the stable, and who, when you remark that it is a fine day, replies, "Ees, sur." Sometimes he is a town-made young gentleman, of that order of nature's nobility popularly called "swells." In that case he has short-cropped hair, wears round his neck what he calls a bird's-eye choker, fastened with a brooch or pin the major part of which consists of a miniature horse-shoe. His top-coat he calls a "down-the-road:" it has pearl buttons as big as crown pieces, with a mail-coach driving across one, and a gentleman breaking his horse's neck over a hedge emblazoned upon another. About town you find this species of animal attending sparring matches, and critical in his remarks on the "Young un's" style of handling his "daddles;" or he frequents betting-list-offices, and talks about somebody's "stable" and somebody else's "lot." Sporting public-houses are, however, the grand resort of this enlightened admirer of what he calls the "holden time." Visit, if you have the courage, one of those smoke-dried old parlours, with Windsor chairs polished by generations of sitters, and the wainscoated walls hung round with mementoes of "good old English manly sports"—stuffed terriers who, living, have scrunched the necks of fifty rats in half-a-minute; scarred and bitten badgers, who have made valiant defences at celebrated "drawings," and correct portraits of the famous light weight "Apple-daddy," or that renowned "fistic champion" Mumbo Sam. Among these precious trophies you will find specimens of the style of art which our friend of the "holden time" particularly affectionates—a series of coaching pictures. Let us glance at them. First we have an elaborate representation of the Bath mail, or the Liverpool mail, passing some celebrated "hostelry:" all, of course, of the "holden time:" the four horses at a stiff, uncommonly stiff, gallop, with all their wooden-like legs together, and the wheels painted so as to make the artistic frequenters of the parlour actually think they are going round On the panels are legibly inscribed Bath or Liverpool—a great stroke of art; and through the window you can just distinguish a lady's bonnet The outside is crowded, and all the passengers are smoking cigars. The driver flourishes his whip with Jovian majesty, and the guard erect behind accompanies him with a corresponding series of flourishes upon a magnificent key bugle. The gentleman on the box seat is generally in a sort of military undress, and those behind sport alternately travelling caps and hats, much broader at the crown than the rim. A lady or two, with bonnets of the coal-scuttle fashion, and waists at their arm-pits—both good old stages of the good old time—make up the company. "Aha," says our friend, giving the cartoon feelingly, "them was the days for travelling, and no mistake." A great number of episodes of coach journeyings are introduced "Pulling up to unskid" is usually one of the interesting processes represented. "Waking up" is another, though who wakes up—the passengers, or the horses, or the driver, or the guard—we have never been able to make out. The "Road and the Rail" is a third favourite subject. It re resents a stage-coach bowling along at a gallop, while at a little distance is seen a locomotive tumbling over an embankment, and dragging half a dozen topsy-turvey carriages after it, to the dismay of the gramin.vorous animals in the field, but to the intense gratification of the lover of the "holden times," who chuckles and contemptuously repeats a joke of the ancient Mr. Weller—"If a coach is upset, you see, vy there you are; but if a locomotive busts, vy vere are ye?"

In the railway carriage the admirer of the good old coaching days generally takes care to make his peculiarities known. When the engine is put to, and you begin to move, he remarks—"Ah! we should not have all that there grunning and screeching if we was sitting like Chrysty-ans behind four thoroughbred 'uns, instead o' that 'ere iron machine. What I say is, that it isn't natural, is this here railroad; and that stands to reason, or the devil's in it.'

Presently emerging into the country, you catch a glimpse of a broad white road, running, perhaps, along the line of rail. It is all but deserted. Now and then you perceive trotting along a farmer's tax cart, with the name of the owner in white narrow letters behind, or the doctor's gig, or the parson's sober phaëton, or the ricketty old carriage of some neighbouring "family." Our friend at once takes up the theme.

"See that road. Aint it a shame to look upon? I should say so. I remember the time, I do, when six-and fifty four-'oss drags passed the milestones of that ere road, regular up and down, every four-and-twenty hours. Ah! them were the days! Travelling was travelling, when you sit behind four regular good uns, with sitch a coachman as Downy Bill or Jemmy Sparrow to tool you along, a-smoking your cigar as comfortable as nothink at all, and pulling up at the jolly old public-houses just to wet your whistle with a pint of right old stale. What I say is—and it stands to reason—that Parliament should put down all them new-fangled railways out o' hand, and set up the old coaches. What right had any man to ruin the people that lived on the old coaches and the old roads? I say it doesn't stand to reason. Confound the Downy Bill hisself. Don't I remember him in his white 'at and spicy top-coat, out as smart as one o'clock, with boucky in the button, and his white cords and riglar knowin' tops, as affable and perlite with the gentlem'n, as he tooled down as nothink at all; smoking cigars and drinking brandy and water with 'em till all was blue. Well, then, blowed if I didn't see Downy Bill hisself yesterday in Oxford-street, a-driving on a penny 'bus, with a visp o' straw round a shocking bad 'at."

Occasionally, on railways and in society, but more frequently in books, you listen to the sentiments of a more refined lover of the olden times of a gentleman and a scholar somehow affected with that moral squint which makes people look round the corners of centuries, and ogle lovingly that which has passed irretrievably away. Often the sentiment is pressed as much in joke as earnest; yet there is a certain sympathy with, and yearning after, the bygone days, which shines out through the half-flippant, half-sneering style.

Your modern, what good are they? They take people a mile a minute. Well, I didn't want to go a mile a minute: a Manchester bagman may; but are the gentlemen of England to give in to Manchester bagmen? Then, there's no comfort in a railway; you can see nothing but the blackness of tunnels, and the prim monotony of stations; you can hear nothing but the clank and the scream of the confounded locomotive. All the time you're not in a tunnel you're in a cutting. You are half choked with the beast.y vapours of the engine; and if you put your head out you draw it back again, with your eyes stuffed full of burning cinders. Formerly, what a was on the top of the old stage, on a bright summer's morning, with everything fresh and green and glorious about you, with no tunnels but the deep hawthorn-shaded lanes, and no cuttings but between the grand old stems and the glorious branches of the oak and elm hung over the road. Then, when you minded over the rough stones of the country town, and watched the people running to the windows and coming out of shops, and passed a fine old church or a quaint town-hall in the market-place, and saw the "change" standing before the hotel door—four thoroughbreds, with coats like velvet, and a helper at the head of each better than a station that! Well, then there was just the momentary scramble into the hotel, to the tidy little bar—to "stretch your legs," of course and then up again. The helpers are hanging to the heads of the fresh team, hardly able to curb them, while the steady driver gathers up the reins. "Let go their heads!" A plunge, a jump, a scramble or two, and away you are again, careering across the fresh green country.

This is the style in which the thing is done, and, to a certain extent, there is some truth in it. Thirty miles, say, outside a well-appointed stage in summer weather, through a pleasant country, is as agreeable as you please; but what of three hundred? Aching bones, torpid feet, shivering frame, cramped limbs, answer. Baked with the sun, nipped by the wind, flooded by the rain, frostbited by the frost. On the pleasures of a long, a three or four days' journey in the good old times, "tooled behind four thoroughbred 'uns" In all the descriptions of the beauties of stage-coach travelling, it is universally taken for granted that the country traversed is a sort of garden of Eden—a repository of all that is lovely in landscape; that the season is always early summer or early autumn; that the sky is always blue and the sun! ght always steady; that the horses are always spanking ones, or "thorough-bred prads; and that the driver is always either an elder Mr. Weller, or a reduced baronet who has lost £20,000 a year on the turf, and doesn't take any sliver under half-a-crown, for which he also makes it a rule not to touch his hat. Very different was in many cases the real prosaic state of the case. You were slowly dragged across a drear and dismal country. You climbed hills at a snail's pace, and were frequently obliged to get down and trudge in the mud. An easterly gale, the very breath of winter, whistled through and through you; or a storm of rain and sleet pelted you unmercifully for many a weary mile. Who does not remember the miserable discomfort of getting gradually soaking wet upon the outside of a coach? the long struggle to make your own umbrella avail.able, and to keep that of your neighbour from dripping down your back, the gradual success of the latter, and the gradual saturated coat after—food you felt as if you had a mass of cold comforters armour-clinging to your shivering frame; next, perhaps, the agonising horror of a small river or water winch had been long collecting in the broad brim of your wideawake hat behind, overflowing its banks and pouring down your neck, or of the appearance of another unexpected stream meandering across the seat, just at the place where you are writhing upon it. Who does not recollect the cold torpor of misery and discomfort into which you gradually fell, afraid to move hand or foot in case of bringing new wet surfaces in contact with your poor shrinking skin. What do you care, then, for tits and thorough-breds, for knowing hats and wonderful tops? How you long for even the third-class upon a comfortable railway, for warmth and shelter, let the seats be never so hard, and the compartment never so crowded. Then, when you get out, wretched, weary, and spiritless, to a coaching meal—when you require to be at once warmed and tittivated by something hot and tasty, some rich well-spiced soup, or some smoking stew or made dish—to find yourself opposite a huge handsome joint of meat, with a mould of black currant tart in perspective, and hard, sour, swipey ale, or hot fiery sherry, an ounce of cayenne to a bottle, with which to wash the junk down!

Let us rejoice and be glad, therefore, that the tits and the prads have had their day, that the jingling of harness and tooling of drags are now confined to cabmen, omnibus drivers, and members of the four-in hand club. The rail, let us acknowledge, is not only more speedy, more certain, more comfortable, but it is even more picturesque and more interesting than all the faded glories of the coaching road. Stand on a station platform, and watch the night express go past, with a roar and a steam and a snaking of all around, as though a thunderbolt had passed before you or eyes. Wonder that, we should think, than even the craziest night coach, with the two brightest of lamps and the four spankingest of steeds! It is said that you cannot see the country from the rail. We deny it Look at the multitudinous sweet glimpses we catch as we hurry by—pasture fields where grazing cows do not raise their heads, yellow corn land with lines of reapers, comfortable homesteads with sheltering trees, and rooks clustered on the highest branches, chattering about the farmer's crop; deep, pleasant lanes, with rustic wains and rough country gigs jogging along the ruts; glimpses of canals winding amid the greenery, with barges slowly gliding along the silent highway where for days that hundreds of thousands of such charming country bits may not be seen from behind the locomotive as well as from behind the twitching tails of the panting "prads" And the advantages of the railroad are, that you are not kept too long over any one prospect—that you never suppose you spellbound by a particular hill, or a particular church tower, which you seem never to be able to leave behind you. You see and pass, and see again; and the black jots of tunnels, and the dips into green-sided cuttings, give you only a keener appetite upon emerging again into the breezy champaign.

Do we need say a word about that grand thing familiarly spoken of as "railway speed?" The honest penny-a-liner grumbles now-a days at a pace which the crackest turn-out of the old times never dreamt of. "Only thirty miles an hour!" is as common a phrase as any you hear upon a railway—"Only thirty miles!" But with the engine at the top of its mettle, the road clear for scores and scores of miles before you, the policemen standing statue-like with outstretched arms to inform the driver of the fact when the glorious express, then shooting along as though no mortal power could stay or stop it, achieving without rock, without jolt, its steady mile a minute, devouring space and drinking time, whirls you from county to county and devouring sea to sea, as though sprites were harnessed to your elbow chair—such is the poetry, the full triumph and glory of the rail, the greatest conquest ever made by man over earth, air, fire, and water!

PRICES FORMERLY AND NOW.—SUGAR.

CHEMISTRY has taught us that sugar is a constituent element of almost all vegetables. By experience we had previously learnt that sweetness is a product in almost every soil and climate, though some places are particularly favourable to the production of sugar. For a substance universally diffused, the taste is universal. The bee extracts it from flowers; the parroquet taps the maple to drink its sweets; the fly sucks it from the Turkey fig; the wasp for it rifles our ripest fruits; the youngest infant, deprived of its mother, is kept alive and made strong by sugar; the boy delights in sweets; and the man rarely loses altogether his love for them. The taste is not artificial; it is implanted in man by the same hand that scatters profusely through creation the means of gratification.

The sugar in daily use is the product of art, manufactured from the juice of the sugar-cane, called by botanists Arundo saccharifera; and the white sparkling crystallised substance we put in our tea has the same relation to the appetite for sweets, as the finest bread or the most delicate entremet has to the appetite for food, which, before art improved taste, was satisfied by the coarsest roots, and by flesh ruddy, quivering, and alive. Refined sugar was first manufactured in Venice—it has been said, about the end of the fifteenth century; but Macpherson, in his "Annals of Commerce," quotes some Scottish records to show that it was known in the fourteenth century. The sugar previously in use was the brown or white soft sugar and sugar-candy, which seems to have been the most common in the time of the Romans. In some form, however, it was known long before. It is ment oned in the Old Testament, both by Jeremiah and Isaiah, and is supposed, under the name of sweet calamus, to have formed one of the costly rarities used in the religious ceremonies prescribed by Moses. But as the sugar cane, according to the current historical statement, was first made known in Greece and Palestine by the expedition of Alexander to India, it is considered that the people of Judea obtained it, as they obtained myrrh and cinnamon in the biblical times, from India, and that the sweet calamus was sugar-candy. In India and in China sugar and sugar-candy have been manufactured from the most remote antiquity; and the rare traffic that carried spices to the Jews, carried to them the hard crystallised and easily transported candy.

Of the price of sugar at that period we have no information; but its price in China, when that country became familiarly known to the nations of the west of Europe, was ascertained to be about 8s. per cwt. In various parts of India it is made for less than 2d. per lb.; and there is reason to believe that this price, like many other things in that country, has been nearly stationary for ages. One of the earliest accounts of its price in Europe is from the year 1319, when some refined sugar was purchased for the Royal household of Scotland at more than an ounce of standard silver per pound: that which is now purchased for 6d. then cost more than 5s. Sugar, however, being obtained from trees and plants widely diffused, and being easily extracted, its price has not undergone, within the time that prices have been recorded, such large reductions as the price of tea. A considerable proportion of the 5s. paid in 1319 for a pound in Scotland must have gone to pay the expense of transporting it from the place of its growth; and to this day a large portion of its price in England is the cost of bringing it from the tropical countries where it is made. Thus, at the present time, Havannah sugar, which costs there free on board about 18s., costs at the docks in London about 29s., or about one-third is added for bringing it to this country. This charge, too, has lately, in consequence of the repeal of the Navigation Laws and other circumstances lowering the rate of freight, been reduced, and in 1832 it was 2s. more. Sugar is a bulky article, which is subject to leakage and waste, and is thus much more expensive to transport than many other articles.

In 1782 Mr. Tucke begins his records of prices; and the average price of Muscovado sugar in the five years, 1782-1786, was, in bond, 40s. 2½d. per cwt.; now it is about 18s. 6d. There have in the interval been great variations in the price, between 97s. and 23s., the consequence of varying crops in a narrow space, and of changes in the duties which have interfered with consumption and price. Gradually, however, our market, which was formerly shut by a close monopoly almost all but British West India sugar, has been opened to sugar from the East Indies, the Mauritius, Manilla, Java, and now Brazils, Havanna, and all other countries. The field of supply, therefore, has become more extended, and prices have generated to odd, now 2s. Great improvements in the cultivation of the cane, and in the manufacture of sugar, have latterly been effected: more are in progress; and it seems highly probable, independently of all changes in the value of money, that the price of sugar will fall lower, and keep tolerably steady at about 20s per cwt. in our market.

As of tea, there are many varieties of sugar; and the following extract of a mercantile circular states them, and the different countries whence the supply comes, as well as the wholesale price in January of the present year, duty paid, which is 10s. on British Colonial, and 11s. 6d. on foreign sugar:—

After the introduction of the sugar-cane into Europe by Alexander's soldiers, it found its way from Tyre to Sicily, which long continued to be a chief source of supply; but, about the beginning of the eighteenth century, the sugar of Sicily was superseded by the sugar of the West Indies, and Sicily itself has since been supplied from that source. It was not till after the discovery of America, whither cane was carried from Madeira, and where they appear also to have been indigenous, that sugar became abundant and in general use in Europe. The Portuguese and Spaniards were both acquainted with the cultivation of the cane, and they began the manufacture of sugar in the Brazils and in St. Domingo. It was thence spread over all the West India islands as they were occupied by Europeans. From that time the cultivation of the cane, the manufacture of sugar, and its importation into Europe from the West and East Indies and from South America, have continually increased, and sugar is now a general article of consumption—allowed in the diet of paupers and sailors—throughout the civilised world. In 1700 the quantity consumed in Great Britain and Ireland was about 500,000 cwt. Last year, including molasses, it was not less than 6,851,633 cwt., a thirty-fourfold increase. Taking the whole population, it was nearly 28 lb. per head. In 1832 the consumption in Great Britain alone was put down by Mr. M'Culloch at 23 lb.; and as our estimate includes Ireland, where the consumption is notoriously small, we may infer that it has increased in Great Britain since 1832 at least 5 lb. per head. As the allowance to servants is from ¾ lb. to 1 lb. per week, it may be assumed that 50 lb. a year, at least, is not too much for grown persons. In sugar-growing countries the quantity consumed is enormous. The labourers live on it in the manufacturing season; and a Duke of Beaufort, who died about 1720, consumed one pound daily for forty years, and enjoyed excellent health till he was seventy years of age. The consumption of sugar has increased very much as it has become cheap, and we may expect, therefore, that the consumption will extend hereafter more rapidly than ever. The whole quantity consumed in Europe last year, including beet-root sugar, was not less than 16,000,000 cwt. If peace be preserved and prosperity continue, the market for sugar will extend amazingly, and force the cultivation by free men of all tropical countries.

The great impediments to the increased consumption have been fiscal, not natural. For upwards of a century and a half, sugar has been subjected to duties increasing from 3s. 5d. per cwt. in 1700, to 30s. in 1806, for British sugar, while the duty on foreign sugar was no less than 63s. These exorbitant duties have been successively reduced; and at present the duty on Muscovado sugar, the production of British colonies, is 10s. and the duty on foreign sugar, of a similar quantity, 11s. 6d.; but while the former is to remain unaltered, the latter is to be reduced 6d. next July, and 1s. in July, 1853, when it will be subject, like British colonial sugar, to a duty of 10s. The reader will understand, therefore, that the price he pays for sugar is enhanced from 10s. to 12s. by the duty, and by an unknown sum to reimburse the merchant for all the inconvenience and loss of capital which the restrictions to levy the duty impose on him. Assuming the price of sugar in China and India, to which, by successive improvements, the price of sugar is now approximating, as about the natural and necessary price, the duty of 10s. will be nearly 100 per cent. on its value in our market. Till lately, free competition has never stimulated the production of sugar, and till lately only slave labour has been employed in producing it. The price of sugar in Europe, therefore, has been kept inordinately high, and few or no improvements were for a long period made in the art of manufacturing it. A new era has now opened for it, and sugar, like bread, the produce of free industry, will become more cheap and more abundant.

THE THREE RINGS.

FROM LESSING'S DRAMA, "NATHAN THE WISE."

ACT III., SCENE V.

Sultan Saladin. Nathan (a Jew).

Saladin. No more of this humility, no more.
To hear its language ever, when I ask
For reason only, wearies in the end. (He rises.)
Come to the question. But I warn thee, Jew,
Uprightly deal uprightly!

Nathan. Sultan, I
Will serve thee honestly.

Saladin. Wilt serve me? How?

Nathan. The best of all I have thou shalt command
At lowest cost.

Saladin. What dost thou talk of, man?
Thy stuffs and wares? As bargainer for them,
Seek thou my sister; she will cheapen them:
As merchant, I have nought to do with thee.

Nathan. Then you would doubtless ask me if I knew
Aught of the enemy. I passed his camp:
His troops, indeed, are moving—if I marked
Aright.

Saladin. No; neither did I send for thee
To ask thee this. Of them I know as much
As I require already. In short—out with it,
Nathan. Command,
O Sultan!

Saladin. Thy instruction I require
On something different far from this. Thou art
A man of wisdom. Tell me now, what creed,
What code, what faith appears to thee the best?

Nathan. Sultan, I am a Jew!

Saladin. And I a Moslem!
The Christian stands between us; yet but one
Of all these three religions can be call'd
The one true faith. I know a man—like thee
Would not remain where the mere chance of birth
Had thrown him. If he does so, it must be
From insight, motive, and a wiser choice.
Come then thy reasons! Let me hear the grounds
On which I never tend time to meddle:
Tell me—of course in confidence—the choice
These reasons have decided thee to make.
That I may make it mine. Thou art surprised,
Art silent, weighest me with thine eye. Perhaps
I may be the first sultan who hath had
A like caprice; although 'tis one that scarce
Not all unworthy. Isn't not so? Come, speak!
Or wilt thou have a short moment to reflect?
I give it thee. Consider! but be quick
With thy reflections. I will soon return. (Exit.]

Nathan (alone). Him! This is odd, now. What am I to do?
What can the Sultan mean? I came prepared
To lend him gold, and lo! he asks for truth!
Demands it, too, all bright and new, as if Truth were like coin. Ah! were it so indeed,
Or were it like the money that of old
Pass'd current among men, unmark'd, unstamp'd
Judged by the metal's purity alone;
Then could I meet his question. But, alas!
In modern coinage, valued by its die,
Told on the board, and taken without test
No. Truth is not such mintage. And can truth
Be gather'd in the turning of a hand
Into the heart, like gold into a sack?
Which is the Jew in this, now—he or I?
And does he seek the truth in verity?
'Twere a.l too petty to suspect he asks
The truth to use it as a snare. And yet
What is too small for greatness? I must be Cautious and on my guard. But how? But how?
I cannot be the bigot of my creed,
Still less will say I am no Jew at all;
For might be not with justice ask me then
"Why not a Musselman?" Ah! so; 'twill do;
That yet shall save me; we may put off more
Than children with a tale. I hear his step;
He cometh. Let him come.

(Enter Saladin.)

Saladin. Well; hast thou done?
Speak, there are none to hear us.

Nathan. I could wish
That the whole world might hear me.

Saladin. Ha! indeed!
Is Nathan, then, so certain of his cause?
Well art thou call'd the Wise. Thou wilt not hide
The truth from any; for the truth dare set
All on the hazard—body, soul, and wealth.

Nathan. Yea, were they needed, and could serve it.

Saladin. Good.
'Twill be my hope from henceforth to deserve
My titles of Improver of the world,
And Betterer of the Laws

Nathan. Fair titles both.
But, Sultan, ere I give thee all my trust,
Wilt thou allow me quietly to tell a tale?

Saladin. Why not? I ever was a friend of tales
And stories, if well told.

Nathan. My skill, I fear,
Does not in good narration.

Saladin. Yet again
So proudly modest! Come! thy tale proceed.

Nathan. Ages on ages since there lived a man
In the dim East, who from a loving hand
Received a ring of priceless worth. The stone
Was a rich opal, of a thousand hues,
That had a secret power, which made whoe'er
Possessed it pleasant in the sight of God
And in the eyes of men, if he but wore
The gem with that intention. Could it be
A wonder if the ring never left the hand
Of him, that dweller in the distant East?
Or that he should endeavour to retain
The jewel in his race for evermore?
He did so, thus: he left unto the son
He loved the most the ring as heritance,
Ordaining that that son again should leave
The ring unto the child his heart prefer'd.
Thus the most loved, without respect of birth,
And by the influence of the ring alone,
Was always Prince and Head of all the line.
Hast understood me, Sultan?

Saladin. Ay, but more.

Nathan. Thus then the ring went down from son to son,
Until at last it came into the hand
Of one who had three children, who alike
Obey'd and honour'd him, and whom his heart
Loved therefore equally. He could not tell
Which was the worthier: now he thought 'twas this,
Then this, and then the third. Whenever one
Sat by his side alone he loved him most;
But when the others came his love was shared.
And thus, from very gentleness of heart,
He had made promise of the ring to all.
This, for a time, was well. But at the last
His hour arrived, and the good father fell
Into a great perplexity. His soul
Was pa n'd to think that two of those he loved
And had his promise must be now deceived.
What could he do? He summon'd secretly
A man of skil., and, showing him the ring,
Bade him spare neither time nor cost, and make
Two others like his own. The artist wrought
Successfully; the father could not tell
Himself which was the model. Joyfully
He called his sons—each one alone—and gave
To each a ring, and blessed him. Then he died.
Hast heard me?

Saladin. Yes. But pry'thee bring thy tale
To a conclusion, Nathan.

Nathan. It is done;
For all that followed is a thing of course.
Scarce was the father dead, when each one came,
Shewing his ring, and seeking to be lord
Above his brothers. There was strife, and search,
And loud complainings; all in vain—the ring,
The true ring, none could name. (Pauses.)
No more than I
Can name the one true creed.

Saladin. Is this to be
Thy answer to my question?

Nathan. My excuse
If I cannot distinguish 'twixt the rings
The father made with the sole purpose that
They should not be distinguished.

Saladin. Play not with me.
I think the creeds that I have named to thee
Are easy to be known: unlike is each
In food, in drink, in garb.

Nathan. In those alone,
Not in their motives: they are founded all
On history as written, or as men
Have heard it from traditions, which we must Accept as things of faith. Then whose belief
Have we least doubt of? of our own? of those Whose blood is in us, who from childhood up
Have loved us—as'er deceived us, swung when
To be deceived was wholesome? How can I Believe my fathers less than thou dost thine?
Or, to reverse it, how can I demand
That thou should'st think thy father's teaching false,
Because mine contradicts it? And the same
Holds good too of the Christian—does it not?

Saladin (aside). The man is right, by Heaven

Nathan. But again
Unto our ring. As I have said, the sons
Accused each other: each one took his oath
Before the judge, and truly. He received
The ring directly from his father's hand,
After a promise, given long before
(No less true, also), that he should enjoy
The privilege the ring bestow'd. And each
Was sure his father could not play him false.
Therefore (although he fain would think the best Of both his brothers) he each one took his
They were impostors. But he would detect
The crafty traitors; ay—and have revenge!

Saladin. What said the judge to this? How can'st thou make
The judge to answer? Speak!

Nathan. The judge replied:
"Summon your father hither—and at once!
You cannot do so? Then you must retire
From this, the seat of judgment. Am I here
To read men riddles, think ye? Will the ring
You search for speak? Yet hold. I heard you say
The genuine ring contains a spell that makes
Its owner loved of all—pleasing to God
And in the eyes of man. That must decide.
File false one has no influence. Tell me then—
Two of the three—which brother love you most?
All silent! Has the ring an inward power
Alone, and not an outward? Each one loves
Himself the most! Then are ye all, all three,
Merely betray'd betrayers; and your rings
Are false alike. The true one, as it seems,
Has disappear'd; and to conceal the loss,
Or to replace it, has your father made
The three for one!"

Saladin. 'Twas answer'd well.

Nathan. "And thus
(The judge continued) if you will not take
My counsel rather than my sentence—go;
But my advice is this: that you accept
The matter as it stands; if you have each
Your ring directly from your father's hand,
Believe it is the true one. It may be
Your father would not that the dominance
Of one should longer govern in his house;
And it is certain that he loved you all,
And loved you each alike, since he refused
To place o'er two the oppressors of the third.
Well, then, let each of you but imitate
His father's common and impartial love;
Strive with each other which of you shall most Display the jewel's power; exert its spell
By gentleness, endurance, charity,
And inward giving of the heart to God.
Then if the influence of the ring extends
Down to the latest of your mortal race,
Then, when a thousand thousand years have pass'd
I summon you again before this seat,
Where one more wise than I am will appear.
He will pronounce between you. Go." Thus spake
The humble judge.

Saladin. Oh, Allah!

Nathan. Saladin!
If thou believ'st, thou art that wiser man ——

Saladin. I, who am dust and nothing, Nathan! No!
Thy judge's thousand thousand years are not
Expired: his judgment seat is not my throne!
Leave me; but be my friend!

"LANGUAGE MUST BE GIVEN TO CONCEAL ONE'S THOUGHTS."

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

Among your Notices to Correspondents is this:—"G. J., Newcastle-under-Lyne, states that the observation 'Language must be given to conceal one's thoughts,' attributed to Talleyrand, in page 203 of our present volume, is to be found nearly sixteen verses in Goldsmith's 'Bee.'" Doubtless he takes his authority from Washington Irving's "Life of Goldsmith." It may not be uninteresting to know that Dr. South, born 1633, was the first to give expression to the idea. His words are as follow: "Man speak with designs of mischief, therefore they speak in the dark. In short, this seems to be the true inward judgment of all our political sages, that speech was given to the ordinary sort of men, whereby to communicate their mind; but to wise men, whereby to conceal it." "SUMMER MOONLIGHT."—PAINTED BY E. DUNCAN.—EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

"THE FLITTING (SCOTCH)." BY A. JOHNSTON.

THE scene of parting from the old home is never without its regrets, even though it be with the view of establishing with better worldly prospects in another sphere. Mr. Johnston, in this picture, which stands No. 544 in the catalogue of the Royal Academy, has very feelingly illustrated the various emotions which such an occurrence might give rise to in the various members of a family circle.

"SUMMER MOONLIGHT." BY DUNCAN.

THE admirable touch and truthfulness of character for which Mr. Duncan is generally remarkable were never more strikingly apparent than in the charming little but above named, which adorns the walls of the Old Water-Colour Society. The scene is thoroughly English, the atmosphere also—the broad beams of the moon struggling through a slight haze before they fall in silvery brightness on the still waters of the canal, the traffic of which never closes, night nor day.

THE BOURNE.—WAVERLEY WOODS AND CROOKSBURY-HILL. BY J. FAHEY.

MR. FAHEY, in this production (exhibited in the New Water-Colour Gallery), presents us with a panoramic survey of one of the most charming bits of scenery on the Surrey downs, and consequently one of the very prettiest spots in the south of England. The view, moreover, is especially interesting, as including within its range the site and precincts of the ancient abbey of Waverley, of which some account may not be out of place. The abbey of Waverley was founded in 1128 by William Giffard, Bishop of Winchester, who brought with him twelve Cistercian monks from Normandy; and, having fixed on this spot, in a secluded valley in the vicinity of the Bishop's Castle at Farnham, he erected here a church and other conventual buildings. Their delightful situation, upon the banks of the Wey, about three miles from Farnham, accords, in great measure, with that peculiar tact, or instinct, which, according to Dr Whitaker, influenced the Cistercians in the choice of their locations. "It may be observed," he says, "that, though they affected to plant themselves in the solitude of woods, which were to be gradually assarted (grubbed up) by their own hands, and though they obtained an exemption from the payment of tithes on that specific plea, yet they were excellent judges of the quality of land, however concealed, and never set about their laborious task without the assurance of an ample recompense. A copious stream to the south, a moderate extent of rich meadow and pasture land, and an amphitheatre of sheltering hills, clad in the verdant covering of their native woods beyond, were features in the face of nature which the earlier Cistercians courted with instinctive fondness. Where these combined, it does not appear that they ever abandoned a situation which they had once chosen; and where these were wanting, it is certain they never remained."

The site of Waverley presents an instance of their better choice. Aubrey, describing the remains of the monastery in 1673, mentions a fine rivulet, which is "the Bourne" in Mr. Fahey's description line. Portions of the abbey church and chapter-house, the walls of the refectory, and a crypt, still remain to attest the importance of the abbots of Waverley. Cobbett, who worked on this estate when a boy, describes the old kitchen-garden of the monks, and its abundant produce. "The peaches, nectarines, apricots, and fine plums never failed; and," he adds, "although I have seen and observed upon as many fine gardens as any man in England, I have never beheld a garden equal to that of Waverley."

Prominent in Mr. Fahey's view is Crooksbury Hill, which belonged to the monks of Waverley, and gives name to an adjoining common: it is mentioned as "Richard's Mille," in a charter granted by Henry de Blois to the monks about 1250. The present name, Crooksbury, appears to be a corruption from Cruz-bury; and we may safely conjecture that the monks erected a cross on this far-seen mount.

"THE SIXTH AGE." PAINTED BY J. S. CLIFTON, EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

"THE SIXTH AGE." BY J. S CLIFTON.

The sixth age shifts
Into the lean and slipper'd pantaloon.

THE artist in this work adopts somethung of the method of the new school, generally classed as "pre-Raphaelites," but without the excess of mannerism which too many of them are guilty of. It is entitled to honourable mention for paying more attention to the sentiment than the appliances of the subject; and how far Mr. Clifton succeeds in this mode of treatment, will be best judged from a careful consideration of the picture before us. It will be seen that he endeavours to invest the poetry of Shakspeare with a pathetic and symbolic interest, rather than the somewhat grotesque character with which the passage has generally been treated. The old man has been sitting in the sunshine at the porch of his mansion, attended by the female figure and child, now his most fitting companions; and, at the solicitation of the latter, rises impassively, and with the difficulty which infirmity and great age occasions; by which, we suppose, may be intended to be indicated, that, though invested with a sufficient estate, ancestral dignity, and the attentions of filial affection, yet all these comforts notwithstanding, and the broad sunshine of prosperity, the days of this period of life "are," indeed, to use the beautiful words of the Psalmist, "but labour and sorrow." The boy has rushed in with his new bow and arrow, pulling the old man by the robe that he may see him exercise his skill in "shooting with the long-bow," leaving the thrown and briers tied to his whip, on which he treads (his last plaything now abandoned), in the old man's path; by which we may suppose is meant to be symbolized the impetuosity of youth, their contempt of discipline, and the cares and troubles which their thoughtlessness and inconsiderate folly so often throw in the path of age. The book of "wise saws and modern instances," of which Shakspeare describes the justice to have been full (and whom the artist has endeavoured to identify with the figure of the old man, by the introduction of the scales on the scutcheon over the porch), has fallen at his feet, and become assimilated with the thorns and briers which beset his path; whilst the female figure stoops to clear them away, typifying one of the most touching and beautiful of the affectionate offices of woman—that of smoothing the path of declining years.

This picture is very pleasingly finished, but we must add, that it is hung so high on the walls of the Royal Academy, that it is with difficulty its beauties are appreciated.

REVIEW OF BOOKS.

THE LIFE OF MARIE DE MEDICIS, Queen of France, Consort of Henry IV., and Regent of the Kingdom under Louis XIII. By Miss PARDOE. 3 vols. Colburn.

A life more dramatic than that of Marie de Medicis has seldom been written; one more imperially tragic, never. The soul (truly says her present biographer) sickens as it traces to its close the career of this unhappy and persecuted Princess. Whatever were her faults, they were, indeed, bitterly expiated. As a wife, she was outraged and neglected; as a Queen, she was subjected to the insults of the arrogant favourites of a dissolute Court; as a Regent, she was trammelled and betrayed. The whole of her public life was one long chain of disappointment, humiliation, and burning, and unrequited, while, as a woman, she was fated to endure such misery as can fall to the lot of few in this world.

If uneasy lies the head that wears a crown, the heart beneath it is still more troubled, until suppressed or hardened. "The grandeur in its beatings" has a rival in the secret state of royalty. Henry IV. had one that throbbed for Mdlle. d'Entragues, afterwards Marquise de Verneuil, to whom he gave a written contract of marriage, pending negotiations at the Court of Florence for the hand of Marie de Medicis. It was the second time that the King had set to work his fortune in the matrimonial lottery, and in both he was unfortunate. The first adventure ended in a divorce, the second was a prolonged conflict. The marriage of Marie had been hastened by the Royal agents, and the announcement was made to the Monarch quite unexpectedly.

The infatuation of the King for his new favourite decided M. de Sully to hasten by every means in his power the marriage of the Sovereign with some European Princess worthy to share his throne; and he accordingly instructed the Royal agents at Rome to demand further the hand of Marie de Medicis for this French Monarch; while Henry, absorbed in his passion, permitted him to act as he saw fit, offering neither assistance nor impediment to a negotiation on which his domestic happiness was in future to depend. It was until the Duke urged upon him the necessity of selecting such of his nobility as it was his pleasure to entrust with the management of the affairs in conjunction with the ambassador when the Grand Duke, her uncle, was about to dispatch to Paris, that, by dint of importunity, he was induced to name M. de Sully himself, the Constable, the Chancellor, and the Sieur de Villeroy, whose son, M. d'Alincourt, had previously been sent to Rome to offer the acknowledgments of Henry to the Holiness for the dissolution of his marriage with Queen Marguerite, and to apprise him of that which he was desirous to contract with Marie de Medicis. This duty performed, M. d'Alincourt solicited the permission of the Princess to accompany Sillery to Florence to pay his respects to the Princess, and to negotiate the alliance; and having obtained the required sanction, the two noblemen set out upon their embassy, quite unaware that the preliminaries were already settled and concluded. So determined, indeed, had the minister that no time should be afforded to the King to redeem the pledge which he had given to the favourite, that Joannini, the agent of the Grand Duke, had not been many days in Paris before the articles were drawn up and signed on both sides, and Sully was commissioned by the other contracting parties to communicate the termination of their labours to his Royal master. The account given by the minister of this interview is highly characteristic:—

"He had not," says the chronicler, "anticipated such expedition, and thus, when I had answered his question of where I had come from by 'We come, Sire, from marrying you,' the Prince remained for a quarter of an hour as though he had been stricken by thunder; then he began to pace the chamber with long strides, biting his nails, scratching his head, and absorbed by reflections which agitated him so violently that he was a considerable time before he was able to speak to me. I entertained no doubt that all my previous representations were now producing their effect; and so it proved, for ultimately recovering himself like a man who has at length taken a decided resolution, he said, and he striking his hands together, 'well, then, so be it; there is no alternative, since for the good of my kingdom you say that I must marry.'"

Such was the ungracious acceptance of the haughty Florentine Princess at the hands of her future husband.

The indignation of Madame de Verneuil was unbounded when she ascertained that she had for ever lost all hope of ascending the throne of France; but it is nevertheless certain that she was enabled to dissimulate sufficiently to render her society indispensable to the King, and to accept with a good grace the equivocal honours of her position. Her brother, the Count d'Auvergne, was, however, less pliable; he had always affected to believe in the validity of her claim upon the King; and his naturally restless and dissatisfied character led him, under the pretext of avenging her wrongs, to form a conspiracy which had recently been formed against the person of the King, whom certain malcontents sought to deprive alike of his throne and of his liberty, and to supersede in his sovereignty by one of the Princes of the blood.

Alas! for the new bride, Marie de Medicis, whose wedded life commenced under such inauspicious circumstances. She possessed the Monarch, but not the man; his dignity, but not his affection. He and it were smothers; and it was even a moral question, which was the wife, which the mistress. The rivalry between the two was unparalleled in these equivocal conditions. They left their separate courts—almost, perhaps quite, equal in splendour—under the same roof, and both gave birth to a son at nearly the same time. Could circumstances more mortifying befall any woman? Yet these Marie de Medicis had to bear, because she had married a King. Her fortitude announced the future of wretchedness which composed her life, relieved by a brief period of power during which she was Regent being established in that regards the position on the assassination of her husband a position as full of trouble as of authority—and terminated in a state of total and complete banishment, forsaken by friends and family, until she was absolutely compelled to chop up her furniture to cook her scanty food, and literally died, between bare walls, of starvation. In her last distresses she received aid and consolation from the prince-artist, Rubens, who, during the days of her perilous, were the services rendered by this truly sovereign mind to the forlorn though Royal widow. Her place of refuge was at the artist's house, in Antwerp.

How does destiny at times mock human greatness, and reward all social rules! Here was a sovereign Princess, the wife and the mother of Kings, who after eighteen weary years of struggle and suffering, was about to set out from the man whom, in 1622, she had invited to Paris, and upon whom she had lavished both riches and honour, in order that he might perpetuate with his brilliant pencil the short-lived triumphs of her regency, a shelter for her grey hairs. Nor was she, in this instance, fated to disappointment, as her reception by the great painter was as earnest and as respectful as though she still swayed the destinies of France.

As Rubens knelt before her, and pressed her thin hand reverently to his lips, the eyes of Marie de Medicis brightened, and a faint colour rose to her wasted cheeks. For a time she forgot all her sufferings and sat talking together of the proud period of her power, when she had laboured to embellish her beloved city of Paris, and summoned Rubens to the Luxembourg to execute the magnificent series of pictures which, from the position they occupy, but too largely obtained could not long endure, and scarcely an hour had elapsed ere they were engaged in concerting new measures to effect her recal to France.

For several weeks the presence of the Queen in Antwerp was not suspected, and during that brief interval of comparative repose not a day passed in which the subject was not earnestly discussed; until although Rubens, who was aware that the retreat of his Royal guest must be ultimately discovered, resolved to undertake in person the mission of peace in which so many others had previously failed.

"Suffer me, Madam," said the painter, "to proceed without delay to Paris charged with a letter from your Majesty to the King your son. The pretext for my journey shall be my desire to execute a portrait of my friend, the Baron de Wick, our ambassador at the French court; and as I do not doubt that his Christian Majesty will honour me with a summons to his presence, I will then deliver your despatch into his own hands. The happy results of my former missions render me sanguine of success on this occasion; while I pledge myself that should I unhappily fail in my attempt to obtain the affection of the King towards your Majesty, it shall be from no want of zeal or perseverance in your cause."

"My noble Maestro!" exclaimed Marie de Medicis; "I would with confidence trust my life in your hands. My sorrows have at least not alienated your generous heart, and there shall remain one thing upon earth who can be faithful when my gratitude is all that I can offer in return. Listen to my words. Even yet I am convinced that Louis is no me—a conviction which is shared by Richelieu; and therefore it is that he condemns me to exile. His fears my influence over the mind of the King my son, and has urged me to deeply to place [illegible] Our mutual struggle has extended over long years. [illegible] Yet would I fain make another effort. I am old [illegible] to bemoan my wretched existence on the soil of [illegible] Sorrow this is not—I [illegible] and now I will not seek to obtain, [illegible] were born under a [illegible] Petro Paulo; and I have [illegible] your counsel. Go then, and may God grant prosper your [illegible]

"Fear not, Madam, [illegible] ter, as he rose from his knee, and placed writing materials before the [illegible] Queen. "In so righteous a cause I shall be protected; but as for [illegible] ay might prove fatal to our hopes, I won't venture to [illegible] your Majesty to close no time in preparing the dispatch of which I am to be the bearer."

"It shall be done," re[illegible] ering a painful smile. "It will in all [illegible] bability be my last [illegible] you fail, Rubens, I shall feel [illegible] at all as indeed lost."

With the letter written by the hand of this desolated piece of royalty the painter was about to proceed [illegible] his mission, when he was stopped by a courier, charged with a [illegible] from the authorities forbidding [illegible] e a further abode in Antw[illegible] the spies of Cardinal Richelieu had found out her retreat, and she was compelled to proceed to Cologne, where she lodged in the chamber in which Rubens was born. Rubens went to Paris, but had no sooner arrived there than the Cardinal dispatched a letter to Phil[illegible] of Rubens on the instant at Madrid, and to detain him in that city until he should hear further from himself:

The request of so dangerous an adversary as Richelieu was a command to Philip, who hastened to invite the illustrious Fleming to his court with a salpeed, upon an affair of the most pressing nature; and when Rubens would have [illegible] in order to fulfil a mission which he considered as sacred, he was met by the declaration that Louis desired to defer the audience which he had already conceded until after the return of the Maestro from the Spanish capital. With a heavy heart Rubens accordingly left Paris aware that this temporary banishment was the work of the vindictive Cardinal, who was thus depriving his unhappy benefactress of the last friend on earth who had the courage to defend her cause; but as he drove through the city gates he was far from anticipating that his freedom of action was to be trammelled for an indefinite period, and that he was in fact about to become the temporary prisoner of Philip IV.

Nor was the persevering cruelty of Richelieu yet satiated: he knew by his emissaries that the end of Marie de Medicis was rapidly approaching, but he was also aware that through the generous sympathy of Charles of England and the King of Spain she was still in the receipt of a sufficient income to insure her comparative comfort; and even this was too much for him to concede to the mistress whom he had betrayed: thus, only a few months elapsed ere the pensions hitherto accorded to the persecuted Princess were withheld by both Monarchs; who, in their terror of the formidable Cardinal, suffered themselves to overlook their duty and their loyalty to a woman and a Queen, and their affection towards the mother of their respective consorts.

Overwhelmed by this new humiliation, Marie de Medicis found herself reduced to the greatest extremity. Unable to liquidate the salaries of those members of her household who had accompanied her into exile, she was abandoned by many among them, which she had hitherto relieved; and she had hitherto relieved were gradually disposed of in order to support those who still clung with fidelity to her fallen fortunes; but even this resource at length failed; and during the winter months, unable any longer to purchase fuel, she was compelled to permit her attendants to break up all such articles of furniture as could be made available for that purpose.

This extreme of wretchedness, however, which would have sufficed to exhaust the most robust hen th and the most vigorous youth, was rapidly sapping the toil-worn and tortured existence of Marie de Medicis; and, aware that she had nearly reached the term of her sufferings, on the 2nd of July, 1642, she executed a will, which is still preserved in the Royal library of Paris, wherein she expressed her confidence that Louis XIII. would cause the mortuary ceremonies consecrated upon her decease to be solemnized in a manner befitting her dignity as Queen of France, and bequeathed certain legacies to her servants, and to the several charitable institutions of Cologne. This duty performed, she consented at the entreaty of her attendants to undergo a painful operation, and to submit to such remedies as were likely to prove most efficient, although she herself expressed a conviction "their utter uselessness. She then received the last sacraments of the church; [illegible] and, after a violent accession of fever, expired at midnight on the morrow, with the breath of prayer upon her lips. Once or twice, blent with the pious outpourings [illegible] her departing spirit, her attendants had distinguished the name of her son—for that son by whom [illegible] Her maternal love did not yield even to bodily agony; but the struggle was brief. Her eyes closed, her breath suddenly [illegible] and all was over.

[illegible] between [illegible] destitution [illegible] nature of demanding the very [illegible] agony of every inflammable article that it contained, in order by such means to prepare the scanty meal that alone could still command, and on a wretched bed which one of her own ancestors would, in her period of power, have disdained to occupy; children, or worse than children, homeless, heroless, and [illegible] wrung, the haughty daughter of the Medici the defiant regent of France, the [illegible] mother of [illegible] of Louis [illegible] in extremity.

The period of French history chosen by Miss Pardoe is rich in all manner of associations, and brings together the loftiest names and most interesting events of a stirring and dazzling epoch. She has been, moreover, exceedingly fortunate in her materials, a MS. of the Comte [illegible] de Hamburg, Captain of the Regiment of French Guards, Gen. [illegible] of the Bedchamber under the Kings Henry IV., Louis XIII., and Louis XIV. (surnamed the Great), consisting of the "memoirs" of the writer, "with all the most memorable events which took place during the reigns of those three Kings, from the year 1594 to the year 1670," was placed at the disposal by M. de la Pause, member of the Institut Royal de la France. This valuable record is very voluminous, extending to some 1500 pages, and throwing a flood of light on every transaction. Of the importance of such materials we have been judiciously informed by Miss Pardoe, and her narrative, accordingly, has a fullness and particularity possessed by none other, and which adds to the dramatic interest of the subject. The work has evidently been carefully compiled. It is, besides, very elegantly written, and, notwithstanding its length, will be read with assiduity and delight. It forms another monument to the worthiness of female intellect in the age we live in—another pledge of social advancement, ever in proportion to the deserved esteem in which woman is held and her moral influence generally acknowledged.

MEMOIRS of the LIFE and WRITINGS of THOMAS CHALMERS, D.D., LL.D. By his Son-in-law, the REV. WILLIAM HANNA, LL.D. Vol. IV. Constable.

We have now before us the fourth volume of Dr. Chalmers' Life, by his son-in-law—not the least interesting of the series. It contains the story of the seventh decade of his life, his Station endeavours to free the church of his country, and to extend it as an ecclesiastical establishment. The narrative is traced with infinite spirit and unction, and places Dr. Chalmers in the foremost rank of men of action

We have here an account of the literary distinction won by the successful preacher and author, and some glimpses afforded into the more secret arcana of his mind, which to the theological and philosophical inquirer are of exceeding interest. We thank Dr. Hanna for the items of spiritual history which he has communicated. These provoke thought, and at the same time serve to direct it into fitting channels. They beget, too, a state of feeling which cannot fail of being beneficial

Dr. Chalmers' religious experience matured into a wish to simplify his faith, and even to economise his mental resources. The biblical commentators he used were few; namely, the Concordance, Kitto's Pictorial Bible, Poole's Synopsis, Henry's Commentary, and Robinson's Researches in Palestine. "There," said he to a friend, pointing to the volumes as they lay on the table of his study, "are the tools I use; all that is biblical is there." The mind at length naturally rests on few books and few authorities. New views began at this period to distress Dr. Chalmers' mind. He did not understand the German philosophy, and evinced that he was unacquainted with it. He at first welcomed Mr. Morell's history, and then opposed it. But all he said and did evinced that he was on this point deficient in information and patience, and not at all in a mood for impartial investigation.

On other literary parts Dr. Chalmers' taste was accurate and clear. In regard to his manner of sustaining its cultivation, the following extract will be valuable:—

[illegible] Chalmers' [illegible] were given to general reading, and to the society of his family and friends. He kept steadily by one book at a time; and, however small a portion of it might be overtaken each evening, the period was regularly preserved to a close. And here, too, as well as in his summer visits, he sought out the friends of his youth. Within the last two or three years of his life he completed a course of reading on Cicero, Shakspeare, and Milton. "I don't wonder now," he said, "at Milton's own preference for 'Paradise Regained' over 'Paradise Lost.'" The single passage of Shakspeare which he most frequently recited was that one in "Henry IV." which commences—

I saw young Harry with his beaver on,
His cuisses on his thighs, gallantly armed, &c.

And the single play in which he took most pleasure was "A Midsummer Night's Dream," among the fairy pictures of which he delighted to revel. "I look on Shakspeare as [illegible] miracle; I would put him before Milton." Mackenzie was also a favourite with his students once told him of the enthusiasm [illegible] and related the anecdote of Goethe's companion between Tieck, Shakspeare, [illegible] philosophy, and expressed a peculiar mixture both of pride and sympathy, he said, "That relation which Tieck holds to me, I hold to Shakspeare. I regard Shakspeare, after hearing the anecdote, "as the true representative of [illegible] Shakspeare was the greatest man that [illegible] ever trod upon this earth, even Sir Isaac Newton." In February, 184[illegible] [illegible] he finished the following entry in Dr. Chalmers' [illegible] "And now I have finished my complete perusal of Shakspeare [illegible] and am reading with great [illegible] wards on [illegible] God in Creation." Let no [illegible] ch [illegible] to serious reading."

The volume before us takes us to the last hour of Dr. Chalmers' life. The picture of his quiet and cheerful conversation on the last evening, ere he retired to that rest which proved his final one, is exceedingly touching. Very shortly after his parting salute on the evening of May [illegible] he died in his bed, and was found in the morning "half erect, [illegible] reclining gently on his pillow; the expression of his countenance that of fixed and majestic repose." Doubtless he died while in a state of slumber, free [illegible] ing, and passed from this life in a death that was [illegible]

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY of WILLIAM JERDAN; with his Literary, Political, and Social Reminiscenses and Correspondence during the last fifty years. Vol. I. Hall, Virtue, and Co.

Few works have been introduced to the public with greater diffidence on the part of the writer than the present autobiography. At the threshold he quotes the saddening experience of one who could, indeed, "suck melancholy from a song:"—

For many a lad I knew is dead,
And many a lass grown old;
And when I think upon the past
My weary heart is cold.—CART. MORRIS.

This regretful feeling tinges, and perhaps somewhat too deeply, nearly every page of the volume before us; yet there is abundant promise of better things. For the establishment of the Literary Gazette, the first of a class of publication peculiar to our time, Mr. Jerdan must ever receive grateful record. During his thirty-four years' editorship of this journal he must have garnered materials for a valuable autobiography, wherewith to work out this promise

When I state (says Mr. Jerdan) that years of my middle life were passed in confidential intercourse with the statesmen of the day, such as Lord Farnborough, Huskisson, Archbishop Cooke, and, still later, with many of the eminent characters who have held high places in the Government of the country; and that, both at the preceding and later periods of my course, I enjoyed the friendship and unreserved intimacy of George Canning, and the regard and familiar acquaintance of almost every person of celebrity in the later political, scientific, artistic, literary, or otherwise remarkable: it may not be too much to predicate that I have a great deal to communicate worthy of popular and even general acceptation. Without any presumption, I can truly assert that my stores are very considerable both in variety and value, and I hope to make a good use of my materials.

Mr. Jerdan was born at Kelso, in 1782, and the present volume carries the reader to the events of 1811; the interval of thirty-two years being occupied with the author's childhood and boyhood, his first visit to London, in 1801, where he entered upon a clerkship in a mercantile house; his removal to Edinburgh, where he was placed with a Writer to the Signet; his few months' service as a solicitor's clerk in the Royal Navy; and his introduction to the periodical press in 1806, with a glimpse of the Parliamentary reporting for the newspapers of that period, especially the establishment of the Aurora and the Pilot, the printer of the latter got a prize of a sixteenth of a £20,000 ticket in the lottery. The Chronicle is a dark passage of history, detailing the trial of a banker's clerk for forgery, and the commutation of his death sentence to transportation for life, through Mr Jerdan's exertion. The narrative of the murder of Mr Perceval, rewritten from Fisher's "National Portrait Gallery," forms the next chapter, and is a specimen of most interesting piece of history in the volume. Mr. Jerdan's "a Mr. Phillips," one of those who lifted up Mr. Perceval's corpse, was Sir Richard Phillips. Mr Jerdan relates:

About five o'clock of the tragical day I had walked down to the House to [illegible] to the interminable debates in committee on the Orders in Council, which were briefly reported in the newspapers. On ascending the broad flight of steps which led to the folding-door of the lobby, I perceived the [illegible] with whom I had the honour of a slight acquaintance, immediately behind me, with his light and lithesome step, following in the same direction. I saluted him, and was saluted in return with that benevolent smile which I saw so instantly destined to be effaced for ever, and pushing open and holding back the half-door, to allow the precedence of entering, I of course made way for him to go in. He did enter, and there was an instant noise; but as a physical fact I was very conscious that, though I was all but touching him, and if the ball had passed through his body it must have lodged in mine, I did not hear the report of the pistol. It is true it was fired in the inside of the [illegible] but just out of it; but, considering our close proximity, I have ever since found it difficult to account for the phenomenon I have noticed. I saw [illegible] curling wreath of smoke rise above his head, as if the breath of a cigar; I saw him recoil back and set the door open, and I heard [illegible] exclaim, "Oh, God" or "Oh, my God!" and nothing more or longer (as recorded by several witnesses), for even that exclamation was faint; and then [illegible] an impulsive rush, as it were, of the entrance to the House on the opposite side for safety, I saw him totter forward, not half way, and drop dead between the four pillars which stood there in the centre of the space, with a slight trace of blood issuing from his lips. All this took place ere with moderate speed you could count five!

Bellingham was instantly seized by Mr. Jerdan; his agitation was frightful, and the shocking spectacle is thus powerfully painted:

I could only imagine something like it in the overwrought painting of a powerful romance writer, but never before could conceive the physical suffering of a stout, powerful man, under the stress of a distracted mind. What fits [illegible] was cool, the agonies which shook his frame were actually terrible. His countenance wore the hue of the grave, blue and cadaverous; huge drops of sweat poured down his forehead, and every breath, a spasmodic sob, as if a ball larger or larger than a billiard-ball, were choking him. The miserable wretch repeatedly struck his chest with the palm of his hand to abate the sensation, but it refused to be repressed. * * * * * * *

On my every return home to Old Brompton, I found that the news had penetrated that retirement, and excited great uneasiness, which was only equated by my arrival with the striking proof of Bellingham's pre-determined resolution, and the mortal means by which he had filled with me a manuscript copy of his petition to Government to remunerate his losses, and give compensation for his personal suffer ings. It is written and signed "John Bellingham," in a bold mercantile hand, and dated with the details of Mr. Hume. This document I had afterwards to find, and, with a plan of the lobby and its occupants, and a fac-simile of the fatal pistol, presented to my much-valued friend Sir Francis Freeling. I had also the pair of pistols, and kept them till the day of the trial; when there was a prodigious struggle for their possession among the official persons engaged in the prosecution and the twenty other remarkable articles which, however, I still retain, was a plain but powerful opera-glass in a red case; and it was important, as it had frequently been seen, during the form gut before, in the assassin's hands in the gallery of the House of Commons, watching and surveyed the members before and ascertained surely, by asking the reporters, which was Mr. Perceval. There can, therefore, be no doubt but that he had long fixed upon his victim; and given up the idea of his own entertaining, if not of marrying Lord Lovelace's widow, whom he accused of traversing his commercial course in Russia.

I received my subpœna on Thursday, the 14th, attended at the Grand Jury and the Old Bailey on Friday, the 15th, but was not examined; and the wretched being expiated, as far humanly as such guilt can be expiated, his atrocious crime in front of Newgate on Monday, the 18th—one week having sufficed to fulfil this memorable tragedy

Peter Pindar, James Hogg, and Canon Lisle Bowles furnish the staple of the next chapter, which is followed by the author's [illegible]ship of the Sun newspaper, "then an acknowledged organ of Pitt politics." In the ensuing chapters of "Sun Anecdotes," we find the following

My room was hardly ever void of company from the time the [illegible] sheet impression of the "Sun" came down from the printing "chapel" above; and there was no lack of topics on which to give and receive information. Among my most constant visitors were Mr (Sir Francis) Freeling, John Kemble, Robert Clarke, Mr. Flaxgate, and the Mr. Proby, I have already mentioned as a most genial character. Proby had never been out of London, never in a boat, never on the back of a horse. To the end of dog-whips he wore a hat; he was the last man that walked with a cane as long as himself, ultimately exchanged it for an umbrella, which he never was without in wet weather or dry; not he usually reported the whole debates in the Fears from memory, without a note, for the Morning Chronicle, and wrote two or three novels decorating the social manners of the times, full of marrying Lord Lovelace Gower

"Paris in 1824" follows, and concludes with this seasonable anecdote:—

At a soirée, where Talleyrand was of the party, the conversation of a few individuals knotted in a corner of the room turned on the pictures brought from Spain by Soult and Wellington, and it was discussed which of the two had the most valuable collection; on which the witty Prince de Périgord, with the usual twinkle of his dry humour, remarked that possibly the most valuable of these treasures were, the most extraordinary circumstance of the whole affair was, that the Duke of Wellington had paid money for his acquisitions!!!

But the grand feast of the Allied Monarchs and their famous followers to London was the focus of universal curiosity and admiration Sight after sight, fête after fête, and extraordinary novelty after novelty, kept the imagination on the stretch, and seemed to plunge every body into an activity for pleasure nothing, as if the British Empire had been turned into one Greenwich fair. From morning to night there was nothing but whirl and diurnism: there was no life but the present; all the past was forgotten, and what the future might bring forth was uncared for. Among the most prominent attractions were the Emperor Alexander, the Duchess of Oldenburgh, Blucher, and Platoff. Bucher was lodged in the small house now occupied by Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence in St. James's Palace, and was scarce ly allowed an hour's rest in the four-and-twenty, by the genteel crowds forcing their way into his privacy, and the common crowds assembling in the court on the outside, and hallooing till they made him show himself at the window, hat in hand, mere schaum in mouth, and bow his thanks for the uproarious distinction. The old General was fatigued enough with his restless reception, and would sometimes, I think, rather have been in a charge of cavalry than in the rush of female onset, which all but shook him to pieces. In a few moments' conversation with him I referred to our Paris meeting, but, mean as it entered him at the time, it was, as I have already hinted, piqued, all driven out of his head, and he appeared to recollect nothing about it, as a half-score more of the ladies were admitted to make him their bow, or, inestimable prize! be honoured with a smile! In the evening he probably lounged for a cool sederunt at the gaming-table, and a view at the heaps of gold, the coins of every nation, French, English, Italian, Dutch, German, Russian, of all sorts and dates, which composed the glittering miscellaneous bank, and tempted visitors to the risks of fickle Fortune. Platoff, it was said, carried off three of his big friends with him when he left England, and settled them as prima donnas and samples of British beauty somewhere upon the Don. Different tastes were exhibited by the strangers, according to their fancies did they frolic to the full in the enjoyments unsparing y provided on every hand The King of Prussia, one of the quietest of them all, was especially captivated with the excellence of a national dish, perhaps, never acquired such loyal approbation before. His gentleman appointed to be his principal attendant, and see that all his wants and wishes were supplied in St. James's Palace, where he was lodged, told me that his Majesty made the poorest possible figure at the gorgeous dinners at Carlton House, because he had lunched heartily before on what he liked much better than even the Prince Regent's exquisite cuisine and cellar, viz. fine Cheshire cheese and Burton ale. On these daily did the King barricade, and my informant used jocularly to say, that if ever he went to Berlin he would take a gigantic Cheshire and a cask of Burton with him, and he had no doubt but the highest preferment in the Kingdom would be open to his ambition.

The Appendix, of some 90 pages, consists of illustrative anecdotes, and a dramatic romance by Thomas Hood, entitled "Lamia." Here is a specimen of the former:—

An eccentric character, such as is now rare in London, used, till his death, a very few years ago, to frequent the well-known dinner-house and tavern, called the Blue Posts, in Cork-street, a favourite resort, especially of Old Ebony when he visited town, and the haunt of the literati connected with "ma Mag" as well as of others, who contributed to the press in all directions. He was, it may be guessed, an octogenarian, and his table and seat were invariably kept for him in a corner of the room, and he as invariably occupied them, summer and winter, as the clock struck his hour of seven. He was pointed out to me as a man who had formerly acquired a fortune in the law, and to which he came to Edinburgh with his first volume. This was very exciting news, and many an effort did I make to get introduced, so that I might hear something from a living witness of the glorious progenitors. At last I succeeded, and on the no time in popping the question about the poet's appearance, his looks, his habits, and the most minute particulars my venerable friend could remember. Upon which he looked at me with a look of wondering look, and answered "I found (remember) Burns perfectly, but what more would you wish to know? He was a gauger (an excisesman), and it cost me a guinea to subscribe to his memorial book, which must have been much better husbanded."

I turned from my late respected informant with horror, and never would speak to him again as long as I existed at the Blue Posts.

Although the staple of this volume scarcely rises to the rank of literary history, it raises and paints with much ability the character, state of remembrances, incidents and occurrences. As a book of anecdote, the work is abundantly amusing; and to serve well this literary entrenet is no mean accomplishment. But the Autobiography has higher aims—to point out the fallacies and fruitless hopes which beset the career of those who rely upon literature for subsistence, yet do not regulate their conduct by rules of ordinary prudence. This object, we doubt not, will be accomplished in the future volumes of the present work, judging by the success with which the great lesson is already read in the portion before us.

HISTORY of TRIAL by JURY. By WILLIAM FORSYTH, M.A late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and Author of "Hortensius" "John Warker and Son. 1852.

WE can understand the merits of a finely-written and well-arranged narrative, with which much discussion is blended; or, on the other hand, of an abstruse treatise which a considerable amount of pertinent narrative is interwoven. The treatise may be learned and profound, and helps you in the mastery of some species of knowledge, necessary or useful to your designs or to your business The history conveys a more general and less exact knowledge for any given pursuit; but it affords relaxation, delight, and interest, and exercises strength ening the faculties of the mind and enriching its general stores.

Mr. Forsyth's book lies with curious infelicity exactly between the two classes of work which we have described. The author calls it a "History of Trial by Jury." But he who takes it up to gratify his taste for historical reading will be severely disappointed. It certainly contains many passages of dry narrative, void of animation, void of interest—with no connected action, no sustained homogeneous progress, no simple build unity, and no clear thread out. It is a string of disjointed records, perfectly wrapped in dense century and essay of no brilliant kind. In form and manner it is treatise, and a law treatise. But yet it is at the same time such a treatise as will not lead afford to the legal student a single clear notion which he may bring to bear in the pursuit of his profession. In chamber or in court he will not find, under any possible circumstances, the smallest help from the closest mastery of all that Mr. Forsyth's book contains. Materials, perhaps, are dry, and make rather hard reading. But no one reads them because they are dry and hard. No one studies them for the sake of undergoing their dull effects. In spite of dryness, dullness, and hardness, they are studied because they are needful for some special objects. The author has more than counterbalanced by the advantage for the sake of which they are borne. Forsyth's book is, with the exception of three or four passages, as heavy as any professional treatise, without furnishing that practical result to the student which derives from a good professional treatise. He has, in fact, produced neither a treatise nor a history, but, out of the best excellent parts of both, has compounded a work which can boast of the merits of neither. Certainly we do not wish to imply that Mr. Forsyth has shown high ability and industry in this labour. The principle on which the book is framed is wrong, and the execution of his task, such as it is, much research has been necessary. The legal literature of the French and the English, of the German, the Scandinavian, and the Anglo-Norman languages has been diligent laid by our author under contribution. And though the mass of law student nor the general reader will find much to interest him in this "History of Trial by Jury," yet the future historian of the same subject, and perhaps, at present, a few antiquarian elders of the inns of Court, fond of all pertaining to legal archæology, will be so rewarded for the labour of Mr. Forsyth's labours.

The book opens with an essay on the nature of the Jury System, and ends with a forced panegyric of its advantages Between the opening essay and the concluding panegyric, almost all is discussion. Indeed, the amount of narrative bears to the amount of "holding forth" about the same proportion which a preacher's text ordinarily bears to his discourse. This being understood, we are led on chronologically, more or less. The ancient Scandinavian tribunals are the subject of inquiry; the Norwegian Langrettemen, the Swedish Nämdi, the Tólftar-Quidr of Iceland, and the Tingmend, Navninger, and Sandemend of Denmark, occupy our learned author's attention. We next arrive at the consideration what was the constitution of the old German courts of justice, and by what process facts were considered proven therein. From this we are directed to the Anglo-Saxon system, in which Mr Forsyth maintains the jury trial to have been unknown. The Wergild and the Fridhori, compurgators and witnesses having been duly passed in review, the Anglo-Norman system claims our attention. By degrees, out of the Judicium Parvum, the jury now arose; and no sooner has it arisen than Mr. Forsyth becomes painfully minute in his remarks. They are often valuable, but they are distressingly prolix and long-winded.

After reaching the point where the duties of jurors and the powers of the jury had become defined and fixed more or less in the exact position in which they stand at the present time, Mr. Forsyth lingers still for thirty-four "mortal" pages of dissertation on the subject of the "proper province of the jury." This chapter, nevertheless, is one of the most interesting in the book. It treats the subject in the following order of classification:—1. The powers and duties of juries in England; 2. The distinction between the office of judge and that of the jury; 3. Mixed questions of law and fact; 4. Presumptions of law and fact; 5. Utility of written pleadings.

The author then takes a review of the working of the system in Scotland, in America, and in France, and of its introduction into Germany and other parts of Europe. In noticing the variations of practice which obtain a footing, he makes some remarks, by no means unworthy of attention, respecting the well-known Scotch verdict of "Not proven." Some illustrations of trial by jury, taken from English state prosecutions, and a panegyric of the system itself, terminate the work properly speaking. But an appendix on some matters of law, and some speculations thereto applicable, is added.

Such is this book of Mr. Forsyth—a book which could not have been produced without considerable talent and still greater industry.

AN ARGUMENT on the INUTILITY of the DISTINCTION between BARRISTER and ATTORNEY, addressed to the Lord Chancellor. By WILLIAM LOCKEY HARLE. Stevens and Norton.

This pamphlet, on a subject of much present importance, is cleverly and speciously written. Its tone is gentlemanly throughout, and its arguments are put with a certain degree of plausibility likely to mislead the casual or general reader. We, however, disagree entirely with the reasoning and intent of the pamphlet, and we cannot let its observations pass without at least recording our objection. We hold just the contrary to what Mr. Harle asserts; and we do see the necessity for some broad conventional distinction or barrier between the barrister and attorney between him who is the mind and him who is the mere practice of the art, between the physician and the apothecary of the law. The solicitor may be employed as Mr. Harle states, and, indeed, has always been more or less the case in minor affairs upon points of practice, or upon subjects more of detail than of extensive argument of deep law. He may go further, he may tell fair well, and convince his cause with fluency and effect; but a body like the Bar will still be wanting—a corporate body, such as it really is, which is placed by its education and course of life and conduct above that petty system of chicanery, that minute working of the craft which cannot but fall in a lesser or greater degree to the share of every man who does the business of an attorney The Bar, on the contrary, acts on enlarged views, and is bound by a code of honour which (as it is now constituted) would never allow it to resort to those artifices and minor subtleties which, if kept within the pale of law and honesty, do not injure the respectability of the other branch of the profession. Indeed, attornies could not be so restrained. It is the possession of this latitude and boldness of action, and these principles of refined good faith and honour, that make and have made the Bar of England what it is—the comptroller of our higher courts of justice, and the protector of their knowledge, their fairness, and their free lom. While, therefore, we cordially concur with Mr. Harle on the utility of attorneys, and in the cleverness and repute of many of them, we shall wish to have an arena sufficiently removed for the successors of Hall, Cowper, Blackstone, Murray, Pratt, Erskine, Denman, Campbell, Brougham, and a host of others who have had to do, not at all with the petty practice, but altogether with the greatness and the chivalry of the law.

A VISITATION of the SEATS and ARMS of the NOBLEMEN and GENTLEMEN of GREAT BRITAIN Part II. completing the first volume By J. BERNARD BURKE, Esq., Barrister and Genealogist, author of "The Peerage" "Colburn and Co.

This part, with the former one already noticed, forms the first volume of the laborious and erudite undertaking The subject increases in curious details and romantic interest as the pages unfold the ancient families in Britain, and of their beautiful homes that have sheltered their happiness and their fame. The mere blazonings of the seats and arms continue to be very fairly executed. The volume itself, in its gorgeous cover, with the old towers of Windsor glittering on it, presents quite an historical and aristocratic appearance.

BROOKLANDS. A Sporting Biography. By HERBERT BYNG HALL, K.S.F. 2 vols. Newby, 1852

These are a couple of volumes of sporting reminiscences, obviously real, which will interest many sporting characters for particularly those of the hunting county, Berkshire, to which they especially relate The style is somewhat rambling, sometimes somewhat inflated, and now and then a leetle vulgar in the slang of the sporting circles; but the bonhomie and the verve of the author are unmistakeable, and his fund of wild rollicking spirit inexhaustible. There is little story in the book, which is chiefly confined to portraits and anecdotes of various characters with whom the writer has associated in the sports of the field. A melancholy and wholesome moral, however, is sought to be inculcated in the example of the figure of the olden time, who, because a railway is made to cut through his park, is infected with the railway mania, becomes a "stag," and, speculating beyond his means, is obliged to mortgage his ancestral domains, leaving his children nearly destitute. The work is dedicated to the Duke of Beaufort, "who," we are told, "ranks high among men, high among sportsmen, but higher than either as a true English gentleman;" the logic of which we do not quite enter into. A man is but a man, and how a man can rank higher as "an English gentleman" than as "a man," and "a sportsman" to boot, we cannot perceive. It is surplusage, to say the least of it.

We must omit to mention that some of the sporting scenes are illustrated with some very clever sketches in lithography, by G. W. Horton.

THE CLIMATE of ITALY in RELATION to PULMONARY CONSUMPTION; with Remarks on the Influence of Foreign Climates upon Invalids. By T. H. BURGESS, M.D. Longman.

Dr. Burgess has, in this work, limself the task of exposing certain popular errors relating to consumptive patients According to him, it is a mistake to send them to the south of Italy or Madeira. Amongst the objections to the usual course, Dr. Burgess enumerates the fatigue inseparable from an overland journey of some two thousand miles (to Malta, for instance), and the total want of English comfort en route, and even in the promised land itself, which, to an invalid, is positive torture. Frequently, the latter hastens the fatal crisis. For these, and other reasons connected with the meteorological observations of J. F. Schouw, and the opinions on climatology of such writers as Sir James Clark and M. E. Carrière, Dr. Burgess, in a very able manner, treats the practice of banishing the invalid to a distant climate as absurd, and goes far to prove it to be so. The pamed is wrong. The patient requires so much attention and sympathy, that in these cases he ought rather to be allowed to die in peace at home, than be sent abroad in pursuit of a fallacious hope.

THE BRITISH WINE-MAKER and DOMESTIC BREWER. By W. H. ROBERTS. Black, Edinburgh; Whittaker, London.

To this edition (the fifth) of the truly practical work, the author has added a supplement on the merits of the juice of the rhubarb plant, as a beverage nearly as valuable as that of the grape for the production of champagne, sock, Madeira, Constantia, and other favourite wines. Within the compass of a few pages Mr. Roberts gives the results of his experiments on the stem of the rhubarb plant, which, by the way, was of a very superior quality. Cobbett, the rural economist, condemned British wines as excellent stuff to catch flies with; but, since his time, better acquaintance with chemistry has enabled our makers to produce excellent wines, as nearly as possible resembling the juice of the grape.

CYCLONES.]

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

SIR,—Having noticed in your paper of the 29th of May some observations respecting a Cyclone, I am induced to offer you the following remarks connected with the subject, feeling certain that discussion on these matters, when conducted with a feeling of courtesy, will be the means of increasing our knowledge of the laws which regulate hurricanes—a topic of great importance, and one which has occupied a large share of the attention of the scientific ever since Sir W. Read first propounded his valuable theory on the subject; and the more this can be simplified, and made practically useful to the seaman, the better. For twelve years ship-masters have been wandering in the dark. Sometimes the theory was found correct; at other times they were overwhelmed in the vortex of a storm, although pursuing the directions hitherto given for avoiding the danger. All those who have studied the theory of the Law of Storms are aware that in the southern hemisphere they travel from east to west, curving to the southward and S.E.. this is an established fact, but unfortunately it has been assumed that the curving of the storm takes place in given latitudes and longitudes. Now, a little consideration will show how incorrect such data must be to act upon. In the broad Atlantic, for a man to say to a homeward, as Cannis did to the sea, "Thus far shalt thou come, and no farther," is preposterous. It is well known that the island of Rodriguez is visited by more hurricanes than the Mauritius, and who can say but that many storms are to 5, 10, 15, or any number of degrees to the eastward of Rodriguez. This is so self-evident, that the custom of assuming a course for a hurricane is likely to be attended with most fatal results, as it shall show was the case with the Equestrian. Had the hurricane which that ship encountered been travelling W.S.W., the commander did right; but, when too late, he ascertained the storm was travelling further to the southward. I will quote from his letter. "On the afternoon of the 24th Dec. the wind, which had been blowing fresh from the eastward for some time before, increased as the sun went down to a hard gale at E.N.E." This fresh breeze at east in the trade was the precursor to the hurricane, and consequently, whilst this wind lasted, the centre of the storm was bearing north (for it is a fact which cannot be controverted, that in a circular storm every wind that is blowing must be at right angles to the centre of that storm); but when the wind shifted to E.N.E., the centre of the storm bore N.N.W.; consequently the ship was in the left hand semicircle of the storm's track. It is very evident the storm was not travelling south, for then there would have been no shift from E.N.E. nor S.E., for then it would have shifted to the southward of east instead of to the northward of east; consequently the track of the storm was somewhere to the westward of south; and laying-to on the port tack till the vortex had passed, which could easily be known by the wind veering to N.N.E. or north, would have been the most prudent plan to adopt. I subjoin a figure illustrating the foregoing observations, and I have avoided introducing particles, as they might tend to confuse.

Perhaps some of your readers may ask how the wind veering afterwards to E.S.E., S.E., and S.S.E., can be accounted for? Nothing is more easy: the ship was running; consequently, as soon as she was past the track of the storm, the wind would back to the southward of east. But I should take up too much of the valuable space in your Journal were I to enter more fully into detail: my views on the subject are already before the public; and I have much pleasure in forwarding to you a copy of my work, which fully demonstrates the truth of what I have written.

I am, &c.

"HAGAR."

PAINTED BY E. ARMITAGE

THIS very impressive picture from early Scripture history hangs in the West Room of the Exhibition of the Royal Academy.

The subject is the distress of the Egyptian bondwoman Hagar, in the wilderness of Beersheba, after she had been cast out with Ishmael by Abraham, thus narrated in the second part of the Book of Genesis, c. xxii.:

"And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her shoulder, and the child, and sent her away: and she departed, and wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba.

"And the water was spent in the bottle, and she cast the child under one of the shrubs:

"And she went, and sat her down over against him a good way off, as it were a bowshot; for she said, Let me not see the death of the child. And she sat over against him, and lift up her voice, and wept."

It is this scene of lamentation which the artist has here so powerfully portrayed. Hagar is the extreme abandonment of despair; she has thrown off her upper garment, and in agonising grief is wildly tearing her hair; and at a bowshot distance, beneath the bush, is the outcast child, typical of the wild man, whose hand, it was foretold, would be against every man, and every man's hand against him. The accessories are in correct taste: the cast-off dress, and the form of the bottle, implying a knowledge of the arts as practised before the Deluge, and imitated by Noah, his sons and his servants; though much in advance of the skin bottles which we see upon Egyptian monuments. The rocky background is characteristic of the wilderness, and completes the saddening scene of desolation, altogether unlike "a field which the Lord hath blessed." Ishmael afterwards made the desert into which he had been cast, his abode; and by attaching himself to, and acquiring influence over, the native tribes, rose to great authority and influence.

The Artist has, according to the practice of painters, made the child or boy a young man. This is not contrary to the Hebrew use of the word boy; for so all young men are termed, as Benjamin (Gen. xliii. 8), and Joseph, Joshua, and David, when he fought Goliah.

We find the following popular illustration of the subject of Mr. Armitage's picture in Dr. Kitto's valuable "Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature."

"The harmony of the weaning feast was disturbed by Ishmael being discovered mocking. This conduct gave mortal offence to Sarah, who from that moment would be satisfied with nothing short of his irrevocable expulsion from the family; and as his mother also was included in the same condemnation, there is ground to believe that she had been repeating her former insolence, as well as instigating her son to his improprieties of behaviour. So harsh a manner was extremely painful to the affectionate heart of Abraham; but his scruples were removed by the timely appearance of his divine counsellor, who said, 'Let it not be grievous in thy sight, because of the lad, and because of thy bond-woman: in all that Sarah hath said unto thee, hearken unto her voice: for,' adds the Targum of Jonathan, 'she is a prophetess.' Accordingly, what she said is called the Scripture (Gal. iv. 30), and the incident affords a very remarkable instance of an overruling Providence in making this family feud in the tent of a pastoral chief 4000 years ago the occasion of separating two mighty peoples, who, according to the prophecy, have ever since occupied an important chapter in the history of man. Hagar and Ishmael departed early on the day fixed for their removal, Abraham furnishing them with the necessary supply of travelling provisions. The Septuagint, which our translators have followed, most absurdly represents Ishmael as a child, placed along with the travelling-bags on the heavily-loaded shoulders of Hagar. But a little change in the punctuation, the observance of the parenthetical clause and the construction of the word 'child' with the verb 'took,' remove the whole difficulty, and the passage will then stand thus: 'And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water (and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her shoulder), and the child, and sent her away.'

"In spite of their instructions for threading the desert, the two exiles missed their way. Overcome by fatigue and thirst, increasing at every step under the unmitigated rays of a vertical sun, the strength of the young Ishmael, as was natural, first gave way, and his mother laid him down in complete exhaustion under one of the stunted shrubs of this arid region, in the hope of his obtaining some momentary relief from smelling the damp in the shade. The burning fever, however, continued unabated, and the poor woman, forgetting her own sorrow, destitute and alone in the midst of a wilderness, and absorbed in the fate of her son, withdrew to a little distance, unable to witness his lingering sufferings; and there 'she lifted up her voice and wept.' In this distressing situation the angel of the Lord appeared for the purpose of comforting her, and directed her to a fountain, which, concealed by the brushwood, had escaped her notice, and from which she drew a refreshing draught, that had the effect of reviving the almost lifeless Ishmael. This well, according to the tradition of the Arabs, who pay great honour to the memory of Hagar, is Zemzem, near Mecca."

AUSTRALIAN GOLD-DIGGERS AND YORKSHIRE WEAVERS

NEVER was the old proverb, "It is not all gold that glitters," more truly realised than in the golden discoveries of Australia. A wonderful change has been effected in the condition of the strong-backed gold-diggers, the storekeepers, and the innkeepers. The farmers all around the gold-fields of Bathurst, in New South Wales, and Ballarat and Mount Alexander, in Port Philip, are, as if by magic, provided with an inexhaustible supply of ready-money customers; and more than one of the owners of grants of land dating from the discovery of the pass over the Blue Mountains, which have long lain on hand unimproved and almost unsaleable, now finds himself at the same time in possession of corn land almost as valuable as in the best counties of England, and great gobbets of gold for the gathering. But these present and eventual benefits will be purchased at a sacrifice of property in the colony, and of manufacturing pre-eminence in Yorkshire, which our keen merchants and enterprising manufacturers have only just begun to foresee and understand.

In 1813, our importation of wool from Australia was little more than 70,000 lb.; in 1850 this had increased to nearly 40,000,000 lb., of a finer quality than can by any care be grown in England. This large increase in the growth of Australian merino wool has been accompanied by a very considerable increase in the quantity of our own coarse British wools, and by a diminution in our importations from Germany. Indeed we now export Australian wool to the Continent. The large supply, fine quality, and low price of Australian wool have not only enabled our cloth-manufacturers to lower the price and improve the quality of their fabrics, but have called into existence a number of new and beautiful textiles, under the name of "merinos," "alpacas," "barèges," "mousseline-de-laines," suitable for dresses, and also shawls, which in fineness of texture and facility of receiving dyes rival the best products of the Indian loom, which are consumed at home, and largely exported to every quarter of the globe. It is the cheapness of these goods that gives them so wide a market: that cheapness materially depends on the low price of the raw material. The Silesian clockowner, whose sheep have to be housed all the winter, and fed upon stored food, even if he could produce the quantity, could not afford to sell it at the same price as the Australian squatter (before the discovery of gold), whose flocks wandered the year round over natural pastures, without ever experiencing the chills of winter. But the discovery of gold—to be gathered for digging a few feet below the surface of the earth—has entirely altered and seriously endangered the position of the Australian wool-grower. Numbers of the wealthiest are now reaping the bitter fruits of short-sighted selfishness, against which they were warned in vain.

In Australia, on an average, each 1800 sheep require the care of three persons—two shepherds to lead or follow two flocks during the day, and a hutkeeper, male or female, to cook, and watch the two flocks at night. The shearing is usually done with the assistance of itinerating bands, who traverse the "Bush" at the proper season. The care of a shepherd in these vast uninclosed plains and open forest is indispensable to guard against the attacks of the dingoe, a sort of fox; the depredations of the blacks; the chances of a fatal disease, such as the scab, foot-rot, or catarrh, which are to be caught in certain districts; and the danger of losing parts of a flock. In lambing time, and when lambs are first weaned, extra care and trouble are needed. Sheep well managed increase seventy per cent. per annum; the average living increase of Australia has not been much short of forty per cent. It is thus steady, easy increase of the exportable raw material, wool, which has enabled the Australian population to be, in proportion to their numbers, the largest consumers in the world of British manufactures. The inhabitants consume on an average £8 9s. a head of British manufactures; and each Australian family produces exports, according to the calculation of Mr. Leslie Forster, of Port Phillip, to the extent of £87 10s.

The annual increase of sheep is partly restricted by the system of boiling down a certain number every year, and exporting them in the shape of tallow. To a great extent the increase of wool-bearing sheep depends on the increase of shepherds. Except for flocks of lambs, or ewes about to yean, any old man, woman, or child over eight years old, may be a shepherd. If the squatters had been prudent, they would long since have followed the wise and Christian example of a few who have now reason to congratulate themselves on a line of conduct once much ridiculed; they would have preferred married shepherds, who could give living hostages for their fidelity: and they would have encouraged the plan, tardily forced upon the colonial government in the year just past, of selling, wherever available, small freeholds of fifty acres, in which frugal shepherds might invest their ample savings, and, marrying, settle and breed up a race of young shepherds—a plan not adopted until the sale of large lots had ceased for ten years. It is well known that the great squatters, who, under the high-priced land system, have had a practical monopoly of the land, have preferred a stout bachelor bush servant, "who would draw the balance of his wages at the end of the year, spend them in a drunken debauch, and then be obliged to hire again." Men with wives and children have been abhorred, and small settlers on land especially detested.

Under the Wakefield system, which has been the curse of the labourer and the ruin of the capitalist who put faith in it wherever practised, our Colonial-office has permitted the selfish stockowners to dictate as to what class should be allowed to emigrate on the proceeds of the rent and sale of land, and has connived at obstructing the frugal labourer in the possession of land.

These errors are now virtually admitted; the Government does take some pains to place wives within the reach of bush servants, and does sell small plots, thus robbing the publican of his gains. But the discovery of gold brought all the criminal shortcomings of the "protection of capital system" home to the pockets of selfish wool-growers. The wandering bachelor vagabond class of shepherds, once so much in favour, have deserted to the gold-fields en masse; while the married shepherds, settled in their nice cottages, with gardens, on the estate of such men as Mr. Suttor, have stuck to their duties, or amicably arranged how and when to try their luck, leaving their families to perform their shepherding. The great flockowners, or squatters, who once demanded an able-bodied, subservient serf—if single all the better, if drunken none the worse, without family ties or, independent spirit—are now imploring the Emigration Commissioners to send the oldest, the feeblest, the fathers with the largest families. "Pray send us," they cry out, "some who will not want to go and dig gold—who are too old, too weak, or too fond of their wives and families to leave the ample wages, the comfortable huts, the gardens, the heifers, pigs, and poultry we now offer." The wool manufacturers of Yorkshire have taken the alarm and appealed in numerous deputations to the Earl of Derby and Sir John Pakington.

The appeal is late, and the consequences to Australia and to this country will be serious indeed. Fathers have been obliged to send for children from school, and set boys, and even girls, to look after their fleecy fortunes. A gentleman in the neighbourhood of Fort Phillip lately met with not less than six children of a wealthy squatter, on horseback, looking after flocks and herds. It will take years to repair the losses sustained in the next year, if vigorous means be not taken to supply the vacancies in the pastoral ranks. A squatter cannot afford to pay much more than £20 a year to a shepherd, with full rations, and £10 to his wife for cooking for her husband; £8 to a boy of ten years of age, with rations; viz. to each full-grown person 12 lb. of meat, 10 lb. of flour, 2 lb. of sugar, and ¼ lb. of tea weekly.

If we lose our Australian wools, and we shall lose half the supply, at the value of a million sterling, very soon, without more vigorous efforts than have yet been made, we shall lose, and perhaps never regain, valuable foreign markets. The effects of the mismanagement of emigration will soon be felt in Yorkshire.

Pauper emigration will never pay—emigrants of the right class are not to be draughted out like shorthorns or South Downs. You cannot take a father and mother and reject two or three children, or accept children and reject parents. You cannot apply an arbitrary gauge of trade, or age, or country, as the Emigration Commissioners do, if you want a perpetual stream of self-supporting emigration. You must induce the labouring classes to take up emigration for their own good, not for the good of their masters. All industrious people of frugal temperate habits will make good emigrants. A little help, a little courtesy, a little kindly paternal advice—not patronising, but sympathising—that is what is needed to save Australian sheepowners and Yorkshire manufacturers, and to make a great pastoral desert a populous prosperous empire. Government emigration is a failure, and something of a job: dilettante emigration is too costly to do much. As an example of what great colonial experience, large common sense, deep knowledge of human nature can do, with small means, the parties interested in Australian wool had better turn to Mrs. Chisholm, and the £7000 paid into her Family Colonisation Society's fund by the working classes. If we only show the way, prepare good ships, and explain the advantages, thousands of the working classes will pay their own passage much more quickly than any great Government scheme can be arranged and floated to its usual failure.

OUR COLONIAL EMPIRE.

THE discovery of gold in Australia has had the effect, among many others as remarkable, of directing public attention to the splendour and grandeur of our Colonial Empire. The great tide of emigration from our shores formerly flowed with a rapid and strong current towards the United States of America; for the people of England, as a mass, scarcely thought of our Colonies at all. To the Canadas, to Australia, to New Zealand, to the Cape of Good Hope, the annual emigration was a mere driblet, compared with the full stream that poured yearly to New York. When our Colonies were mentioned in Parliament, it was either in a tone of complaint or indignation against the Colonial Office, that persisted in misgoverning them, or with an impatient deprecation of demands thought to be unreasonable, which were made on the part of the colonists. But the mighty power of gold has operated a great change in the public feeling in this respect. The mind of the nation has been awakened to the full consciousness and appreciation of the fact, that our Colonies are not alone magnificent in extent and resources, but that they have been grossly neglected by the people, as well as by our rulers; and that in the times in which we live, while other nations are making such rapid advances towards an equality with us in all the arts that extend and maintain the power of States and Governments, it is not wise on the part of Great Britain to suffer those splendid possessions to be alienated, either by misgovernment or by neglect. We remember, at last, that we have a duty to ourselves to perform, as well as towards them—and that this double duty demands a closer and more cordial intercourse between ourselves and those transoceanic regions, where our language is spoken, and where our children live, than we have yet found it convenient to establish.

Australia, that has long had cause of complaint, has for the present forgotten most of her grievances, in gratulations over the abundant wealth that has recently been dug out of her streams and mountains. Her great want is men. She suffers one engrossing misery—the insufficiency of human hands to turn her resources to account, and prevent her real and tangible wealth—better than gold, and of which gold is purely the symbol—from being lost to herself and the world by the too great prevalence of the auro-mania among her scanty population. But Australia, though for the moment she has forgotten her old sources of complaint, will, sooner or later, remember and insist upon them again; and, with such treasures in her hands, she will not, in future, suffer herself to remonstrate as vainly as she has formerly done against the injustice which she must suffer under a system by which an official in Downing-street, often entirely ignorant even of the very geography of the Colony, is permitted to control her affairs. A Colonial Minister without knowledge, and with the distance of half the circumference of the globe between him and the subordinates to whom he transmits his orders, though he may have the best intentions, cannot fail to make grievous mistakes. The Canadas, though at present tranquil, are not so warmly attached to the Downing-street system as to be such firm friends of the British connexion as it is desirable they should be. These noble provinces, with the contiguous North American colonies which still acknowledge their allegiance to the British crown, are possessions which ought to be a source of strength and pride to their mother country. They cover a large extent of the American continent; they are favourably situated for trade and commerce as well as for agriculture, and, doubtless, possess mineral wealth as yet undiscovered which may make them quite as valuable as Australia. While midway, as it were, between the Canadas in the Northern and Australia in the Southern Ocean, we have the Cape of Good Hope—a colony which any leading power in Europe would be glad to take off our hands, even with all the expense and annoyance of the Kaffir war with which to debit the advantage of the transaction. India, that possession more magnificent than either, can scarcely be called a colony, but it is indubitably one of the most valuable portions of our wide empire. Were we unfortunately to lose it, the day of our glory would be at an end, and the sun of our greatness would have set for ever.

But though all these great possessions—each of them large and rich enough to constitute of itself, either now or at no remote period, a powerful empire—are situated at a distance from the little island of Great Britain which renders their government from the central point of London a matter of difficulty, the progress of science is such as virtually to bring them as near to us as John O'Groat's house was two centuries ago.

Time and space in 1852 are very different, as regards the power of man to make them subservient to his purposes, from what they were in 1652. When we shall be able to communicate with Australia in a month, with the Cape in a week, with India and with the Canadas by electric telegraph in a forenoon, our relationship towards those colonies and possessions must be more intimate than at present. And if we do not succeed in governing them more to their own satisfaction than we have hitherto done, it is likely that one by one they will imitate the example set by the United States of America, and declare themselves independent. With independence may come rivalry; with rivalry, that worst of all evils, war between nations of the same stock, language, and religion. In such a war, or series of wars, we might be defeated with shame; but we could scarcely conquer with glory.

It may be considered that, in speculating on such remote contingencies, we are endeavouring to look too far into the future; but it should be remembered that the present times differ from all others in recorded history, and that it is never too soon to guard against probable evils. Had we been a wiser nation and a wiser Government seventy years ago, the Queen of Great Britain might now have been Queen of North America, and Victoria the

GOLD IN AUSTRALIA. THE ROAD TO MOUNT ALEXANDER GOLD FIELDS, THROUGH THE BLACK FOREST, PROVINCE OF VICTORIA.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

First might have held her court in New York as well as in London. It is, therefore, possible that the day will come when it will be [illegible] the interest of the people in this small island to consider all these and our other colonies as integral parts of our empire, and thus prevent the dissatisfaction which among men of English birth and ideas will always exist, when there is taxation without representation. Had America possessed the right of sending even so few as half-a-dozen—or, perhaps, two—members to the British Parliament, it is probable that she would have remained firm in her attachment and loyalty to the British Crown. All our Colonies now are, and ever have been, more or less discontented. We do not see why Australia, the Canadas, the Cape, and India should not transact their own local affairs with as much freedom as York, or Edinburgh, or Middlesex, but for all imperial and national purposes be as strictly integral portions of the United Kingdom as Kent or Wales. The isle of Man and Canada are both separated from England by a sea, but seas are no longer such formidable barriers as they used to be before the days of steam and electricity. If it now take eight or ten days to reach America, it took as long in the days of Charles I. to go from London to Edinburgh; and, knowing of no insuperable objection in point of theory, we do not see why, on the mere pretext of distance, Canada and Australia should not now send members to the British Parliament for imperial purposes, as Caithness or Sutherlandshire did a century and a half ago. The United States, that are now running us so hard in the rivalry of greatness, possess but one real advantage over this country—space. But even in that advantage we might, if we pleased, not merely rival, but surpass them, by the simple process suggested by their own demands at the early period of the American Revolution. The admission to the British Parliament of members for Australia, the Canadas, and all our Colonies, is no extravagant idea. In the opinion of some of the wisest statesmen of America, as well as of Great Britain, a concession like this would have deprived the world of the necessity for a Washington, and made England and her great and growing competitor as identical or united in government as they are in language. And in 1852 Australia is not really so remote from London, in point of time, as New York was in 1782. Such a union of the Colonies with the parent state, if operated now, would consolidate the British empire, and prevent its future disintegration. It would prove no revolutionary theory, but a conservative act; and although the time is not ripe for its consummation, the discussion of the subject is not without interest. It is good occasionally to look beyond the narrow boundaries of the present; and, although not in the secrets of Mr. Disraeli, and unable to say whether such a project has ever entered his mind, or is shadowed forth in the third of the seven great points which he says are to be decided at the approaching general election, "Whether our colonial empire shall be confirmed and maintained," we must say that the possibility of the consummation we have hinted at seems to us, in the words of that eminent person, "to loom in the future.

GOLD IN AUSTRALIA.—THE ROAD TO THE MOUNT ALEXANDER DIGGINGS

We have been favoured by a Correspondent at Melbourne with the Sketch engraved upon the preceding page: showing the road to the newly-discovered Mount Alexander Gold Fields, through the Black Forest; whither, we learn, the Government of South Australia are about to open a more direct road, in order to bring the gold thence under escort to Adelaide.

The following extract from a letter dated Sydney, Feb. 4, relates to this field:—"There is nothing very new here except that the favourite digging at present is in the neighbouring colony of Victoria, at a place called Mount Alexander (Mitchell's original name being Mount Byng, under which name you will find it in the maps). There the gold is turned up by tons."

A letter from Hobart Town, dated Jan. 30, states:—"Mount Alexander is the centre where Van Diemen's Land men assemble, and their labour is paid in gold of their own finding. I give you a fair example:—Five gentlemen formed a party to the diggings, and after five days' work divided £1800. A young clerk in a lawyer's office here raised £400 in three weeks. One very young man, the family I knew to be in a state of beggary, went hence two months ago, and has just returned with £1000. There is no mistake about the gold fields, and the abundance of their produce. Nothing else is talked of here; it is all, 'Go, go!'"

THE DANISH SUCCESSION.

The treaty between her Majesty, the Emperor of Austria, the Prince President of the French Republic, the King of Prussia, the Emperor of all the Russias, and the king of Sweden and Norway, on the one part, and the King of Denmark on the other part, relative to the succession to the Crown of Denmark, which was signed at the Foreign-office in London on the 8th of May, was ratified on Saturday at a meeting of the plenipotentiaries of the above-named Sovereigns, held at the Foreign-office. Owing to the absence of the Emperor of Russia from St. Petersburg, the ratifications on the part of that Power have not yet arrived.

The following is the text of the several articles:

Art. 1. After having taken into serious consideration the interests of his monarchy, his Majesty the King of Denmark, with the assent of his Royal Highness the Hereditary Prince, and his nearest of kin called to the succession by the Royal law of Denmark, as well as in concert with his Majesty the Emperor of All the Russias, chief of the elder branch of the house of Holstein-Gottorp, having declared his desire to regulate the order of succession to the States in such a manner as that in default of male issue in the direct line of Frederick III. of Denmark, his crown may be transmitted to his Highness the Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Glucksburg, and to the descendants sprung from the marriage of that Prince with her Royal Highness the Princess Louisa of Sch eswig-Holstein-Sonderburg Glucksburg, born Princess of Hesse, in the order of primogeniture from male to male; the high contracting parties declare that they will not views which have determined the adoption of this combination, bind themselves by a common agreement, whenever the eventuality contemplated may arise, to recognise in his Highness the Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Glucksburg, and his descendants male, sprung in direct line from his marriage with the said Princess, the right to succeed to all (à la totalité) the States actually united under the sceptre of his Majesty the King of Denmark.

Art. 2. The high contracting parties, recognising the principle of the integrity of the Danish monarchy as permanent, bind themselves to take into consideration each ulterior overtures as his Majesty may think it proper to make them, if (which God forbid) the extinction of the heirs male, in the direct line, of his Highness Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Glucksburg, by his marriage with the Princess Louisa, should become imminent.

Art. 3. It is expressly understood that the rights and reciprocal obligations of his Majesty the King of Denmark and of the Germanic Confederation, concerning the Duchess of Holstein and Lauenburg, rights and obligations established by the Federal Act of 1815, and by the existing federal law, shall not be altered by the present treaty.

Art. 4. The high contracting parties reserve to themselves the right of bringing the present treaty to the knowledge of other Powers, by inviting them to accede to it.

Art. 5. The present treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at London within the space of six weeks, or sooner, if possible. In faith of which the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty, and affixed their seals to it.

Done at London, May 8th, in the year of grace 1852.

LAUNCH OF THE CUNARD STEAM-LINER "ARABIA."—There was launched, on Wednesday afternoon, from the building-yard of Messrs. R. Steele and Co., Greenock, the Arabia, the largest of the magnificent fleet of steamers belonging to the British and North American Steam Navigation Company. Her dimensions are as follows:—Length, including cutwater, 312 feet 4 inches; length, excluding cutwater, 297 feet 10 inches; keel and forerake, 285 feet; breadth between the paddle-boxes, 40 feet 9 inches; depth of hold, 27 feet 7 inches; length of keel, 277 feet; bread ft, including paddle-boxes, 65 feet 6 inches; tonnage, new measurement, 2402 tons. The engines are of the side-lever class, to be supplied by Mr. Robert Napier, of Glasgow. They will be of 350-horse power, but are expected to work up to 1000. It is understood that the building and fitting up of this ship will not cost less than £16,000.

The proprietors of the Cunard line of mail steamers, which communicate between Liverpool and New York, are about to establish a line of steamers of the first class to Panama, with a view to acting in concert with another line of steamers which is to ply across the Pacific to Sydney, &c.

A fine salmon, weighing 46 lb., was, a few days ago, taken at Oldbury, near Thornbury.

FRANCE.

The question of the confiscation of the Orleans property may now be considered as set at rest. The decision of the Council of State (which we noticed in our late edition last week) has been given in the conflit raised, on the 28th of April last, by the Prefect of the Seine, on the subject of the confiscation decree of the 22d of January. In their decision, the Council of State have adopted the "conclusions" of M. Maugne, the Government commissioner, and have confirmed the "conflict" in so far as it deprived the judicial tribunals of the power of entertaining demands for discussing the legality of the said decree, or for determining the sense, or regulating the execution thereof, with respect to the Princes of the Orleans family; and they have annulled the part of the "conflict" which would remove from the civil jurisdiction the examination of questions that might arise relative to the private property which they hold in virtue of hereditary right. The President of the Republic having given his approbation to the judgment by attaching to it the formula "Bien jugé" and his signature, and the decision of the Council of State being sovereign, the matter may now be considered as finally settled.

Another conflict of a very different character has arisen in a quarter where such a disagreement with "the powers that be" was least expected, viz. the Corps Législatif; and the subject of it is the excessive expenditure of the national finances of the present Government, as exhibited in the Budget for 1853, which the Government lately submitted to the consideration of the Legislative Body.

The Budget having been in due form referred to a committee of the Chamber, M. Chasseloup-Laubat, who was appointed by the committee to draw up a report on the subject, produced a document, so condemnatory of the extravagant outlay of the Government of the Prince President, and his conclusions and recommendations were so strenuously maintained by the Legislative Body in opposition to the Council of State, that Louis Napoleon thought fit to intervene personally in the affair, and to show his displeasure at the unlooked-for spirit of independence and opposition evinced by the Legislative Body in thus coming into collision with the Executive on so vital a point as the finances. His communication to the committee in question was conveyed through the Minister of State to the President of the Legislative Body, intimating that the Committee on the Budget, in continuing to reject, by their amendments, certain articles of the Budget, after those amendments had been disallowed by the Council of State, had taken an unconstitutional course.

This message, which brought Louis Napoleon personally into direct collision with the Legislative Body, was presented in that assembly on Tuesday, towards the close of the discussion on the question, at the whole of which discussion Louis Napoleon himself was present in one of the side galleries. The committee, nevertheless, maintained that its decisions and conclusions were sound and just; and in consequence of this insubordination it is surmised that Louis Napoleon will dissolve the body, in the hope of a new election resulting in a more obsequious assembly.

The decision of the Council of State is the one which will stand. The differences between the two bodies consisted, in effect, in this—that the Budget committee of the Legislative Body, while ready to allow the increase of salary to different functionaries, yet proposed savings to the extent of about 28 millions, of which 10 millions were for reduced army expenditure; whereas the Council of State rejected all proposals of the kind. All that the Council of State would admit with regard to reduction was a diminution of the credits for the Cherbourg and the Cette Railways of about 7,000,000f., with some other matters, which, however, would allow for general services only a reduction of 1,635,000f. The committee also raised objections to the new Police Ministry, as calculated to clash with other administrations, and finally persisted in recommending, contrary to the Council of State, a series of reductions, of which the most serious is the suppression of 800,000f. for secret service money demanded by the police.

A statue of the Prince President, of a larger size than those which have been hitherto placed in the public markets, was inaugurated, on Monday, in the Marché St. Germain, with great ceremony. The statue in question is cut in fine Tonnerre stone, and is 1 metre 30 cent. in height. The local authorities, with the clergy and a detachment of the National Guard, and a military band, were present. A grand ball was given in the evening, for the benefit of the poor.

The Count de Chambord, it is said, has written another letter, dated the 10th instant, in which he declares that his political friends will refuse to take the oath of allegiance to the Prince President.

Several newspapers having lately relaxed in appending the signatures of the writers to the articles inserted, have received an official intimation that a continuance of such conduct will expose those journals to the penalties fixed by the law upon that subject.

The provincial journals continue to give details of considerable damage caused by the overflowing of the rivers. Several bridges have been carried away, and at Saint-Leger-de-Peyre eighteen houses were thrown down.

The Moniteur (Government gazette) announced on Saturday last that from the 1st of July it is about to reduce its price to 40f. per annum. The present price is 112f. This will be a serious blow to the press, and especially to the Government journals. It is said that the Moniteur will shortly be printed at the Palais Royal. The chief editor, M. Grun, will be placed under the immediate control of three State functionaries, who are to see that no writer shall be engaged for that journal but who is favourable to the existing Government.

Viscount Edward Walsh, the proprietor of the old château of Chaumont, on the Rhone, is now resisting the châteaux, upon which he proposes to lay out as much as 150,000f. The Minister of Public Works had allotted to the Viscount 22,000f. in aid of the restoration, from a large fund at his disposal for the purpose of restoring historical monuments. The claim of Chaumont to be so considered consists in its having belonged to Catherine de Medicis and Diana of Poichers. It having, however, been suppressed certain quarters that this 22,000f. was the price of Viscount Walsh's adhesion to the present Government, he has written to refuse the money, and to say that he is, as ever, a stanch Legitimist.

Count d'Orsay has been appointed superintendent of the fine arts to the Elysée, with a salary of £1000 a year. The President has placed at the Count's disposal £12,000 from his private purse, to make purchases with.

M. C. Reille, a captain on the staff, has refused to take the oath, and has consequently forfeited his commission. Captain Reille has been twenty-one years in the service. He was an orderly officer to the Duke de Nemours.

A despatch from Constantine of the 13th, addressed to the Governor-General of Algeria, announces that the insurrection of the Harractas has been put down.

The first batch of convicts sent to Cayenne arrived there on the 13th ult., in the Allier corvette. During their voyage they conducted themselves with great propriety, and expressed a determination, for the future, to lead a reformed life.

The Brussels Emancipateur of Tuesday was stopped at the French Post-office, because it contained an account of the proceedings of the Council of State.

CANADA.

The intelligence from Canada by this week's mail is of a disastrous character. The city of Montreal has been visited with a most destructive conflagration, which has laid in ashes a considerable number of buildings in the lower part of the city. The fire commenced at six o'clock A.M. on the 6th inst., at the corner of St. Peter and Lemoine-streets, in a carpenter's shop; and a strong south-west wind prevailing, the conflagration was not subdued until the Custom-house, Old St. Andrew's Church, several exchange and railway offices, and a considerable number of other buildings, were consumed. The damage is estimated at £250,000 to £300,000. Two lives were lost in the house where the fire commenced.

WEST INDIES.

The latest accounts from Jamaica are dated May 29, and are of the same gloomy character which the last mail came past marked the advices from this quarter. Small-pox and measles were still ravaging the lower classes at Kingston and St. Ann's.

The want of labour was still being urged, but great opposition was offered to the introduction of North American immigrants at the expense of the colony.

The popular question of retrenchment was again being agitated, and the public seemed extremely desirous to reduce the very expensive and heavy establishment of the country. The inordinate salaries paid to the public officials could not be any longer supported; and even if the British Government should afford the colonies protection, still it would be highly necessary to curtail the enormous salaries paid to the public officers, which in round figures added together amount to no less than £350,000 a year.

From the other islands there was no news of interest.

At Demerara the yellow fever prevailed, and was very virulent.

INDIA.

A telegraphic despatch of the 22d inst. from Trieste announces the arrival there of the Overland Mail, with accounts from Bombay dated May 22.

On the subject of the Burmese war there is no recent intelligence from Rangoon. Our forces still remain there until the termination of the rainy season; and should the war continue, additional troops will be sent from Bombay, Bengal, and Madras. At Bombay two European and four native regiments have been selected for this service.

From India Proper we learn from the north-west frontier, that Sir Colin Campbell has been again called forth, with considerable forces, to act against the native tribes.

In the Nizam's territory a discovery has been made of the existence of a frightful system of Thuggee. Five hundred murderers have been found, and the names of 320 rebellious Thugs obtained: 120 are in prison, and the majority have confessed the crime.

From the Nizam's territory it is announced that his Highness is willing to liquidate his debt to the East India Company by a cession of territory.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

CHELSEA PENSIONERS.—The Secretary-at-War has issued the following circular to each of the staff officers in command of the respective divisions of Chelsea pensioners:—

As employment may probably be provided during a couple of months, for some of the most active and intelligent of the pensioners who are capable of acting as instructors in infantry drill, it is requested that the same be made generally known among those under their superintendence; that about ten of this description will probably be required from each district to drill the militia, after the ensuing harvest, provided they are found qualified, and willing to volunteer for that duty on the following terms:—1. The pay to be 1s. 6d., in addition to pension, but without distinction as to the rank of the pensioner. 2. The same allowances in regard to barracks or billets, travelling expenses, marching money, messing, &c., as in the regular army. 3. They will be provided with the usual suit of clothing. 4. Any enrolled pensioners, or, if they are already enrolled in the local force, they will be allowed the use of that clothing, but they will be expected to keep up a proper supply of necessaries at their own expense. 4. Every pensioner engaged for this duty must, in the event of his having to remove from his home during the period of his employment, leave at least sixpence a day out of his pension for the support of his wife during his absence, with threepence per day additional if he have only one child, or a sixpence a day if he have two or more children. Should the pension be less than these amounts, the whole must be applied to prevent his family becoming chargeable to the parish in his absence. Before recommending these men the staff-officer must use his best endeavours to ascertain, not only that they are capable of drilling recruits, and inform them that they will probably be inspected and examined by another officer as to their capacity in this respect before being finally approved for this duty. The pensioners recommended should not exceed forty-seven years of age, and a preference should be given to enrolled men and those who are recently discharged.

LAUNCH OF THE "CRUIZER" WAR STEAMER.—The launch of this vessel took place at three o'clock on Saturday last, at Deptford, in the presence of Captain R. S. Dundas, C.B., superintendent of the dockyard; Commander Dundas, C.B., Captain Craufurd, and a number of ladies and gentlemen connected with the naval departments. Mr. Wallace, master ship-wright, directed the launch, and Miss Fortall named the vessel with the usual ceremony. The following are her dimensions. She is to be fitted with engines of 60-horse power, by Messrs. George and Sir John Rennie:

	Feet.	Inches.
Length between perpendiculars	160	0
Ditto keel for tonnage	140	7½
Breadth extreme	31	1½
Ditto for tonnage	30	8½
Depth moulded	13	9
Burthen in tons, old measurement	737	57/94

Draught of water 10 feet 10½ inches aft, and 6 feet 5 inches in the forepart of the vessel. She was commenced building on the 28th April, 1851. The Hornet, screw steam-sloop, a sister vessel in every respect, and building in the adjoining slip, for engines of 60-horse power with screw-propeller, will now be brought forward for launching.

STATION OF THE WEST COAST OF AFRICA.—A return has been recently printed showing the number of her Majesty's ships on the west coast of Africa, the date of their being commissioned, their complements, and the number of guns with which they are armed. There are 21 vessels on the list, of which 7 are sloops, 2 brigs, 2 steam-vessels, 1 steam-ship, 1 steam-vessel and 1 store-ship. There are, in addition, 3 vessels ordered home—2 steam-sloops and 1 steam-vessel. Out of the 24 ships 16 are commissioned in the year 1850, the remaining 8 in the year 1851. The complement numbers 2305, and the number of guns 139. The ships were built from 1831 to 1850. There was one built in 1820, and one purchased in 1845.

LORD FREDERICK FITZCLARENCE.—On Saturday evening the Court of Directors of the Hon. East India Company, as is their hospitable custom, gave a farewell entertainment, at the London Tavern, to Lieut.-General Lord Frederick Fitzclarence previous to his departure to take command of the troops at Bombay. The dinner took place in the grand banqueuing-room, which was decorated with unusual splendour for the occasion. The company was exceedingly numerous and distinguished, comprising the Duke of Cambridge, the ex-Rajah of Coorgh, cabinet ministers, dukes, marquesses, and earls, and a long array of distinguished military officers, almost every one of whom was decorated with the knightly insignia of the Garter, the Bath, or the Thistle. Sir James Weir Hogg, chairman of the Court of Directors, presided.

WOOLWICH ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY.—A board of general officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers assembled at the large hall of the Practical Class of Gentleman Cadets at the Royal Arsenal, at ten o'clock on Tuesday, for the purpose of examining the gentleman cadets who had gone through a course of instruction to qualify them for commissions in the Royal Artillery or Royal Engineers. Lieutenant-General Sir G. W. Pasley, K.C.B., and a number of officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers, were present during the examination. Lieutenant-General Sir John F. Burgoyne, in presenting the highest prize (a magnificent sword) to Mr. Ravenhill, of the Practical Class, expressed his satisfaction with the excellent report he had received of his good conduct, and made a few appropriate remarks to encourage others to follow his example. Several other prizes were awarded "for acquirements, or great proficiency in study."

ARMY PRIZE-MONEY.—It appears by a Parliamentary return printed on Wednesday, that the total amount of unclaimed army prize-money, from the 1st January, 1849, to the 31st December, 1851, amounted to £1,405,555 19s. 7d. Of this amount, £720,015 was paid to the claimants; £97,501 was paid for expenses incurred in executing acts; £557,739 was paid for the Patriotic Fund; in addition to the above sum, £30,000 was voted, and the balance, £30,000, was paid to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests for appropriation towards the Royal Military Asylum.

COURT-MARTIAL.—A court-martial was held on board the Victory, flag-ship at Portsmouth, on Wednesday, consisting of Admiral Superintendent H. Prescott, president; Capt. Chads, H.M.S. Excellent; Capt. Martin, H.M.S. Victory; Capt. Lord, H.M.S. Rodney; Capt. Henderson, H.M.S. Hecla; Capt. Jones, H.M.S. Sampson; and Capt. Giffard, H.M.S. Progon. Mr G. L. Gresham was deputy judge-advocate of the fleet, to try Lieut. Seccold, Capt. Warden, of H.M.S. Retribution, prosecutor; and the prisoner was defended by Mr. Low, solicitor. The charge against the prisoner was, that he had, on the 17th instant, been guilty of neglect of duty, being then officer of the watch of the Retribution, and that when called to account for his conduct by the senior lieutenant of the ship, Lieutenant Wilkes, he had accused that officer of acting "very impertinently." The court was of opinion that the charge was fully proved, with the exception of the word "very" in connexion with "impertinent," and adjudged the prisoner to be dismissed from H.M.S. Retribution, and to lose one year's rank in the Royal Navy. They also expressed their great regret at finding the misunderstanding that existed in reference to the proper position of the first lieutenants on board ship, and which misunderstanding is calculated, if it continued, to be attended with serious results to the public service.

On Saturday last a Court of Directors was held at the East India-house, when Lieutenant-General Lord Frederick Fitzclarence, G.C.H., was sworn in as Commander-in-Chief of the Company's forces on the Bombay establishment, and second member of Council at that Presidency.

The following general officers have been placed upon the list of those receiving the distinction of a K.C.B. per Gazette of 25th inst.:—Major-General Robert G Manse, K.H.; Major-General Faris Bradshawe, K.H.

The war frigate Resistance, which formed one of Nelson's fleet at Trafalgar, but which has lately been converted into a troop-ship, arrived in the Clyde on Saturday with the 42d Highlanders on board from Halifax, N.S.

On Monday her Majesty's steamer Arrogant, 46, Captain Robinson (senior officer); Dauntless, 24, Captain Halsted; Highflyer, 21, Captain Matson; and the Pantaloon, 14, Captain Gordon, sailed from Spithead for a trial cruise to tween Portsmouth and Gibraltar. Captain Sir Baldwin Walker, K.C.B., Surveyor-general of the Navy, went to sea in the Arrogant, but will land at Plymouth.

The steamer Pearl, of Hartlepool, was destroyed by fire on last Saturday night when about 50 miles E. by N. off Yarmouth. Her crew, we had taken to the boats, were subsequently safely picked up and landed at Yarmouth. The cause of the fire is unknown.——On the 16th inst. the American barque Sea Bird, from Newcastle, struck upon the Skerry of Stroma, St. John's Channel, Pentland Firth, where she remains a fixture. Crew saved.——The Lady Huntley, belonging to Maryport, from Swansea, has been lately wrecked on the bar of the South Bull, but no lives were lost.

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

According to the Morning Herald, which is regarded as the organ of the present Government, Parliament will not be dissolved on the 1st of July, as had been generally supposed, but within the first eight days of the ensuing month. No particular day, however, has been fixed upon up to the present time.

In the House of Lords, on Saturday last, the case of Mr. Spry, who was arrested for his debts, and proceeded to the House to give evidence, was heard, and an order was issued for his immediate discharge.

At no previous period in the history of the port of Liverpool, has there been so much activity in the shipping and trade of the Mersey as at the present time in the emigration trade, the chief current of which has set in for Australia. Upwards of 1800 emigrants will leave Liverpool and Birkenhead for Port Phillip and Sydney in the course of next week alone.

Sunday last, being the fifteenth anniversary of the accession of Queen Victoria, the Royal standard was hoisted at the different dockyards throughout the kingdom, and the usual rejoicing took place.

Two additional lines of steamers are about to be established from Liverpool to China, the one by the Cape of Good Hope, Batavia, Panama, and the Pacific Ocean; the other by the route of the South Atlantic and the Indian Oceans. These two enterprises will form a complete line of British steam navigation round the globe.

About eighty acres of land in and near Southampton are now let to poor men of that town, to cultivate as vegetable gardens, not more than twenty rods being let to one man, to prevent sub-letting, and none but labouring men or mechanics are allowed to be renters. The poor men cultivate potatoes, cabbages, beans, and peas on these plots after they have left their ordinary work. Although most of the land is without fence, and with public thoroughfares through it, the crops remain safe. Above 200 allotments have been staked out.

A further report respecting the Encumbered Estates Court was lately issued. On the 12th inst. the number of petitions in which absolute orders for sale had been made, or which were ripe for such orders, was 1000, and remained unsold, was 93. The total estimated rental of such lands so remaining unsold is stated at £600,000.

MUSIC.

CONCERTS OF LAST WEEK.

The programme of the morning concert at the Hanover-square Rooms on Monday last, in aid of the funds of the Hahnemann Hospital, was anything but an unfortunate one. There was quantity and quality in the musical prescription, while the names of Miss Messent, Miss Mitchell, Mdlle. Lossing, Mdlle. Rose Braham, Miss Dolby, Signor Gardoni, Herr Reichardt, Mr. Frederick Lee, Mr. Land, Mr. Weiss, Mr. Wrighton, Mr. F. Bodda, Mr. Lavator (who made his mirth-provoking parody, "Robert le Diable") : the accomplished pianists, Mdlle. Goldner, M. Sidney Pratten, M. Lavigna, Piatti, and Bottesini, with Benedict and Pilotti as accompanyists.—Vieuxtemps was the lion of the sixth matinée of the Musical Union, on Tuesday: he played in Mozart's Quartett in G, No. 6, with Herr Pollitzer, M. Ury, and Piatti; and in Beethoven's trio in C minor, for violin, viola, and violoncello. Herr Hallé performed Beethoven's Sonata, E flat, Op. 29, and Mendelssohn's Capriccio in E.——The scheme of the fifth concert of the Quartett Association, on Wednesday, at Willis's Rooms, was, as usual, novel as well as interesting, opening with a well-written quartett in G, No. 14, Op 152, by J. L. Ellerton, Esq., an amateur, and executed by Sainton, Cooper, Hill, and Piatti. In Beethoven's posthumous quartett in B flat, No. 130, Mr. Cooper was the first violin. A great treat was afforded by the magnificent performance by Sainton and Cooper of Spohr's duo concertante for two violins, in D minor, Op. 39. M. Emile Prudent's clever pianoforte performance concluded a delightful matinée.——Mr. and Mrs. John Ros, assisted by the Misses Poole, C. Felton, F. Stirling, Messrs. G. Tedder, W. Grover, F. Smith, Barsham, and F. Bodda, vocalists; Miss Rose and Mr. J. F. Cooper, pianists; Mr. R. M. Ward, trumpet, and Mr. F. Coatterton, gave an evening concert on Wednesday, at the Music Hall, Store-street.——Miss Arabella Goddard had her annual concert on Wednesday night, at the Hanover-square Rooms. Besides the charming pianoforte performances, she was aided by Piatti, Bottesini, Sainton, Hill, Herr Kuhe, Mr. F. Mori, Misses Birch, Milne, Macfarren, Miss Dolby, M. Fédor, Signor Biletta, Signor Gnia Asin, &c. She played in Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Quartett in D minor, No. 3; and, with Sainton, Beethoven's Sonata in G, Op. 30. She also executed Bach's Prelude and Fugue No. 8, in D, and No. 4 of Mendelssohn's seven characteristic pieces (7 pensieroso in A, besides Thalberg's "William Tell" fantasia, and proved herself fully capable of grappling with all schools and difficulties, modern and ancient. Miss Dolby was encored in a pretty ballad, composed by Miss A. Goddard, "I pass by your own," and M. Fédor was called upon to repeat a romance by Clapisson, "Mon ame à Dieu, mon cœur à toi."——The fourth and last meeting of the English Glee and Madrigal Union took place at Willis's Rooms, on Thursday, with Miss Louisa Pyne, Mrs Edza Birch, Miss Dolby; Messrs. Land, Francis, Swift, and F. Bodda.——The second matinée musicale of Mdme. Pleyel was recorded as the event of the week in the world of fashion. A large assemblage of fashionable and artistical celebrities, on Thursday, at Willis's Rooms. The unrivalled pianiste performed the pianoforte part of Mendelssohn's Quartett in B minor; having Vieuxtemps for first violin, M. Urie, viola, and Piatti for violoncello. With Sivori, she executed Beethoven's Sonata in F. Her single pieces were an adagio by Hummel: "I Pirata," by Kalkbrenner; and some of Rossini's "Soirées Musicales." Mr. Swift and Mdme. Pascati-Tasca received the instrumental portion of the programme. An encore having call on our columns this week prevents us from devoting the space to this remarkable matinée which its merits deserve: let it suffice that the fournet of the nobility could not fail to be delighted as on any previous display of her matchless performances.—On Friday there were three meetings to engage the attention of the amateurs: in the morning was Mr. Sterndale Bennett's fine pianoforte playing, at the Hanover-square Rooms, assisted by Sainton and Piatti; at the Queen Anne-street Rooms a new pianiste of considerable promise, Miss Emma Goodman, made her début in works of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, S. Heller, and Chopin, with the co-operation of Herr Ganz, Madame Zimmermann, Herr Reichart, Signor Ciabatta, Miss Kate Hickson, and the Misses Broughan. Joachim's concert, with full orchestra, conducted by Heller, cannot be summarily dismissed, and our notice must, therefore, be reserved until next week.

MUSICAL EVENTS.

The recital of classical and modern pianoforte music of Mdlle. Clauss last Saturday, at Willis's Rooms, took place in the midst of a thunder-storm, but the enthusiasm of the numerous and fashionable audience was not affected, and the playing of the young and gifted pianiste was truly magnificent. Nothing could be more intellectual than her reading of Beethoven's trio in B flat, in which she had for coadjutors Joachim and Piatti. Her delivery of the presto scherzando of Mendelssohn was impulsive and elegant. She sang the nocturne in E, of Chopin, most exquisitely; and she evidenced her charming powers in a C sharp with such astonishing vigour and precision as to command a rapturous encore. In the moonlight sonata of Beethoven, and in Thalberg's "Sonnambula" fantasia, Mdlle. Clauss made her last appearance, which was equally at home, and she won the unanimous suffrages of the distinguished professors as well as of the amateurs, who filled the room to repletion.——Signor Regondi's second matinée musicale took place on Saturday, at the Hanover-street Rooms, with the co-operation of Mr. R. Blagrove, Mr. C. Salaman, M. Frédin, Madame Macfarren, Signor Marras, and Mr. Whitworth.——The seventh concert of the Amateur Musical Society took place last Monday, at the Hanover-square Rooms, under Mr. Osborne's direction.——The musical engagements for the ensuing week will include the eighth and last Philharmonic concert, the seventh meeting of the Musical Union, the seventh and last meeting of the Quartet Association (with Madame Pleyel's final appearance), the seventh and last of the London Wednesday Concerts, the annual concert at Exeter Hall in aid of the excellent institution the Chiland Home, the third meeting of the English Glee and Madrigal Union.——Mr. Carter Lee terminated last night, at Willis's Rooms, his first series of musical entertainments.

THE FUTURE OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—Arrangements have been entered upon by the directors of the Crystal Palace Company, in conjunction with Sir Joseph Paxton, Messrs. Fox and Henderson, Mr. Owen Jones, and the other gentlemen engaged in the re-construction of the edifice, and in the formation of the grounds. The total length of the building will be 1833 feet, its breadth remains width 384. The new palace will undergo several modifications. It will have three transepts two of the same size and height as the original transept, and a central one of 130 feet span, 108 feet higher than the two smaller. The roofing of the transepts, as well as of the whole of the nave, will be arched, and the ribs will be of wrought iron instead of wood, as employed in the old transept, the former material being used, not for the sake of durability only, but with the view also of assuring the whole of "glass" of the arches, and of preventing its being thrown on the adjacent flat roofs of the aisles. The glass for the new roofs will be all 21 ounces, instead of 10 ounces per square foot. The general form of the ground on which the building will be made available for the various works below the floor line, necessary for the heating of the interior, for machinery, and for the stores required in a building of a permanent character. This basement story will be formed of cellars, arched over, with brick arches fitted to receive the earth for the plants above The disposition of the gal-eries will be much modified. It is determined that they shall not run along the nave, as at present, but shall be principally due to the outside walls, coming forward only at those points where they will command the most striking views. The interior will be arranged on the following general principal. At one end the climate and vegetation of those of the tropics, gradually changing, until at the centre transept a temperate climate and temperate vegetation are reached, which will prevail throughout the remainder of the building. Portions of the palace will be occupied with quadrangles similar to the fine art or medieval courts of the Exhibition. Many additions will be made to represent the manners, costumes, &c. of different countries. For instance, one court will form an Indian bazaar, with adjoining refreshment and reception rooms. Here all the Indian articles will be collected in as vivid and characteristic a manner as possible. Another quadrangle will be devoted to the illustration of China. A third will contain a reproduction of one of the courts of the Alhambra, by Mr. Owen Jones. There will exhibit a Pompeian house fully restored. In one of the smaller transepts there will be Egyptian antiquities, casts from the celebrated reliefs, illustrative of the trades of Egypt, and from the most noted statues—although not exactly like the originals, and so disposed as not to be a mere dead collection of individual objects, but a lively reproduction of Egyptian manners and things as another part there will be produced a Mexican museum. Steps have been already taken to procure collections of sculpture, of architecture, and of ornaments, illustrating the progress of those arts from the commencement to the present time. The sculptures will include the finest works of the great masters of ancient and of the modern schools. Many of the latter—the compositions, for instance, of Rauch, Schwanthaler, Cornelius, and Schnorr—the English public know scarce by name, and will be made acquainted with for the first time. The architectural collection will form a progressive series, with which will be mingled the industrial arts and manufactures of the middle ages. All these, by means of casts, are within reach of the directors, and the effect of the combination of statues and foliage will be as new as it is striking. A large space will be set for geological specimens, arranged in the order of the strata, accompanied by maps, views, and models of the country, specimens of vegetation, &c. Modern machinery and manufactures will be largely represented in the sections of materials from their raw states, in every progressive condition up to manufactured articles. The intention of all the museums within the building will be educational. They will not constitute mere collections of curiosities, but will serve only to those who are beforehand acquainted with the illustrated subjects, but they will be arranged so as to exhibit the connection and progression of all the subjects. It will be impossible for the spectator to take interest in what he sees without deriving instruction from its observation. Up the centre of the nave fontains of various descriptions will play. The principal, or Victoria Fountain, in the nave will play 150 feet high—that is to say, 50 feet higher than the Nelson column in Trafalgar-square. There as every reason to believe that within a twelvemonth the Crystal Palace will be once more open to the public.

A deputation waited on the Earl of Derby at his Lordship's official residence, Downing-street, on Saturday, in order to urge upon his Lordship the necessity of adopting measures to prevent the Crystal Palace or its grounds being opened to the public on Sundays. The deputation was favourably received. His Lordship admitted the great importance of the object the deputation had in view, and promised it should have his best consideration in case the interference of the Government were required by the Crystal Palace Company.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

For the annual benefit of Signor Fanzi, the celebrased performer on the horn, a portion of the first act of Rossini's "Semiramide," with the last act of "La Sonnambula," sustained by Mdlle. Cruvelli and Signor Gardoni, were given, followed by various choregraphic combinations. Mdme. de Lagrange's Sons rumides, if any of them had existed before, decided the question as to her pretensions to be a dramatic singer: as a clever executant of roulades must she be content to rest her fame in this country. Mdlle Angri sings and acts the part of Arsace with much feeling and energy that it might be worthy the consideration of the management to present her in the leading contralto characters, such as Tancredi, Malcolm in "La Donna del Lago," Romeo, &c. She has made great progress this year in subduing the former exaggerations in her style and in acquiring refinement. Signor Balletti seems at present to be the only successor of Tamburini in the Rossinian parts, exacting from a basso the vocal volubility of a soprano. If Balletti were a better actor, and would infuse more warmth in his method, his great musical attainments would be twice as effective.

On Saturday was the fourth representation of Beethoven's "Fidelio;" and on Tuesday Bellini's "Norma" was repeated for the fourth time. Mdlle. Cruvelli sustains with unshrinking determination her onerous duties: she has been the stay of the establishment this season, and too much praise cannot be awarded to her for her loyalty and courage. Owing to some misunderstanding with Signor Gardoni, whose engagement expired on the 12th inst., and whose name was announced for Pollio, considerable delay took place in commencing "Norma" on Tuesday; and, ultimately, Mr. Alfred Bunn chirped the indulgence of the audience for Signor Bettini, who sang instead of Gardoni Bellini's "Puritani" was revived for Thursday; but "Il Barbiere" was given in its place, for the sixth time, with Mdlle. Cruvelli, Calzolari, Belletti, Ferlotti, and Lablache; followed by the new ballet of M. St. Georges, "Zelia, ou l'Amour et la Magie"—the dances and action of which, and the music composed by M. Benoist. Mdlle. Rosati sustained Zelia, or the Fairy; Mdlle. Rosa was Fleur; Mdlle. Esper, Water; Mdlle. Lamoureux, the Air; Durand, the Prince of Samos; and M. di Mattia, the Magician; and Venafra and Gouriet, the attendants on the Prince. The argument of the French piece, if not very novel and ingenious, affords the requisite opportunities for scenic display, of which Mr. Charles Marshall has of course availed himself, and for some clever choregraphic configurations, including the grand Pas des Elemens, danced by Rosati, Rosa, Esper, and Lamoureux, assisted by the inventor, M. Durand, who has also contributed "L'Amoreux Valse" for Rosati and himself. There is also a grand bacchanale, danced by Louise Fleury and the pantomime portion of this fanciful ballet treats of the efforts of the Magician to unite his adopted child, Zélie, with the Prince of Samos. The latter is forced by a spell, like Ferdinand in the "Tempest," to the call of this French-fashioned fairy, whose Zelia before his eyes is the type of the "ideal"—"of the earth, earthy," in fact. The Prince is inclined to be a polygamist, and at his request the necromancer embodies in human form the other elements; and these supernatural ladies naturally contend for the possession of a magic flower, given to the Prince by the Magician, which flower has the virtue or vice of causing the wearer to be loved by whomsoever he might love. In this contest Fire yields to Water, and Water in turn to Air; but ultimately, with the help of the Burning Sun, Air dies away, and the Child of the Earth revives. After divers temptations, the Prince devotes himself exclusively to Zélie, and agrees to abandon his inclination for magic, and devote himself to love. The ballet was received with the greatest satisfaction, and the dancing of Rosati drew down thunders of applause. The "Pas des Elemens" will be, no doubt, very popular. Signor De Bassini will appear this night.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Meyerbeer's "Roberto il Diavolo" was given for the second time on Saturday night, and was honoured by the presence of her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Duke and Duchess of Montpensier, and the Duke and Duchess d'Aumale. Herr Formes has resumed the part of Bertramo. On Tuesday "Roberto" was repeated, in place of the announced "Puritani," Mario being indisposed. On Monday a representation took place for the final subscription night of Tuesday, September 7th: Donizetti's "I Martiri" was performed for the fifth time. The state of the house did not justify this experiment. For the extra night on Thursday, Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" was announced for the whole time. Spohr having obtained from the Elector of Hesse permission to visit London, the rehearsals of "Faust" are actively pursued under his direction By his engagements his services are exclusively secured to the Royal Italian Opera, and he has, therefore, been compelled to decline the offers of the Philharmonic Society and Sacred Harmonic Society to conduct performances at their meetings.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, were present on Thursday night.

Mdlle. Wagner has left town for the Continent; and Madame Grisi will appear forthwith as Adia in the "Prophète," as Madame Viardot's health will not allow her to sing this season.

ST. JAMES'S.

On Saturday we were treated by Mr. German company to a specimen of Lysing's drama, the "Emilia Galotti," to which the author perpetually refers as "Dramaturgie" as an example of the principles on which dramatic production should proceed. Casting aside stiff French models, without repudiating their chief principles, Lessing rejected the modern romantic form that theatres which had attained a classic interest.

In the "Emilia Galotti" it is the old story of "Virginia;" but Lessing has so much altered the treatment after the manner of Knowles, though not equalling himself with the story as it stood. His catastrophe wants apparent outer motive for its justification. Lessing has been more successful in his additions to the Duke and Duchess of Montpensier, and the Duke and Duchess d'Aumale. Conception, and was supported with persistent energy by this very skilful actress. Herr Devrient's character was a very brief and unsatisfactory one; but shows the consummate art on the part of the eminent actor, who was thus willing to sacrifice himself to it—to strengthen the cast of the play.

On Tuesday Goethe's wonderful "Faust" was put upon the stage, the hero by Devrient, and Mephistopheles by Keehn. It would be presumption to dilate on this production, "Faust" having been so frequently translated in this country, and criticisms without number written on it. Frau Schroeffer was the Margaret, and acted in the last scene with remarkable power. The manner in which the whole poem (we use this word advisedly, rather than drama) was performed reflected credit to the credit of all parties concerned. Each laboured as it success depended on his own undivided efforts, and the result was accordingly was highly gratifying. On Tuesday Schiller's play of "The Robbers" was enacted; but as this drama has frequently and recently been produced on the English stage, the mere recital of the fact is on the occasion sufficient.

Schiller's "Song of the Bell" was finely declaimed by the German actors on Tuesday week, accompanied with portions of Romberg's music.

HAYMARKET.

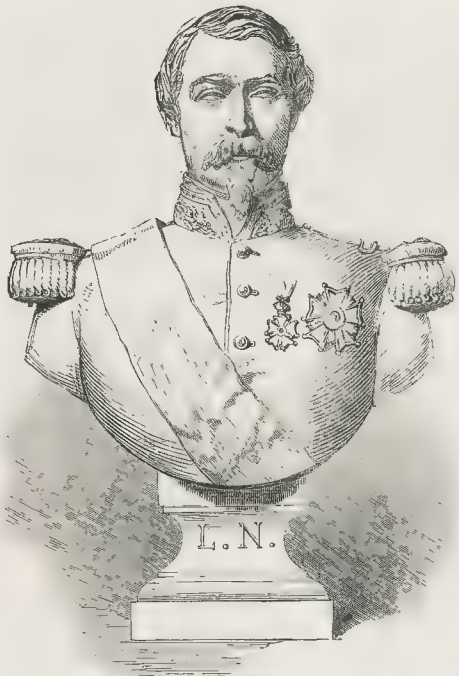
Mr. Buckstone's five-act comedy of "The Foundlings" has been repeated. The plot and structure of the piece are as extravagant as they are amusing. Dixon and Jackson, two parish infants, deposited in a basket, found at a door in Berners-square, grow up to be men, and Jackson being of the gentle sex, wrapped up, Dixon (Mr. Buckstone) seeks to discover his friend's parentage, thinking it to be a profitable speculation. Ultimately, he falls in with one Molekin (Mr. Keeley), a wealthy individual, converted to a Puritan preacher, who consents, for the sum of £2000, to put him in possession of the secret. To raise the money, Dixon has to consent to be (what does the reader think?) bitten by a mad dog, in order that a Dr. Crowl (Mr. Lambert) may gain a reputation for the cure of hydrophobia. The result is that he finds himself the legitimate Earl of Eaglefield, and Jackson to be son of a printer. There is also an underplot, in which one Pamela Pudsters (Miss Fitzwilliam) rents the fashionable houses of noblemen and nobles, in favour of poor Dixon; and thus the humble, but faithful, bootmaker earns the unexpected distinction of a coronet. Buckstone and Keeley are always in this piece in most amusing contrast, and the mirth excited by it exceeds all recent example.

MR. BARKER'S DIORAMA OF NINEVEH.

Mr. C. Fiott Barker, who furnished the drawings for Mr. Burford's Panoramas of Nineveh, has lately had great success at the Hopetoun Rooms in Edinburgh, where on Monday week the completion of a course of very interesting lectures on the subject, amply illustrated by beautiful dioramic views. He commenced his route at Scanderoon on the coast of Syria; and continuing that journey by Aleppo and other towns, proceeded across the Euphrates, and onwards to Nineveh. The spectator was led over the mounds of that ruined city, and shown the excavations, with the long-buried sculptures and inscriptions which have lately disinterred. He was then taken to the Assyrian Obelisks, and afterwards brought to the coasts of Syria by a different route, amount to ninety-five, and they were accompanied with a description of a great variety of Oriental airs. Such an exhibition is of exceedingly instructive.

ROYAL POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.—The chemical professor to the establishment, Mr. Pepper, has been engaged during the past week in the subject of fermentation, with especial reference to the bitter ale and beer of the eminent Burton brewers. The lecturer commenced his discourse by explaining the process of malting and fermentation, with the addition of hops. After expressing the highest encomiums of the cleanliness, order, and management of the brewing operations conducted at Burton—to which he alluded to the detection of scrychine, which was proved to be very easily and inexpensively were displayed with Otto's and Lewis Thompson's, and a new discovery of the lecturer, which was capable of detecting the presence of one grain in a gallon of liquid. These tests had all been applied to the beers of London and Burton; and Mr. Pepper was enabled most emphatically to declare that bitter ale, as prepared at Burton, was really a genuine article, and made only of malt, hops, and spring water.

FETE CHAMPETRE AT CHARLTON HOUSE.—The annual fête in aid of the funds of the West Kent Dispensary, generously permitted by Sir Thomas Maryon Wilson to be held in the private grounds of Charlton House, took place on Wednesday, and passed off with the eclat which has heretofore attended it. The company was exceedingly numerous, and there was great attraction for all. Barry's band, a tight-rope ascent, a very creditable flower show, and three military bands contributed to the perfect success of the fête, through which a very considerable sum will be secured to the charity.



BUST OF THE FRENCH PRESIDENT, LOUIS NAPOLEON.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JULY.

THE fashionable world has remained in Paris much later this year than customary; balls, fêtes champêtres, and divers amusements have detained the gay world beyond the usual period, which is generally Easter. Every one is now on the eve of departure; and had it not been for the chilling weather which we experienced for some time, the flight would have taken place much earlier, and the votaries of fashion would have been at watering-places, or in their chateaux.

The barège, gaze de laîne, and gaze de soie, which until now have been exclusively for summer wear, have given way to to mousseline and organdi (book muslin). The latter is printed, and is wonderfully improved by the pattern being so printed as to suit the intended make of the dress, such as albanaises, &c.—from those having borders of flowers at the bottom, which decrease as they ascend to the waist, to detached bouquets and the most simple stripes. Seven flounces on the skirt are much worn, though rather heavy and stiff; they are close to each other, though we prefer much three flounces. When dresses are so fully trimmed at top, it is necessary to put less fulness in the skirt, and to look to the size of the wearer, so as to make the ornaments of the dress proportionate. There are ladies by whom the seven flounces cannot on any account be worn; they may, instead, have seven bouillonnes, or silk pinked, whipped in the middle, and not making the skirt too full, which will be found a most elegant and graceful dress for a petite lady.

Besides the dresses we have mentioned on former occasions for watering-places or the country, such as organdi, silk, velvet, and gaze, we must now add, for morning wear, the embroidered muslin, which, in case of need, with a coloured petticoat under, makes a charming evening dress, and is, at all events, a most elegant attire for morning. The most recherché are the embroideries en tablier, rather thick at the bottom, gradually diminishing up to the waist; a black lace shawl, and a bonnet of puckered tulle, or wide drawings of the same colour as the under dress, forms, altogether, a most elegant toilette. In fact, embroidery is used for all articles of ladies' dress: it cannot be too heavy or too rich. The pardessus, which have been set aside for some time, appear again for the country. They are made of different shapes, either for warmth or lightness, and often of the same material as the dress, and in silk wadded, lined, or without. This is convenient for evening.

Manteletz Talma, with hoods, are also worn: they have the advantage over the pardessus, that for evening the hood may be used.

We borrow from the last century for morning dresses all that is elegant and recherché. The embroidered muslin peignoirs, lined in rose-coloured silk, braided bows of ribbon, which we find extremely graceful in our pastels of the last century, are now high fashion, and nothing is more elegant and graceful. Twills, with coloured ground, pattern white, are a very pretty morning dress; the pardessus, of the same material, rather tight to the waist, and trimmed with broderie Anglaise, or merely a scollop on the stuff. For morning, barege organdi are worn, printed grey on a plain ground: the patterns bouquets or scrolls; but in either case simple and sober. No change has taken place in the sleeves or fichus: they remain as we described them to be last month.

INAUGURATION OF THE BUST OF THE FRENCH PRESIDENT

ON the 7th inst. the Bust of Louis Napoleon was inaugurated with much ceremony in the market of La Vallée, in St. Sulpice, at Paris. Early in the morning the façade of the market was tastefully decorated with tri-coloured banners, and garlands of flowers and evergreens, as for a fête. The great hall of the market was also splendidly ornamented; and the walls were hung with tapestry and trophies, amidst which were inscribed "Honneur et Patrie!" "Vive le Président!" &c. Towards two o'clock a procession was formed, headed by the band of the 37th regiment of the line; and the Bust was borne to the church of St. Sulpice, where mass was performed with great pomp; after which the procession returned to the market, followed by a great crowd of spectators. The mayor of the arrondissement, assisted by several officers, then duly installed the Bust in its place; an appropriate discourse was delivered by the chief magistrate, and was followed by loud cries of "Vive Louis Napoléon!" and thus terminated the ceremony. The Bust, which our Artist has Engraved, is of the design hitherto approved of by the authorities for being placed in all public places where the people of France desire to have the presentment of their ruler.

ST. THOMAS CHARTERHOUSE SCHOOLS, GOSWELL-STREET.

THIS edifice, the founding of which we engraved in our Journal of May 1, will consist of a basement and three other stories. The basement will in front be occupied as a kitchen and laundry, and, with vaults under the street, will form an industrial department for teaching some of the girls household duties. The back part will be occupied as a play-room. The front rooms of the ground and one pair stories will be school-rooms for 198 girls. The back room of the ground story will be an industrial room for the instruction of 173 boys in different trades. The one pair back room will be an infant-school for 280 infants. The upper story will be occupied, front and back, as school-rooms for 336 boys.

The building will be adapted altogether for upwards of 1000 children.

The whole of the stories (except the basement) will be 15 feet high in the clear. The floors will be fire-proof, formed with wrought-iron girders and hollow brick arches, and covered with metallic lava.

NEW SCHOOL OF ST. THOMAS, CHARTERHOUSE.

The architect is Mr. Robert Hesketh, of Wimpole-street. The style is the Byzantine or Romanesque, and the exterior will be of red bricks.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

(FOURTH NOTICE.)

A. RANKLEY has selected a powerful scene from the life of Eugene Aram, as described in Hood's ballad (No. 238). It is where, after his crime of forgery, having escaped from the world, he is engaged in the humble functions of an usher: he enjoys a seeming repose, but is still a prey to poignant remorse, which the ordinary religious observances of a well-regulated school only serve to render more and more intense. To him heavenly prayer and praise bring no consolation:—

> Oh Heaven, to think of their white souls,
> And mine so black and grim!
> I could not share in childish prayer,
> Nor join in evening hymn:
> Like a devil of the pit I seem'd,
> Mid holy cherubim!

This work (of which we give an Engraving) is admirably composed and full of meaning. The innocent expression of the scholars' faces, that of the rev. schoolmaster, happily ignorant of the darker offences against society, the prim formality of the young lady accompanying the Evening Hymn on the harpsichord, comprise a group in which a man laden with sin, and bowed down with humiliation as Eugene Aram is, can form no part; and his face would betray the fact to all, if they were not too intent upon their own happier thoughts. In the details, particularly in the variety thrown into the heads of the juveniles, there is much to praise.

Elmore has two pictures which will serve to maintain his well-earned reputation as an original and thinking artist. No. 248 is "A Subject from Pepys' Diary"—Mr. Hales painting, "my wife's portrait" in the character of St. Katharine, and "while he painted, Knipp and Mercer and I sang." The picture divides itself into two parts. In the foreground we have the author of the "Diary" enjoying himself to the top of his bent with wine and vocalisation; whilst at his side sits the patient wife, whose face, though only seen in a side view, wears a tone of sadness which betokens that she is not quite at her ease in the neglect to which she is habitually subject. The portrait painter, who stands in the rear, has a very business-like air, intent on his subject, and, with his brush in hand, appears to indicate to the sitter a slight alteration in the position of the head. The expression of all the personages is well indicated; the colouring warm and satisfactory. No. 353, "The Novice," is an imaginary subject—a young girl just consigned to a nunnery, recalled to the thoughts of the world without by a gay pageant passing beneath the window. Within all is cold and rude in furniture and appliance; and through the door are two aged nuns; and a grave-yard tells of the dark monotonous fate to which our novice is doomed. This picture, though ingenious in design, and carefully painted, is not quite so much to our satisfaction as the more lively scene the subject of his other work.

We have already spoken of Mr. W. C. Thomas's "Laura of Avignon," described in a former Number. The peculiar formality observable in the arrangement and treatment of the figures will be appreciated on an inspection of our Engraving, but the story will not be understood except by the aid of the lines of the poet, which, therefore, we reproduce :—

"The sage Sennuccio, as he walk'd of late
Beyond the city, met my sainted love,
I...vd and saluted her with reverent state,
As noble hearts their admiration prove.
While she with holy book—calm thoughts of good,
Glided unconscious of all outward show,
In the regality of womanhood.
The light of virtue beaming from her brow.
A coxcomb lounging in the public way,
With head inverted, tricked in full conceit,
Expectant sought regard from her sweet face :
"Thou fool!" Sennuccio cried, which made some stay,
Who laughed outright at that poor fop's self-cheat,
So blind is folly to meet holy grace.

We understand that Mr. Thomas rejects being classed in general terms with the new "Pre-Raffaellite" school, and, we believe, belongs to a narrower circle, styling themselves "Idealists." Now the distinction between the "Idealists" and "Naturalists" at the earlier periods of the "revival" in Italy is well known to those read in the history of art; but we confess we cannot see how it is realised in the work before us, which wants the real, unaffected devotional character which engrossed the whole attention of the Idealists of old. Whatever may be said of the composition, however, the colouring is reprehensible as being utterly regardless of the rules of harmony. The prevailing tone is a cold grey, the only bright spots being the crimson and green cloak of Sennuccio, the olive and amber cloak of Laura, and the crimson doublet of the coxcomb.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 26, 1852.

A MAN who lives within his income, a Government with a surplus revenue, and a nation with capital increasing faster than population, have always a store to fall back on, and the disasters to which all are liable, such as deficient harvests, only lessen their means of enjoyment. Such disasters, however, crush the man in debt, revolutionise a Government which has exhausted its resources, and degrade or extinguish an improvident nation. The year 1847 was notoriously unfavourable, the harvest in France was very short, it filled up the cup of suffering; the resources of the people were exhausted by the exactions of the State, they had no superfluity to fall back on, and the destructive revolution of 1848 ensued. Late accounts from France inform us that in the southern departments the rivers have overflowed their banks, and destroyed all chance of a crop in their vicinity for the present year. The apprehensions entertained for the general harvest there are not yet great, but the price of corn is rising, and the stock of flour in Paris is becoming less. France has little more than one string to her bow. The bulk of her people are agriculturists. Like the Irish with their potatoes, and the West Indians with their sugar, the French limit their production too much to one article. There is in France comparatively a small manufacturing population, to work up in good seasons the surplus of the agriculturists, and constitute a national granary of the very best kind. A harvest deficient one-fourth diminishes the resources of an exclusively agricultural people fully to that extent; but where the manufacturing population is double that of the agricultural, as in England, such a misfortune only diminishes their resources one-eighth, and the privation falls comparatively light on all. A deficient harvest, therefore, is very much to be dreaded in France. Since 1847 the harvests there have been almost uniformly good, and the immense extent of land under the plough or the spade has enabled her to export a great deal of wheat and flour. But in proportion to that extent will she suffer when the harvest fails, and she has no great store of food from former years should the present harvest be deficient. The people will suffer much, and the Government will be unsafe. Then the additional taxes which we noticed last week will be reckoned up, and discontent, if not disturbance, will ensue. Then the refusal of the Council of State, or, in fact, of the Executive Government, to curtail the public expenditure 28,000,000 francs, as recommended by the budget committee of the Corps Legislatif, will be remembered as a great error, and will operate very unfavorably to the Government. Even as it is, the most important function assigned to the Corps Legislatif by the present Constitution has been virtually abrogated, and the real nullity of that body clearly shown. It has kicked against its master, but seems likely to be strangled, leaving nothing to mediate between the extravagant demands of the Government and the narrow means of the people, and to check the exactions of the former, but the violence of the latter. Within three months the floating debt of France has been increased 46,000,000 francs, and for 1853 will exceed that of 1852 by nearly £2,000,000: but France is already living fully up to her means; and a deficient harvest, with such a vast increase to her debt and her expenditure, will be for her a terrible disaster.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

The Queen and the Prince Consort have several times during the week appeared in public—at the opera, the theatre, and in the parks. Her Majesty continues, we rejoice to add, in the enjoyment of excellent health.

On Saturday last, the Queen and Prince Albert, attended by the Countess of Desart, Major-General Buckley, and Colonel Bouverie, left town at a quarter before five o'clock in the afternoon, and paid a visit to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess de Montpelier, at the Old Palace on Richmond-green. In the evening her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert honoured the Royal Italian Opera with their presence.

On Sunday the Queen and the Prince, accompanied by the Princess Alice, took a drive in an open carriage and four. The Equerries in Waiting attended on horseback. In the evening her Majesty and his Royal Highness, with the Duchess of Kent, honoured the Princess' Theatre with their presence.

On Tuesday morning his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Bouverie, was present at a brigade field-day, in Hyde Park, at half-past eight o'clock. His Royal Highness commanded the brigade, consisting of the 1st Battalion Coldstream Guards, 2d Battalion Scots Fusilier Guards, and a detachment of the Grenadier Guards. In the evening the Queen and the Prince, with the Duchess of Kent, honoured the performance of the German plays with their presence.

On Wednesday the Queen held a Court, at three o'clock, at Buckingham Palace, at which his Highness Said Pacha, uncle of the Viceroy of Egypt, was introduced to her Majesty. His Highness was attended by M. Musurus, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from the Sultan of Turkey. At an early hour in the morning her Majesty and the Prince Consort, with the Princess Royal and the Princess Alice, paid a visit to the Exhibition Building in Hyde Park. In the evening the Queen had a dinner party, which included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary, the Duchess of Northumberland, &c.

Lord Byron has relieved Lord Crofton in his duties as Lord in Waiting to the Queen, and Sir Frederick Stovin has relieved Major-General Berkeley Drummond in his duties as Groom in Waiting to her Majesty.

On Thursday the Queen and the Prince, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, Prince Alfred, and the Princess Alice, visited Westminster Hall, and afterwards inspected the new Palace of Westminster. In the evening the Queen and the Prince, with the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, received the Royal Italian Opera with their presence

FASHIONABLE ENTERTAINMENTS.

The Duke and Duchess of Northumberland gave a grand banquet on Saturday last, at Northumberland House, to a party of thirty distinguished guests. The Duches subsequently threw open her salons for the reception of a brilliant and numerous circle of visitors.

The Duchess of Beaufort gave a ball on Monday evening, at Beaufort House. Her Grace was honoured with the presence of several members of the Royal family, and a brilliant circle of the aristocracy.

The Earl and Countess of Hardwicke gave a grand banquet on Saturday evening, at their mansion, in St. James's-square. Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, and a distinguished party of the nobility. After the banquet, the Countess had an anteroom concert, which was attended by upwards of 300 members of the fashionable world.

The Countess of Wilton had a grand ball, on Wednesday evening, at the family mansion in Grosvenor-square. Their Royal Highnesses the Duchess of Cambridge and the Princess Mary, and his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, honoured her Ladyship with their presence

Viscount and Viscountess Jocelyn gave a grand banquet on Saturday evening, at their mansion, in Carlton Gardens, to a distinguished party of the corps diplomatique and aristocracy. Her Ladyship had afterwards a "reception," which was attended by a brilliant circle of rank and fashion

Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess de Nemours visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, on Tuesday, at Clarence House, St. James's.

His Royal Highness Said Pacha, uncle of the Viceroy of Egypt, has arrived in town from Paris, and has taken up his residence at Mr Moses Montefiore's house, Grosvenor gate, Park-lane.

His Excellency the Belgian Minister and Madame Van de Weyer have left Portland-place for Antwerp, en route to Ems

THE ARCHBISHOPS AND COLONIAL BISHOPS.—On Tuesday afternoon a conference of bishops was held at Lambeth Palace, at which are on a visit to this country, by the members of the University of Oxford. The Rev. Dr. Jacobson, Regius Professor of Divinity, read the address which accompanied the presentation. The Bishop of Melbourne and the Bishop of Western New York severally returned their acknowledgements. Shortly after the presentation of the testimonial the company adjourned to the hall, where they partook of luncheon. At the close the "loving cup" went round, and the Rev. Mr. Sewell, the vice-rector, who presided, pledged the meeting to amity.

NEW CHURCHES.—The Queen has approved a recommendation of the Commissioners for Building new Churches, for assigning a district, set forth in a plan annexed, to the church of St. John, in the parish of Richmond, Surrey, and also the recommendation of the said commissioners for assigning a district to the church called Christ Church, at Worlon, in the parish of Potterne, Wiltshire.

ETON CHAPEL OF EASE.—The fund for the erection of a new chapel of ease in the parish of Eton has been augmented by a donation of £100 by her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

THE ARCHDEACONRY OF SODOR.—An order in council has been published, ratifying a scheme, proposed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, for augmenting the income of the archdeaconry of Sodor, in the diocese of Lincoln, by the annual payment of £170 out of the common fund mentioned in the 3d and 4th Victoria.

THE DEANERY OF YORK.—The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have been authorised by an order in council to sell and convey certain land and tenements belonging to the deanery of York.

SALARIES TO COLONIAL BISHOPS.—A return to Parliament just printed shows the salaries of the colonial bishops. The highest salary is £3000 a year, and the lowest £500. Some are paid out of the parliamentary grant, others out of the Consolidated Fund. In two cases the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel contributes a portion, and in another case the Church Missionary Society has to pay £600 a year towards the salary of the Bishop of New Zealand.

OXFORD.—In a Convocation holden on Monday, the plan prepared by Mr. Johnson, with certain modifications, for providing a suitable building in the Botanic Garden for the reception of the Fielding Herbarium, was submitted for approbation, and agreed to.

THE REV. MR. GLADSTONE.—Mr. Gladstone has come to the determination to accept an offer on the part of Sir Culling E. Eardley, Bart., and some friends, to become the minister of Farrow-cross Free Episcopa. Church, [illegible] Devonshire. He will consequently give up all thoughts of any appeal to the Privy Council, and satisfy himself as far as the law of the case is concerned, with what he has seen in the Court of Arches.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE ENLARGEMENT, BUILDING, AND REPAIRING OF CHURCHES AND CHAPELS.—This society held a meeting on Monday last, at 7, Whitehall; His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury in the chair. There were also present the Bishops of Winchester, Bangor, Worcester, Salisbury, St. Asaph, and Lichfield; Earl Howe, the Rev Sir Chas. Farnaby, Bart.; Sir R. H. Inglis, Bart., M.P.; the Venerable Archdeacon Jones, the Hon. and Rev. A. Duncombe, the Rev. Robert Tritton, &c. Including a few cases deferred at the last meeting, the committee had before them no less than 37 app ications for aids, to 29 of which grants of money were made amounting in the whole to £34[illegible].

CORPORATION OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY.—A court of assistants of this very ancient corporation was held at their house, Bloomsbury-square, on Saturday last, for the purpose of distributing the Midsummer benefactions. Sir Robert Harry Inglis, Bart., M.P., was in the chair; and amongst the governors present were the Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, K.G., the Archbishop of Bangor and Oxford, the Rev. and Right Hon. Lord John Thynne, Archdeacon Hale, the Revs. Dr. Vivian, John Jennings, Mr. Serjeant Channell, &c. The funds for distribution were principally derived from bequests by Dr. Taylor, Mr. Myddleton, and Miss Clark, for poor clergymen "with good characters and large families," and for other poor clergymen not having large families, but suffering under distressed circumstances from age, sickness, temporary loss of duty, or otherwise. Miss Elizabeth Jackson's bequest was for the Sons' special fund which was recently established, and the augmentation of which the governors have much at heart, came happily in aid. Out of the entire number of 138 applicants 74 received grants of £10 or £20 each, from Mrs. Cam's and Mr. Myddleton's Fund; 52 were awarded £20 each from Mrs. Cam's fund; and 10 had grants from the other funds. The total sum thus distributed was £1080.

COLONIAL CHURCH BILL.—The bill introduced on Wednesday into Parliament by Mr. Gladstone to relieve the bishops, clergy, and laity in the colonies, in connection with the United Church of England, from certain legal disabilities affecting the management of their church affairs, proposes to enact, that the bishops, clergy, and laity in the colonies shall have full power to meet together, and to make regulations for the better conduct of their church affairs, subject to the local regulations respectively, and to such provisions as they may think proper to enact. The bill then goes on to declare that it shall not be lawful to impose any temporary or pecuniary penalty or disability, other than loss of the emoluments of any ecclesiastical office or benefice, under any sentence or proceedings affecting the tenure thereof. The regulations made on the occasion of these meetings to be only binding upon the before-mentioned parties within the particular colony. The consent of her Majesty necessary to give authority to these regulations. The subordination of the bishops, clergy, &c. to the see of Canterbury is to be recognised by their regulations, except upon the consent of the Archbishop of the said see, signified under his hand and seal. The sixth clause is as follows:—"And nothing herein contained shall be held to authorise any such regulation which shall direct or allow the bishop of any diocese to confirm or consecrate, or to ordain, or to license or institute any person to any see, or to any pastoral charge or other episcopal or clerical office, except upon such person having immediately before taken the oath of allegiance to her Majesty, and having likewise subscribed the Thirty-nine Articles, and having furthermore declared his unfeigned assent and consent to the Book of Common Prayer; but if such see, pastoral charge, or episcopal or clerical office be in a foreign country, then the oath of allegiance need not be required to be taken by such persons."

THE REV. JOSEPH BROWN, the rector of Christ Church, Blackfriars, according to his annual custom, invited all the children in his schools, with their parents, and the inmates of the workhouse—in all, 2500 guests—on Monday, in an entertainment provided for them at the Star and Garter, Kew Bridge, Richmond, providing them with railway tickets, &c. In the course of the afternoon Mr. Stanley, in the name of a large body of the parishioners, presented the rev. gentleman with a handsome silver cup, with the following comprehensive Bible," elegantly bound in blue morocco, clasped, and bearing on a silver plate, inscribed in the cover, the following inscription:—"Presented to the Rev. Joseph Brown, Rector of Christ Church, Surrey, by the teachers, children, and working classes of the parish, in grateful acknowledgment of his Christian liberality, and also for the untiring and indefatigable zeal displayed by him in promoting their temporal interests as well as their spiritual welfare.—June 21, 1852." The presentation was accompanied by a suitable address. The rev. gentleman, who evidently laboured under strong emotions, briefly acknowledged the compliment paid him, and stated that in all he had done he felt he had only performed his duty.

A CENTENARIAN PREACHER.—On Monday a religious service was held in the Rev. Dr. Fletcher's chapel, Finsbury Circus, when a Sunday-school teacher, and occasional preacher, in his 100th year, delivered an address. The venerable preacher had all the appearance of a man about 70 years of age.

NEW ACT TO ASSEMBLE PARLIAMENT AFTER A DISSOLUTION.—On Wednesday the new act was printed to shorten the time required for assembling Parliament after a dissolution. It enacts, that no writ for calling Parliament shall by her Royal proc anation appoint a time for the first meeting of the Parliament of the United Kingdom or Great Britain and Ireland after a dissolution or demise of the crown to be less than eight days, or more than less than thirty-five days after the date of such proclamation, the Act of the 6th year of Queen Anne, c. 8, or the Act of the 7th and 8th years of William 3, c. 25, or any other statute or statutes to the contrary notwithstanding.

It is stated that an extensive blight among the beans has manifested itself in the West of England within the last few days.

Lord Primate Beresford has contributed £3000 for a magnificent bell tower at Trinity College, Dublin, of which his Grace is Chancellor.

The Lords of the Treasury have agreed to pay to Mr. Goldsworthy Gurney the sum of £120 per annum, for license to use his patent light in the House of Commons and the library thereof, such payment to date from the year 1847, and to continue during the period of his patent. Mr. Gurney memorialised the Treasury to the effect that he had saved the public £50000 within the last few years by the use of his patent, and that he considered he was entitled to the half of that sum.

AGRICULTURAL PRIZE AT PORT NATAL.—A handsome silver cup, value twenty guineas, has been given by an agricultural society formed at Pietermaritzburg, Port Natal, for the best show of wheat in three years, a promising incentive for a young colony. The cup was manufactured by Messrs. Jones and Sec, of Liverpool.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

NOMINATION OF SHERIFFS.—A Court of Aldermen was held on Monday, in consequence of a requisition to the Lord Mayor, for the consideration of the nomination, at the last court, of two gentlemen to fill the office of Sheriffs of London and Sheriff of Middlesex. Alderman Hooper moved that the entry of the two names Mr. Grissa and Mr. Moore, whom he had put in nomination at the last court for the office of sheriffs, be struck off the minutes, on the ground that these gentlemen had since declared that they would be seriously inconvenienced by the obligation to serve at the present time. Alderman Thompson seconded the motion. A long discussion took place, in the course of which Mr. Harrison stated that, last year, he had negotiated five gentlemen without having consulted one of them. He would move as an amendment, that the gentlemen nominated by him in his mayoralty should be inscribed in the election. Several members expressed a doubt as to the legality of the whole of the proceedings of the Court, and a great deal of confusion and contradiction took place. Alderman Hooper's motion was ultimately negatived by the casting vote of the Lord Mayor against it. It is stated that the two gentlemen who were nominated by the Lord Mayor had each of them paid the fines of £400.

SOCIETY FOR IMPROVING THE CONDITION OF THE LABOURING CLASSES.—The eighth annual meeting of the promoters of the institution was held on Saturday last, at the Freemasons' Hall, the Earl of Shaftesbury in the chair. On the platform there were also the Rev. R. Burgess, Dr. Hawkes, Dr. Calvert, Rev. Mr. Hughes, &c. Letters of apology had been received from the Duke of Newcastle, the Bishop of London, Mr. Sidney Herbert, M.P., Mr. Peto, M.P., the Ear. of Harrowby, the Marquis of Blandford, &c. By the report it appeared that during the past year the Thanksgiving model building in Portpool-lane had been opened. It had been erected out of a fund £2300 of which had been the result of collections on the Thanksgiving Day in 1849, the total cost having been upwards of £3000. The building would accommodate twenty families, and 128 single women; there being also a wash-house, which might be used by 34 persons at once. The wash-houses were used by about 300 persons per week; but of the 64 rooms for single women, at a per week each person, there were at present only 24 occupied, owing to the great fluctuating account of the progress of the different model lodging-houses in the metropolis, the report stated that the society had published the plans and specifiat ons of Prince Albert's model cottages, and a tract called "Home Reform," all of which promised to be of great utility. The total receipts during the year, including a balance of £910 3s. 1d. in hand, had been £14,918, and the total disbursements £14,695; leaving a balance in hand of £223. The gross rateable value of the real property belonging to the society was £15,152 17s. 8d. The report was unanimously adopted. The principal speakers at the meeting were the noble chairman, Mr. Monckton Gore, Mr. Beach, of Tiverton, Essex; the Rev. R. Burgess, Dr. Garthwood, — Smith, and Mr Slaney, M.P.

DIOCESAN BOARD OF EDUCATION.—The annual meeting of this association was held on Monday afternoon, at the parochial school, Pall-mall—the Rev. Dr. Russell presiding, in the absence of the Lord Bishop of London. The annual report stated that when the inquiry into the condition of the schools of the metropolis was instituted, five years ago, by the National Society, a great deficiency was discovered in the school accommodation of the diocese of London; and in the county of Middlesex alone, with a population of 1,736,536, there were only 81 177 scholars in the schools of the Church of England, or one in 19½. There were then 767 schools in the county, affording room for five per cent, which had elapsed since that inquiry, the committee feared that the number of schools had by no means kept pace with the increase of the population, and it might be deemed whether, to the archdeaconries of London and Middlesex, over which the operations of this board extended, there were one in 20 of the population under a system of education connected with the Church of England. There were at present in union with the society 270 ragged schools. The results of the £5 exhibitions of pupil teachers had been found very advantageous. During the year £147 had been given towards the £5 pupil teachers' exhibitions, and the society had aided in the building of three schools, fitting up 75, paying the rent of 10, and had assisted many others in various ways, showing a total of 181 schools assisted. The report was agreed to, and several resolutions in accordance with the objects of the society were passed.

UNITED SERVICE INSTITUTION, WHITEHALL.—Mr. Lacon, on Tuesday afternoon, delivered an interesting and useful lecture on his new mode of lifting boats to windward; the other varieties of which, in lieu of the old one that had lately taken place in the destruction of the Amazon and Birkenhead might have been greatly diminished, if not altogether avoided. Mr. Lacon, for the purposes of his lecture, had constructed a boat which this subject had been created, read accounts of the loss of ships by fire and wreck from the year 1804, in all which cases an immense amount of human life had been sacrificed by the negligent and inefficient management of the boats. He exhibited a working model of the proposed plan of improvement, by means of the [illegible] mode, by which it requires several men at each end of a boat to lower it, who must act in strict uniformity or it is upset, Mr. Lacon does it with a single rope, which is managed by one man. The rope is wound round a barrel, the motion of which as the boat descends is regulated by a very simple, although a compound leverage, by means of which a man can lower a boat containing thirty-two persons on to the water in a few seconds. At the close of the lecture a model of the Amazon was exhibited, on which a second occasion require great speed during any period of the operation, the boat can be let down "by the run." Another part of the plan is, that the rope is tied on the barrel, and is capable of sustaining a weight of 2100 or 2400 lbs., but it is not permanently fixed; so that, when the rope has run out, it becomes disengaged from the barrel, and allows the boat to drop astern, entirely free from the pitching and rolling of the ship. The usual vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Lacon.

PROTESTANT DISSENTERS' SCHOOLS.—A meeting of the Nonconformist body of all grades was held on Wednesday evening, at Bell's Rooms, Hendon, for the purpose of witnessing the distribution of prizes to the scholars at the close of the scholastic year. The Lord Mayor occupied the chair. Before the prizes were distributed, a number of recitations were given by the pupils in various languages. Several English compositions were also given with great taste, and some humorous compositions with good effect. The prizes consisted chiefly of books, and, on the recommendation of the books being most expensively bound. At the conclusion of these proceedings the chairman was served in the large hall of the institution, to which upwards of 300 persons sat down.

ROYAL SOUTH LONDON FLORICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The third exhibition of this society took place on Wednesday, at the Surrey Zoological Gardens. The élite attracted an unusual large assembly of beauty and fashion. The pelargoniums and Cape heaths were splendid; but the roses, although fine, were exceedingly limited in number. The pinks and pansies exhibited were of unusual excellence. A very interesting collection of wild flowers was shown by Mr. Clark. On the whole, the exhibition was fully equal to the preceding exhibitation of this society; and its management and arrangement reflected the highest credit upon the secretary, Mr. J. T. Neville, of Peckham, editor of the new periodical on floriculture called the Gardeners' Record. The usual list of prizes was awarded.

ROYAL DISPENSARY FOR DISEASES OF THE EAR.—On Thursday the annual meeting of this institution was held at the dispensary, Dean-street, Soho; the Rev. William Brook in the chair. It was stated that during the past year 1029 patients had been admitted, of whom 435 were cured, 192 relieved, and 502 remained under treatment. The number of treatment in the dispensary is purely constitutional, and the funds being amply adequate to meet the demand. The funds had lately been increased, but not to an extent commensurate with the claims of the charity; and the committee could only extend the use of a portion of the building to the late Joseph Roberts, Esq. The report was adopted, and thanks having been voted to the benefactors, to Mr. Hervey, the surgeon, and the chairman, the meeting separated.

ROYAL GENERAL PENSION SOCIETY.—On Thursday the annual meeting of this society was held at the offices, Sackville-street, Piccadilly; Sir Peter Pilot, Bart., in the chair. The report stated there were 40 pens ioners on the funds of the society, a men and 32 women—of whom 20 had received 3s. 6d. a week, and the latter 2s. 6d. The committee were desirous, as soon as possible, of extending the benefits of the institution. The receipts for the past year were £284 17s., and the payments £302 8s. 1d. A series of resolutions, pledging the meeting to the support of the hospital, were moved and carried.

INFANT ORPHAN ASYLUM, WANSTEAD.—On Thursday the anniversary of this excellent institution was celebrated by the examination of the children by the Rev. Canon Dale, M.A., in scriptural knowledge. The number of which, for their ages, they displayed great proficiency After the examination nearly 400 friends of the institution sat down to an elegant dejeûner, served by one of Mr Benjamin Edgington's celebrated confectionary establishments in the grounds. The Right Hon. Lord Calthorpe presided, and made an eloquent speech on behalf of the institution, which maintains nearly 400 children. These children remain in the asylum till they reach the age of fourteen, and the boys at eight years of age; but some difficulty having been found in providing for them at that age, the boys are now to be kept till they are fourteen, and the girls to fifteen. Extra exertions having been made to increase the funds for the purpose, the collection announced amounted to £5535

PAUPER EMIGRATION.—On Thursday a vestry meeting of the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields was held in the vestry room, King William-street Mr. George Coates in the chair—to consider the propriety of raising a sum not exceeding one-half of the rates upon an average of the last three years, to enable 50 persons—32 men and 30 women—who had memorialised the churchwarden for the means of emigration, to put their wishes into effect. The whole amount proposed to be raised was £1000, or one penny in the pound on the rateable property of the parish being about the amount it would require to keep the same number of people in the workhouse for two years. After some discussion, the further consideration of the subject was adjourned for a month.

BRITISH ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH COMPANY.—On Monday in the Standing Orders Committee, consisting of Lord Redesdale, chairman, and several other noble Lords, the standing orders were declared not complied with, and that the bill was not to proceed.

ST. GILES'S RAGGED AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.—The ceremony of opening this institution took place on Wednesday morning, under the auspices of Lord Shaftesbury. The new building is situate at the corner of George-street and Broad-street, Bloomsbury, and is formed to accommodate for edu purposes 300 children. The dormitories, which are well fitly bat plain y furnished, will accommodate 40 boys and the same number of girls; and there are also workshops where any pupil can have the opportunity of learning the rudiments of some useful and remunerative employment. At two o'clock 300 children sat down to dinner in the hall. In the evening a public meeting was held at St. Martin's Hall, Long-acre; the Earl of Shaftesbury in the chair, supported by the Hon. and Rev. Montagu Villiers, Mr. [illegible], M.P., &c. The report stated that the cost of the building had been £5000, and £2600 of the sum had been already swelled the amount to £3795. Of this sum only £1560 had been raised, leaving still £1155 remaining as a liability

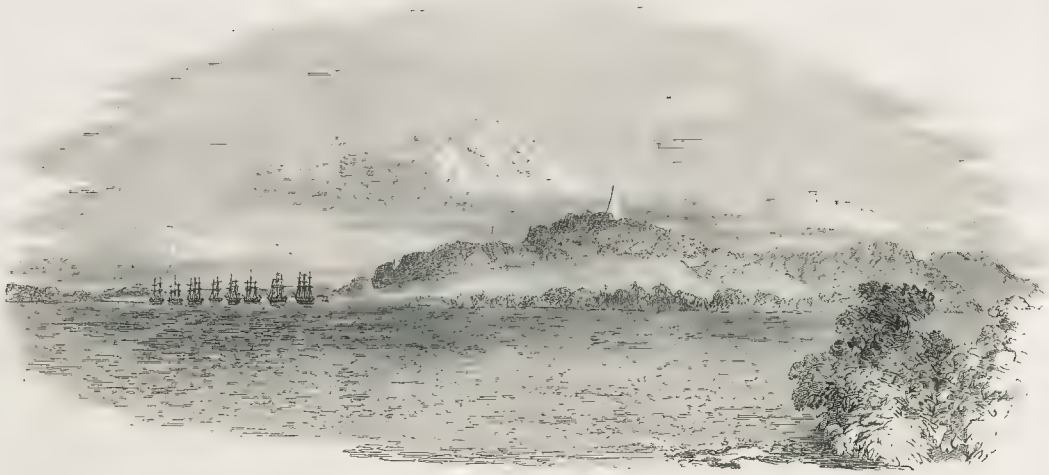
THE WAR IN BURMAH.



RANGOON TOWN, FORTIFICATIONS, AND DAGON PAGODA.

THE following communication, from an officer on board the Hon. East India Company's steam-ship Sesostris, engaged in the operations in the Rangoon River, refers to the taking of Rangoon by our troops on the 14th of April last, and was accompanied by one of the Sketches here engraved. The letter was written on the 18th, four days after the occurrence of the scenes described by our Correspondent, and is interesting as giving personal details and glimpses, seen by an individual, of those military operations which we described in globo under the general head of Indian News in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of the 5th instant.

Our Correspondent, speaking of the capture of Rangoon, says:—

The first act of our warlike drama is over, and Rangoon has fallen, after a spirited defence by the Burmese. * * * We went up the river with our whole force on Easter eve; and on Easter Sunday took up our position off the stockades which you see in the Sketch. As we anchored, they opened fire upon us: the balls came whistling over our heads, striking the ship. One poor fellow, an officer of the 51st Regiment, was standing on our hatchway close to me, as I was getting my guns adrift, when a round shot struck him right through the shoulder, and killed him—at least, he died in two hours. We had not any more casualties on board, but many very narrow escapes: a round shot nearly took my hat off, and struck the mainmast. But when we opened our tremendous fire, it soon altered the question: we poured in a storm of shot and shell; and at ten minutes after 10 a shell from our (Sesostris) after 68-pounder blew up the enemy's magazine. (See Sketch.) The position of the shipping is here correctly shown. The fire at one time was pretty brisk from the stockade, but was speedily silenced by the tremendous fire we opened on them. The second shot fired from the magazine on the left killed poor Armstrong of the 51st, H.M. regiment, and we were struck several times, but no one else was killed. The Moozuffer had four killed, and two were killed on board the Atalanta transport, which anchored too close under fire. The stockade on the right was strongly defended by a trench and chevaux-de-frise of stakes, which it would have been difficult to take by escalade; but they appeared totally unprepared for our great weight of metal.

This settled the matter for the day: the Burmese found it very little use to attempt to defend the river stockades under our fire. Next morning (Easter Monday) our troops landed, and attacked the stockades inland, whilst we shifted our position round another point of the river. The troops lost some men, and did not get on well; so we were ordered to cover them with shell, and clear the inland stockades, when the effect was extremely grand: the great Dagon pagoda shoots up like a pyramid of fire in the glare two miles off.

On Tuesday we continued to shell at intervals, whilst the troops were inactive and continued to do so till two o'clock on Wednesday morning by order, when we ceased, and the troops advanced to attack the great stockade. I watched them from the masthead: the Burmese kept up a strong fire from the stockade and pagoda, where they had heavy guns mounted; but on the afternoon the 18th Royal Irish led the storming party, and paid in losing several men. The Burmese fled outside: we opened fire on them, and Rangoon was ours. Two of our ships, the Moozuffer and Feroze, attacked a stockade that had repulsed one of her Majesty's ships, the Serpent, and took it easily by clearing first with the heavy guns. The Admiral Austin has expressed his approval of the way in which our ships have done their work.

I have been on shore, and have visited the Great Pagoda, &c. I was much struck with the Dagon, which is a mass of brick and stone, cased over and gilt, and rising about 250 or 300 feet: it is surrounded by small pagodas and elaborately carved houses, containing multitudes of gilt and marble images, great bells, &c. The base is surrounded by guardian winged monsters like griffins, their wings inlaid with coloured glass, and gilt in strange barbaric taste. I have got all sorts of curiosities in the shape of images and little gilt gods; also, a sword and gilt hat, which a chief left in the trenches; and a collar, not of much value, which I got off the stockade the first morning I landed. I thought at the time I was doing something wonderful, not knowing that our fire had cleared them out. The destruction in the town amongst the houses was very great: the native troops destroyed everything in the way of furniture that they could not carry off; and I pitied the poor Rangoon people, who, I believe, are rather favourable to us than otherwise. The town was defended by picked men sent down from the capital, Ava: they were red uniforms, and gilt hats. The place was completely deserted when I walked through it. The scene in the court of the Great Pagoda was very singular, the 18th and two native regiments being quartered there: they were scattered amidst the huge gods and images in the different temples. Here we saw a stupendous figure holding a bell, and there one with a forage cap on and a pipe in its mouth; another with a great coat. The whole scene was very ludicrous, as the poor fellows lay asleep in every direction.

The burning of the stockades and shelling the pagodas on the night of Easter Monday was a scene of havoc. The troops were landed in the morning, and had some sharp skirmishing, in which several were killed and wounded; so it was determined to clear out the stockades between the pagodas and the shore by a heavy fire from the ships, and thus create a diversion. We set fire during the day to the stockades commanding the river; the rest of the fires were occasioned by red-hot shot and shell, and carcasses, which we poured into the inland stockades. I soon witnessed an illumination such as I had never seen before: the thunder of the heavy guns, and the rush and explosion of shell and rockets, was indescribably grand; while the great Dagon pagoda, gilt from summit to base, shone out occasionally with a lurid light reflected on it in the background.

It is disputed whether the Great Pagoda is hollow or solid: some persons say there are subterranean passages leading to the interior. I do not think there will be much prize money this time: it all depends upon the campaign being renewed after the monsoon.

What our next destination will be is a mystery. I hope we shall not stay here all the monsoon, for we cannot get any supplies, and cholera is beginning to show itself in the fleet. There were fourteen ships of war employed in this affair of Rangoon. Hoping you will be satisfied that I have got off all clean this first scene of the campaign,

I am, &c.,

Mr. Thomas Windus, Stamford-hill. ALFRED T. WINDUS.

It is stated, in a postscript to the above—

It was a horrid sight visiting the stockades the morning after the fire: poor wretches, dead, and some wounded (but most of the latter had been carried off), were lying about, and the dogs tearing them to pieces, with crows and vultures gorging themselves till they could scarcely fly. In the magazine that we blew up, some of the dead had been so burnt as to fall to pieces when touched. The effect of our fire was fearful: indeed, nothing could have stood such heavy guns. But the Burmese fought with spirit till completely driven out. There has been a good deal of loss at the inland stockades; indeed, as I have said, they were obliged to resort to our shot and shell to cover them.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

The first View shows the site of Rangoon Town, with the Fortifications and the Dagon Pagoda; and Dalla leftward.

The second Illustration shows the scene described in the above letter of Lieutenant Alfred Tubb Windus, of the Hon. East India Company's steam-ship Sesostris. Here the Fox frigate is seen coming to her moorings astern of the Moozuffer.

The first, third, fourth, and fifth Sketches are by another officer, engaged in the action.

In the third View is shown the destruction of the stockades defending the river face of Rangoon, by the combined Royal and Indian naval squadrons, representing the explosion of the Expense magazine, and total destruction of the strong stockade defending the King's Wharf, by a shell from the Sesostris. The stockade defending Dalla was stormed and carried by a combined party of blue jackets, marines, and a company of her Majesty's 18th.

The next Sketch shows one of the Talien corps.

Lastly is a Burmese man of war, built at Rangoon by the King of Ava, and captured in the late action by the Hermes.

UNITED STATES.

The intelligence from New York this week comes down to the 12th inst.

The Democratic National Convention held at Baltimore had nominated General Franklin Pearce for the Presidency, and Mr. Rufus King for the Vice-Presidency; and throughout the Union, in all the leading cities, political meetings were being held to ratify this choice of the Baltimore Convention.

The Senate was engaged in executive session, discussing the nomination of judges for Utah (the Mormon State). Two out of the three candidates are Mormons, and there was a strong disinclination on the part of the Senate to nominate them.

The following resolution, brought forward by Mr. Hamlin, had been agreed to:—

That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of so altering the law as to authorise the Secretary of the Treasury to issue registers to vessels built in foreign countries, when the same have been wrecked in the United States, and when the amount of repair shall be three-fourths of the value of the said vessels when so repaired.

The House of Representatives had under discussion a bill appropriating 10,000,000 acres of the public lands to be apportioned among the States for the comfortable maintenance of the insane.

Upwards of twenty memorials had been presented to the House from steam-engineers, residing and employed on the northern lakes and the rivers, bays, and gulfs of the Atlantic coast, praying for the enactment of some law "correcting, as far as practicable, the evils that now exist in the conduct of steam-vessels, and to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam."

Meagher, the lately escaped political exile, was receiving great attention from the New York Common Council and other constituted bodies of the State.

Kossuth had arrived in New York on the 7th. Everything was quite different from his first appearance there, and no more notice was taken of him than of any private man.

The "national council" of Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops, assembled at Baltimore, had addressed a pastoral letter to the clergy and laity under their charge, in which, after strongly enforcing the necessity of obedience to the prelates, they exhort them to increased exertions in behalf of works of charity and religious zeal, and to co-operate in their endeavours to educate more priests, who would be suitable for the infant churches. The letter also urges the laity to encourage Roman Catholic schools, and indirectly appeals for contributions in support of the proposed university in Ireland, and the society established at Lyons, in France, for the purpose of aiding Roman Catholic missionaries in the propagation of their faith.

On the 3d instant, three fugitive slaves from Kentucky were arrested by the Sheriff of Detroit, en route to Canada, in consequence of a telegraphic message. A large number of coloured people assembled, and the prisoners were rescued, hurried off to the river, taken into a boat, and within two hours safely landed in Canada.

A silver mine is reported to have been discovered in Southern Illinois. The Lake Superior papers state that an extensive coal-bed had been discovered in the vicinity of L'Anse Bay.

Accounts from the West show that the cholera had begun its ravages. Many persons had recently died from this malady in several of the towns and on the steamers navigating the Mississippi. It also prevailed to a considerable extent in connexion with other diseases on the prairies.

From California we have advices dated May 18. From the mines the news is cheering. A company at Downville were taking out 1000 dollars per day. A piece of gold weighing 36 ounces had been found at San Joaquin, and many persons in that vicinity were taking nine ounces per day.

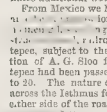
The Panama Railway had been opened another four miles. Two miles additional would be opened in a fortnight.

From Mexico we have intelligence to the 10th of May, which notices a [illegible] signed by President Arista and his officers, an[illegible] Congress to promote the formation of a company to con[illegible] railroad, or waggon road across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, subject to the approval of the Mexican Congress. The application of A. G. Sloo for the right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec had been passed by the House of Representatives by a vote of 60 to 20. The nature of the application is for an exclusive right of way across the Isthmus for forty years, with a grant of a league of land on either side of the road. He binds himself in one year to build a plank-road across the Isthmus, and, as soon as the travel will justify it, a railroad. Mexico to [illegible]e for forty years two-fifths of the receipts of the route; and [illegible] expiration of that time the road is to revert to Mexico, who is to pay the grantee, or his heirs, two-fifths of the receipts for forty years. Both parties to the grant are to be represented in the management.

[illegible] in the north-west of Brazil, there are advices of the 6th of May, [illegible]otice the recent occurrence of that coast of a sea fight between [illegible]ships, supposed to be French transports bound to Cayenne.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

LADY MARY DE REEDE GINKLE.



The death of this lady, the second and last surviving daughter of Frederick Christian Ryshard, sixth Earl of Athlone, died at the Hague, 9th June. Her Ladyship had completed her 83d year. Her immediate ancestor was the famous General de Ginkell, so distinguished in the campaign against James II. in Ireland. He commanded in chief at the siege of Athlone and at the battle of Aghrim, and was created, in consequence of his eminent services, Earl of Athlone and Baron of Aghrim.

WILLIAM EGLINTON MONTGOMERY, ESQ., OF ANNICK LODGE, AYRSHIRE.

Col. Montgomery, of Annick Lodge, was second son of the late Hugh Montgomery, Esq., of the same place, grandson of Hugh Montgomery, Esq., of Coilsfield, and nephew of Hugh, twelfth Earl of Eglinton. He was born 15th April, 1789, and married, 7th January, 1824, Susannah Fraser, daughter of John Anderson, Esq., by whom he leaves several children.

He was a Magistrate and Deputy Lieutenant for Ayrshire, and Lieut.-Col. Commandant of the Ayrshire Yeomanry Cavalry. His death occurred on the 14th inst.

ABEL ROUS DOTTIN, ESQ., LATE M.P. FOR SOUTHAMPTON.

The [illegible] cted gentleman, formerly a Captain in the 2d Life Guards, resided, for [illegible]many years, at Pargle Hall, Southampton, and sat in Parliament [illegible] of that town, generally supporting the Conservative [illegible]. He was elder son of the late Abel Dottin, Esq., of Grenade Hall, in Barbadoes, and of Kingsley, in Oxfordshire, High Sheriff of that county in 1764; and great-grandson of William Dottin, Esq., of Grenada Hall, who was, as his father had been, a member of the Assembly and Council of Barbadoes. He married Dorothy, eldest daughter of Robert Burnett Jones, Esq., of Ades, in Sussex, Attorney-General of the island of Barbadoes.

Captain Dottin, who had attained a very advanced age, in the esteem and regard of all who knew him, died on the 17th instant, at his residence, 31, Argyle-street, London.

COMMANDER ARCHIBALD MACDONALD, R.N.

Archibald Macdonald, a Commander in the Royal Navy, was brother of the late Sir John Macdonald Kinneir, British Envoy at the Court of Persia. Archibald Macdonald began very early in life to signalize himself as a gallant officer, and was midshipman of the Ardent, at the capture of the Dutch fleet in the Texel, in 1799. He was wounded at Copenhagen, in 1801, during the memorable engagement fought under the command of Lord Nelson. He took an active share in many subsequent severe engagements, and was again wounded. In 1815 he commanded the transports which conveyed the British troops under Lord Wellington to the Continent, which ended in the brilliant victory at Waterloo. Latterly Commander Macdonald was employed in the Coast Guard and Preventive services; and for the last twenty-four years of his life he was the Superintendent of Quarantine at the port of Liverpool. Commander Macdonald, who was much esteemed, died on the 13th inst., at his residence at the Rock Ferry, Cheshire: his demise is very generally lamented.

The Peninsular and Oriental Company's Steam Fleet.—The hull of the monster iron screw-steamer Himalaya, building for the Peninsular and Oriental Company, is nearly completed, and it is expected she will be launched in October, and will be ready for sea at the latter end of this year. Her length is 270 feet, and her engines will be 700 horse-power. She is larger than is the Great Britain screw-steamer, besides which the engines of the Great Britain are only 500 horse-power. The Himalaya is destined to run between Southampton and Alexandria, and she will be commanded by Captain Brooke, the oldest officer in the company's service. The company's steamer Indus, which runs between Southampton and Alexandria, is laid up—lengthening 37 feet, and having new and more powerful engines put on board her. Some idea may be formed of the increase of speed of transit on the overland India route during the last few years by the fact that the heavy portion of the India mail is not due at Southampton before the 28th of the month, yet it lately arrived on the 19th, and never hardly later than the 20th. The Peninsular and Oriental Company's is now building five new vessels, and altogether, when their fleet is complete, it will consist to nearly 40 steamers. The company's screw-steamer Pekin, destined to convey the mails between Singapore and Sydney, arrived at Southampton on Sunday last, after a rapid voyage from the Clyde, and starts for Australia on the 7th of August next. The same company's screw-steamer Madras, bound for the Bosphorus, has just made the voyage from Southampton to Malta in nine days, which shows to what extraordinary speed screw-steamers have attained.

Napoleon's Hat.—A hat which formerly belonged to the Emperor Napoleon, and which he wore during the Russian campaign, was sold on Saturday last at Chateau Thierry for the sum of 4000f. (£160). The hat belonged to a person of the name of Evrard, who had been one of the emperor's valets de chambre. Evrard lately died, and on his property being sold for the benefit of his family, the hat was put up to auction, and the widow, rather than part with the relic, gave the price just mentioned.

Mr. Feargus O'Connor.—No perceptible change for the better has taken place in the state of the unfortunate gentleman since his removal to Chiswick, where he is not placed under anything like the restraint experienced in the House of Commons. He lives liberally, is permitted to drink wine, plays considerably at billiards, but still talks wanderingly and acts erratically. Dr. Conolly, of Hanwell, visits him, and several members of the House have been down to Chiswick, where Mr. O'Connor may be said to be doing as well as can be expected.

Epidemic among Horses.—The influenza among horses, so prevalent throughout the country during the past few months, continues in unabated course. It is a disease so insidious in its nature as frequently to escape detection until the more serious lesions have gained too firm a hold. The cough, which at other times is looked upon as a mere temporary irritation in the air-passages, and which nursing generally removes, is, at the present unwholesome period, a symptom of considerable danger. It has this year been more general in its attack than on any previous occasion with which the country; hence the losses sustained have been greater than in any season within our remembrance. It presents, too, peculiarities hitherto unobserved by the veterinary profession, and in frequent instances baffles the skill of the most eminent of that body. Many valuable horses of the cart and other breeds have fallen victims to its ravages, and at the present time a number of owners of this useful animal are deprived of their services, owing to this treacherous affection.

Books, &c. to Mauritius.—A notice has been issued by command of the Postmaster-General, which states that on and from the 1st July next, printed books, magazines, reviews, and pamphlets (whether British, Colonial, or Foreign) may be transmitted to and from Mauritius, by packet via Plymouth, or, if specially so addressed, by the overland mail via Southampton, at the following reduced rates of postage; viz. For each packet not exceeding 4 lb. in weight, 6d.; exceeding 4 lb. and not exceeding 1 lb., 1s.; exceeding 1 lb. and not exceeding 2 lb., 2s.; exceeding 2 lb. and not exceeding 3 lb., 3s.; and so on, increasing 1s. for every additional pound, or fraction of a pound.

The General Hewitt (Gatenby) has arrived in the London Docks from Sydney (whence she sailed the 7th of March), with 18,857 ounces of gold, valued at about £75,000. The Abertoyle, from Port Philip (whence she sailed the 18th of February), has also reached the Channel, with 40,272 ounces, valued at £171,000.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Monday.

GUANO.—THE LOBOS ISLANDS

Earl Fortescue presented a petition from owners and occupiers of land in Devon, praying that the Lobos Island might be considered free for ever hereafter to obtain guano from, and complaining of the high price for guano demanded by the Peruvian Government. He wished to know whether the noble Earl at the head of foreign affairs was prepared to lay papers on the subject upon the table, which had been promised.

The Earl of Malmesbury would lay all the papers on the table of their Lordships' House in a day or two. The subject, he admitted, was of much importance to the agricultural interest, and he attracted the attention of her Majesty's Government for some time past. The island of Lobos had, however, not been correctly described by the petitioners, who stated it had never been claimed by the Peruvian Government until this demand for the guano, with which it abounded, arose. On the contrary, in 1803 the island was claimed by Peru, and that claim was admitted by the Advocate-General. So far, therefore, government was compelled to regard the island as prima facie belonging to that republic. Having said that much, he would say that Government could not interfere to protect any vessel going there, except under such regulations as the Government of Peru might choose to make. Her Majesty's Government [illegible] given instructions to our cruisers to collect information as to whether [illegible] Sombrero or Polynesian Island's contained similar deposits, in order that, by competition, the Peruvian Government might be obliged to diminish the price of guano, which they insisted upon in consequence of having a monopoly of the trade. Their Lordships would obtain further information from the papers he would lay upon the table.

MARRIAGE WITH THE SISTER OF A DECEASED WIFE.

Petitions from various localities were presented in favour of marriage with a deceased wife's sister, by several noble Lords.

The Earl St. Germans, having presented a petition from 11,000 persons, including 59 clergymen of the metropolis, to the same effect, said he desired to call the attention of their Lordships to the number of petitions from persons of all classes and ranks in life, 98,000 in number, which had been presented that day, all of which expressed the same views. The subject of marriage with a deceased wife's sister had been thoroughly investigated, especially by a society established for that purpose; and the result of inquiry was to show that England was almost the only country which prohibited such alliances. The noble Earl argued at much length in favour of relaxing the law so far as to render marriages of this kind lawful.

After some observations from Lords Lyndhurst and Campbell and the Bishops of St. Asaph and Salisbury, against any alteration in the law, the subject dropped.

COUNTY COURTS.

Their Lordships, on the motion of Lord Brougham, agreed to the Commons' amendments to the County Courts Extension Bill, after some discussion.

THE OUTRAGE ON MR. MATHER AT FLORENCE.

Lord Beaumont brought forward the case of Mr. Mather; and, after entering into the whole of the circumstances, censured the Foreign Secretary for want of firmness in the ulterior negotiations, but admitted he was right in holding Tuscany responsible for the injury instead of Austria. In conclusion, he moved for the production of the instructions to Sir H. Bulwer in which the nature of the redress demanded was explained.

The Earl of Malmesbury, while condemning the outrage as altogether inexcusable, disputed the allegation of Lord J. Russell that it involved the honour of England. He held his predecessor, Lord Granville, to have been wrong in interfering before Mr Mather had endeavoured to obtain reparation from the Tuscan tribunals—a British subject in a foreign country being entitled to the same redress as a native, and no more. He defended his own course in recommending pecuniary compensation, on the ground that the case was one of personal injury; and having replied to the comments of Lord J. Russell and Lord Palmerston, made in the other House, censured Mr. Scarlett for deviating from his instructions, and stated that Sir H. Bulwer had been directed to re-open the negotiations, and either to obtain an acknowledgment from the Tuscan Government of its responsibility or quit Florence.

Lord Campbell held that Mr. Scarlett had been fully justified in concluding the arrangement he had made with the Tuscan Government, and urged the vagueness of the instructions on which he had acted as the ground of justification.

The Earl of Aberdeen was of opinion that the demand for redress might fairly have been made either from Austria or Tuscany, but preferably upon Austria. After the ample apology of Prince Schwarzenberg, however, the national honour ought to have been satisfied, and Lord Malmesbury had been right in afterwards regarding the case as one of mere personal injury, to be compensated pecuniarily by Tuscany.

After some observations from Earl Granville,

The Earl of Derby defended the Earl of Malmesbury, and said that not a step had been taken, nor an instruction issued, without his previous knowledge and assent. The recognition by the Tuscan Government of its responsibility for the safety of British subjects in its territories was the point upon which her Majesty's Government had all along insisted, but which Mr. Scarlett, on his own responsibility, had not unfortunately considered by himself bound to waive. To this settlement of the question the Government could not give its assent, and therefore it was that instructions had been sent out to Sir H. Bulwer to obtain a recognition of that principle; but it would be impossible at present to lay those instructions before the House.

Lord Beaumont withdrew his motion.

The Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Enfranchisement of Copyholds Bill also passed; as did the Trustees Act Amendment Bill.

MILITIA BILL.

This Bill was likewise read a third time, and passed.

Their Lordships adjourned at a quarter past twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Monday.

The House met at noon.

The Poor-law Board Continuance Bill was, after considerable discussion, read a third time and passed.

The remainder of the sitting was chiefly occupied in committee on the Metropolitan Burial Bill.

The Metropolis Water Supply Bill was read a third time and passed.

The House adjourned from four until six o'clock.

BRENTWOOD SCHOOL AND CHARITY.

The Attorney-General, in answer to Mr. Hardcastle, explained that he had been induced to recommend the acceptance of £2000 for the £7000 due to the Brentwood School, by the late head master, by an arrangement by which the patron agreed to transfer the surplus of the charity connected with it to the school, in order to increase its efficiency.

MR. MURRAY.

In reply to a question from Lord D. Stuart, Lord Stanley said he had received such intelligence from Italy as led him to form great hopes that the life of Mr. Murray, who was now lying under sentence of death at Ancona, would be spared. He could not say, however, whether he was guilty or innocent of the charges made against him, but Sir Henry Bulwer was making such inquiries as would enable him to form an opinion upon the subject.

NATIONAL EDUCATION. THE MANAGEMENT CLAUSES.

On the motion that the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill be considered,

Lord J. Russell called attention to the recent minute of the Committee of Council on Education, which he thought very unwise and objectionable, although he did not think that its pernicious effects would be perceptible for some time to come. His first objection to the minute was, that whereas inspectors (seeing) might be dismissed for teaching "unsound doctrines," which would be decided upon by the clergy, the words "or on other moral or religious grounds" were introduced, which would place the teachers wholly at the disposal of the clergy, thus altogether changing their position and destroying their independence. His second objection was that it tended to weaken the influence of the lay members of the committee; and, thirdly, he objected that it would separate the clergy from the laity in carrying out a system of education. He looked with the more apprehension at this minute, as emanating from a Government which professed its weakness in the present Parliament, and which, therefore, only proposed to do all humble good measures, as well as of absolute and indispensable utility. If in their weakness they could propose a measure like this, what was to be expected from them in the plenitude of their power? What could be the intention of the ministers, totally destroying all popular interference in the great work of education?

Mr. Walpole said the complaint of the noble Lord was nothing more than that the minute had not been a relaxation of the management clauses. It, in fact, however, did nothing more than give back to the Church what Parliament always intended the Church should possess. There was no inspection into the management and religious discipline of these schools from 1840 to 1846, when a Conservative Government was in power; but in the latter year, when the noble Lord came into power, an entire change took place—not openly, but by means of private letters—by the introduction of the management clauses. The schools were plainly told that these clauses must be accepted, or they could not hope to partake of the Government grant. The Church justly complained of what was done, contending that it ought to have perfect freedom in framing the constitution of its schools. This, however was denied them at that time, and in now restoring it to them by this minute he believed they were pursuing a course that would tend to heal many differences in the Church. The minute only said that the promoters of these schools should be at liberty to constitute those schools as they pleased, and yet be entitled to receive a portion of the public grant for education, and to that decision he could see no [illegible]

Sir H. Verney contended that the honour of the country was pledged to the preservation of the management clauses.

Mr. Gladstone contended that there was nothing unreasonable in what had been done by this minute, and denied that the honour of Parliament was in any way pledged to maintain the management clauses, which, after all, were only experimental. It might be necessary to have a thousand minutes while in an experimental state, paving the way to a sound system of national education, and it would be absurd to say that the honour of Parliament was pledged to any of these minutes.

After some further discussion, in which Mr. Hume, Mr. Miles, Mr. J. A. Smith, and other hon. members took part, the Consolidated Fund Bill, as amended, was considered and agreed to.

In reply to a question from Sir J. Graham,

The Attorney-General said he would withdraw the Grand Juries (Metropolitan District) Bill.

The Patent Law Amendment Bill passed through committee.

The Crime and Outrage (Ireland) Bill also passed through committee.

The Encumbered Estates (Ireland) Bill also passed through committee.

JEWISH DISABILITIES.—MR. SALOMONS

The third reading of the Disabilities Repeal Bill was opposed by Mr. Newdegate, and supported by Mr Roundell Palmer, who explained that Lord Lyndhurst was its author; and pointed out the uselessness of the penalties the existing law imposed on persons voting in the House of Commons without taking the oaths, which was the case the bill was intended to meet, especially with reference to Mr. Salomons, who had sat and voted as member for Greenwich without taking the oaths as regulated by law.

Sir W. P. Wood, Mr. Anstey, and M. Hudson, also spoke in support of the bill.

Mr. Secretary Walpole would oppose the bill if he looked upon it as Sir W. P. Wood did, as an instalment towards the removal of those disabilities which prevented Jews sitting in Parliament; but, believing the penalties it sought to repeal were unnecessary for the maintenance of the existing law, he supported it.

Mr. Newdegate having withdrawn his opposition, the bill passed.

The Common Law Procedure Bill, with the Lords' amendments, was considered and the amendments agreed to.

The Masters in Chancery Abolition Bill, with the Lords' amendments, was considered and the amendments agreed to.

The Master of the Rolls brought up a clause giving compensation to the chief clerks in the same manner as to the Masters.

Mr. Carter opposed the clause, which, after some discussion, was agreed to.

The Holloway House of Correction Bill was read a third time and passed.

Adjourned at half-past two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Tuesday.

On the motion of the Duke of Wellington, returns were ordered of several regimental reports, showing the state of discipline among the military on board the steam troop-ship Birkenhead at the time that vessel was lost.

The Lord Chancellor, in reply to a question from Lord Lyndhurst, said he could give no explanation why, in the Suitors in Chancery Bill, no notice was taken of the recommendation of a select committee of the House of Commons that orders of course should be abolished. The bill had not been prepared by the present Government.

NEW ZEALAND.

The Earl of Desart moved the second reading of the New Zealand Government Bill, the object of which is to confer on that colony a constitution consisting of a General Central Legislative Assembly and six provincial councils, with local governors.

Lord Lyttelton and Lord Wodehouse supported the bill, expressing a general approval of its provisions.

The Duke of Newcastle said he approved of the veto reserved to the Government at home upon the acts of the Central Legislature, but he objected to the members of the Upper Chamber being nominated instead of elected. He recommended the postponement of the clauses relating to the New Zealand Company.

Earl Grey canvassed at great length the details of the bill, supporting the claims of the New Zealand Land Company, and strongly objecting to the nomination of the Upper Legislative Chamber.

After a short discussion, the bill was read a second time.

The County Rates Bill was read a second time.

The Sunk Island Roads Bill, the Commons' Enclosure Act Extension Bill, the Appointment of Overseers Bill, and the Hereditary Casual Revenues in the Colonies Bill, were severally passed through committee.

The Poor-law Commission Continuance (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Tuesday.

The House met at noon.

The Sheriffs of London appeared at the Bar, and presented a petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, praying for the enactment of a measure against betting-offices.

THE MILITIA—RIFLE CORPS.

The Militia Ballot Suspension Bill, and the Militia Pay Bill, were respectively read a third time and passed.

In reply to Sir De Lacy Evans, Mr. Secretary Walpole said that it was not from any distrust of volunteer rifle corps, but because it was apprehended that the appointment of such bodies would interfere with the volunteer enrolment in the militia, that Government had not accepted their services, but that they would be unhesitatingly accepted should necessity arise.

THE WEST INDIES.

Mr. Bernal again called the attention of the Colonial Secretary to the deficiency of, labour in Jamaica, occasioned more immediately by the ravages of the smallpox which information, received by the mail of that morning, showed was not decreasing.

Secretary Sir J. Pakington, while admitting and sympathising with the distress consequent on the want of labour, would not encourage hopes which it might be found impossible to realise, but he promised to consider whether any means existed by which labour could be supplied, by relaxing the labour laws, or otherwise.

COLONIAL AFFAIRS AUSTRALIA AND THE IONIAN ISLANDS.

On the motion that the Appropriation Bill be read a third time,

Mr. Hume drew attention to the petition presented the other day from the new legislative council of New South Wales, complaining of the conduct of the Home Government, and announced an intention of renewing the notice he had on the paper on the subject in the next Parliament. He also adverted to the last day of motion he had given in reference to the proceedings of Sir H. Ward, which the state of public business prevented his bringing forward this session, and described the acts of that functionary as a disgrace to the national character, and especially referred to the punishment inflicted by him on M. Dominich.

Secretary Sir J. Pakington doubted whether all the statements in the New South Wales petition were borne out by facts, but promised attention to them, considering it the duty of the Government to concede to the colonies all that could tend to promote their prosperity and attach them to the mother country. He regretted Mr. Hume had two of the principal claims put forward in the petition, viz. the management of the waste lands and the control of the casual revenues arising from mineral products, had already been allowed by a bill passed the other day. He complained in strong terms of the manner in which Mr. Hume had attacked the character of Sir Henry Ward, without bringing forward any definite motion on which the House could pronounce an opinion, and suggested that the reason why the hon. member did not bring the question to an issue was the bad success he had when, three years ago, he submitted a resolution condemnatory of Sir Henry, whose conduct the present Government was prepared to justify.

Mr. Molesworth made some observations in favour of the colonial claims; Lord D. Stuart spoke in condemnation of Sir Henry Ward; and Mr. B. Cochrane in deprecation of attacks on a high-minded and honourable public servant.

The motion for the third reading of the Appropriation Bill was then agreed to, and the bill passed.

The remaining clauses of the Metropolitan Burials Bill were considered in committee.

The House adjourned from four until six o'clock.

In the evening sitting,

BRITISH SUBJECTS IN AUSTRIA.

Sir H. Verney asked her Majesty's Government whether they were taking measures to obtain compensation for the Revs. Messrs. Smith and Wingate, missionaries to the Jews at Vienna, and the Rev. Mr. Edwardes, a missionary to the Jews at Lemberg, from the Free Church of Scotland, who were expelled from the Austrian dominions during the last winter, under circumstances of great hardship, and who sustained in consequence a considerable loss of property.

Lord Stanley said that all the papers on the subject would be laid upon the table in a few days.

BRITISH SUBJECTS OF COLOUR IN THE UNITED STATES.

Lord Stanley, in reply to a question put by Mr. M. Milnes as to the detention of Manuel Pereira, a coloured man, who was forcibly taken on of a British ship which had put into Charleston, South Carolina, U. S., in distress, stated that a writ of habeas corpus had been applied for by our consul there, but had been refused without argument, and an appeal from that decision to Columbia was now pending. The energetic remonstrances of Lord Palmerston on the subject of the arrest, followed by the similar remonstrances of America to seize and imprison all coloured persons arriving in foreign ships had been followed up by the present Government; and there was hope that public opinion in the States would ere long aid in putting a stop to a practice which was a disgrace to any civilised nation.

The House then went into committee on the Valuation (Ireland) Bill, and the discussion of its clauses took up the greater portion of the evening. The bill ultimately had all its clauses passed.

The Crime and Outrage (Ireland) Bill was considered as amended, after a protest from Mr. V. Scully against proceeding with it.

The Patent Law Amendment Bill was considered as amended.

The Nisi Prius Officers Bill, the Common Law Procedure Bill, the Masters in Chancery Abolition Bill, and the Pimlico Improvement Bill, were read a third time and passed.

The Excise Summary Proceedings Bill; the Secretary of Bankrupts Office Abolition Bill, the Bishopric of Quebec Bill, and the Colonial Bishops Bill, passed through committee.—Adjourned at half-past one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Wednesday.

The House sat from noon to six o'clock.

COLONIAL ECCLESIASTICAL LAWS.

The House having resolved itself into committee upon the Colonial Ecclesiastical Laws,

Mr Gladstone moved a resolution to the effect that the chairman be directed to move the House that leave be given to bring in a bill to renew bishops in the colonies in communion with the Church of England, and the clergy and lality in communion with them, in respect to legal doubts or disabilities affecting the management of their Church affairs. The right hon. gentleman said it was not his intention to press his bill, if he obtained leave to bring it in, during the present session. The bill he had formerly introduced had given great satisfaction in the colonies, and his object now was to make some amendments in that bill, and to have it printed and sent out to the colonies, so that their opinions upon it may be communicated to the House by the next session of Parliament.

Sir G. PAKINGTON had no doubt the right hon. gentleman was actuated by the purest motives, and nothing had in the course of his life given him more pain than having to condemn the bill he had brought forward. He did not wish to impede the object of the right hon. gentleman in having his bill brought in; but he hoped, in its amended form, it would obviate the serious objections which he felt to it in its original shape. Under any circumstances, he would feel himself free to deal with it as he might think proper when it should again come before the House.

Mr. HOREMAN condemned the whole course pursued by Mr. Gladstone with respect to this bill, which would create an ecclesiastical tyranny of a most intolerable character in the colonies.

Sir W. P. WOOD defended Mr. Gladstone from the charges made against him by Mr. Horsman, and was glad that Government had consented to the introduction of the bill. As to establishing ecclesiastical despotism in the colonies, it was too much to allege such an intention on the part of the right hon. gentleman in the face of a bill the object of which was to give increased power to the laity.

Mr. BUTT disapproved of the proposed measure.

The resolution was then agreed to, the House resumed, the report was brought up, and leave was given to bring in the bill.

The Public Health Act Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Metropolitan Burials Bill passed through committee.

All the other bills on the paper were forwarded a stage. After which

THE AMEERS OF SCINDE.

Viscount JOCELYN moved for copies of the evidence and report of a commission appointed to inquire into a charge preferred against his Highness Meer Ali Morad, Ameer of Upper Scinde, of having made fraudulent alterations in the treaty of Normahur, concluded between his Highness and the late Meer Roostum Khan, and of all minutes and correspondence on the Indian records connected with the charge; and of the report on Scinde of Sir George Clark, K.C.B., late Governor of Bombay, dated April 24, 1848. The noble Lord had stated his belief that there was every wish on the part of the Governor-General of India to ameliorate the condition of the nephews of Meer Ali Morad; but he thought that some expression of the sympathy of the House of Commons for their fate would assist the Government of India in carrying out its views in favour of these princes. He entered into a long detail of all the services and misfortunes of the late Meer Roostum Khan, who had been destroyed by the intrigues of Meer Ali Morad, his younger brother, who had succeeded upon the British Government, and thus accomplished his ruin. Meer Ali Morad was subsequently tried and convicted, and deprived of the turban; but justice had not yet been done to the children of Meer Roostum Khan. It appeared to him, he said, to be the most proper course to commence with the history of British rule in India; and now, as Government had the opportunity of making some reparation in consequence of the ended territory of Ali Morad, he hoped their sense of justice would induce them to do so in the case of the exiled Ameers of Scinde into their consideration. The noble Lord concluded a most able and impressive address amidst cheers from all parts of the House.

Sir R. INGLIS seconded the motion.

Mr. H. BAILLIE said the speech of his noble friend had little reference to his motion, which related to Ameer Ali Morad. The policy pursued in superseding the Ameers of Scinde was sanctioned by the Government of Sir R. Peel, of which the noble Lord himself was a supporter. The Government had no objection to produce all the papers relating to the charges against Ali Morad, and he could assure the House that the case of the Ameers of Scinde was occupying the attention of the Government.

Mr. HERRIES moved the adjournment of the debate until next day, as it wanted only two minutes to six o'clock.

The debate was accordingly adjourned, and the House rose.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their Lordships met at five o'clock.

SALE OF COFFEE AND CHICORY.

In reply to a question from Lord Torrington, the Earl of DERBY said that the treasury minute of 1840, allowing the sale of coffee and chicory mixed, had been altered so as to require the dealers in these articles to sell them separately.

The Consolidated Fund Appropriation Bill, and the Militia Ballots Suspension Bill, were severally read a second time.

The NAVY PAY Bill, the Sunk Island Road Bill, and the Hereditary Casual Revenues (Ireland) Bill, were severally read a third time and passed.

The Suitors in Chancery Relief Bill passed through Committee. Several other bills were forwarded a stage —Adjourned

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The SPEAKER took the chair at twelve o'clock.

The Marriage Law Amendment Bill, as amended, was considered and agreed to.

The Valuation (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed; as also were the Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues Bill, the Excise Summary Proceedings Bill, the Board of Customs Office Abolition Bill, the Bishopric of Quebec Bill, and the Colonial Bishops Bill.

The General Board of Health (No. 2) Bill, as amended, was considered and agreed to.

The Bishopric of Christchurch (New Zealand) Bill was read a third time and passed

The Lords' Amendments to the Copyholds Enfranchisement Bill were considered and agreed to.

SCINDE.

The adjourned debate on Scinde was resumed by

Mr. H. BAILLIE, who said that the Government were taking steps to rend er the fallen condition of the Ameers of Scinde as agreeable to them as circumstances would permit. According to the latest intelligence, the sum of 3,000*l*. granted that temporary assistance had been rendered to the family of Roostum Khan until something permanent could be done. He would not oppose the production of the minutes if pressed by the noble Lord (Jocelyn), but he thought the production would lead to no good.

Colonel EYTOUNT said he had no authority from his noble friend, but at the same time he felt that the minutes ought to be produced.

Mr. HERRIES said, in the absence of Lord Jocelyn, he could only suggest that the two chief documents should be produced, and that the others should be withheld, unless there should appear to be an absolute necessity for their production.

Mr. GIBSON said it was never too late to do justice, and he hoped the Government would at last take into its consideration the case of the Ameers.

Mr. Herries' suggestion was then acceded to.

The House then adjourned until Friday.

ELECTION INTELLIGENCE.

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO ELECTORS.—An important notice to voters in the return of members to sit in Parliament for the cities of London and Westminster, the metropolitan boroughs of the Tower Hamlets, Finsbury, Marylebone, Lambeth, Southwark, and Greenwich, and in the return of knights of the shire for the counties of Middlesex, Kent, Surrey, &c., was put up on Monday at the different churches and chapels in the metropolis and vicinity:—

"CITY OF LONDON, &c., ELECTORS.—[Schedule B. No. 2.] We hereby give notice, that no person will be entitled to have his name inserted on any list of voters for the city now about to be made, in respect of the occupation of premises of the clear annual value of £10, whether situate wholly or in part within the parish of ——, unless it shall have been paid, on or before the 20th day of July next, all the poor-rates and assessed taxes which have become payable from him in respect of such premises before the 5th day of January last past; and all persons entitled to make such payments will be required to produce on the next register of voters for the said city or London," &c. Signed by the respective overseers of the parishes of the above places. "VOTERS FOR KNIGHTS OF THE SHIRE.—That all persons qualified to vote in the election of knights of the shire for the counties of Middlesex, &c., in respect of property situate wholly or part within the parish of ——, who are not upon the register of voters now in force, or who being upon the register shall not retain the same qualifications, or continue in the same place of abode as described in such register, and who are desirous of having their name inserted in the register of voters about to be made for the said county of Middlesex, &c., are hereby required to give or send to us, or any of us, on or before the 20th day of July next, a notice in writing by them signed, in which their name and surname at full length, their place of abode, and the particulars of their qualification, must be legibly written, according to the form prescribed. Any person who is upon the present register may also make the claim if he thinks fit, but it is not necessary that he should do so if he has the same qualification and place of abode now described in the register." Signed by the respective overseers.—June 19.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE.—An additional address has been issued by Mr. Benjamin Disraeli to his constituents of the county of Buckingham, viz:

"Downing-street, June 18, 1852.—Gentlemen, The dissolution of Parliament will take place in a few days. I have so recently addressed you, and at so great a length, that I will only now beg you, on the day of nomination, to support my claims to be elected, i.e. the third time, to the high honour of being your member. If, as I confidently anticipate, the judgment of the country will ratify the choice of our gracious Sovereign, the present Administration, under the auspices of Lord Derby, will do their utmost to obtain a just redress for the agricultural interest, and will unfalteringly uphold our free constitution in Church and State, to which, under Divine Providence, our subjects owe a greater degree of happiness and liberty than is enjoyed by any country in the world.—I have the honour to remain, gentlemen, your obliged friend and servant, B. DISRAELI."

SHEFFIELD.—The following extract from a letter dated the 19th instant, and addressed by Mr. Roebuck to Mr. William Fisher, of Sheffield, completely sets at rest all doubts respecting his present state of health. He says, "I now deem myself completely recovered, and ready for any reasonable amount of work. I see the Daily News intimates a doubt of my being able to be present at the election. There is no reason for any such doubt. I am quite able to undergo the fatigue needed, and shall be ready for the work as soon as the work comes. I beg my friends to believe that I do not intend to shirk any trouble or labour. My circumstances is now right again, and my weakness greatly diminished."

THE OXFORD COMMEMORATION.

The customary festivities attendant upon the recurrence every fourth year of the the great gala of the University have gone off most satisfactorily during the past week. Balls, boat-racing, and other amusements have not failed to attract a large number of strangers, and amongst them the Scottish and American Bishops, who took part, a few days since, in the great jubilee of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel.

On the present occasion the festivities commenced on Friday week, when a concert was given by the Philharmonic Society in the dining-hall at St John's College. It was a splendid affair, and highly creditable to all who took part in it. On the following evening the University Amateur Musical Society gave a concert in the Town-hall, which was attended by upwards of 600 persons, including many of the heads of colleges and halls, and their families. The success of the concert was evinced by the large number of encores which occurred during the evening.

On Sunday the University service at St. Mary's Church was attended by a large number of visitors, and the edifice presented a more crowded and animated appearance than it is wont to wear. At the City Church the Rev. W. W. Champneys, rector of Whitechapel and canon residentiary of St. Paul's, preached in the morning and evening on behalf of the Church Pastoral Aid society, when the sum of £33 was collected. The Bishop of Argyll and the Isles preached at St. Mary's Church in the afternoon, and at Christ Church and Is es Hall. The service at the cathedral was attended by an unusually large number of strangers. The service was Arnold in A, and the anthem "I will sing of Thy power" (Green). The service at Magdalen Chapel, as usual, attracted many; the service being Elvey in A, and the anthem, Handel's magnificent Coronation Anthem, "Zadoc the Priest," in consequence of its being the anniversary of the Queen's accession. The choir, under the direction of Mr. Hullah, performed the whole of the music, including the organ accompaniments, with great correctness and precision, and the effect was very fine effect by the choir. On the conclusion of the service many lingered for awhile to admire the beautiful painted windows, the sculptured altar-piece, the carved fittings, and the superb west window, executed by Jervais in 1777, from cartoons furnished by Sir Joshua Reynolds.

On Monday the procession of undergraduates took place in the evening on the fields, and at night the first ball at the Town-hall came off.

On Tuesday the Bishop of Oxford preached at St. Mary's Church, in aid of the Radcliffe Infirmary. A selection of sacred music was performed in the theatre in the afternoon: and at Exeter College a sumptuous collation was served in the college-hall, when a very elegant silver gilt alms-dish was presented, in the names of a certain number of the members of the University, to the American Bishop, as a token of their affectionate regard for the American Church. The Regius Professor of Divinity, the Rev. Dr. Jacobson, presented the token in a suitable and interesting address. The Bishops of Michigan and New York spoke in acknowledgment of this unexpected and spontaneous demonstration of regard evinced towards them on the part of the members of the University, who had chosen this gratifying mode of expressing their sentiments towards the American Church.

On Wednesday, the great event of the week—the ENCENIA, or Commemoration of the Benefactors—was celebrated in the Sheldonian Theatre, under the most favourable circumstances, the weather having become bright and sunny, affording an opportunity for the display of the gay dresses of the ladies, who assembled in great force on the occasion.

On the procession, headed by the Vice-Chancellor, heads of houses, noblemen, and doctors of the civil law, entering the theatre, the National Anthem was pealed in full peal from the organ. The Vice-Chancellor then opened the proceedings, and the honorary degree of Doctor of Civil Law was conferred on several individuals, who were presented by Dr. Bliss, in addresses descriptive of their merits and claims to the distinction. The honorary degree of Doctor in Civil Law was conferred on Don Domicio Lefera de Pedro Santa, Duke of Barradefalso and Prince of San Pietro; the Right Rev Samuel Alex McCoskry, D.D., Bishop of Michigan, in the United States; the Right Rev William Heathcote de Lancey, D.D., Bishop of Western New York; Hon. Sir John Taylor Coleridge, Knt.; Sir Gardiner Wilkinson, Knt.; the Rev. Jonathan Maynew Wainwright, D.D.; William Pulteney Alison, M.D.; Richard Owen, Esq., Hunterian Professor of Comparative Anatomy and Physiology, and Conservator of the Museum of the Royal College of Surgeons.

The undergraduates behaved with exemplary good conduct throughout the proceedings. The announcements of the degrees and the Professors' introductory speeches being almost all next any interruption, and the Bishops and especially the hearty congratulations of the assembled multitude when the Soudan Prince, the American Bishops, Judge Coleridge, and Sir Gardiner Wilkinson (both old members of the University, the former having himself carried the Latin verse and read a Latin and an English essay in the theatre on the floor of which he then stood), Professor Alison, and Richard Owen, the celebrated [illegible] addressed, took their places as doctors in the theatre.

Dr. Bliss's very full eulogy on Professor Owen was very happy. He described him to be, from his acquirements, one of the most distinguished and accomplished of the [illegible] in the world; and, from his pleasing manners and unaffected good-nature, the most popular man in London

Perhaps one of the most remarkable features of the present commemoration was the presence of not less than seven bishops—London, Exeter, Colchester, Oxford, Argyll and the Isles, and the two American bishops.

Most of the company proceeded from the theatre to the horticultural fete in Worcester Gardens, which was crowded with thousands of persons all the afternoon. A grand miscellaneous concert also took place in the theatre.

THE DUKE OF YORK'S SCHOOL AT CREMORNE.—On Monday night,

the annual treat to the young soldiers of this admirable institution took place. At three o'clock they were marched in military procession to the gardens, headed by the excellent band, and after perambulating the grounds to witness the various amusements, they formed in circles around the balloon, which was already inflated, and partook of the good things liberally provided by Mr Simpson. A few minutes before eight, Mr. Coxwell went away with the balloon at a very rapid pace, and descended in a few minutes in the park of a nobleman's lady at Doddington-park, having travelled at the rate of 80 miles an hour. The arrangements, including fireworks, were excellent.

COPYRIGHT.—The Copyright Amendment Act of the present session (15 Vict. cap. 12), entitled "An Act to enable her Majesty to carry into effect a convention with France on the subject of copyright, and to amend and explain the international copyright acts, and to explain the acts relating to copyright in engravings," has been issued. It contains 14 sections or clauses. The 18th sec. of the act 7 and 8 Vic., cap. 12, is partially repealed by this act. Her Majesty may by order in council direct that the authors of books published in foreign countries may for a limited time prevent unauthorised translations, and also that the authors of dramatic works represented in foreign countries may for a limited time prevent unauthorised translations. Adaptations of dramatic pieces to the English stage are not to be prevented. Printed copies of English works are prohibited to be imported except with the consent of the owner or copyright.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

THE MANOR-HOUSE, KENNINGTON.

THE ancient manor of Kennington—the name signifying a place belonging to the King—is specified in the Conqueror's survey as Chenintune, then in the possession of Theodoric, a goldsmith, who held it of Edward the Confessor. It appears to have been an occasional residence of the Kings of England prior to the Conquest, and afterwards down to the time of Henry VII.

Two events which are commonly stated as having occurred at Lambeth—the death of Harold and the coronation of Harold may be presumed rather to have taken place at Kennington; for in the Conqueror's survey there is no reference to any residence at the former place, which belonged to Goda, sister to Edward the Confessor, but may have been at Vauxhall, which Kennington, formed one estate

In the reign of Edward III. the manor of Kennington was annexed to the Duchy of Cornwall, and was inhabited by the Black Prince.

In 1377, John of Gaunt took refuge here, under the protection of Richard Prince of Wales, when pursued by the exasperated Londoners, whose Bishop he had insulted. Henry VII. took up his residence at Kennington previous to his coronation, at which time, on the 29th of September, 1485, he appointed Sir Richard Guylforde custodian of this Royal manor.

The last of the long succession of Royal tenants who inhabited the ancient site was Charles I., when Prince of Wales: his lodging, a house built upon a part of the site of the old palace, is the only existing vestige, as represented in the accompanying engraving, unless earlier remains are to be found in the lower parts of this interior; but the appropriation of the edifice by a sisterhood of religious devotees proved a bar to the writer's investigation in that quarter. The view is from some nursery-ground at the back of the house, which has originally formed part of the garden. A coved door of the style prevalent in the time of Charles I. may be seen by a glance over the wall which separates the nursery-ground from the secluded garden of the veiled ladies. The gate seen in the view is contemporary with the existing edifice; and the remains of another similar gate stand about a hundred yards in advance of the first, having originally served to divide different portions of the garden. A wall of old brickwork skirts the nursery-ground, indicating the original extent of the grounds belonging to the Manor-house. The stables of the earlier building, constructed of flint and stone, existed until about the beginning of the present century, and were known as the Long Barn.

This time-honoured site is near Kennington-cross. William Duke of Cumberland, son of George II, took the title of Earl from Kennington.

PLATE PRESENTED TO THE SPANISH COMMISSIONER.

THE beautiful ewer and dish delineated in our Engraving were a short time since presented to Don Manuel de Yasai, by her Majesty's Commissioners for the Great Exhibition of 1851, as a testimonial of the services rendered by him, and are the workmanship of Messrs. Garrard, of Panton-street. They are copies of superb Italian plate of the workmanship of the seventeenth century, and in the school known as the "Cellini." The ewer is very graceful in its outline; and on the body in compartments are exquisitely designed masks, groups of foliage, fruit, &c., interspersed with animals. The handle is extremely fine in form; and in addition to the rich ornaments on it is a terminal head. The lip is embellished on its under side with a grotesque mask, festoons, flowers, &c.

The dish in its border contains figurative representations of music, geometry, rhetoric, grammar, dialectics, astrology, arithmetic, and history, in small medallions; and in the spaces between are emblems of the various subjects. In the central portion of the dish are representations of the four seasons, in medallions, and between them are emblematic termini.

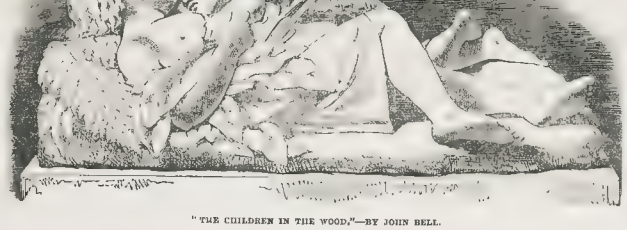
"THE CHILDREN IN THE WOOD." BY JOHN BELL.

THIS exquisite group was purchased by her Majesty at the Great Exhibition of Works of Industry of all Nations, where it was one of the "lions" of the British sculpture. The figures are very beautifully grouped, the attitudes childlike and most affectionate; and, save that there is, perhaps, a little too much of the chubby look of children in health to warrant the notion that they have died of hunger, the expression is very fine. A spray of fern is carried over the bodies, to indicate their last resting-place in the wood.



"THE CHILDREN IN THE WOOD."—BY JOHN BELL.

MR. GORDON CUMMING.

WE understand that Mr. Gordon Cumming has just arrived in London, to superintend personally the arrangements for the removal of his South African Museum, which will, for this purpose, be shortly closed. We therefore recommend those who have not yet visited this extraordinary collections to take the earliest opportunity of doing so. Its several objects are so many illustrations of Mr. Gordon's life of adventure, which it may be interesting to recount.

Raoulcine Gordon Cumming, second son of Sir William Gordon Cumming, Bart., of Altyre, Morayshire, was educated under a tutor whose early life had been passed in the interior of India, and who contributed to inflame the innate passion of every Highlander for field sports by inspiring Raoulcine with his own taste for adventure in foreign lands, and study of the natural history of the largest and fiercest animals in their native haunts. Gordon Cumming commenced his career by strenuously practising the Highland sports, in which he still excels; and in pursuing Highland game with an ardour and pertinacity which more than once involved him in serious disputes with the proprietors of deer forests, whose territories he invaded in order to complete his collection of stags' heads of ten and more tines.

The bounds of the Scotch Highlands being too narrow for the mighty hunter, he obtained a commission in the Hon. East India Company's service, with the view of pursuing the boar, the bear, and the tiger of India; but either the discipline of the Indian army, or the tame, safe system of the Indian hunting parties, was unsuitable to his ardent temperament. Therefore, again migrating, he proceeded to South Africa, with a commission in the Cape Mounted Rifle Corps. But in Africa, as in India, the regular hours, the formal parades, and punctual obedience of military service, were ill suited to the disposition of one who might have commanded a company of wild horsemen in the middle ages, but was certainly never born to obey. Accordingly, he resigned his commission; and in October, 1843, set out from Graham's Town on his first of hunting expeditions in the far interior of South Africa, which lasted five years, and led him through many districts previously untrodden by white men.

In these expeditions commercial speculations were made to bear the cost of Gordon Cumming's love of sport and adventure, and he returned loaded with the teeth of elephants and hippopotami, the skins and horns of many curious beasts, and the feathers of the ostrich, obtained by barter from black tribes.

These adventures have been detailed with great, almost too great, minuteness in his "Hunter's Life in South Africa;" for the writer has not learned the ars celare artem, by which the inevitable bloodshedding of his pursuits would have been toned down by reflections or descriptions. And cockney critics, whose experience lies more among bleached calves' cutlets and pâtes of tortured geese livers than in African life, have expressed incredulity as to some of the lion, elephant, and snake stories; but experienced African hunters are prepared to confirm, and more than confirm, all Gordon Cumming's adventures.

He is indeed an extraordinary man—the incarnation of that spirit of eager sportsmanship which is characteristic of the men of these islands; a spirit which gives vigour and manliness to our national character, promotes a love of air, exercise, and natural scenery, and redeems thousands from the sensual pleasures of ultra-civilisation and the calculating coldness of money worship. Upwards of six feet in height, admirably proportioned for strength and agility, active as one of his native Highland red deer, with a countenance that would be feminine but for his thick moustache and the latent fire of his calm, piercing eyes, with a step at once elastic and majestic, bare-headed and bare-armed, clothed in his Highland garb, advancing toward, or awaiting the onset of, one of the fearful beasts of the African desert, Gordon Cumming might be termed the Cœur de Lion of the nineteenth century—

Lord of lion heart and eagle eye.

He realises the Scandinavian poet's description of a Berseker, "a strong-armed, blue-eyed, fair-faced hero," slaying and singing ballads—himself the subject of ballads, or a knight whose deeds old Froissart would have delighted to record. Gordon Cumming is not merely a strong striker: although he has not written poetry, it is evident from his rude notes that he has the feelings of a warrior poet. He exults in the loneliness of the desert. When lying in ambush at night, within a few yards of lions, hyenas, and wolves, he finds in sounds that would strike terror into most men "the sweetest music he ever heard." His self-confidence is perfect, his aim certain, his nerves iron. His presence of mind never deserts him. When watching in an ambush-pit he falls asleep, and, waking, finds himself surrounded by a growling pack of ferocious wild hounds, his gun unloaded—in fact, unarmed—he stands erect, spreading his blanket at full length, and," addressing them in loud, sonorous tones, ends with a wild scream, on which the savage pack take flight."

The accompanying Illustration portrays Mr. Cumming as he lately appeared in a display of club exercise, at the Hanover-square Rooms.

Mr. Gordon Cumming's Exhibition has been honoured by a Royal visit during the week; their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and Prince Alfred, attended by Mr. Gibbs, having inspected the collection on Tuesday morning.

SYON.—DISTANT VIEW OF THE GREAT PLANT-HOUSE.

SYON.—THE SEAT OF HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND.

Syon, in the parish of Isleworth, is too well known to Thames tourists to need special description. The long façade of the mansion, seen from the river, scarcely reminds one of its origin—a monastery of Bridgetine priests and nuns, founded in 1414 by Henry V., and originally settled at Twickenham. Within the walls of this monastery, after its desecration, Catherine Howard, Queen of Henry VIII., was confined shortly before her execution. The site was granted by Edward VI. to the Protector Somerset, who commenced the present Syon House, which has received great additions and alterations from the Dukes of Northumberland the subsequent proprietors. The mansion contains some interesting portraits, re-peopling, as it were, its historic walls

Our present visit is, however, to the out-door attractions of Syon. Its gardens, with their triumphs of horticultural science; and its noble trees, with their gigantic picturesqueness, relieve the flatness of the site. To extensive pleasure grounds skirting the Thames, from the middle of Battersea to Isleworth Ferry, with the once noble gardens, had received little attention since the early days of Queen Anne, when the late Duke of Northumberland caused designs [illegible] embellishing the whole of the grounds, 75 acres in extent. All the improvements and introductions since Brown completed the gardens [illegible] ons of hardy trees and shrubs; whilst the most [illegible] ning preserved prominent in the view [illegible] the artificial rockery constructed for Alpine plants, the grand [illegible] the improvements is the range of plant houses, with the substitution of [illegible] the frames for the wood-framed roofs and sides of the old choal of hothouse manufactures.

The range of plant-houses, 400 feet in length, designed by Mr. Richard Forrest, consists of nine divisions, so contrived that each can be kept at its own [illegible] temperature, suitable to the health and beauty of its plants: yet the [illegible] upon any special occasion, be thrown open, giving the various [illegible] of the world with their various inhabitants. These plant houses take the form of a crescent; the centre one is 65 feet high; the two end-houses being broader and higher than the intermediate part. The framework of the entire roof is formed of light iron bars; and the ends and centre have wood pillars and cornices. The whole range is filled with plate glass. The metallic roofing was manufactured by Messrs. Jones and Co., of Birmingham; it has stood some twenty years without shrinking; and was the first metallic horticultural structure of any importance. The steam-warming apparatus was fitted by Tredgold, the eminent engineer; the cast-iron pipes being laid beneath the pathways, and provided with valves for the admission, when required, of vapour, so conducive to the health of tropical plants: the whole being heated by one fire, 300 feet from the building. The contractors for the heating apparatus were Messrs. Bailey, of Holborn. Several things have, we believe, fruited here, which have not borne fruit anywhere else in Britain; and many plants, which here fruit profusely, are scarcely ever to be seen in general collections. The houses stand upon a raised stone basement, adorned with elegant terra-cottas, as planted with fruit and foliage, attributed to Gibbons. The end portions of the building are used as conservatories for orange-trees, camellias, bougmansias, &c., with a few showy flowers.

In front of this range of plant-houses is a flower-garden, with a basin and fountain; and lines of standard roses by the side of the walks. The entire garden establishment is supplied with water from an artesian well, 460 feet deep.

The kitchen-garden comprises three and four acres; and the forcing-houses have the roofs, fronts, and ends mainly of iron, the bars of the sashes being of copper. These, also, are the work of Messrs. Jones. The principal range, for early fruits, is 100 feet long. At the end of the range is a conservative structure, occupied principally by the Victoria Regia, which flowered here shortly after the specimen at Chatsworth.

The Dowager Duchess of Northumberland, who resides at Syon, is a distinguished botanist; and when her Grace was governante to our gracious Queen, [illegible] during our minority, occasionally occupied, with the Duchess of Kent, the state apartments at Syon. The Royal observation of the beauties of the [illegible] gardens here doubtless led to their ornament, Mr. Forrest, being subsequently employed in the improvements at Frogmore, where he has completed the most extensive range of metal-framed glass in the world, designed from the Syon forcing-house.

The grounds of Syon are beautifully diversified with rare shrubby and half-shrubby plants; and a double avenue of Limes, near the side of the water are admirable groups of deciduous cypress; and in other parts of the park, the old thorns have become trees. Fine mosque groups of the common acacia crest on the westerly side of the park; and there are some extremely beautiful [illegible] blooms between the bridge and [illegible] usion is a majestic cedar, which our Artist has here portrayed [illegible] Old Cedars of this tree still five old plane. The companion View is sketched from the rosary.

Last year, the mansion and grounds of Syon were most liberally thrown open to the public by their noble owner.

To return to monastic Syon. Mr. Burke, in his recently published "Visitation of the Seats and Arms of the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Great Britain," has fully described the history of Syon as a religious house, and of its subsequent owners, the Percy family; and he has been at much pains to trace the sisterhood of Syon, from their second dissolution by Buonaparte to their refuge in Flanders, at Rouen, and at Lisbon; their return to England in 1808, and their settlement at Syon House, Peckham. Of the ancient community, the last remnant of the once powerful and richly-endowed sisterhood of Syon," at Cobridge, near Newcastle, Staffordshire: where the surviving nuns were visited, a few years since, by the late and present Duchesses of Northumberland, the proprietors of the [illegible] demesnes, where the old charters of the monastery and lands of Syon are preserved at Alnwick Towers, the seat of the Earl of Percy.

THE FARMERS' CHARTER.—MR. COBDEN.

The committee of the Eastern Counties Agricultural Relief Association have issued an appeal to their brother farmers, in which they announce a new charter, with five points:—

"First, the [illegible] sistent an unconditional repeal of the malt tax; addise, as to [illegible] the deficiency [illegible] created by the malt duty is to be supplied, that is no [illegible] of course. We do not set up for Chancellors of the Exchequer, but we do believe that 'where there is will there's a way;' that economy instead of extravagance, and a cutting down of sinecures and salaries, would do much, and that an increase of the Property-tax would be better than the continuance of the malt duty.

"Secondly. They go for a just measure of the tenant right which shall secure to an out-going tenant the value not the cost of all actual improvements made either in the building or on the land, at the termination of our holding.

"Thirdly. They say that county expenditure should be controlled by elective boards, as proposed by Mr. Milner Gibson.

"Fourthly.—They demand that the only game which should be preserved is winged game; that hares and rabbits should be considered what they really are, vermin to be killed as such by any one who could do so without trespassing.

"Fifthly. They require the abolition of all restrictions on the growth and manufacture of excisable articles, the growth of tobacco and manufacture of beet-root and potato-starch sugar, and the distillation of spirits from grain or potatoes, to place them on equal terms with the foreign farmer, who grows his own tobacco, manufactures his own sugar, or distils spirits from the surplus produce of the farm;" and, in conclusion, they repudiate Protection, and publish the following letter from Mr. Cobden:—

"House of Commons, 16th June, 1852.

"My dear Sir,—In reply to your letter, urging the Parliamentary Reformers to take up the question of the malt-tax, I can do no more than reiterate the arguments I have before used. The Parliamentary and Financial Reformers have already taken the only steps that can possibly lead to the removal of the malt tax, by voting for a large reduction of expenditure. When I brought forward my motion in favour of going back, as speedily as practicable, to the expenditure of 1835, I was supported by the whole of the Parliamentary Reformers representing large towns, but was opposed en masse by the agricultural representatives. Mr. Disraeli has since taken credit to his party in this House [illegible] himself if they intended to apply to your appeal to the Financial and Parliamentary Reform members, I will make an appeal to the agricultural constituencies. Send us members to help us in the House, and we can muster at least, for a division, as many as you have on the agricultural member who votes with the Financial Reformers. Until the farmers can point out to at least one member, sent into the House by them, in support of the Parliamentary and Financial Reform, they ought not to expect to throw upon us the blame of not succeeding in repealing the malt tax. There are some people to be found who are weak enough to believe in the possibility of repealing the malt tax, yielding from five to six millions, without reducing the Government expenditure. I should like to know what other tax they propose to substitute for it. I challenge them to show any one tax which could be imposed in lieu of it that would not be more objectionable; but I should wish to see the farmers get upon the true scent, and not be running after red-herring trails all their lives. I repeat, let the farmers, who boast so much of their power, send us one man, at least, to vote with the sixty or eighty representatives for large towns in favour of large reduction of expenditure. Then, and not till then, will they have taken the first step towards the accomplishment of their favourite object—the repeal of the malt tax.

"On moving the division of the third reading of the Militia Bill, I find that all the representatives of the large towns voted against it; and all the members for the agricultural constituencies were in favour of it. It was, in fact, carried by the farmers' friends.

"I regret what I have said [illegible] of those farmers' friends would stay away from the House, we could [illegible] and ultimately repeal the malt tax. [illegible] my constituency, and I [illegible] for not succeeding. Hume has already told you, that [illegible] during which he has been labouring to carry out economy and financial reform, great opposition have been [illegible] the House fully confirms the statement. Every years [illegible] [illegible] Johnson."

"R. COBDEN

[illegible] have arrived by a steamer from Boulogne, addressed to his Royal Highness the Duke de Nemours, and containing furniture and other effects, the property of the ex-Royal family of France. The whole of the packages are rendered by the illustrious exiles at Claremont.

The Western Star, speaking of the exodus of the people from the province of Connaught, in Ireland, says there is no doubt that in a few years more it must stop as it has to the present, only, alas, of the people to America, and latterly to Australia—those will not be a man left of the present race of inhabitants to be found, within the compass of the four provinces. From the west, it is added, they are flying in hundreds.

A young girl who was in service as a housemaid in Lisbon, and who had been placed in the Foundling Hospital of that city by an Englishman, some twenty years ago, has just been declared entitled to a fortune of £70,000 left to her by her father.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The calendar shows little of interest in the shape of racing for next week, the only fixtures being Carlisle, on Tuesday and two following days; Ludlow and Chelmsford, on Wednesday and Thursday; and Salisbury, on Thursday and Friday. The following are cricketers' appointments for the week:—Monday, at Lord's, the gentlemen of England against the gentlemen of Kent; and All England match at Banbury; the Vine Club against the West Kent, at Sevenoaks; the Lansdowne against the Taunton, at Taunton; at Eton, the Harlequins against the Present Etonians, Tuesday, the Surrey and West Wickham Clubs, at West Wickham. Wednesday, the Kennington and Chertsey Clubs, at the Oval; the Lansdowne against the Teinbridge, at Tolnbridge. Thursday, return match at Eton between the M. C. and Etonians; Surrey against all England at the Surrey ground; the Gore Court and Vine, at Sevenoaks; and the Vale of Taunton against Exmouth, at Taunton. The only regatta in the calendar is the Paisley, on Saturday.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Notwithstanding that a check was given to the upward movement in the value of Consols on Wednesday, in consequence of a large sale of stock (£100,000) and the differences between the Legislative Assembly and the President of the French Republic, the market for the national securities has been considered firm. On Monday, the Three per Cents for the Account were done at 101¾ ⅞; on the following day they reached 102⅝ to 101; but on Wednesday they receded to 102⅜ ⅞. During the whole of Thursday prices were very steady, at 102⅛ ⅜. Thus it will be perceived that the actual rise has amounted to ⅜ per cent. Other stocks have exhibited very great firmness, the New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents being done on Thursday at 104⅜ ½; and the Three per Cents Reduced, 101⅜ ½ to ⅝. Bank stock has improved in value, the last quotation being 224. Long Annuities, 1860, were 6 15-16, ⅞; and 1859, 6⅝ 11-16. Large investments have been made in the Unfunded Debt, at from par to ⅛ premium for the March bills, and 6⅜ to 7⅜ for June. India Bonds have reached 2 to 3 ⅜ premium.

Since we last wrote, the imports of the precious metals have been on a scale of almost unequalled magnitude, not less than £350,000 in gold having been received from Australia and New York, and £320,000 from Brazil, Portugal, Mexico, &c., 497,492 dollars of the latter being in silver, and 679,240 dollars in gold. These supplies, added to those in the preceding week, make a total import, in one week, of £670,000. The effect of this great influx is, that the whole of the foreign exchanges are still in favour of the country, and as our export trade is still rapidly increasing, further heavy arrivals may be looked for. The demand for gold for France has been considerable. California, state that the produce of the mines was rapidly on the increase. Some parties appear to be apprehensive of a sudden speculative mania, the results of which it may be difficult to foresee; but we are of opinion that every effort will be made by all parties to "spread" the gold in one but fair channels of investment. The present position of the Bank of England is now an extraordinary one, the supply of gold in its vaults being about £300,000 more than its total note circulation. Most of the private and joint-stock banks hold unusually large balances; hence good paper is readily discounted at very low rates.

The demand for foreign Stocks has been by no means so active as might have been anticipated; nevertheless, the quotations have kept up extremely well. On Thursday Austrian Scrip was marked 3⅞ to 4¼, premium; Brazilian Five per Cents were 101⅜; Ditto, New, 101⅛; Buenos Ayres Six per Cents, 77¼ to 78¾, Granada, Deferred, 10; Mexican Three per Cents, 27 to 26½ 27¾; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 106¾ to 104¾; Spanish Three per Cents, 49¾ to 49⅝; Ditto, New Deferred, 22¾ to 22½; Venezuela Three-and-a-Half per Cents, for the Account, 45¾ 44¾ to 45¾; Austrian Five per Cents, 83; and Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 64¾ to 65. Chilian Six per Cents have been done at 106; Ecuador, 4⅜; Portuguese Converted Four per Cents, 39¾; Sardinian Five per Cents, for Account, 94¼ ⅜; Spanish Passive, 5⅞ ⅜; and Venezuelan Three-and-a-Half per Cents, 44¼ to 46.

Messrs. Baring have received about 400,000 dollars on account of the advances made some time since to meet the payment of the Mexican dividends. On Wednesday a meeting of the holders of Buenos Ayrean Bonds was held to consider their actual position. The question of the supply of grain from Patagonia was discussed, in order that a large quantity of that article might be forwarded over to the agents here, and by them be fairly distributed to the creditors. We, however, much question the right of the Government of Buenos Ayres to Patagonia.

Very large transactions have taken place in Bank Shares, the prices of which have again advanced. Australasia have realised 51¼; Colonial, 15; Commercial of London, 9⅝; London and Westminster, 30⅜; South Australian, 23¾; Union of Australia, 48⅝; and Ditto, New, 5.

Commercial Dock Shares have sold at 90⅝; East and West India, 169; London, 130; St. Katharine, 87⅝; and Surrey, 39¾.

Steam-boat Shares have commanded rather more attention, as follows: General Steam, 28¼; Peninsular and Oriental, 87¼ ex. div.; Ditto, New, 38 ex div.; Royal Mail, 79; General Screw, 5⅞; and Australian Royal Mail, 2.

Railway Shares have been in improved request, and the whole of them have been quoted at advanced rates. It must be observed that Caledonian, Aberdeen, Great Northern, and other shares, with £20 paid up, are now called "stock," and, as the dealings are usually for five shares, the committee have had them quoted at £100 paid. The following are the official closing prices on Tuesday

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—During the present week, the arrivals of English wheat, coastwise and by land carriage, have been on a very limited scale, and in but middling condition. For all kinds the demand has ruled steady, at an advance of 1s per quarter, at which good clearances have been easily effected. Fine foreign wheats have changed hands to a fair extent, and the value of low and middling kinds has been well supported. Floating cargoes of wheat have produced full currencies, but Indian corn has ruled a shade lower. A steady business has been doing in barley, and malt has met a full inquiry. Low parcels of oats have given way 6d per quarter; but both beans and peas have improved in value 1s per quarter. The demand for flour has been unsatisfactory.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 38s to 44s, ditto, white, 42s to 46s; Yorkshire and Norfolk, red, 36s to 42s, ditto, white, 38s to 45s; rye, 30s to 32s; grinding barley, 25s to 28s; distilling ditto, 26s to 28s; malting ditto, 28s to 30s; Norfolk and Lincoln malt, 54s to 56s; brown ditto, 44s to 49s; Kingston and Ware, 54s to 58s; Chevalier, 58s to 62s; Yorkshire and Lincoln, 52s to 56s; beans, 32s to 34s; Lincoln and Essex, 32s to 33s; Suffolk and Yorkshire, 34s to 35s; grey peas, 34s to 36s; maple, 34s to 36s, white, 36s to 38s; Kingston and Essex, 38s to 39s per quarter. Flour, 35s to 40s; Suffolk, 28s to 32s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 30s to 33s per 280 lb.—Foreign. American red wheat, 32s to 33s per barrel, French, 36s to 42s per sack.

The Scott Markets.—The general demand is in a very inactive state, and prices are almost nominal.

LEADENHALL.—Last week, sowing, 40s to 42s; Baltic, crushing, 44s to 47s. Mediterranean and Odessa, ditto, 40s to 42s; Egyptian, 37s to 37s per quarter. Cortlandt, 40s to 42s per cwt. Brown mustard-seed, 7s to 8s; white ditto, 5s 6d to 6s 6d. Tares, 5s 6d to 6s 6d per bushel. English rapeseed, new, £21 to £24 per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £7 15s to £8; Baltic, £6 10s to £6 15s per ton. Rape cakes, £4 5s to £4 10s per ton. Canary, 55s to 56s per quarter. English clover seed, red, 40s to 48s; white ditto, 60s to 68s; Foreign, red, 42s to 46s; white ditto, 48s to 56s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 6d to 7d; of household ditto, 5d to 6d per 4 lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 40s 9d; barley, 27s 5d; oats, 20s 9d; rye, 30s 2d; beans, 32s 8d; peas, 31s 6d.

The Six Weeks Average.—Wheat, 40s 9d; barley, 27s 9d; oats, 20s 9d; rye, 30s 2d; beans, 31s 10d; peas, 30s 10d.

Duties.—Wheat, 1s; barley, 1s; oats, 1s; rye, 1s; beans, 1s; peas, 1s.

Tea.—The demand for most kinds is in a very inactive state, at about stationary prices Common mixed congou is selling at 8d to 8½d per lb. The total stock in London on the 19th inst. was 44,053,000 lb, against 39,233,000 lb last year.

Sugar.—Although a fair average business has been transacted in most kinds of raw sugar, prices have ruled about 6d per cwt lower than in the previous week. Ordinary yellow Barbadoes, 34s 6d to 35s 6d; middling, 35s to 36s 6d; fine ditto, 37s to 38s; fine mixed, 36s 6d to 37s 6d; fine yellow Mauritius, 38s to 39s 6d; middling to good, 32s to 34s 6d; fine Bengal, 36s to 37s; Madras, 34s to 35s; fine white, 44s; fine white Benares, 45s per cwt. Molasses move off slowly, at from 47s to 49s per cwt. Crushed tolerably firm. The total consumption in the 19th inst. were 2,70...356 cwts against 2,271,979 ditto in 1851.

Coffee.—Although our last report only a limited business has been done in this market, yet good ordinary native Ceylon is still quoted at 44s to 44s 6d per cwt.

Rice.—The demand in this market is steady, but we have no change to notice in the quotations.

Provisions.—Irish butter is in very moderate request, at a further decline of 2s per cwt. Fine mild qualities are selling to-day at 76s; mild ditto, 60s to 70s per cwt; and fresh, 8s to 10s per dozen lb. No change in foreign. Irish bacon has given way 2s per cwt. Hams are in good request, and prices have a tendency upward. Landed prices are as follows:—Fine 80s, and fine hogs, 52s to 54s. Pork scarce, and prime India is worth 45s per tierce. No change in other articles.

Tallow.—The demand is less active, but P.Y.C. on the spot is held at 38s 9d per cwt. Town tal...w, 37s per cwt, on cash, rough fat, 2s 1d per 8 lb.

Oils.—Linseed, 28s to 28s, sondrum, and linseed oils move off from, and prices have an upward tendency. In other articles very little is doing.

Spirits.—Rum and brandy have given way 1d per gallon. Geneva, 2s 10d to 2s 11d; and East Indian 1s 6d per gallon proof. All other kinds of rum are quite as dear as last week. Brandy and corn spirits are in steady request, at fu...ormer rates.

Hops.—The accounts from the plantations being very favourable, the demand for all kinds of hops is very inactive, but we have no decline to notice in prices

Wool.—The stock of Colonial wool is now 55,000 bales, which will shortly be submitted to public competition.

Potatoes. Old qualities are now nearly out of season. New ones are coming freely to hand, and in excellent condition.

Smithfield.—The beef trade has ruled somewhat active at a further advance in the quotations of 2d per 8 lb. In the value of other stock no change has taken place:—

Beef, from 2s 10d to 4s 0d; mutton, 3s 10d to 4s 8d; lamb, 4s 8d to 5s 6d; veal, 3s 10d to 4s 6d; pork, 2s 6d to 3s 8d per 8 lb. to sink the offals.

Newgate and Leadenhall. Rather a large business has been transacted in these markets, at extreme currencies:—

Beef, from 2s 8d to 3s 6d; mutton, 3s 8d to 3s 10d; lamb, 4s 10d to 4s 10d; veal, 3s 4d to 3s 10d; pork, 3s 6d to 4s 6d per 8 lb.

SILVER CANDELABRUM, PRESENTED TO VISCOUNT DUNCAN, M.P., BY THE CITY OF BATH.

PLATE PRESENTED TO VISCOUNT DUNCAN, M.P.

On Saturday last, a deputation from the city of Bath attended at Lord Duncan's residence in Hill-street, Berkeley-square, to present his Lordship with a piece of plate, subscribed for by persons of various political parties, in acknowledgment of his valuable, persevering, and energetic exertions which the repeal of the Window-Tax last year crowned with success. The deputation, consisting of W. Hunt, Esq. (ex-Mayor of Bath); T. Gill, Esq.; and Thomas Herrett, Esq. (Sheriff), were received by his Lordship and Viscountess Duncan, the Earl and Countess of Camperdown, Sir G. Phillips, and other distinguished members of his Lordship's family.

The Testimonial is a massive silver candelabrum, convertible into an épergne. From a triangular base rises an oak trunk with six branches, e ornamented with foliage and acorns. At the angles of the base are three figures in frosted silver—Aurora, Hygeia, and a Roman orator—emblematical of light, health, and eloquence. On two sides of the base are the arms of the city of Bath and the family arms of the noble Lord; and on the third the following inscription:—

Presented to their Parliamentary representative, Lord Viscount Duncan, by the people of Bath and other friends wholly irrespective of political party, as a testimonial of their esteem and gratitude for his Lordship's able and unremitting exertions through five sessions of Parliament in seeking to obtain the abolition of the Window Duty, and which at length was so happily and decisively effected in 1851.

The Plate was designed and manufactured by Mr. Poole, of Bath: its weight is 322 ounces; and it is a very beautiful work.

The testimonial was presented by Mr. Hunt, with an appropriate address, thanking his Lordship for his public services since 1841, and his uniform attention to their local interests, irrespective of political party. He also strongly expressed the regret of a large majority of the constituency, of all shades of opinion, that it was not Lord Duncan's intention of allowing them another opportunity of returning him as one of the representatives of the city of Bath.

Lord Duncan, in his reply, congratulated the deputation on the successful issue of the struggle which the design of the memorial so faithfully illustrates; his Lordship adding that he would not consent to monopolise, but merely to share with others, the merit of directing public attention to a grievance, which, fortunately for our character as a civilised and enlightened nation, has ceased to exist in this country.

"I believe," said his Lordship, "that Bath has profited by the remission of the tax as much, if not more, than any other town in the kingdom. This only proves how partial it has been in its operation. The benefit of its remission must be felt especially by the working classes, to whom light and air to their rooms and dwellings is nothing less than strength and health. The revenue has not suffered by this remission; there is little doubt that the saving from the window-tax has been partially employed in the purchase of those articles that affect the Excise and Customs.

After the presentation, the deputation, with several distinguished friends invited by his Lordship to meet them, partook of an elegant déjeûner.

THE LATE M. PRADIER, THE FRENCH SCULPTOR.

We have already announced the death of this most eminent of modern sculptors, which recently took place near Paris. His end was sudden and affecting. While wandering with his young daughter and a party of friends on a day's excursion amid the beauties of Bougival, a momentary sense of discomfort led him to take rest in the house of M. Eugène Forcade, while the rest strayed on, unconscious of the fact, to Marly. Apoplexy had marked him for its own, and in a few hours he was dead; and when his daughter knew that illness had detained him, she was an orphan.

James Pradier was born of a respectable family of artists, of limited means, at Geneva, on January 3, 1796. His strong inclination for sculpture manifested itself when he was but ten years old; and at fifteen he was distinguished by his fine taste and talent for observation of nature.

About the year 1811, M. Denon, President of the French Institute, and Member of the Academy of Fine Arts, visited Geneva, and heard of the juvenile artist, who was in a few days placed under the eminent French sculptor Lemot. In 1812 he was a competitor for the great prize of Rome, given by the French Government, but failed to obtain it, because the work he executed exceeded the required dimensions; he, however, obtained a gold medal instead. The next year he carried off the grand prize, and went to Rome to study for five years. Here many original statues and sketches bore ample testimony to the perseverance of the French school, the skill of the master, and the genius of the young artist. "Orpheus," "The Centaure and la Bacchante," "Niobide," "Venus," "A Nymph," are fine illustrations of the precocious talent of the élève de Rome, partaking of the style of the Greek school.

In 1819 Pradier returned to the School of the Fine Arts of Paris, where he exhibited his group of "Cupid and Venus," "Promethena," "The Graces," "Psyche," an "Odalisque," "Phryné," "The Spring," and "Anacreon with Cupid."

Besides an immense variety of statuettes, sketches, and studies, Pradier has sculptured the four "Renommées" on the front of the Arc de l'Etoile; decorated the fountain of Molière at Paris, as well as the monument erected to the memory of the late Duke of Berry, carved in white marble, and then cast one in silver; the celebrated statuette of "Sappho;" the sparkling fountain at Nismes; and, finally, the two statues of "Victory" to be placed on the Monument to Napoleon.

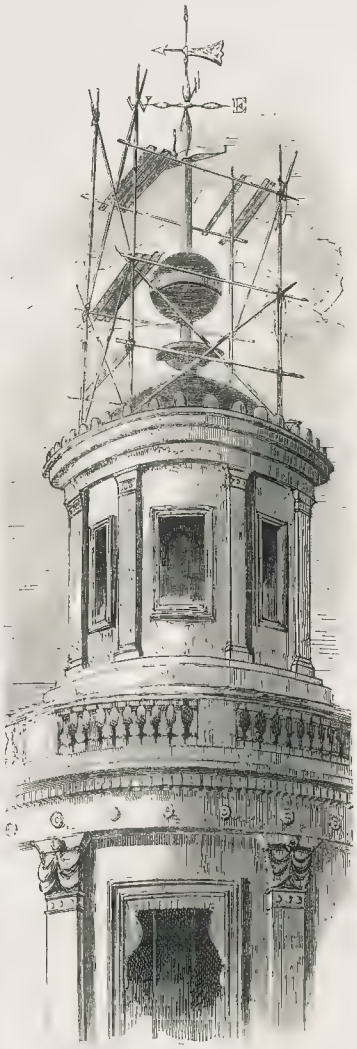
The characteristics of all Pradier's works are great originality and boldness, combined with remarkable chasteness and elegance.

A few days previous to his death, when he was in perfect health, Pradier completed a bust of himself in white marble, gilt, which will be placed upon the pedestal of the sculptor's monument: this bust is in the present Exhibition at Paris, with a statue of "Sappho," also by Pradier. As soon as the directors of the Exhibition heard of the sculptor's death, they ordered a black veil to be thrown over the "Sappho," the effect of which our Artist has represented in the accompanying illustration.

PRADIER'S STATUE OF SAPPHO, AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION, VEILED IN MEMORY OF THE SCULPTOR.

REGULATION OF TIME BY THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.

It will, doubtless, be recollected that for some time past arrangements have been pending between the Electric Telegraph Company, the Astronomer Royal, and the South-Eastern Railway Company, for the establishment and transmission throughout London and the provinces of mean Greenwich or uniform time. For this purpose, a system of ingenious apparatus has been constructed upon the dome of the Telegraph Company's West-end station, No. 448, opposite Hungerford Market. The operations commenced by erecting on the summit of the cupola of the building, under the direction of Mr. Sandys, the apparatus designed by Mr. Edwin Clarke, the Company's engineer. The scaffolding was 30 feet high, and from its summit an uninterrupted view of London and the river was obtainable, the total height of the apparatus being about 110 feet above the level of the



TIME-BALL AT THE ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH COMPANY'S STATION, WEST STRAND.

Thames. The scaffolding having been secured, the next step was that of raising the apparatus, which consists of a long quadrangular shaft or pillar of wood, 38 feet high, and 8 feet in circumference, formed of three sections. The first section of this hollow shaft was fixed by the workmen into the floor of the room underneath the dome, and thence carried through and joined on the second section and the third, the latter of which was then passed through the centre of a large globe or ball, which is intended by means of sympathetic electrical action to fall every day simultaneously with the well-known ball on the top of the Greenwich Observatory, between which and the Strand the electric wires have been completed for the purpose, so as to indicate to all London and the vessels below bridge exact Greenwich time. The ball is nearly 6 feet high, and 16 feet in circumference. It is formed of zinc, painted black, with a broad white belt round it. The shaft is continued a few feet above the ball, and at the extremity is a bright gilded weather vane, with "E. T. C." on it. The apparatus is provided with an air cylinder, in connexion with the telegraphic wires between London and Greenwich; so that when the ball at Greenwich falls, an instantaneous shock of electricity will be communicated along them; and this, acting on an electrical trigger connected with the ball in the Strand, will cause it to fall simultaneously with the one at Greenwich. The first experiment will be tried when the arrangements for the purpose are perfected. The cost of carrying out this novel chronometrical machine is estimated at £1000.

FINE ARTS.

THE RUSTIC ARTIST DRAWING FROM NATURE.

BY W. HEMSLEY.

SUCH is the name of a clever little picture by W. Hemsley, exhibited at the National Institution of Fine Arts, in Regent-street. There is a good deal of originality in the idea, and a nice perception of character displayed in the various features of the personages who compose the interesting group. An unhappy house-dog has been seized, and set up on end against the back of a chair, a [illegible] of being passed round his neck for greater security, whilst an embryo Sir Joshua takes his portrait on a slate. Look at the knitted [illegible] and scrutinising gaze of the artist! There can be no mistake about his being in earnest, and, to use the stereotyped phrase, "thoroughly imbued with his subject." The dog, admonished by the threatening fist of an aide-de-camp, passively submits to the operation, which he seems to understand is intended to promote the general hilarity of the family party. The bystanders have each something to say in the matter, though, like Juliet, they discourse only with their eyes. The little girl is wrapped in mute astonishment; the bigger boy, in the centre, enjoys the joke heartily; whilst the smaller gentleman, examining the artist's work over his shoulder, has all the air and intelligence of a connoisseur.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

(SIXTH NOTICE.)

WHATEVER may be the cause, it is, as we remarked at the outset of our critical labours for the season, the Academicians have done little towards the furnishing forth of the present exhibition—little indeed, whether the term be applied to the number or the character of their works. Charles Landseer, the keeper of the Institution, although he certainly exhibits three pictures, and therefore looks in the index to be an exception to the "singularity" observable in his brother R.A.'s, disappoints us when we come to the works themselves. No. 47, "The Death of Edward III." is a painful, not to say humiliating subject, to which the artist has failed of giving any ennobling interest. The story is taken from the Romanist historian, Lingard—

> On the morning of his death, the Lady Alice Perers drew the ring from his finger and departed. The other domestics had separated to plunder the palace; but a priest, who chanced to be present, hastening to the bed of the dying monarch, admonished him of his situation, and bade him prepare himself to appear before his Creator. Edward, who had just strength sufficient to thank him, took a crucifix into his hands, kissed it, wept, and expired.

To a man thoroughly awake with the solemnity of such an incident, and thoroughly imbued with the feelings under which the historian wrote, the scene offered opportunities for the production of a touching and effective picture; but this has not been the case here. The Lady Alice Perers is a commonplace-looking individual: and there is a coarseness of feature and a vulgarity of expression in the heads, both of the dying monarch and of the priest, which deny them either sympathy or respect on the part of the spectator. This artist's other works are of the most trifling kind: two very small pieces (91), "A Painter's Study," a commonplace collection of old armour, goblets, and articles of costume, not over and above well copied; and (99) "The Bird's-meat man," a curly-headed and rather sentimental looking fellow, with a basket of chickweed and groundsel, standing outside an ancient porch, wherein is a little spaniel barking furiously at him. These are childish affairs for an R.A. to indulge in.

H. W. Phillips has a picture of "The Magdalen" (No. 286)—

> [illegible] last at the cross, and earliest at the tomb.

The penitent sits in an attitude of intense grief, in a wild rocky spot, the cross being seen on high in the distance. The prevailing tone is dark blue, as of the early morn before sunrise, throwing the figure into relief. We like the simplicity of the treatment observed in this work, which, with a little more of the [illegible]er expression of grief thrown into the face, would be worthy of unqualified commendation.

Four circular pieces by C. Brookes, in the middle room, two and two on either side of the two doors, emblematical of the four seasons, are of a merit which must not pass unacknowledged. They are four little groups of children, something after the manner of Giulio Romano and the followers of his school; and the idea in each is pretty and appropriate. In "Spring" we have the youngest urchin of three tempted forward by the presentation of a primrose, which one of his elder companions has just gathered; in "Summer" all three are disporting themselves in a rich yellow corn [illegible] decked with poppies and other field flowers; "Autumn" gives them grapes, peaches, and other fruits of the season; and "Winter" clothes their hitherto naked forms with sheep-skins, in which they strive to make themselves as warm and comfortable as possible. The groups are all designed with great spirit and taste; and the execution of the figures and the colouring of the flesh are better than we too often find in modern attempts of this kind.

G. B. O'Neill has a very clever little picture, the "Foundling" (No. 235), founded upon a passage in Crabbe's "Parish Register"—

> To name an infant met our vi[illegible]
> Assembled all, as such event requires—
> Frequent and full, the rural sages sate,
> And speakers many urged the long debate—
> . . . . . .
> Some harden'd knaves, who roved the country round,
> Had left a babe within the parish bound.

The gravity which pervades the assembly of "rural sages," deliberating upon the necessary parochial proceedings in regard to the little stranger, is happily contrasted with the important earnestness of the old lady who has brought the intruder before them, and who seems proud of her charge, and the playful mood of the child itself, who, little dreaming of the terrors of a parish board, wants to snatch up an old gentleman's red leather spectacle-c[illegible] Another old gentleman contemplates the young intruder through a pocket-glass, with a mixture of indifference and idle curiosity, just as he would scan a tortoise, or hedgehog, or other strange apparition. The colouring is delicate and effective.

Unfavourably hung up in a corner in the West Room is a little picture by W. Davis, of Liverpool, which betrays much earnestness of intention under a garb of unaffected simplicity. "The Canary" (443) introduces us to a poor seddon's girl, in an humble attic, the sole companions of whose leisure are a gold fish and a canary. To the latter, whose cage is hung up in the sun, she is conveying his daily supply of water, for which he is looking out from behind his wire barrier. There is something in the expression of the girl which speaks of privation, yet of content—of patient toil and much, struggling in the wide world without, and of great reward and comfort in the inspiriting notes of her dear canary. The colouring is sober, perhaps rather too much so for ensuring effect at a first view; but still, upon the whole, well in keeping with the moral of the situation.

Amongst the landscapes in the same room we remark two very agreeable ones, placed side by side: that by M. A. Ruytenbrouwer (503), "A Ruin in Ardennes," is a romantic spot, in which rock and wood are harmoniously intermixed, a very warm delicate atmosphere pervading the whole. No. 504, by F. W. Hulme, "The River Llugwy Betwys-y-Coed, North Wales," is cooler in tone, but very dashing and masterly in treatment.

Next door to the above we have a fiery red production, by G. P. Manby (530), "The Medicine Man, or Doctor, performing his medicines or mysteries over a dying chief, with the skin of a [illegible] and [illegible] curious articles of dress thrown over him, with his mystery rattle and spear, which he supposes possesses a supernatural power in the art of healing and curing the sick. A scene taken from 'Catlin's History of the North American Indians,' and curious enough in its way, but the merit of which would be better [illegible] Egyptian Hall than where it is. Our great [illegible] at the artist of any ability and resources [illegible] these [illegible] such as that which has been both industriously and creditably accomplished.

BRITISH AGRICULTURE.

SURREY.

BY T. ROWLANDSON, C.E., F.G.S.

Population .. .. [illegible] | Area .. .. 907,920 acres.

Soils.—This county possesses soils of a very varied character, and in some places much intermixed. Parts of Bagshot Heath are amongst the most sterile lands in England, whilst a portion of the most noted hop-grounds in the vicinity of Farnham have a natural fertility rarely equalled, and nowhere excelled. The southern portion of the county is occupied by the Weald clays of a tough, tenacious character, which, from the want of artificial drainage, is very retentive of moisture a circumstance that occasions the climate over the Weald to be cold and damp. To such as have not visited this district, but who are acquainted with the comparatively small average annual rain in the Weald, the luxuriance of the lichens and mosses that are found growing on the timber, hedgerows, walls, palings, &c., would be incredible, being of more vigorous growth than that found in the moist climate of the English northern, South, and Irish mountains. The district which adjoins, and is [illegible] of the Weald of Sussex [illegible] in its most southern part, the whole width of Surrey from Wilderwick to Haselmere, a distance of more than thirty miles. It contracts on the eastern side of the county from Haslemere to Godalming, being deeply indented between these towns with a sandy loam. The Weald of Surrey is characterised by great sameness of physical properties: its elevation above the level of the sea is but trifling for an inland district. The subsoil of the Weald clays is more retentive than the surface. Much wood is grown in the Weald, though rather of an interspersed and hedgerow character. On a fine summer's day the view of the Weald from Hindhead (890 feet above the level of the sea) presents a beautiful sylvan appearance. The Weald clay is easily rendered unfit for the plough by wet weather; and, when once completely soaked with rain, requires a very long course of dry and windy weather, to adapt it for aration. Parallel with and adjoining the Weald is a wide extent of country occupied by the Lower Greensand, which rises to considerable elevations, the summits of Hindhead and Leith Hills being respectively more than 800 feet above the level of thesea; in fact, this part of Surrey forms the greatest development of the lower greensand to be found in inland district. The subsoil of the Weald is generally reddish in the sameness of not less than 600 feet. The general characters of this formation are, easily recognisable in the country between Sevenoaks, Reigate, Dorking, and Godalming, for the study of which the railway affords great facilities. In this district it consists of thick masses of coarse quartzose light yellow sands, interstratified with others of a finer grain and of a brighter colour, ochreous and shaded red, sometimes nearly white, and adapted for glass-making, and irregular bands of hard very ferruginous sandstone, and sometimes of chert, are sometimes common. Subjoined to the whole are a few beds of greensand and clay; and at Nutfield there is found the celebrated bed of Fuller's earth. In some places the strata pass into soft porous sandstones; and in others they again become gritty and coarse. As a whole the [illegible] very absorbent and permeable, and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

EMIGRATION DEPOT AT BIRKENHEAD.

DEPOT AT BIRKENHEAD, FOR THE RECEPTION OF GOVERNMENT EMIGRANTS TO AUSTRALIA; WITH A VESSEL ALONGSIDE THE WHARF PREPARING FOR THE VOYAGE.

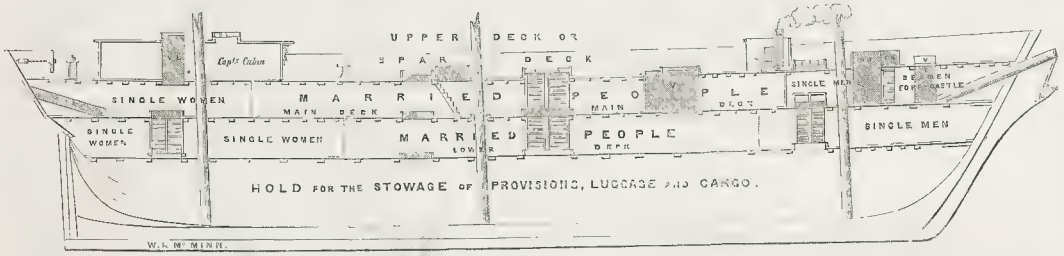
When in port, and for one or two days afterwards, if practicable, two-thirds of a pound of fresh meat, one pound and a half of soft bread, and one pound of potatoes, per adult, are issued, with a suitable supply of vegetables, in lieu of salt and preserved meat, and of flour, suet, raisins, rice, and peas.

It is in the discretion of the surgeon superintendent to issue three times a week, to children under seven, four ounces of rice or three ounces of sago, in lieu of salt meat.

The surgeon has liberty to draw an additional quart of water daily for the use of each person sick in the hospital.



SECTION OF THE EMIGRANT SHIP "BOURNEUF," OF LIVERPOOL, BURDEN 1495 TONS; SHOWING THE ARRANGEMENT FOR GOVERNMENT PASSENGERS TO AUSTRALIA.

The commissioners formerly despatched their emigrant ships from Deptford and Plymouth; but, latterly, private enterprise pointed out Birkenhead as a suitable place, and the commissioners now despatch three or four ships a month from that depôt.

All parties are loud in praise of the arrangements for convenience of the business and for the comfort of the emigrants at the Birkenhead depôt; and our readers will best understand this by the accompanying Engravings.

First is the ship Bourneuf, of 1495 tons, taking on board her passengers alongside the quay, and an exterior view of the Depôt.

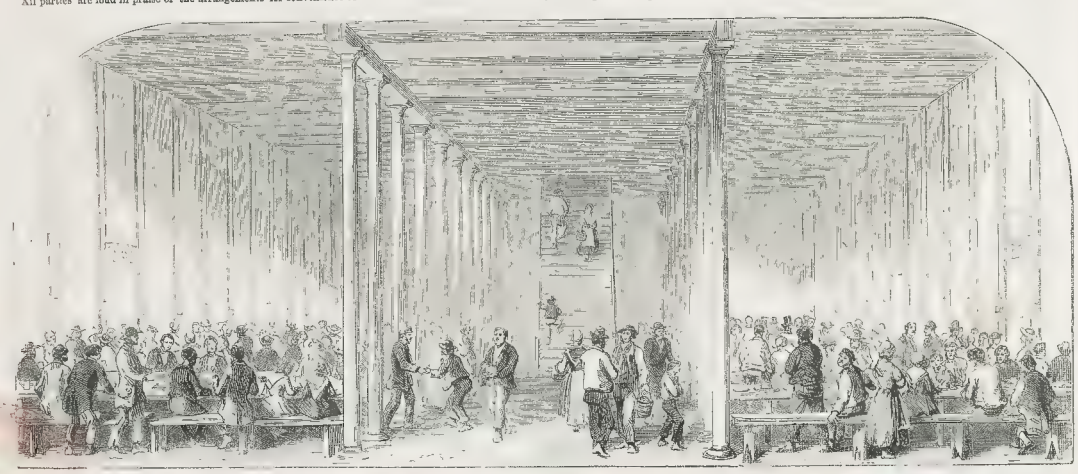
Next is a section of the Bourneuf, showing her fittings up and arrangements for meals, and sleeping berths, distinguishing single males from the females and the married couples.

Thirdly is the interior of the large and well-ventilated dining-hall, showing the emigrants at dinner. This room comfortably accommodates six hundred people, and they are divided into classes—English, Irish, and Scotch—each table being so marked.



GOVERNMENT EMIGRANTS' MESS-ROOM.
